TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCE IAMES, BY THE GRACE OF GOD KING OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, FRAVNCE, AND IRELAND, defendor of the faith, &c.

IT may of ſome, and not without iuſt cauſe (moſt gratious and dread Soueraigne) be imputed vnto me for no ſmall preſumption, to preſent vnto your royall Maieſtie (a prince of ſo great learning and iudgement) theſe homely fruits of mine endeuours and paines taken in the Generall Hiſtorie of the Turks, and ſtrange ſucceſſe of their great and mightie Othoman Empire. Whereunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rare and wonderfull clemencie ioyned vnto many other the great and moſt reſplendent vertues of your heroicall mind; the leaſt whereof, is ſufficient to haue cheared vp my weake and feeble ſpirits; but alſo by the encouragement of the right Worſhipfull my moſt eſpeciall friend Sir Peter Manwood knight, the firſt moouer of me to take this great Worke in hand, and my continuall and onely comfort and helper therein. Which to doe, I was alſo the more deſirous, ſeeing diuers little volumes and ſmall parts of the Hiſtorie preſented vnto the greateſt Princes: as the little Treatiſe of Pau. Iouius, de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mightie Emperour Charles the fift: and the ſmall Hiſtorie of Cælius Secundus, de Bello Melitenſi, vnto her late ſacred Maieſtie, of moſt happie and bleſſed memorie, the rare Phœnix of her ſex, who now reſteth in glorie: with diuers others of like ſort, by the learned authors thereof ſtill commended ſome to one great prince of their times, ſome to others: all filling me vvith good hope, that this whole and continuat Hiſtorie of that Northerne and warlike Nation (vvhich in ſhort time by God his appointment hath brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon a great part of the world as former times haue ſildome or neuer ſeene) drawne euen from the firſt beginning thereof, and continued vnto this preſent yeare (not together to my knowledge by any one before written) ſhould with your moſt noble Maieſtie find no leſſe grace and fauour, than hath almoſt euery part thereof with other the aforeſaid and ſuch like moſt mightie and famous Princes: and the rather, for that your Maieſtie hath not diſdained in your Lepanto, or Heroicall Song, vvith your learned Muſe to adorne and ſet forth the greateſt and moſt glorious victorie that euer was by any the Chriſtian confederat princes obtained againſt theſe the Othoman Kings or Emperors. Beſides that, the matter and argument of this Hiſtorie and ſuch like (ſo much concerning the ſtate and good of the Chriſtian commonweale in generall, neuer by any ſo much impugned or endangered, as by theſe the naturall & capitall enemies therof) of right vnto none ſo properly belongeth, as vnto your moſt excellent Maieſtie, with the reſt of the Chriſtian princes, ſitting at the helme of your Eſtates; who onely by your vnited forces (the barbarous enemies greateſt terrour) are able to giue remedie thereunto: in the chiefeſt ranke of whom, your ſacred Maieſtie for glorie, honour, ſtrength and power (God long preſerue the ſame) is now ſecond vnto none. Thus perſuaded and encouraged, I in all humble and dutifull manner doe preſent vnto your Maieſtie theſe my weake endeuours: which how vnworthie ſoeuer they be of ſo great and princely a fauour, as well for the meaneneſſe of me the Author, as for the plaineneſſe of the ſtyle; yet if for the worthineſſe of the matter, or of your owne great and infinit clemencie you vouchſafe them your Maieſties fauourable regard, they ſhall no doubt liue no leſſe fortunat than if they had beene more happily borne and brought to light: ſeruing (if to no other vſe) yet as faire warnings vnto ſuch great ones as God hath here vpon earth exalted aboue the reſt vnto the higheſt degrees of power and of ſtate, for the good gouernment and defence of his church and people. Accept them I beſeech you moſt mightie Monarch into your gratious protection, ſo ſhall I (if God ſpare life) be comforted & encouraged vnder ſo mightie a fauor to proceed to amend what ſhall be found amiſſe, and adde what future times and better helpe ſhall deſcrie and miniſter vnto me for the perfection of this Hiſtorie: and according to my bounden dutie inceſſantly in all humilitie pray vnto the great God of all might and power (by whom all kings and princes raigne) to his glory long to preſerue your moſt royall Maieſtie in bleſſed health and peace to rule and raigne ouer vs and theſe your great kingdomes, ſo happily by you vnited: and ſo likewiſe (his will ſo being) your moſt noble poſteritie after you euen to the worlds end.

Your Maieſties moſt

humble and obedient ſubiect,

THE AVTHORS INDVCTI-
on to the Christian Reader vnto the Historie of the Turkes following.

THE long and ſtill declining ſtate of the Chriſtian commonweale, with the vtter ruine and ſubuerſion of the Empire of the Eaſt, and many other moſt glorious kingdomes and prouinces of the Chriſtians, neuer to be ſufficiently lamented, might with the due conſideration thereof worthily mooue euen a right ſtonie heart to ruth: but therewith alſo to call to remembrance the diſhonour done vnto the bleſſed name of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus, the deſolation of his Church here militant vpon earth, the dreadfull danger daily threatened vnto the poore remainder thereof, the millions of ſoules caſt headlong into eternall deſtruction, the infinit numbers of wofull Chriſtians (whoſe grieuous gronings vnder the heauie yoke of infidelitie, no tongue is able to expreſſe) with the careleſneſſe of the great for the redreſſe thereof, might giue iuſt cauſe vnto any good Chriſtian to ſit downe, and with the heauie Prophet to ſay as he did of Hieruſalem: O how hath the Lord darkened the daughter of Sion in his wrath? and caſt downe from heauen vnto the earth the beautie of Iſrael, and remembred not his footſtoole in the day of his wrath? All which miſeries (with many others ſo great, as greater there can none be) the prince of darkeneſſe and author of all miſchiefe hath by the perſecuting princes of all ages, and auntient heretickes, his miniſters, laboured from time to time to bring vpon the Church of God, to the obſcuring of his bleſſed name, and vtter ſubuerſion of his moſt ſacred word; but yet by none, no not by them all together ſo much preuailed, as by the falſe Prophet Mahomet, borne in an vnhappie houre, to the great deſtruction of mankind: whoſe moſt groſſe and blaſphemous doctrine firſt phantaſied by himſelfe in Arabia, and ſo by him obtruded vnto the world; and afterwards by the Saraſin Caliphes (his ſeduced ſucceſſours) with greater forces maintained, was by them together with their Empire diſperſed ouer a great part of the face of the earth, to the vnſpeakeable ruine and deſtruction of the Chriſtian Religion and State: eſpecially in Aſia and Affricke, with ſome good part of Europe alſo. But the vnitie of this great Mahometane Monarchie being once diſſolued, and it diuided into many kingdomes, and ſo after the manner of worldly things drawing vnto the fatall period of it ſelfe, in proceſſe of time became of farre leſſe force than before, and ſo leſſe dreadfull vnto the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, by whom theſe Saraſins were againe expulſed out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spaine, which they yet held within the remembrance of our fathers, vntill that by their victorious forces they were thence at length happily remooued alſo, after that they had poſſeſſed the ſame about the ſpace of ſeuen hundred yeares. In this declination of the Saraſins (the firſt champions of the Mahometane ſuperſtition, who though they had loſt much, yet held many great kingdomes both in Aſia and Affricke, taken for the moſt part from the Chriſtians) ariſe the Turks, an obſcure and baſe people, before ſcarce knowne vnto the world, yet fierce and courageous, who by their valour firſt aſpired vnto the kingdome of Perſia, with diuers other large prouinces: from whence they were about an hundred threeſcore and ten yeares after againe expulſed by the Tartars, and enforced to retire themſelues into the leſſer Aſia: where taking the benefit of the diſcord of the Chriſtian princes of the Eaſt, and the careleſneſſe of the Chriſtians in generall, they in ſome good meaſure repaired their former loſſes againe, and maintained the ſtate of a kingdome at Iconium in Cilicia (now

(now of them called Caramania) holding in their ſubiection the greater part of that fruitfull countrey, ſtill ſeeking to gaine from the Chriſtians what they had before loſt vnto the Tartars. But this kingdome of the Turkes declining alſo, by the diſmembring of the ſame, there ſtept vp among the Turkes in Bythinia one Oſman or Othoman, of the Oguzian tribe or familie, a man of great ſpirit and valour, who by little and little growing vp amongſt the reſt of his countreymen, and other the effeminate Chriſtians on that ſide of Aſia, at laſt like another Romulus tooke vpon him the name of a Sultan or King, and is right worthely accounted the firſt founder of the mightie Empire of the Turks: which continued by many diſcents directly in the line of himſelfe, euen vnto Mahomet the third of that name, who now raigneth, is from a ſmall beginning become the greateſt terror of the world, and holding in ſubiection many great and mightie kingdomes in Aſia, Europe, and Affricke, is growne to that height of pride, as that it threateneth deſtruction vnto the reſt of the kingdomes of the earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it ſelfe. In the greatneſſe whereof is ſwallowed vp both the name and Empire of the Saraſins, the glorious Empire of the Greekes, the renowmed kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponeſus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Seruia, Boſna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Ægipt, Iudea, Tunes, Argiers, Media, Meſopotamia, with a great part of Hungarie, as alſo of the Perſian kingdome, and all thoſe churches and places ſo much ſpoken of in holy Scripture (the Romanes onely excepted;) and in briefe, ſo much of Chriſtendome as farre exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this preſent if you conſider the beginning, progreſſe, and perpetuall felicitie of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this world nothing more admirable or ſtrange; if the greatneſſe and luſtre thereof, nothing more magnificent or glorious; if the power and ſtrength thereof, nothing more dreadfull or dangerous: which wondering at nothing but at the beautie of it ſelfe, and drunke with the pleaſant wine of perpetuall felicitie, holdeth all the reſt of the world in ſcorne, thundering out nothing but ſtill bloud and warre, with a full perſuaſion in time to rule ouer all, preſining vnto it ſelfe no other limits than the vttermoſt bounds of the earth, from the riſing of the Sunne vnto the going downe of the ſame. The cauſes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the moſt part ſo ſhut vp in the counſels of the Great, as that for me to ſeeke after them, were great follie: yet amongſt the reſt, ſome others there be, ſo pregnant and manifeſt, as that the blind world taketh thereof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wiſer ſort (as I hope) euen in theſe our nice dayes be lightly touched. Whereof the firſt and greateſt, is the iuſt and ſecret iudgement of the Almightie, who in iuſtice deliuereth into the hands of theſe mercileſſe miſcreants, nation after nation, and kingdome vpon kingdome, as vnto the moſt terrible executioners of his dreadfull wrath, to be puniſhed for their ſinnes: others in the meane while, no leſſe ſinfull than they, in his mercie enioying the benefit of a longer time, calling them vnto repentance. Then, the vncertainetie of worldly things, which ſubiect to perpetuall change cannot long ſtay in one ſtate, but as the ſea is with the wind, ſo are they in like ſort toſſed vp and downe with the continuall ſurges and waues of alteration and change; ſo that being once growne to their height, they there ſtay not long, but fall againe as faſt as euer they riſe, and ſo in time come to nothing: As we ſee the greateſt Monarchies that euer yet were vpon earth haue done, their courſe being run; ouer whom, Time now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it ſhall ouer this ſo great a Monarchie alſo, when it ſhall but then liue by fame, as the others now doe. Next to theſe cauſes from aboue (without offence be it ſaid) is the ſmall care the Chriſtian princes, eſpecially thoſe that dwelt further off, haue had of the common ſtate of the Chriſtian Commonweale: whereof euen the verie greateſt are to account themſelues but as the principall members of one and the ſame bodie, and haue or ought to haue as ſharpe a feeling one of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done vnto the feet, or rather as if it were done vnto themſelues: in ſtead of which Chriſtian compaſſion and vnitie, they haue euer and euen yet at this time are ſo deuided among themſelues with endleſſe quarrels, partly for queſtions of religion (neuer by the ſword to bee determined,) partly for matters touching their owne proper ſtate and ſoueraignetie, and that with ſuch diſtruſt and implacable hatred, that they neuer could as yet (although it haue beene long wiſhed) ioyne their common forces againſt the common enemie: but turning their weapons one vpon another (the more to bee lamented) haue from time to time weakened themſelues, and opened a way for him to deuour them one after another: Whereas with their combined forces (the greedie enemies greateſt terrour) they might long ſince not onely haue repreſſed his furie, and abated his pride, but with ſmall danger and much glorie (God fauouring their ſo honourable attempts) haue againe recouered from him moſt of thoſe famous Chriſtian kingdomes, which he by force againſt all right holdeth at this day in moſt miſerable ſubiection and thraldome; many millions of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in the meane time out of the furnace of tribulation in the anguiſh of their ſoules crying in vaine vnto their Chriſtian brethren for reliefe. By

ciuile diſcord the noble countrey of Græcia periſhed, when as the father riſing againſt the ſonne, and the ſonne againſt the father, and brother againſt brother, they to the mutuall deſtruction of themſelues called in the Turke, who like a greedie lyon lurking in his den, lay in wait for them all. So periſhed the kingdomes of Bulgaria, Seruia, Boſna, and Epirus, with the famous iſlands of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betraied as it were by the Chriſtian princes their neighbours, by whom they might haue eaſily beene relieued. So the moſt flouriſhing and ſtrong kingdome of Hungarie (in the reliques whereof, the fortune of the Turkiſh Empire hath longer ſtucke than in the conqueſt of any other kingdome, by it attempted, whatſoeuer) diuided in it ſelfe by the ambition of princes and ciuile diſcord, the weaker ſtill calling vnto his aid the mightie power of the Turke, is long ſince for the moſt part become vnto him a prey, the poore remainders thereof being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Chriſtian Emperour and of the princes his confederats, ſildome times meeting together with ſuch cheerefulneſſe or expedition, as the neceſsitie of ſo great a matter requireth. Vnto which ſo great a cauſe of the common decay, may be added the euill choice of our ſouldiours emploied in thoſe warres, who taken vp hand ouer head out of the promiſcuous vulgar people, are for moſt part vntrained men, ſeruing rather for ſhew and the filling vp of number, than for vſe, and in no reſpect to be compared with the Turks Ianizaries and other his moſt expert ſouldiours, continually euen from their youth exerciſed in feats of armes. Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the want of the auntient martiall diſcipline, the wholeſome preſeruatiue of moſt puiſſant armies, which breedeth in the proud enemie a contempt of the Chriſtian forces, with a full perſuaſion of himſelfe, that he is not by ſuch diſordered and weake meanes to be withſtood. But to come neerer vnto the cauſes of the Turks greatneſſe, and more proper vnto themſelues, as not depending of the improuident careleſneſſe, weakneſſe, diſcord, or imperfections of others: firſt in them is to be noted an ardent and infinit deſire of ſoueraignetie, wherewith they haue long ſince promiſed vnto themſelues the monarchie of the whole world, a quicke motiue vnto their ſo haughtie deſignes: Then, ſuch a rare vnitie and agreement amongſt them, as well in the manner of their religion (if it be ſo to be called) as in matters concerning their ſtate (eſpecially in all their enterpriſes to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that thereof they call themſelues Iſlami, that is to ſay, men of one mind, or at peace among themſelues; ſo as it is not to be maruelled, if thereby they grow ſtrong themſelues, and dreadfull to others: ioyne vnto this their courage, conceiued by the wonderfull ſucceſſe of their perpetuall fortune, their notable vigilancie in taking the aduantage of euery occaſion for the enlarging of their Monarchie, their frugalitie and temperatneſſe in their diet and other manner of liuing, their ſtraight obſeruing of their auntient militarie diſcipline, their cheerefull and almoſt incredible obedience vnto their princes and Sultans; ſuch, as in that point no nation in the world was to be worthily compared vnto them: all great cauſes why their Empire hath ſo mightily encreaſed and ſo long continued. Whereunto may be added the two ſtrongeſt ſinewes of euery well gouerned commonweale, Reward propounded to the good, and Puniſhment threatened vnto the offendor; where the prize is for vertue and valour ſet vp, and the way laied open for euery common perſon, be he neuer ſo meanely borne, to aſpire vnto the greateſt honours and preferments both of the Court and of the field, yea euen vnto the neereſt affinitie of the great Sultan himſelfe, if his valour or other worth ſhall ſo deſerue: when as on the contrarie part the diſloyall or cowardly is to expect from the ſame ſoueraigne power nothing but diſgrace, death, and torture. And yet theſe great ones not contented by ſuch commendable and lawfull meanes ſtill to extend or eſtabliſh their farre ſpreading Empire, if that point once come in queſtion, they ſticke not in their diuelliſh policie to breake and infringe the lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues grounded vpon the law of Nations, be they with neuer ſo ſtrong capitulations concluded, or ſolemnitie of oath confirmed, haue with them no longer force than ſtandeth with their owne profit, ſeruing indeed but as ſnares to entangle other princes in, vntill they haue ſingled out him whom they purpoſe to deuour; the reſt faſt bound ſtill looking on as if their own turne ſhould neuer come, yet with no more aſſurance of their ſafetie by their leagues than had the other whom they ſee periſh before their faces. As for the kind law of nature, what can be thereunto more contrarie, than for the father moſt vnnaturally to embrue his hands in the bloud of his owne children? and the brother to become the bloudie executioner of his owne brethren? a common matter among the Othoman Emperours. All which moſt execrable and inhumane murthers they couer with the pretended ſafetie of their ſtate, as thereby freed from the feare of all aſpiring competitors (the greateſt torment of the mightie) and by the preſeruation of the integritie of their Empire, which they thereby keepe whole and entire vnto themſelues, and ſo deliuer it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part diſmembred or impaired. By theſe and ſuch like meanes is this barbarous Empire (of almoſt nothing) growne to that height of maieſtie and power, as that it hath in contempt all the reſt, being it ſelfe not inferiour in greatneſſe and ſtrength vnto the greateſt monarchies that euer yet were vpon the face of the earth, the Romane Empire only excepted. Which how farre it ſhall yet farther ſpread, none knoweth, but he that holdeth in his hand all the kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging of the ſea, ſo that it cannot further paſſe. ueſſe and glorie of this ſo mightie and dreadfull an Empire, growne for the moſt part out of the ruine of the Chriſtian commonweale, with the vtter ſubuerſion of many great and flouriſhing kingdomes, and wofull fall of many moe right puiſſant and mightie princes, not without griefe to be remembred: I long ſince (as many others haue) entered into the heauie conſideration thereof, purpoſing ſo to haue contented my ſelfe with a light view of that which might well be for euer of all good Chriſtians lamented, but hardly or neuer remedied; vntill that afterwards led with a more earneſt deſire to know the ſtrange and fatall mutations, by this barbarous nation in former time brought vpon a great part of the world, as alſo ſo much as I might to ſee ſo great a terrour of the preſent time, and in what tearmes it ſtandeth with the reſt, I had with long ſearch and much labour, mixt with ſome pleaſure and mine owne reaſonable contentment, paſſed through the whole melancholie courſe of their tragicall Hiſtorie: yet without purpoſe euer to haue commended the ſame or any part thereof vnto the remembrance of poſteritie, as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fitter for ſome more happie wit, better furniſhed with ſuch helpes both of nature and art, as are of neceſſitie requiſit for the vndertaking of ſo great a charge, than was my ſelfe, of many thouſands the meaneſt. Not vnmindfull alſo of that which the Poet (keeping decorum*) ſaith in like caſe, though farre leſſe matter, of himſelfe:*

Virg. Eclog. ſexta

Cum canerem reges & prælia, Cynthius aurem
Vellit, & admonuit: Paſtorem Tittere pingues Paſcere oportet oues, deductum ducere carmen.

When I did ſing of mightie kings, or els of bloudie warre, Apollo pluckt me by the eare, and ſaid I went too farre:
Beſeemes a ſhepheard Titterus his fatlings for to feed,
And for to fit his rurall ſong vnto his ſlender reed.

Beſides that, ſo many difficulties euen at the firſt preſented themſelues vnto my view, as that to ouercome the ſame, if I ſhould take the labour in hand, ſeemed to me almoſt impoſsible: for beſide the ſea and world of matter I was to paſſe through (requiring both great labour and time) full of the moſt rare example both of the better and worſe fortune in men of all ſort and condition, yeelding more pleaſure vnto the reader than facilitie to the writer, I ſaw not any (among ſo many as had taken this argument in hand) whom I might as a ſure guide or loadſtarre long follow in the courſe of this ſo great an Hiſtorie: many right worthie and learned men (whoſe memorie my ſoule honoureth) contenting themſelues to haue with their learned pennes enrolled in the records of neuer-dying fame, ſome, one great expedition or action, ſome another, as in their times they fell out; yea the Turkiſh Hiſtories and Chronicles themſelues (from whom the greateſt light for the continuation of the Hiſtorie was in reaſon to haue beene expected) being in the declaration of their owne affaires (according to their barbarous manner) ſo ſparing and ſhort, as that they may of right be accounted rather ſhort rude notes than iuſt Hiſtories, rather pointing things out, than declaring the ſame; and that with ſuch obſcuritie, by changing the auntient and vſuall names as well of whole kingdomes, countries, and prouinces, as of cities, townes, riuers, mountaines, and other places, yea, and oftentimes of men themſelues, into other ſtrange and barbarous names of their owne deuiſing, in ſuch ſort, as might well ſtay an intentiue reader, and depriue him of the pleaſure together with the profit he might otherwiſe expect by the reading thereof; whereunto to giue order, perſpicuitie, and light, would require no ſmall trauell and paine. Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the diuerſitie of the reports in the courſe of the whole Hiſtorie, ſuch as is oftentimes moſt hard, if not altogether impoſsible to reconcile. Notwithſtanding all which difficulties, with many others more proper vnto my ſelfe, hauing with long labour and diligent ſearch paſſed through the courſe of the whole Hiſtorie, and ſo in ſome reaſonable ſort ſatisfied my ſelfe therein, I thought it not amiſſe, as well for the worthineſſe of the matter, as for the zeale I beare vnto the Chriſtian commonweale, and for the ſatisfying alſo of ſome others my good friends, much deſirous of the ſame, to make proofe if out of the diſperſed workes of many right worthie men, I could ſet downe one orderly and continuat Hiſtorie of this ſo mightie an Empire, with the great and fatall mutation or rather ſubuerſion of many right ſtrong and flouriſhing kingdomes and ſtates (the proper worke of all mightie riſing Empires, ſtill encreaſing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud monarchie hath alreadie daunted a great part of the world, being ſo many and ſo ſtrange, as that moe or more wonderfull were not euer to be ſeene in any of the greateſt monarchies of auntient time or memorie, and ſo together, and as it were vnder one view and at one ſhew, to lay open vnto the Chriſtian Reader, what I was glad to ſeeke for out of the defuſed labours of many: a worke ſo long and laborious as might well haue deterred a right reſolute and conſtant mind from the vndertaking thereof, being as yet to my knowledge not vndergone or performed by any: wherein among ſuch

varietie, or more truly to ſay, contrarietie of writers, I contented not my ſelfe, as a blind man led by his guide happily of no better ſight than himſelfe, to tread the ſteps of this or that one man, going for a while before me, and by and by leauing me againe ſtumbling in the darke: but out of the learned and faithfull workes of many, according to my ſimple iudgement to make choice of that was moſt probable, ſtill ſupplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defectiue in the weaker, propounding vnto my ſelfe no other marke to aime at than the very truth of the Hiſtorie; as that which is it ſelfe of power to giue life vnto the dead letter, and to couer the faults eſcaped in the homely penning or compiling thereof. Which the better to performe, I collected ſo much of the Hiſtorie as poſſibly I could, out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues preſent and as it were eye-witneſſes of the greateſt part of that they writ, and ſo as of all others beſt able, moſt like alſo to haue left vnto vs the very truth. Such is the greateſt part of ſo much of the Hiſtorie of the Greeke Empire, as I haue (for the better vnderſtanding of the riſing of the Turkes) in this Hiſtorie ſet downe, gathered out of the doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing ſuch things as they themſelues ſaw, or were for moſt part in their time, and neere vnto them done. Such are the wonderfull and almoſt incredible warres betwixt old Amurath the ſecond, and his foſter child, the fortunat prince of Epirus, of the Turks commanly called Scanderbeg, and by that wayward tirant at his death together with his kingdome deliuered as it were by inheritance vnto his ſonne, the great and cruell Sultan Mahomet; all written by Marinus Barletius, himſelfe an Epirot, and in all thoſe troubleſome times then liuing in Scodra, a citie of the Venetians ioyning vpon Epirus. Such is the wofull captiuitie of the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, with the miſerable death of the Greeke Emperour Conſtantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeke Empire, written by Leonardus Chienſis, Archbiſhop of Mitylene, being himſelfe then preſent, and there taken priſoner. Such is the lamentable Hiſtorie of the Rhodes, taken for moſt part out of Ia. Fontanus his three bookes de Bello Rhodio, a learned man, then preſent and in great credit with Villerius the Great Maſter, at ſuch time as that famous iſland, after it had by him and the other worthie knights of the Order beene moſt wonderfully of long defended, was to the great ruth of Chriſtendome taken by the great Sultan Solyman. Such is the moſt tragicall Hiſtorie of Baiazet, Solyman his youngeſt ſonne, collected out of the notable Epiſtles of Augerius Busbequius Legationis Turcicæ, he himſelfe then lying embaſſador for the Emperour Ferdinand at Conſtantinople, and preſent in Solymans campe at ſuch time as he himſelfe in perſon went ouer with his armie into Aſia, to countenance his eldeſt ſonne Selymus, who ſucceeded him in his Empire againſt his valiant yonger brother Baiazet: and beſide, well acquainted with the great Baſſaes Achmet, Ruſtan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the Hiſtorie following. Such is alſo the Hiſtorie of the taking of the auntient citie of Tripolis in Barbarie from the knights of Malta by Sinan the proud Baſſa, written by Nicholas Nicholay lord of Arfeuile, preſent at the ſame time with the lord of Aramont, then embaſſadour for the French king vnto Solyman. So might I ſay alſo of the miſerable ſpoile of the fruitfull and pleaſant iſlands of the Mediterranean, made by Lutzis Baſſa, Solyman his brother in law and great Admirall, with the ſubmitting of the iſland of Naxos to the Turkes obeiſance, written by Iohn Criſpe, at that time duke of the ſame iſland. And ſo likewiſe of diuers other parts of the Hiſtorie, too long to rehearſe. But for as much as euery great and famous action had not the fortune to haue in it a Cæſar, ſuch as both could and would commend vnto poſteritie by writing that whereof they might truly ſay, They were themſelues a great part; many right excellent Generals contenting themſelues with the honour of the field, and their glorie there woon, leauing the honourable fame thereof to be by others reported. For lacke of ſuch moſt certaine authors, or rather (as I before ſaid) eye-witneſſes, I gathered ſo much as I could of that remained, out of the works of ſuch, as being themſelues men of great place, and well acquainted with the great and worthie perſonages of their time, might from their mouths as from certain Oracles report the vndoubted truth of many moſt famous exploits done both by themſelues and others: as might Pau. Iouius from the mouth of Muleaſſes king of Tunes, from Vaſtius the great Generall, from Autia the prince of Melphis, Charles the Emperour his Admirall, and ſuch others: or els out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues great trauellers into the Turkes dominions, and withall diligent obſeruers of their affaires and ſtate, as were the phiſitions Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclauius (of all others a moſt curious ſearcher of their antiquities and Hiſtories) vnto which great Clarkes and ſome others of that learned profeſſion, we may worthily attribute the greateſt light and certainetie of that is reported of a great part of the Turkiſh affairs. But theſe in the courſe of ſo long an Hiſtorie failing alſo (as by conferring that which is hereafter written, together with their Hiſtories, is eaſily to be perceiued) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge vnto the writings of ſuch other learned and credible authours, as of whoſe integritie and faithfulneſſe the world hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted: yea for theſe few late yeares I was glad out of the Germane and Italian writers in their owne language to borrow the knowledge of theſe late affaires as not yet written in Latin, wherein if the reader find not himſelfe ſo fully ſatisfied as he could deſire, I would be glad by him to be better enformed, as being no leſſe deſirous of others to learn the truth of that I know not, than willing to impart vnto others that little which I know. Thus much I thought good to set downe, to perſuade the Chriſtian Reader of the truth of the Hiſtorie following, wherein he ſhall find matter enough to wonder at, and no leſſe ſtrange than that whatſoeuer it is that is written of the greateſt monarchies of auntient time, vnto whom for power and maieſtie it yeeldeth litle: But ſo much the more worthy our conſideration than they, for that their periods alreadie run, and ſo their furie ouerpaſt, this in our time ſo flouriſheth, and at this preſent ſo mightily ſwelleth, as if it would ouerflow all, were it not by the mercie of God firſt, and then by the forces of ſome few of the Chriſtian princes neereſt vnto ſo great a danger with their great charge to their immortall glorie and benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale mightily checked and kept within ſome bounds and compaſſe. This Hiſtorie for the moſt part thus as is aforeſaid paſſed through, and brought to ſome good perfection, was yet by me againe laid aſide, and like ynough euen as an abortiue fruit to haue periſhed in the birth before it was growne to perfection, had I not many times fainting in the long and painefull trauell therewith, by my eſpeciall good friend Sir Peter Manwood of S. Stephens *in the countie of Kent knight of the honourable order of the Bath, a louer and great fauourer of learning (in whoſe keeping it ſo for the moſt part many yeares in ſafetie reſted) beene ſtill comforted and as it were againe reuiued, and now finally encouraged to take it in hand, and ſo at length as I might to perfect it: vnto whom (being the onely furtherer, ſtay, and helpe of theſe my labours) thou art for ſuch pleaſure as thou findeſt therein (if it be any) in courteſie beholden. Now what I for my part haue in this my long trauell performed, I leaue it to thy good diſcretion to conſider, contenting my ſelfe in ſo great a matter to haue bin willing to haue done ſomthing; wiſhing no longer to liue, than in ſome meaſure to be profitable to the Chriſtian commonweale, which long ſince in my nurſing mother houſe Lincolne Colledge in Oxford, where I was ſometime Fellow, I did purpoſe to performe, as it ſhould pleaſe God in time to giue me meanes and occaſion: in which mind I hope by the goodneſſe & mercie of Chriſt ſo long as I liue to continue. Only this fauor (to conclude with) I requeſt of thee That if in this ſo long and perplexed an Hiſtorie (by peecemeale of ſo many diuerſly handled) written by me in a world of troubles and cares, in a place that affoorded no meanes or comfort to proceed in ſo great a worke, thou chance to light vpon ſome things otherwiſe reported than thou haſt elſewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maieſt) not therfore forthwith to condemne what thou here findeſt, being happily taken from a more certaine reporter than was that whereunto thou giueſt more credit; or at leaſtwiſe not written by me, as meaning in any thing to preiudice thy better iudgement, but to leaue it to thy good choice in ſuch diuerſitie of reports to follow that which may ſeeme vnto thee moſt true. By which courteſie thou maieſt hereafter encourage me to performe ſome other worke to thy no leſſe contentment. So wiſhing thee all happineſſe, I bid thee farwell. A

THE GENERAL HISTORIE OF THE TVRKES, BEFORE THE RISING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THEM.

C THE glorious Empire of the Turkes, the preſent terrour of the world, hath amongſt other things nothing in it more wonderfull or ſtrange, than the poore beginning of it ſelfe; ſo ſmall and obſcure, as that it is not well knowne vnto themſelues, or agreed vpon euen among the beſt writers of their hiſtories, from whence this barbarous nation that now ſo triumpheth ouer the beſt part of the world, firſt crept out or tooke their beginning. Some (after the manner of moſt nations) deriue them from the Trojans, led thereunto by the affinity of the words Turci & Teucri; ſuppoſing (but with what probabilitie I know not) the word Turci or Turks, to haue beene made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Trojans: as alſo for that the Turks haue of long moſt inhabited the leſſer ASIA, wherein the antient and moſt famous citie of TROY ſometime ſtood. No great reaſon in my deeming: yet giue the authors thereof leaue therewith to pleaſe themſelues, as well as ſome others, which dwelling much farther off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probabilitie at al; and that with ſuch earneſtneſſe, as if they could not elſewhere haue found any ſo honourable anceſtours. Otherſome report them to haue firſt come out of PERSIA, and of I wot not what citie there, to haue taken their name: neither want there ſome which affirme them to haue taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea and ſome out of SYRIA, with many other far fet deuiſes concerning the beginning and name of this people: all ſeruing to no better purpoſe, than to ſhew the vncertaintie thereof. Amongſt others, Philip of MORNAY, the noble and learned Frenchman in his woorthy worke concerning the trueneſſe of the Chriſtian religion, ſeemeth (and that not without good reaſon) to deriue the Turks together with the Tartars, from the Iewes, namely, from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanazar king of ASIRIA, in the time of Oſeas king of ISRAEL, caried away into captiuitie, and by him confined into MEDIA, and the other vnpeopled countries of the North, whoſe going thither is not vnaptly deſcribed by Eſdras, where among the great Hords of the Tartars in the fartheſt part of the world Northward, euen at this day are found ſome, that ſtill retaine the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nepthaly, a certaine argument of their diſcent: whereunto alſo the word Tartar or Tatar, ſignifying in the Syrian tongue remnants or leauings; and the word Turke, a word of diſgrace, ſignifying in Hebrew, baniſhed men; ſeemeth right well to agree. Beſides that, in the Northern countries of RVSSIA, SARMATIA, and LYTHVANIA, are found greater ſtore of the Iewiſh nation than elſewhere, and ſo neere vnto the Tartarians ſtill the mo; whereunto Io. Leunclauius the moſt curious ſearcher out of the Turks antiquities and monuments, addeth as a farther conjecture of the diſcent of thoſe barbarous northern people from the Iewes, That in his trauell through LIVONIA into LYTHVANIA, in the coun-

trie neere vnto the metropoliticall citie of RIGA, he found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in language from the other countrey people of the Curoes and Eſtons, no leſſe barbarous than themſelues; who had alwaies in their mouths as a perpetuall lamentation, which they with doleful moanes daily repeated abroad in the fields, Ieru, Ieru, Maſco, Lon: whereby they were thought to lament ouer IERVSALEM and DAMASCO, as forgetfull of all other things in their antient countrey, after ſo many worlds of yeeres, and in a deſolat place ſo far diſtant thence. And Munſter in his deſcription of LIVONIA repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demaunded what they meant by theſe words ſo often and ſo lamentably by them without cauſe vttered: anſwered, That they knew no more than that they had beene ſo of long taught by their anceſtors. But to leaue theſe opinions concerning their beginning, ſo diuers and vncertaine, and to follow greater probabilities as concerning the place from whence they came: it is vpon better ground thought by diuers others, and thoſe of the beſt hiſtoriographers, That this barbarous nation which hath of late brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon ſo great a part, not of Chriſtendom onely, but euen of the whole world, tooke their firſt beginning out of the cold and bare countrey of SCYTHIA: induced thereunto, both by the authoritie of the greateſt Coſmographers, as by moſt apparant reaſons. Pomponius Mela, the deſcriber of the world, reckning vp the people neere vnto the great riuer TANAIS (the bounder of EVROPE from ASIA Eaſtward) amongſt others maketh expreſſe mention of the Turks, in theſe words: Geloni vrbem ligneam habitant. Iuxta Thyrſagete Turceque vaſtas ſyluas occupant aluntur que venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aſpera & deſerta regio ad Arympheos vſque permittitur. The Geloni inhabit a citie of wood. And faſt by, the Thyrſagets and Turks poſſeſſe the vaſt forreſts, and liue by hunting. Then, a rough and deſart countrey with continuall rocks, is ſpaciouſly extended euen as far as vnto the Arympheians. Plinie alſo in like manner reckning vp the nations about the fennes of MÆOTIS, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, ſaith: Deinde Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, Thuſſagetæ, Turcæ, vſque ad ſolitudines ſaltuoſis, conuallibus aſperas vltra quos Arymphei qui ad Riphæos pertinent montes. Next vnto them, are the Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, the Thuſſagets and Turks vnto the deſarts rough with wooddie vallies: beyond whom are the Arympheians, which border vnto the Riphean mountaines. And Ptolomie in the deſcription of SARMATIA ASIATICA maketh mention of the Tuſci, whom many learned men ſuppoſe to haue been the ſame nation with the Turks. Vnto which antient teſtimonies of reuerend antiquitie, adde the manners and conditions of the Turks, their antient attire, their geſture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding, and fight, their language and dialect, ſo well agreeing with the Scythians: and a man ſhall find matter enough ſufficient to perſuade him in reaſon, that the Turks haue vndoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes; whom they in ſo many things reſemble, and with whom of all other nations they beſt agree.

Now it hath beene no leſſe doubted alſo among the writers of the Turks hiſtories; at what time, and for what cauſes the Turks (to the trouble of the world) left their naturall ſeats in the cold countrey of SCYTHIA, to ſeeke themſelues others in more pleaſant and temperat countries more Southerly, than it hath beene of their originall beginning. Blondus and Platina, report them, enforced with a generall want, to haue forſaken their natiue countrey and followed their better fortune, in the yeere of our Lord 755: with whom alſo Segonius agreeth in the cauſe of their departure, but not in the time or place when or whereby they departed. For they (as he ſaith) iſſued out of their dwelling places in the yeere of grace 844, by the ſtraits of the mountaine CAVCASVS: whereas the other with greater probabilitie ſuppoſe them to haue come foorth by the Caſpian ſtraits: which the Turks alſo (as ſaith Sabellicus) affirme of themſelues, their anceſtors (as they ſay) being by their neighbours driuen out of the Caſpian mountaines. Some others there be that report them to haue forſaken their natiue countrey, neither enforced thereunto by neceſsitie, or the power of others; but for their valour ſent for by the Sultan of PERSIA to aide him in his wars: vnaduiſedly ſuppoſing that to have beene the cauſe of their firſt comming out, which in deed hapned long time after, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall appeare. But whatſoeuer the aforeſaid cauſes of want, or of the enemies power, might enforce them vnto, a greater power no doubt it was that ſtirred them vp, euen the hand of the Almightie, who being the author of all kingdomes vpon earth, as well thoſe which he hath appointed as ſcourges wherewith to puniſh the world, as others more bleſſed; will haue his worke and purpoſe

A purpose full of diuine majestie, to appeare in the stirring of them vp from right small beginnings, in the increasing & establishing of their greatnesse and power, to the astonishment of the world; and in the ruine and destruction of them againe, the course of their appointed time once runne. As for the difference of the time of their comming foorth, before remembred; it may reasonably be referred vnto the diuers emotions of that people, who being not vnder the command of any one, but of their diuers gouernours, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to haue come foorth all at once, either for one cause; but at diuers times, some sooner, some later, and that for diuers causes. This people thus stirred vp, and by the Caspian ports passing thorow the Georgian countrey, then called IBERIA, neere vnto the Caspian sea: first ceased vpon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with so strong hand, that it is by their posteritie yet
B holden at this day, and of them called TVRCOMANIA; of all other, the most true progenie of the ancient Turks. In which great countrey, they of long, vnder their diuers leaders, in the manner of their liuing most resembling their ancestors, roamed vp and downe with their families and heards of cattell, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their countrey men, without any certaine places of abode; yet at great vnitie among themselues, as not hauing much to loose or wherefore to striue.

Armenia (now called Turcomania) the first field of the Turks after their first comming out of Scythia.

The first kingdome of the Turks erected in Persia by Tangrolipix, Chieftaine of the Selzuccian family: with the successe thereof.

D THis wandring and vnregarded people, but now the terrour of the world, thus first seated in ARMENIA: long time there liued in that wide countrey, after their rude and woonted manner (from which the Turcoman nation their posteritie in that place, euen at this day as we said much differeth not) and not onely notably defended the countrey thus by them at the first possessed, but still incroching farther and farther, and gaining by other mens harmes, became at length dreadfull vnto their neighbours, and of some fame also farther off: whereunto the effeminat cowardise of those delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to do gaue no lesse furtherance, than their owne valour; being neuertheless an hardie rough people, though not much skilfull or trained vp in the feats of war.

The fame of these Turks togither with their fortune, thus daily encreasing, and the mightie Empire of the Sarasins as fast declining: which vnder their Chaliphes the successors of the false
E prophet Mahomet, hauing in lesse than the space of two hundred yeeres, ouerspread not onely the greatest part of ASIA and AFRIKE, euen vnto GADES and the pillers of Hercules: but also passing ouer that strait, had ouerwhelmed almost all SPAINE, and not there staying, but passing the Pyrenei had pearsed euen into the heart of FRANCE, and diuers other parts of Christendom, as namely, ITALY, SICILY, the famous Iland of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now diuided in it selfe, and rent into many kingdomes, turned their victorious armes from the Christians vpon one another, to the mutuall destruction of themselues & their empire. Amongst other the Sarasin Sultans which forgetting their obedience vnto their great Chaliph, tooke vpon them the soueraignty of gouernment (which admitteth no partner) was one Mahomet, Sultan of PERSIA, a right great prince, who hardly beset on the one side
F with the Indians, and on the other with the Chaliph of BABYLON his mortall enemie, praied aid of the Turks his neighbours, who were now come euen to the side of ARAXIS, the bounds of his empire: Vnto which his request the Turks easily granted, in hope therby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, and so sent him three thousand hardie men, vnder the leading of one Togra Mucalet, the sonne of Mikeil, a valiant captaine and cheefe of the Selzuccian tribe or family; whom the Greeks commonly call Tangrolipix, and ſome others Selduck or Sadock, names (as I ſuppoſe) corrupted of the great family whereof he was deſcended. By the aide of this Tangrolipix (for now we will ſo call him, as by the name moſt vſed) Mahomet the Perſian Sultan, ouercame Piſaſiris the Chaliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of the Turkiſh archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turks deſiring to returne home, requeſted of the Sultan leaue to depart, and with a ſafe conuoy to be conducted vnto the riuer ARAXIS, and there to haue the paſſage of that ſwift riuer opened vnto them, which was by the Perſians ſtrongly kept by two caſtels built vpon each end of the bridge whereby the riuer was to be paſſed: But Mahomet loth to forgo ſuch neceſſarie men, by whom he had obtained ſo great a victorie, and purpoſing to employ them further in his ſeruice againſt the Indians, would by no meanes hearken vnto their requeſt; but ſeeming therewith to be diſcontented, commanded them to ſpeake no more thereof, threatning them violence, if they ſhould more preſume to talke of their departure. The Turks therefore doubtfull of their eſtate, and fearing further danger, ſecretly withdrew themſelues into the deſart of CARAVONITIS, and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field againſt ſo many millions of the Saraſins, liued as they might by continuall excurſions and roads which they made out of the deſert forreſt into the countries adjoyning: wherewith Mahomet greatly incenſed, ſent out an armie of twentie thouſand men, vnder the conduct of ten of his beſt captaines againſt them: who for want of water and other neceſſaries, doubting to enter the deſart, encamped themſelues in the ſide of the forreſt, there to conſult what courſe to take. But Tangrolipix who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountaines, vnderſtanding of the comming of his enemies, and of the manner of their lying; thought it beſt vpon the ſudden by night to ſet vpon the Saraſins and Perſians, if ſo happily he might ouerthrow them by policie, whom he was not able to encounter in plaine battell. Vpon which reſolution, hauing trauelled two daies long march in the deſart, the third day at night he ſuddenly ſet vpon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, and by his vnexpected comming, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they without longer ſtay betooke themſelues to flight, euerie man ſhifting for himſelfe without regard of others. This victorie ſo happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furniſhed, with armour, horſes, and abundance of all things needfull for the wars, kept the woods and forreſts no longer as a theefe or out-law, but ſhewed himſelfe in the open field, where daily repaired vnto him numbers of roagues and vagabonds, ſeeking after ſpoile; with many other deſperat villaines, who for feare of puniſhment were glad of ſuch a refuge: So that in a ſhort ſpace his armie was growne to be fiftie thouſand ſtrong, and ſo much the ſtronger, for that they had nothing to truſt vnto, more than the valour of themſelues. Whileſt Tangrolipix thus encreaſeth, Mahomet enraged with the ouerthrow of his armie, in his furie cauſed all thoſe ten captaines that had the leading thereof, to haue their eies pluckt out, threatning alſo to attire all the ſouldiers that fled out of the battell in womens apparell, and ſo diſgraced, to carrie them about as cowards: and withall raiſed a great armie for the ſuppreſsing of the Turks. All things being now in readines, he ſet forward: when by the way the ſouldiers whom he had before ſo threatned to diſgrace, ſuddenly fled to the enemie: with whoſe comming, Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and ſtrengthened, reſolued to giue the Sultan battell. And ſo boldly comming on, met with him at ISPAHAN, a citie of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible battell, with woonderfull ſlaughter on both ſides. In the heat of which battell, Mahomet vnaduiſedly riding too and fro to encourage his ſouldiers, falling with his horſe, brake his necke: vpon which miſchance both the armies comming to agreement, by common conſent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his ſtead, and ſo made him king of PERSIA and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome belonging.

Mahomet the Perſian Sultan goeth himſelfe with an armie againſt Tangrolipix.

Tangrolipix by conſent of the ſouldiers, made Sultan of Perſia.

This was the firſt kingdome of the Turks, begun by the good fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 yeeres after their comming out of SCYTHIA, in the yeere alſo of our Lord 1030; Conſtantinus Monomachus then raigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the raigne of Romanus Argirus, Conſtantine his predeceſſour. Tangrolipix by rare fortune, thus of a meane captaine become king of PERSIA, foorthwith commanded the garriſon that kept the bridge ouer the riuer ARAXIS, to be remooued, and ſo free paſſage to be giuen vnto the Turks his countreymen, at their pleaſure to come ouer: who in great multitudes repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan well prouided for, and by little and little promoted vnto the greateſt

Tangrolipix firſt Sultan of the Turks.

A greatest dignities of that kingdome; the Persians and Sarasins the antient inhabitants thereof, being by these new come guests now kept vnder, and as it were troden vnder foot. Together with this kingdome, the Turks receiued the Mahometane superstition, from which they before not much abhorred, as men vsing circumcision: So that hard it is to say, whether nation lost more; the Persians and Sarasins, by the losse of so great a kingdome, or the Turks by embracing so great a vanitie. When the Turks first receiued the Mahometane superstition.

Tangrolipix with his Turks thus possessed of the kingdome of PERSIA, held not himselfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbour princes, especially against Pisasiris the Chaliph of BABYLON, whom hee in diuers battels ouerthrew; and hauing at length slaine him, joyned his kingdome vnto his owne. After that he sent Cutlu-Muses his cousin, with an ar-
B mie against the Arabians, by whom he was ouerthrown and put to flight. But returning by MEDIA he requested of Stephan the Greeke emperours lieutenant, leaue to passe with his armie by the confines of his countrey: which his request, Stephan not onely rejected, but also by strong hand sought to stop his passage; but joyning battell with him, was by the Turks easily ouerthrown and himselfe taken. So Cutlu-Muses returning to Tangrolipix, and recounting vnto him the successe of his wars, perswaded him to turne his forces into MEDIA, as a most fruitfull countrey, and easie to be subdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vnto him, but raising a new armie in hope of better fortune, went against the Arabians in person himselfe. Cutlu-Muses in the meane time fearing the Sultans displeasure, fled with his followers and fauorits: and taking for his refuge PASAR a strong citie of the Chorasmians, reuolted from him; which the Sultan seeming not to regard, held on his intended jour-
C ney against the Arabians, by whom he was also put to the woorst, and enforced with dishonour to returne. After that, he with part of his armie besieged Cutlu-Muses, who by the strength of the place and valour of his people, for a great while notably defended himselfe. In the meane time Tangrolipix not vnmindfull what Cutlu-Muses had before said vnto him, concerning the easinesse of the conquest of MEDIA (a countrey (as hee said) defended but by women) sent Asan his brothers sonne, surnamed the Deafe, with a conuenient armie to inuade the same: who entring into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the emperours lieutenant ouerthrown, and himselfe with the greatest part of his armie slaine: with which losse the Sultan rather enraged than discouraged, sent Habramie Alim his brother, againe with an army of an hun-
D dred thousand fighting men; with which so great a power the emperors lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill he had procured farther aid from the emperour, especially out of IBERIA, and therefore kept himselfe with such power as he had within his strong and fenced places: which Alim perceiuing, and out of hope to draw him vnto battell, roming vp and downe the countrey, at last besieged ARZEN an open towne, but full of rich merchants, by whom it was contrarie to his expectation, notably defended for the space of six daies; vntill that at length the Turks seeing no other way to win it, set fire vpon it in diuers places: by force whereof the inhabitants were enforced for safegard of their liues to flie, and to leaue the towne with an infinit wealth to the spoile of the enemie. By this time was Liparites gouernour of IBERIA come with a great power to the aide of the emperors lieutenant in MEDIA: whereof Alim hauing intelli-
E gence, without delay hasted with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them a little before night, had with them a cruell fight, wherein the victorie fell vnto the Christians, who had the Turks in chace a great part of the night. Neuertheless Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battell, was there taken and so carried away prisoner: For whose ransome the emperor sent a great summe of money, with certaine presents to the Sultan; all which he sent back againe, and frankly set Liparites at libertie, wishing him neuer to beare armes more against the Turks. And with him sent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahumetans, his embassadour vnto the emperour: who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, amongst other things proudly demanded of the emperour to become tributarie vnto the Sultan, and so to be at peace with him for euer. Which his vnreasonable demand, was by the emperour with no lesse
F disdaine scornfully rejected, and the Seriph so dismissed: which contempt of his embassadour the Sultan taking in euill part, as also not a little mooued with the death of his nephew and losse of his armie, with all his power inuaded the Roman prouinces. But being come as far as COIME without any notable harme doing, for that the countrey people hearing before of his comming, had in time conueighed themselues with their substance into their strong holds, whereof there was great ſtore in thoſe countries; and hearing alſo that the Greeke emperour was raiſing a great power to come againſt him at CESAREA; not daring to proceed any further, leauing ſo many enemies behind him, he fretting in himſelfe returned into MEDIA, where finding the people all fled into their ſtrong townes, he laid ſiege vnto MANTZICHIERT, a citie ſtanding in a plaine champion countrey, but ſtrongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches. This citie he furiouſly aſſaulted by the ſpace of thirtie daies without intermiſsion, but all in vaine, the ſame being ſtill notably defended by Baſilius gouernour thereof, and the other Chriſtians therein. The Sultan wearie of this ſiege, and about to haue riſen, was by Alcan one of his great captaines, perſuaded yet to ſtay one day, for him to make proofe in, what he were able to do for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelding, committed the whole charge of the aſſault vnto him. Alcan the next day diuiding the armie into two parts, and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpoſe, with the multitude of their ſhot to haue ouerwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the armie, furniſhed with all things needful for the aſſault, approched the wals: the Sultan in the meane time with certaine of the chiefe Turks, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this ſo forward a captaine in the middeſt of his endeuour loſt himſelfe, being ſlaine with a great number of his followers in approching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beautie of his armour, was by two valiant yoong men that ſalied out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the citie; and his head being foorthwith cut off, was caſt ouer the wall among the Turks: wherewith the Sultan diſcouraged, and out of hope of gaining the citie, roſe with his armie, pretending himſelfe with other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatning withall, the next ſpring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great diſcord aroſe betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, in ſo much that the Sultan ſought by diuers meanes to have taken him out of the way: which Habramie perceiuing, fled to his nephew Cutlu Muſes, and ioyning his forces with his, denounced war vnto the Sultan his brother; who meeting with them not far from PASAR, ouercame them in plaine battell, wherein Habramie was taken, and preſently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu Muſes with his couſin Melech, & ſix thouſand Turks fled into ARMENIA; and by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, requeſted of the emperour Conſtantinus Monomachus to be receiued into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heeles, they for their more ſafetie were glad to flie into ARABIA. The Sultan afterwards turning into IBERIA did there great harme, ſpoiling the countrey before him: againſt whom the emperour ſent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine; of whoſe approch the Sultan hearing, and that he would vndoubtedly ere long give him battell (deeming it no great honour vnto him to ouercome the emperours ſeruant, but an eternall diſhonour to bee of him ouerthrown) retired with his armie backe againe to TAVRIS, leauing behind him one Samuch with three thouſand Turks to infeſt the frontiers of the emperors territories; which both he and other the Turks captaines afterward more eaſily did, for that Monomachus the emperour hauing prodigally ſpent the treaſures of the empire, to encreaſe his reuenue, had impoſed a tribute vpon the frontier countries of his empire, woont before to be free from all exactions: in lieu whereof, they were bound to defend the paſſages from all incurſions of the enemies; but now preſſed with new impoſitions, had diſſolued their woonted garriſons, and left an eaſie entrance for the barbarous enemies into the prouinces confining vpon them: Beſides that the emperours immediatly following, and eſpecially Conſtantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and giuen altogether to the hoording vp of treaſure, gaue little countenance and leſſe maintenance vnto men of ſeruice, which in ſhort time turned vnto the great weakning, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Conſtantinopolitane empire. At the ſame time alſo the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitane empire by the death of Conſtantinus Ducas the late emperour, came to his wife Eudocia with her three ſonnes, Michael, Andronicus, and Conſtantinus, all verie yoong; whoſe ſex and tender yeeres the barbarous nations hauing in contempt, at their pleaſure grieuouſly ſpoiled the prouinces of the empire, namely, MESOPOTAMIA, CILICIA, CAPADOCIA, yea and ſometime as far as CŒLESIRIA. The report wherof much troubled the empreſſe, & gaue occaſion for many that loued her not, to ſay, That ſo troubled an eſtate required the gouernment of ſome worthie man. Wherefore ſhee fearing leſt that the Senat, making choiſe of ſome other, ſhe and her children ſhould be remooued from the gouernment, thought it beſt for the preſeruation of her ſtate and her childrens, to make choice of ſome notable & valiant man for her husband, that

A for her and hers ſhould take vpon him the managing of ſo weightie affaires. But to check this her purpoſe (the onely remedie of her troubled thoughts) ſhee had at the death of the late emperour Conſtantine her husband, at ſuch time as the ſoueraignetie was by the Senat confirmed vnto her and her ſonnes, ſolemnly ſworne neuer more to marrie; which her oath was for the more aſſurance conceiued into writing, and ſo deliuered vnto the Patriarch to keepe. This troubled her more than to find out the man whom ſhe could thinke worthie of her ſelfe, with ſo great honor. Shee held then in priſon one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renown & honorably diſcended; whoſe father hauing married the neece of the emperour Romanus Argirus, and aſpiring to the empire, being conuicted thereof, ſlew himſelfe for feare to be enforced by torments to bewray his confederats. This Diogenes was by the late emperour Conſtantine, for his good ſeruice againſt
B the Scythes (who then much troubled the empire) highly promoted, with moſt honourable teſtimonie in the charters of his promotions, That ſuch honours were beſtowed vpon him, not of the emperours meere bountie, but as the due rewards of his woorthie deſerts. Notwithſtanding after the death of the emperour, he ſicke of his fathers diſeaſe, and ſwelling with the pride of ambition, ſought by ſecret meanes to haue aſpired vnto the empire: Whereof the empreſſe hauing intelligence, cauſed him to be apprehended and brought in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, where being found guiltie of the foule treaſon, and ſo committed to ſafe keeping, was ſhortly after brought foorth to the judgement ſeat againe, to receiue the heauie ſentence of death. In which wofull plight, ſtanding as a man out of hope and now vtterly forlorne, he mooued all the beholders with a ſorrowfull compaſsion: For beſide that he was a man of exceC ding ſtrength, ſo was he of incomparable feature and beautie, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues anſwerable thereunto: wherewith the empreſſe mooued with the reſt, or pearſed with a ſecret good liking, is hard to ſay, reuoked the ſentence of condemnation readie to haue beene pronounced vpon him, and gaue him pardon. And ſhortly after hauing ſet him at libertie, ſent for him as he was going into CAPADOCIA his natiue countrey, and made him generall of all her forces, with a ful reſolution in her ſelfe to marie him, and to make him emperour, if ſhee might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarches hand, wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe, was compriſed. For the compaſsing whereof, ſhe entred into a deepe deuice full of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches, whom ſhe purpoſed to vſe as her pander for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This craftie Eunuche inſtructed by his miſtreſſe, D comming to the Patriarch Ioannes Xiliphilinus, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honoured, told him in great ſecret, That the empreſſe had ſo far ſet her good liking vpon a yoong gentleman, a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court) as that ſhe could be content to take him to her husband and to make him emperour, if ſhee might by his holineſſe be perſuaded, that ſhe might with ſafe conſcience do it, and by him be diſcharged of the raſh oath ſhe had vnaduiſedly taken, neuer to marrie againe, whereof hee had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwiſe a contemner of worldly honours, yet mooued with ſo great a preferment of his nephew, promiſed the Eunuch to do therein whatſoeuer the empreſſe had deſired, which he accordingly performed. And ſo ſending for the Senators one by one, in whoſe good liking the matter cheefly reſted: he with much grauitie propounded vnto them the dangerous eſtate of the E common weale, with the troubles dayly encreaſing, and the continual feare of forreine enemies, not to be repreſſed by the weake hand of a woman, or the authoritie of yoong children, but requiring (as he ſaid) the valiant courage of ſome woorthie man. After that, hee began to find great fault with the raſh oath which the empreſſe had taken a little before the death of her huſband, neuer to marrie; and vtterly condemning the ſame, as contrarie to the word of God, and vnjuſtly exacted of her, rather to ſatisfie the jealous humour of the emperour her late husband, than for any good of the common-weale: he in fine perſuaded them, that the vnlawfull oath might be reuoked, and the empreſſe ſet at libertie at her pleaſure, by their good liking to make choice of ſuch a man for her husband, as might better vndertake ſo weightie affaires of the empire, more fit for a man, than for ſo tender a lady and three yoong children. The greater part of the F Senat thus perſuaded by the Patriarch, and the reſt with gifts and promiſes ouercome by the empreſſe; the Patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing ſhe ſo much deſired, & diſcharged her of her oath: whereupon ſhee foorthwith calling vnto her certaine of her ſecret friends, married Diogenes, whom ſhe cauſed to be proclaimed emperour. Now thought Eudocia, after the manner of women, to haue had her husband (whom ſhe euen from the bottom of diſpaire had exal-

the firſt forced himſelfe, but afterwards (being a man of a proud nature, and haughtie ſpirit) became wearie of ſuch obſeruance, and began by little and little to take euerie day more and more vpon him. And for that the imperiall prouinces in the Eaſt, were in ſome part loſt, and the reſt in no ſmall danger, he aſwell for the redreſſe thereof, as for his owne honour, and to ſhew himſelfe an emperour indeed, and not the ſeruant of the empreſſe, left the court and paſſed ouer into ASIA, although it were with a ſmall armie and euill appointed: for why, it was no eaſie matter for him to furniſh out the armie with all things neceſſarie, which by the ſloth and ſparing of the late emperours, had to the great danger and diſhonour of the empire, beene vtterly neglected. Neuertheleſſe the Turkiſh Sultan, who at the ſame time with a great power inuaded the prouinces of the empire, hearing of his comming, and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting H what power he might bring with him, retired himſelfe; and diuiding his armie, ſent the one part thereof into the South part of ASIA, and the other into the North, which ſpoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and ſuddenly ſurpriſing the citie of NEO-CESARIA, ſacked it, and ſo laded with the ſpoile thereof departed. But the emperour vnderſtanding thereof, and not a little greeued therewith, drawing out certaine bands and companies of the beſt and moſt readieſt ſouldiers in his armie, and with them coaſting the countrey to get betwixt the Turks and home, vſed therein ſuch expedition, that he was vpon them before they were aware, and ſo ſuddenly charging them, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they betooke themſelues to their heeles, leauing behind them for haſt, their baggage and carriages, with all the priſoners and bootie they had before taken at NEO-CESARIA, and in their late expedition: yet was there no I great number of them ſlaine, for that the Chriſtians forewearied with long trauell, were not able far to follow the chace. From thence taking his way into SYRIA, he ſent part of his armie to MELITENA, and carried himſelfe from ALEPPO, a great bootie both of men and cattell. At which time alſo the citie of HIERAPOLIS was yeelded vnto him, where he ſhortly after built a ſtrong caſtell. But whileſt he there ſtaied, newes was brought vnto him that the other part of his armie which he had ſent away, was ouerthrowne by the Turks, for the releeſe of whom, he roſe with all haſt and marched towards them: but being in number farre inferiour vnto his enemies, hee was by them as hee lay encamped, encloſed round in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought almoſt impoſsible for him to haue eſcaped. At which time alſo the gouernour of ALEPPO, traiterouſly reuolted from him, and joyned his forces with the enemie, making now no K other reckoning, but aſſuredly to haue taken him. But whiles the Turks thus dreame of nothing but of a moſt glorious victorie, and were in mind diuiding the ſpoile; the emperour without ſo much as the ſounding of a trumpet, ſuddenly iſſuing out of his trenches, when they leaſt thought he durſt ſo haue done, and reſolutly charging them home, put them to flight, & had of them had a notable victorie, had he throughly proſecuted the ſame. After that, hauing taken diuers townes he came to ALEXANDRIA in CILICIA, and there all about in the countrey billited his armie, becauſe of the approch of winter, and ſo returned himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE. The next ſpring the Turks, according to their vſuall manner inuading the frontiers of the empire, did much harme about NEO-CESARIA: whereof the emperour aduertiſed, went thither with is armie, and quickly repreſsing their furie, tooke his journey to the riuer EVPHRATES, L where leauing part of his armie with Philaretus for the keeping of thoſe frontiers, he himſelfe retired Northward into CAPADOCIA. But after his departure, the Turks ſetting vpon Philaretus, put him to flight with his garriſons: and taking the ſpoile of the frontiers entred into CAPADOCIA, waſting all as they went: and afterwards turning into CILICIA, ſacked ICONIVM a rich and populus citie, Whereof the emperour vnderſtanding, at SEBASTIA, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranſackt the citie, and were for feare of his comming alreadie retired, he ſent Chatagurio gouernour of ANTIOCH, with part of his armie to MOPSIPHESTIA to ſtop the Turks of their paſſage. But they in the plaines of THARSVS were before diſtreſſed by the Armenians, and ſtript of all their rich prey: and hearing farther of the approch of the emperours power, fled by night, and ſo eſcaped: which the emperour vnderſtanding, and hauing now well quieted thoſe prouinces, and the yeere far ſpent, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. But after his departure, the Turks againe inuading the frontier prouinces, he ſent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant yoong man, generall againſt them; who ſo preuailed, that the emperour enuying at his honour, tooke from him a great part of his armie, and ſent him with M

A with a ſmall power into into SIRIA. But as he was vpon his way, he was by the Turks entrapped neere vnto SEBASTIA, and there taken, moſt part of his armie being at the ſame time ouerthrowne and ſlaine: with which loſſe, the emperour troubled, made great preparation to go himſelfe in perſon againſt his enemies; who encouraged with the former victorie, ceaſed not to infeſt his territories. In the meane time, by great fortune came Manuel Comnenus home, together with the Turke that tooke him; who being fallen into the diſpleaſure of the Sultan, fled vnto the emperor with his priſoner, of whom he was honorably entertained. All things now in a readineſſe for ſo great an expedition as the emperour had in perſon purpoſed, he ſet forward; and after long trauell hauing paſſed CESAREA, he encamped at a place called CRYAPEGA; where for ſeuere execution done vpon certaine mutinous ſouldiers, one of the legions of his ar-
B mie roſe in mutinie againſt him: whom for all that he quickly pacified with the terrour of the reſt of his armie, which he threatned to turne vpon them if they proceeded to forget their dutie: After that, remooving to THEODOSOPOLIS, he diuided his armie, and ſent Ruſelius one of his beſt captaines, with one part thereof againſt Chliat, and another part hee ſent to beſiege MANTZICIERTS, retaining with himſelfe the reſt, being of no great ſtrength. The Turks in MANTZICIERTS finding themſelues not able long to hold out, fell to compoſition, and yeelded the city. But ſhortly after, the ſouldiers left there in garriſon for the keeping therof, going out to ſeeke for forrage, were by the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed: which the emperour vnderſtanding, ſent thither one Nicephorus Bryennius, with certaine companies to releiue the citie; who encountring with the Turks, and finding himſelfe too weake, ſent vnto the emperour for aid: who
C not knowing the ſtrength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardiſe, yet ſent vnto him Nicephorus Baſilacius with part of his armie; who joyning his forces with Bryennius, and giuing the Turks battell, put them to flight. But following too faſt vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great haſt after, he had his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and ſo on foot heauily laded with armour, and not able to ſhift for himſelfe, was there taken and brought to the Sultan: who honourably entreated him, and oftentimes queſtioning with him concerning the emperour, and ſhewing him his owne power, examined him alſo of the emperours.

Diogenes with a great armie againſt the Turks.

Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field againſt the emperour, was Axan his ſon, a man of great wiſedome and diſcretion: who conſidering the doubtfull euent of battell, ſent embaſſadours vnto the emperour to entreat with him of peace. But he (perſuaded by ſome of D his captaines, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meere feare and diſtruſt he had in his owne power, or elſe to gaine time vntill ſome greater ſtrength came) had ſmall regard of the embaſſadours or their meſſage, but proudly willed them to tell their maſter, That if he were deſirous of peace, he ſhould get him farther off, and leaue the place wherein hee lay encamped, for him to lodge in. And ſo without other anſwere commanded them away. Now had the emperour (as is before ſaid) ſent away part of his armie by Ruſelius againſt Chliat, whom he now ſent for in haſt againe: but he hearing of the approch of the Sultan, by the perſuaſion of Tarchomates, one of his captaines, was retired for his more ſafetie backe into the Romain frontiers, leauing the emperour deſtitute of his helpe. At which time alſo, a companie of the Scythians which ſerued in the emperours campe, reuolted vnto the Turks; not without
E ſome ſuſpition, that the reſt of their fellowes which remained, would ere long do the like. Neuertheleſſe the emperour preſuming of ſuch ſtrength as he had, or carried headlong with his owne fortune, reſolued to giue the Turks battell, and therefore putting his men in order, ſet vpon them. Who ſomewhat troubled with the emperours ſo ſudden a reſolution, as being yet in ſome hope of peace: yet hauing put themſelues in order of battell, receiued the enemies charge; ſtill giuing a little ground, as men not greatly deſirous either to fight or to flie. This fight continuing long, and the day now declining, the emperour doubting leaſt the Sultan ſhould ſend part of his armie to aſſault his campe (from which he was now drawne ſomewhat far, and had left the ſame but weakly manned) cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and ſo began orderly to retire himſelfe with them that were about him: which others a far off in the battell beholding, and G ſuppoſing him to haue fled, began themſelues to flie a maine. Of which ſo ſhamefull flight and ſudden feare Andronicus (the ſonne of Iohn Ducas, the late emperour Conſtantine his brother, and by him created Cæſar, who with his ſonnes ſecretly enuied at the honour of Diogenes) was the cauſe. For he commanding a great part of the armie, gaue it firſt out vnto ſuch as were about him, that the emperour fled: and to encreaſe the feare, turning his horſe about, fled towards the campe campe as fast as he could: after whom all the rest most disorderly followed: which the emperor beholding, and therewith not a little troubled, made a stand, labouring in vaine to haue staid the rest. For now the Turks encouraged with the sudden flight of the Christians, began hardly to pursue them, as men alreadie ouerthrown by the hand of God: whom for all that, the emperour with such as yet stood with him, for a space notably resisted. But being forsaken by the greater part of his armie, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, being wounded himselfe, and his horse slaine vnder him, he was there taken all embrued with his owne blood, and the blood of his enemies, of whom he had wounded and slaine many. The Sultan aduertised of his taking, at the first beleeued it not, supposing it rather to haue beene some other great man: vntill that he was both by them whom he had but a little before sent embassadour vnto him, and by Basilacius one of his captaines then prisoner with him, assured that it was vndoubtedly he, which Basilacius brought before him to see if he knew him, fell downe prostrat at his feet, as before his dread lord and soueraigne. The emperour brought before the Sultan, and humbling himselfe in such sort as best beseemed his heauie fortune, the Sultan presently tooke him vp and thus cheerfully spoke vnto him: Greeue not noble emperour (said he) at thy mishap, for such is the chance of war, ouerwhelming sometimes one, and sometimes another: neither feare thou any harme, for I will vse thee not as my prisoner, but as an emperour. Which he accordingly did, presently appointing him a princely pauilion, with all things answerable to his estate, setting him oftentimes at his owne boord, and for his sake enlarging such prisoners as he required. And after he had thus for certaine daies honourably vsed him, and discoursed with him of many things, he concluded a perpetuall peace with him, vpon promise of a marriage to be made betwixt their children, and so with a safe conuoy sent him away with greater honour than was at an enemies hand to haue beene expected. The emperour in Turkish attire, which the Sultan had bestowed vpon him, comming to THEODOSOPOLIS, there staid for the curing of his wounds, & afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embassadors, set forward toward CONSTANTINOPLE. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuitie, Iohn the Cæsar, with Psellus one of the cheefe Senators, and others of the same faction, which alwaies enuied at the honour of Diogenes, presently tooke the imperiall gouernment from Eudocia the empresse, and thrusting her into a monasterie which shee had built neere vnto PROPONTIS, set vp Michael Ducas her eldest sonne, emperour, in steed of Diogenes: whose simplicitie, Cæsar his vncle, abusing with the rest, did now what they list. And hearing that Diogenes was now contrarie to their expectation, set at liberlie by the Sultan, and comming towards the emperiall citie, sent out letters euerie way in the new emperours name, vnto all the gouernours of the prouinces whereby hee was to passe, not to receiue him as emperour, or to doe him any honour: which Diogenes vnderstanding, staid at the castle of DOCIA, whether some of his friends with such power as they were able to make, resorted vnto him. Against whom, Cæsar with the contrarie faction first sent his sonne Constantine, and after that Andronicus his eldest sonne, both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great armie: by whom Diogenes with his friends and followers, were ouerthrown and discomfited. Diogenes himselfe flying to the citie of ADANA, was there hardly besieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yeeld himselfe, vpon condition, that he should resigne the empire, and so for euer after to lead a priuat life. For whose safetie, certaine of the cheefe of the clergie sent of purpose from Michael the emperour, gaue their faith. So Diogenes all attired in blacke, yeelded himselfe to Andronicus: by whom hee was brought to COTAI, then the metropoliticall citie of PHRIGIA, there to expect what further order should be taken for him from the court: during which time, he fell sicke, being as many supposed secretly poysoned. But whilst he there lay languishing, an heauier doom came from the yoong emperor, That he should haue his eies put out: which was foorthwith in most cruell manner done; the clergie men that had before for his safetie gaged their faith, crying out in vaine against so horrible a crueltie. Thus depriued of his sight, he was conueighed into the iland of PROTA, where his eies for lacke of looking to, putrifying, and wormes breeding in them, with such an odious smell as that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in short time after died, when he had raigned three yeeres, eight months. All which miserie was thought to haue hapned vnto him through the malice of Cæsar, without the knowledge of the yoong emperour his nephew.

Axan hearing of the miserable end of the late emperour Diogenes, was therewith much greeued, and the more, for that the league which he had to his good content so lately made with him, was Diogenes the emperour taken prisoner by Andronicus.

The miserable death of Diogenes the emperor.

Axan the Sultan seeketh to reuenge the death of Diogenes.

A was thereby come to naught: wherefore in reuenge thereof, he with great power inuaded the imperiall prouinces; not for ſpoile and bootie onely, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the ſame. Againſt whom Michael the emperour ſent Iſaack Comnenus his lieutenant, with a great armie: who meeting with the Turks, and joyning battell, was by them ouerthrown with all his army, and taken priſoner: and glad afterwards for a great ſumme of money to redeeme himſelfe. After which ouerthrow, the emperour ſent his vncle Cæſar with an other armie againſt them, who was by Ruſelius, that had before reuolted from the emperour, ouerthrown at the riuer SANGARIVS, and taken priſoner: whom he for all that, ſhortly after ſet at libertie againe, and joyning with him againſt the Turks, were both together by them diſcomfited and taken priſoners, but afterwards redeemed; Cæſar by the emperour, and Ruſelius by his
B wife. This Ruſelius was a notable traitour, who joyning with the Turks did what he liſt in the prouinces of the empire in the leſſer ASIA: for the repreſsing of whom, the emperour ſent Alexius Comnenus, a yoong man, but verie politike and couragious; who ſecretly practiſing with the Turks that were great with Ruſelius, had him at laſt by them for a ſumme of money betraied into his power: who forthwith ſent him to CONSTANTINOPLE to the emperor, by whom he was impriſoned, but afterward ſet at libertie and employed againſt Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion againſt the emperour.

But to come neerer vnto the Turkiſh affaires. Cutlu-Muſes who with his couſin Melech and others were for feare of Tangrolipix their couſin fled into ARABIA, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the raigne of Axan, returned: and as the enuious competitours of his king-
C dome, hauing raiſed a great power of their friends and partakers, were now ready to haue tried the matter with him by plaine battell. Againſt whom alſo the Sultan on the other ſide had brought into the field his whole forces, and was now readie likewiſe to haue encountred them neere vnto the citie of ERES. But whilſt the Turks thus diuided, ſtood ready to deſtroy themſelues, the Caliph of BABYLON (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporall ſoueraignetie, yet in matters of religion ſtill held him in great reuerence and eſteeme, as their chiefe biſhop, and the ſucceſſour of their great prophet) conſidering that nothing could be more dangerous vnto his ſect and religion than that ciuile diſſention, the late confuſion and vtter ruine of the Saraſin empire, and authoritie of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in theſe new Saraſines, now the chiefe ſtay of the Mahometane ſuperſtition: ſetting aſide all his pontificall formalitie,
D whereby he was bound not to go out of his owne houſe, came with all ſpeed, euen as the armies were now ready to joyne battell, and thruſting himſelfe into the middeſt betwixt them; what with the reuerence of his perſon, what with his effectuall perſuaſion, wrought ſo much and preuailed ſo far with both parties, that they were content to lay downe their weapons, and to ſtand to his order and judgement: which was, That Axan the Sultan ſhould ſtill enjoy his kingdome and territories, whole and entire vnto himſelfe as he did: and that Cutlu-Muſes and his ſonnes, aided by him, and ſo inuading the prouinces of the Conſtantinopolitane empire, ſhould thereof ſubdue ſo much as they could vnto themſelues, and to be thereof accounted the onely lords and gouernours. Which order as it was vnto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the Mahometane ſuperſtition, verie wholeſome & commodious; ſo was it vnto the Chriſtian com-E mon weale and religion moſt dangerous and hurtfull, as in proceſſe of time by proofe it appeared. For by this meane, in ſhort time after, Cutlu-Muſes with his couſin and ſonnes ſubdued all MEDIA with a great part of ARMENIA, CAPADOCIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA, and ſo a great part of the leſſer ASIA. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muſes & the fauour of the ſouldiers, Nicephorus Botoniates aſpiring vnto the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, diſplaced his maſter the emperour, Michael Ducas, after he had raigned ſix yeeres and ſix months, and in the habit of a munke thruſt him into an abbey: which vſurper by the juſt judgement of God, was at length requited euen with the ſame meaſure, and in like manner ſerued by Alexius Comnenus; who thruſting him out, ſucceeded himſelfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muſes with his ſonnes and kinſmen did for the enlarging of the Turkiſh empire, by the helpe of the great Per-
F ſian Sultan: whoſe forces, together with their owne, in diuers countries conducted by theſe worthy leaders his nigh kinſmen, and doing great matters, gaue occaſion for themſelues to be accounted Sultans, though in deed they were none, neither their names ſuch as are by ſome antient writers and ſome others of later time alſo reported; but vnto the Turks themſelues, by thoſe names, either for Sultans, vnknowne. Out of theſe great commanders, all borne of the Selzuccian family, family, hath Aithonus, and others following his report, deriued their Dogriſſa, Aſpaſalemus, Meleclas, and Belchiaroc, whom they ſuppoſe to haue orderly ſucceeded Zadoc, otherwiſe called Tangrolipix, in the Turkiſh empire, and to haue done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turks themſelues, and the relation the Greeks, it appeareth plainly, Axan (more truely called Ax-Han, that is to ſay, the White king) to haue beene the ſonne of Tangrolipix, and to haue ſucceeded him in the empire: and that by him the emperour Diogenes was taken, and not by Aſpaſalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Aſpaſalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it ſeemeth to haue beene a name corrupted of Aſpam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his ſonnes ſonne as they would haue it. In like manner Meleclas alſo ſeemeth to haue beene forged of Melech the ſonne of Habrami, Tangrolipix his brother, and not of Aſpaſalemus, as ſome without any good ground report. Whom they finding to haue beene all great men in the Selzuccian family, with ſome others alſo, haue both corrupted their names, and giuen vnto them an imaginarie ſoueraignetie and ſucceſsion in the Turks firſt empire, ſuch as beſide that the Turks themſelues acknowledge not, is eaſily to be refelled out of the hiſtories of the Greeks, who had with them ſtill much to doe. Wherefore leauing theſe ſuppoſed princes of the Turks, with their imaginarie ſucceſsion, and doings, vnto the authors thereof, following more certainties, to returne againe vnto the courſe of our hiſtorie. Axan the Sultan at the ſame time that he had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his couſin Cutlu-Muſes: to encreaſe the honour of his nation and the bounds of his empire, gaue vnto Ducat and Melech, two of his nigh kinſmen, the gouernment of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, with that part of SIRIA which joyneth vnto them, of purpoſe that way to encroch vpon the Aegyptian Chaliph, who then had vnder his juriſdiction all as far as LAODICEA in SIRIA; yet not with ſo large priuiledges as had Cutlu-Muſes, vnto whom and his poſteritie he had yeelded the abſolute honour of a Sultan or king, ouer ſuch countreis and prouinces as they ſhould winne from the Chriſtians: but vnto theſe others his kinſmen, he gaue the gouernment of the aforeſaid cities of DAMASCO and ALEPPO in the frontiers of his dominion in SIRIA, conditionally that they ſhould ſtill remaine his vaſſals, and hold of him as of their ſoueraigne, whatſoeuer they had: who neuertheleſſe in ſhort time mightily preuailed vpon the Aegyptian, ſtil increaſing the Turkiſh territorie with the loſſe of the Saraſins, whoſe name together with their empire, was now by the Turks almoſt quite driuen out of ASIA.

A moſt hurtfull order for the Chriſtian common weale.

But theſe proud branches of the Turkiſh empire, thus ouerſpreading the leſſer ASIA, with the greateſt part of SIRIA, were in ſhort time after by the mercie of God, and the valour of the moſt Chriſtian and religious princes of the Weſt, cut ſhorter, and brought againe into ſome better order. The full diſcourſe whereof, worthie eternall memorie, by others inrolled in the antient records of fame, I purpoſe not at large to follow, but in briefe to touch, for the orderly continuation of the preſent hiſtorie, haſting to the doings of this victorious nation of later times, wherein we are to make a longer ſtay, as more pertinent vnto the dangerous eſtate of the preſent time.

Peter a French herm t goeth on pilgrimage to Ieruſalem.

It fortuned that whileſt Cutlu-Muſes and his ſonnes, ſupported by the Sultan Axan their kinſman, thus mightily preuailed againſt the Chriſtians in the leſſer ASIA on the one ſide, and Melich with his couſin againſt the Aegyptian Caliph in SIRIA on the other: that one Peter a French Heremite mooued with a deuout zeale, according to the manner of that time, went to viſit the ſepulcher of our Sauiour, with the other holy places at IERVSALEM: who comming into SIRIA, then for the moſt part poſſeſſed by the Turks and Saraſins, diligently noted by the way as he trauelled, the manners and faſhions of theſe barbarous nations, their gouernment, their cities, their power and ſtrength; but aboue all, the grieuous miſeries of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, that there liued in moſt miſerable thraldom amongſt them, without hope of releaſe: all which, he in the habit of a poore pilgrim, at libertie ſafely viewed, in the midſt of theſe miſcreants, being withall a little low hard fauoured fellow, and therefore in ſhew more to be contemned than feared. Yet vnder ſuch ſimple & homely feature, lay vnregarded a moſt ſubtill ſharp and pearcing wit, fraught with diſcretion and ſound judgement, ſtill applying to ſome good vſe what he had in his long and painfull trauell moſt curiouſly obſerued. He comming to IERVSALEM, and performing his deuotions there, ſaw the grieuous miſerie of the poore deuout Chriſtians, ſo great and heauie, as that greater or more intollerable could none be: wherewith not a little

The deſcription of Peter the Heremit.

A little grieued, he entred into a deepe discourse thereof with Simon the Patriarch and Abbot of the monasterie of the Christians (there before built by certaine deuout Italian merchants) and with the master of the Hospitalars, by whom he was fully enformed thereof, as of whatsoeuer else he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed vpon amongst them, That the Patriarch and the Grand-master, should in their owne, and the names of the other oppressed Christians, write their letters vnto the Pope and the other Christian princes, concerning their miseries; and to craue their aid for the recouerie of those holy places out of the hands of those cruell infidels: of which letters, the deuout hermit promised himselfe to be the trustie carrier, and of their petitions the most carefull soliciter. Whereupon the Patriarch and Grand-master
B in the name of the poore oppressed Christians, wrote their letters vnto this effect:

The letters of Simon Patriarch of Ierusalem, and of the Grand-master of the Hospitalers vnto the Pope and other Christian princes, in the behalfe of the oppressed Christians in Ierusalem.

We the citizens of the Holy citie, and countreymen of Christ Iesus, dayly suffer those things which Christ our king suffered but once, in the last daies of his mortalitie. We are dayly buffeted, scourged, and pierced: euerie day some of vs are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would flie from citie to citie vnto the remotest parts of the earth, and remooue out of the middle of that land, where Christ our Sauiour wrought our redemption, to lead a poore exiled and vagrant life; were it not impietie to leaue the land (sacred with the birth, doctrine, death, resurrection, and assention of our Sauiour) without inhabitants and priests: and that there should first lacke such as would endure death and martyrdome, than such as would inflict the same: and that there should not be which would willingly die
C for Christ, as in battell, so long as there were any that would fight against them. These things truly we most miserably suffer: yet was there a time when as our ancestors feared no such thing, either to themselues or their posteritie. And now perhaps the Christian kingdomes of the West, liue likewise without the least suspition of feare: but let them bee mooued by our example and testimonie. The strength of the Turks is dayly encreased, & ours diminished: The continuall gaining of new kingdoms giueth them courage: They haue already deuoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turks are fiercer and stronger than the forces of the Sarasins, their policies deeper, their attempts more desperat, their endeuours greater, and their successe fortunater. Yet haue the Sarasins attempted both ROMES; they haue besieged CONSTANTINOPLE, and haue wasted not only the Sea coasts of ITALY, but euen the heart of the land also. Then why should the kingdomes of the West presume
D themselues to stand in safetie and out of all perill, when as the chiefe fortresses of the world haue beene so endangered? What may the rest of Christendome promise vnto it selfe, seeing that IERVSALEM (the seat and spectacle of the Christian religion) hath beene besieged, taken, sacked, rased, and triumphed vpon? Seeing that of the Christian profession, remaine but the poore and weake reliques, in comparison of the ancient whole entire bodie? This land, which is dayly besprinkled with our blood, yea the blood it selfe crieth out for reuenge. And we your most humble suppliants, prostrate at your feet, call vpon the helpe, aid, mercie, faith, and religion, of you most blessed Father, of the kings, princes and potentates; Christians not in name and profession onely, but in heart, soule and spirit. Before the tempest thunder, before the lightning fall vpon you, auert from you and your children the storme hanging ouer your heads: defend vs your poore suppliants: deliuer your religion from most wicked and accurs-
E sed slauerie. You shall in so doing, deserue immortall fame, and God shall requite your so great valour in this world with terrestriall kingdomes, and in the world to come with eternall blisse, whose sacred inheritance you shall haue defended from the rage of hell.

Rome, and Constantinople, which was also called Noua Roma, or new Rome.

With these letters, and plentie of other secret instructions, the deuout hermit returning into ITALY, and comming to ROME, deliuered his letters vnto Vrban the second of that name, then Pope, with a full discourse of the miseries of the Christians vnder the Turkish thraldome, which he had seene at IERVSALEM, and other places as he trauelled; requesting his holy care for the redresse thereof: with whom he so preuailed, that shortly after, he calling a Councell at CLAREMONT in FRANCE, among other things, propounded the miserie of the poore op-
F pressed Christians at IERVSALEM, as an especiall matter to be considered of. And hauing caused the aforesaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Christian princes, to bee openly read in the Counsell, wherunto three hundred and ten bishops were then out of diuers parts of Christendome assembled, with the embassadours of all countries, much mooued the whole assembly to compassion: at which time also the hermit, whose flowing eloquence fully countervailed what wanted in his feature, standing vp in the midst of the Counsell, deliuered his message in the name of the afflicted Christians, with their heauie gronings and teares: which as they could not be in letters expressed, so were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him who hauing but lately seene, both the miserie of the men, and desolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the greife thereof) so liuely represented, as that it mooued the whole assembly with the like simpathie of heauinesse and greife. Which the Pope perceiuing, tooke thereupon occasion to enter into a large discourse concerning that matter, with many effectuall reasons perswading the fathers and princes there present, of the necessitie of so religious a war to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppressed brethren out of the thraldome of the infidels; and now as well with their present decree, as afterwards at their returne home into their countries, by all meanes to further the same. Which notable perswasion, with the heauie complaint of the hermit, and the equitie of the cause, so much mooued the whole counsell and the rest there present, that they all as men inspired with one spirit, declared their consent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth it, God willeth it: which words so then vttered by way of applause, was in the great and most sacred expedition following, much vsed of the deuout Christians, as the fortunate signall of their cheerfull forwardnesse, euen in their most dangerous enterprises. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleeued (but that the antient histories beare witnesse of the like) how far in one daies space the report of this religious decreed war, was by flying fame dispersed.

An expedition agreed vpon by the Counsell, for the releise of the Christians oppressed in the Holy land.

The Counsell dissolued, and the reuerend fathers returning euerie man home into his owne countrey; it pleased God by their effectuall perswasions so to worke with the rest of the Christian princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and prouinces in Christendome, were shortly to be seene men of all sorts in great number, with redcrosses on their brests (the cognisance of that sacred expedition) readie of themselues to spend both life and goods for the defence of the Christian religion, and recouerie of the Holy land. The number of whom is of diuers diuersly reported, but of most supposed to haue beene three hundred thousand fighting men: of whom the chiefe commanders were Godfrey Duke of LORRAINE, with his two brethren Eustace and Baldwin, all of the honourable house of BUILLON; Hugh surnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French king; Raymond and Robert, earles of FLANDERS; Robert duke of NORMANDIE, William the Conquerours sonne; Stephan de Valois earle of CHARTIERS; Ademar bishop of PODIE, the Popes legat; and Peter the hermit, not to be numbred amongst the least, as chiefe author of this most famous expedition: vnto whom many other honourable princes joyned themselues as partakers of their trauels, though not with like charge.

The chiefe commanders of the Christians in their expedition into the Holy land.

The first that set forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Sensauier, a noble gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom, followed Peter the hermit, with fortie thousand mo: who both, trauelling thorow GERMANIE, HVNGARIE, and BVLGARIA, were glad oftentimes, especially in the further part of HVNGARIE and BVLGARIA to open themselues a way with the sword; and so with much labour, and no lesse losse, came at length to CONSTANTINOPLE: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the emperour Alexius Comnenus, who guiltie vnto himselfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the empire from Nicephorus his predecessour, had that expedition of the Christians into the East, in distrust, as purposed against himselfe: vntill that fully resolued to the contrarie, by the hermit and others; and that a far greater power was comming after, for the inuasion of the Turks and recouerie of the Holy land, he was content to relieue them now wearie of their long trauell: & afterward to make roome for thē that were to come, shipped thē ouer the strait of BOSPHORVS into ASIA; who marching forward into BITHINYA, encamped their armie in the countrey not far from the citie of NICE. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other princes that had joyned themselues vnto him, with the Germaines and Loranois, and the greatest part of the armie, followed the same way that the hermit had taken before him. At which time also Hugh the French kings brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts, (the one duke of NORMANDIE, and the other earle of FLANDERS) and the rest of the French commanders, passing ouer the mountaines into ITALY, came to ROME, with a wonderfull great armie: where taking their leaue of the Pope, because they would be lesse troublesome vnto the cities and countries whereby they were to passe, they diuided their great armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to BRVNDVSIVM, and the other to BARY, and the

A the third to HYDRVNTVM, vnto whom alſo Bohemund, one of the great princes of APVLIA, joyned himſelfe with twelue thouſand good ſouldiers that followed him. From theſe three ports the Chriſtian armie departing, and croſsing the ADRIATIKE, arriued in ſafetie at DIRRACHIVM, and nigh thereabout, vpon the coaſt of DALMATIA: from whence they trauelled by land thorow MACEDONIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, where they met with the duke Godfrey, and the reſt of the armie: whom alſo at the firſt, Alexius the emperour is reported to haue but coldly entertained, as jealous of his owne ſtate; vntill that better perſuaded of their deſignements and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich preſents ſent vnto him from theſe ſtrange princes, he joyned with them in league: wherein it was agreed, That the emperour during the time of this expedition, ſhould furniſh them with new ſupplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatſoeuer elſe they ſhould want: in regard whereof, the princes on the other ſide, promiſed to reſtore againe vnto the empire, what prouinces, countries, or cities they ſhould happily gaine out of the hands of the Turks and Saraſins, the citie of IERVSALEM onely excepted: which agreement was afterward on the ſuſpicious emperours part, but ſlenderly performed. Neuertheleſſe this league ſo made, he graunted them paſſage, and ſo tranſported them ouer the ſtrait into ASIA; onely Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the emperour Alexius and his father, would not come to CONSTANTINOPLE, but marching with his armie thorow the vpper MISIA and THRACIA, came ſooner than any man had thought vnto the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS, and ſo paſſed.

Godfrey duke of Buillon and the other Chriſtian princes meet together at Conſtantinople.

Now had Gualter, and the hermit Peter, with their armie, lyen two months in the countrey
C about NICE, expecting the comming of the reſt of the Chriſtian princes: for why, they thought it not good, before their comming, to attempt any thing againſt the enemie, whom they knew to lie not far off verie ſtrong. But the common ſouldiers, wearie of ſo long lying, and naught doing, and pinched with ſome wants; and withall diſliking of Gualter their chiefe commander, and the hermit Peter, of whoſe integritie and holineſſe they had a greater opinion than of his proweſſe and direction; riſe vp in mutinie, and diſplacing Gualter, made choiſe of one Raymund, a valiant Germain captaine, for their generall: by whoſe conduct they tooke EXORGVM, a towne of purpoſe forſaken of the Turks. For they long before vnderſtanding what a tempeſt of war was growing vpon them out of EVROPE, ſought by all meanes to cut off theſe that were alreadie come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater armie following, and therefore had left them this
D towne, as a bait to traine them out of their trenches. And after that the Chriſtians were thus poſſeſſed of the towne, hauing laid certain ſtrong ambuſhes, they draue out certaine heards of cattell the more to allure them: all which, certaine companies of the Chriſtians brought in, without any loſſe, the Turks ſtill winking thereat. With which bootie the Chriſtians encouraged, went out (three thouſand of them) to take in a tittle towne not far off, who were by the Turks cut off and ſlaine euerie mothers ſon, as they were about to haue diuided the ſpoile: which ouerthrow reported into the towne, diſcouraged euen the chiefe commanders of the armie, ſo that they reſolued no more to try the fortune of the field, before the comming of their friends. Neuertheleſſe the common ſouldiers, condemning them of cowardiſe, choſe them a new generall, one Godfrey Burell, whom they now requeſted not, but enforced to go out to reuenge the death of their fel-
E lowes: which their raſhneſſe not long after turned to their owne deſtruction. For ten thouſand of them going out of EXORGVM, to forrage the countrey, were by the Turks entrapped, and almoſt all ſlaine, except ſome few which by ſpeedie flight eſcaped. The Turks proſecuting their victorie, laid hard ſiege to them in the towne alſo, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the ſword conſumed the moſt part of them. The hermit with the poore remainder of his armie tooke his refuge to CINITE, a towne not far off, before abandoned by the Turks; where with much adoe he defended himſelfe, vntill the comming of duke Godfrey, and the reſt of the princes.

F countries & prouinces, altogether gained from the Chriſtians in ASIA, whom he held in great ſubjection & thraldom. This warlike prince hauing diſcomfited, and almoſt brought to naught the hermits forces, was no leſſe carefull for the withſtanding of the great army following: which now being come into BYTHINIA, & lying before NICOMEDIA, remooving thence laid ſiege to the citie of NICE, called in antient time ANTIGONIA of Antigonus, the ſon of Philip that built it, and afterwards NICEA, of Nicea the wife of king Liſimachus. In this citie dwelt many deuout Greeks, Chriſtians; but in ſuch thraldom vnto the Turks, as that they could not do G any thing for the deliuerie of themſelues. This ſiege endured longer than the Chriſtian princes had at the firſt ſuppoſed: who although they to the vttermoſt of their power, forced the citie on three ſides, yet was it ſtill notably defended; new ſupplies ſtill comming from the Turks by the lake of ASCANIVS joyning vpon the other ſide of the citie. But after that the Chriſtians poſſeſſed of the lake, began on that ſide alſo to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turks diſcouraged, and ſeeing themſelues beſet round with their enemies, yeelded vp the citie the fift 1097 of Iuly, in the yeere 1097, after it had beene fiftie daies beſieged. But whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, the Turks aſſailed that quarter of the campe where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulſed, and with great loſſe enforced to retire vnto the mountaines. In this citie amongſt the reſt of the Turks, was taken Solymans wife, with two of her children, H whom the princes ſent priſoners to CONSTANTINOPLE. This citie ſo woon, was according to the agreement before made, reſtored vnto Alexius the emperour, whoſe fleet had in that ſiege done good ſeruice, by taking the lake from the Turks.

The citie of NICE thus woon, the Chriſtian princes remooving thence with their armie; and marching thorow the countrey, came the fourth day after vnto a riuer which watred many rich paſtures: where, as they were about to haue encamped for the commodiouſneſſe of the place, and refreſhing of the armie, ſuddenly newes was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now buſie in caſting vp his trenches, That the Turks with a great army were ready euen at hand to charge him. For Solyman hauing raiſed a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of PERSIA his kinſman, was now come with an armie of threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, to giue the I
A cruell battell fought betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians. Chriſtians battell: of whoſe approch Bohemund aduertiſed, left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his ſouldiers in array, ſet forward to meet him, ſending word to the reſt of the princes that lay a far off, to be readie as occaſion ſhould require, to relieue him. Theſe two armies conducted by their moſt reſolute chieftaines, meeting together, joyned a moſt fierce and terrible battell, where in a ſhort ſpace the Turks lay ſlaine vpon heapes, in ſuch ſort that they ſerued the Chriſtians in ſteed of bulwarks. But whilſt Bohemund thus preuaileth in the battell, certaine of the Turks horſemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemunds campe; (not as then altogether fortified, & but ſlenderly manned) where among the women, & other weake perſons there left, they raiſed a great tumult & outcry, to the great appauling of them that were fighting in the battell: which Bohemund perceiuing, withdrew himſelfe with certaine companies vnto the campe, K from whence he with great ſlaughter repulſed the enemie. But returning againe into the battell, he found there a great alteration: for his ſouldiers whom before he had left, as it were in poſſeſſion of a moſt glorious victory, were now ſo hardly laid vnto by the Turks, as that they were readie to haue turned their backs and fled. Neuertheleſſe by his comming in, the battell was notably reſtored, and againe made doubtfull: when the enemie perceiuing how much the aſſault-ting of the campe had troubled the Chriſtians in battell, ſent out certaine troupes of horſemen againe to aſſault the ſame: and had not failed vndoubtedly to haue taken it, being as aforeſaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French kings brother come in good time to the reſcue: who comming in with thirtie thouſand horſemen, after he had relieued the campe, entring directly into the battell, was notably encountred by a ſquadron of freſh ſoldiers of the Turks, by them of L purpoſe reſerued for ſuch euent. There began a battell more terrible than the firſt, with moſt doubtfull victorie. But at the length, the Turks wearie of the long and cruell fight, and ſeeing moſt of their fellowes ſlaine, began by little and little to giue ground, and ſo retired into the mountaines, which were not far off. In this battell which continued a great part of the day, were ſlaine of the Turks fortie thouſand, and of the Chriſtians about two thouſand. The next morning Bohemund with the French kings brother, came againe into the field, in ſuch order, as if they ſhould preſently haue giuen or receiued battell: where after they had ſtaid a great while, and ſaw no enemie to appeare, they fell to the honeſt buriall of their dead: which were eaſily known from the Turks, by the red croſſes vpon their garments, the cogniſance of their ſacred warfare.
Solyman flieth. Solyman flying with the remainder of his armie, notably diſſembled his loſſe, giuing it out that M he had got the victorie: yet by the way as hee went, he burnt vp the countrey villages, and deſtroyed or carried away whatſoeuer elſe he thought might ſtand the Chriſtians in any ſteed, if they ſhould further follow after him, leauing nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victorie, Bohemund and the Chriſtian princes, without reſiſtance marching through

A through the hot and drie countreis of the leſſer ASIA, came to ANTIOCHIA, a citie of PISIDIA, which they tooke with ſmall labour: & ſo marching vnto ICONIVM the principal citie of CILICIA, neere vnto the mountaine TAVRVS, were there alſo of the citizens courteouſly receiued, where they ſtaid certaine daies for the refreſhing of the armie. From thence they ſet forward toward HERACLEA, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be aſſembled. But they together with the garriſon ſouldiers vpon the approch of the victorious armie of the Chriſtians forſooke the citie and fled. The citizens being Chriſtians (as they were yet generally in all the prouinces of the leſſer ASIA, but in great ſubjection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel maſters the Turkiſh garriſons; came foorth, and meeting the princes, gladly yeelded themſelues with their citie vnto them, as vnto their deliuerers. Here the Chriſtian princes fully inſtru-
B cted of the great feare and deſperation of the Turks, who now in no place durſt abide their comming; for the more ſpeedie taking in of thoſe countries but lately oppreſſed by the Turks, diuided their armie into two parts, leauing the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in CILICIA, for the full ſubduing thereof (who in ſhort time tooke the cities of TARSVS, EDISSA, and MANVSSA, with all the reſt of the countrey, the Turks not daring any where to abide their comming:) the other part of the armie in the meane time entring into the leſſer ARMENIA, tooke the ſame from the Turks, which the princes gaue to one Palmurus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great ſeruice. From thence they tooke their way into CAPADOCIA, which they alſo ſubdued, driuing out the Turks in euerie place, and tooke the cities of CESAREA and SOCOR, where they ſtaid a few daies for the refreſhing of the armie: with like ſuc-
C ceſſe they paſſed through the reſt of the prouinces of the leſſer ASIA, of late poſſeſſed by the Turks, ſtill chaſing them out before them, and ſetting at libertie the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians of thoſe countreis. Whereof Solyman (crauing aid of Axan the Perſian Sultan his couſin) grieuouſly complained by his letters to him directed in this ſort. The famous citie of NICE, with the countrey of ROMANIA, which we by your aid and power haue gotten from the kingdome of the Greeks, and of your bountie poſſeſſed: the Chriſtians of the kingdome of FRANCE haue againe taken from vs. Thus was the late erected kingdome of the Turks in the leſſer ASIA, by theſe valiant Chriſtian champions againe brought low, and they glad to retire themſelues farther off into the mountaines and more Eaſterne countries, vntill this heat was ouerpaſt; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled ſtate of the Greeke empire (afterwards rent in ſunder by ambition and D ciuile diſcord, the ruine of the greateſt monarchies) recouered not onely their former ſtate, but became alſo dreadful vnto the Greeke emperours themſelues: vpon whom they dayly gained in one corner or other, ſtill maintaining the honour of their eſtate, vntill the riſing of the Othoman familie, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall God willing be declared.

Theſe victorious princes then, and to the worlds end famous, not contented to their immortall praiſe, to haue thus driuen the Turks out of the leſſer ASIA, and recouered ſo many countries; bound themſelues, as well the princes as the common ſouldiers, by ſolemne oath, neuer to return againe into their countries, vntil they had accompliſhed that facted war, with the conqueſt of the Holy citie. So mounting together the high mountaine TAVRVS, and diſcending thence as into another world, they came to the citie MARESIA, which they tooke without reſiſtance,
E the Turks there in garriſon, being by night before for feare fled: where the Chriſtians for the refreſhing of themſelues, certaine daies ſtaid. In the meane time Robert earle of FLANDERS with a thouſand men at armes, was ſent out to giue ſummons vnto a citie called ARTASIA, about fifteene miles diſtant from ANTIOCH: when as the citizens beholding the enſignes of the Chriſtians, ſuddenly tooke vp armes againſt the Turks there in garriſon, which had of long holden them in ſubjection, and preuailing vpon them, ſlew them euerie mothers ſonne: whoſe heads they preſented vnto the earle, and receiued him into their citie. The Turks to reuenge the death of their friends, and to recouer againe the citie before the comming of the reſt of the armie, ſent out about ten thouſand men out of ANTIOCH; for thither was aſſembled a great power of F them to haue hindred the farther proceedings of the Chriſtians: and being come neere to ARTASIA, they ſent before certaine ſtragling companies, of purpoſe to draw the new come Chriſtians out of the citie, lying in the meane time in ambuſh with the reſt, of purpoſe to entrap them. With theſe ſtragling companies, the Flemings ſallying out luſtily, encountred, & eaſily put them to flight; the Turks in deed flying of purpoſe to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in Ambuſh. cloſed round with their enemies, and there had vndoubtedly periſhed, had not the citizens be- G ing Chriſtians, preſently ſalied out, and right woorthily relieued them.

Shortly after the Chriſtian princes marching forward with their armie, were encountred by the Turke at the riuer ORONTES, who had there thought to haue ſtaid their farther paſſage: with whom Robert duke of NORMANDIE, who had the leading of the vauntguard, had a hard conflict, vntill that the Turks diſcouraged with the ſight of the armie ſtill comming on, forſooke the bridge, and betooke themſelues to flight. So the Chriſtians paſsing the riuer, came and encamped with their armie before the famous citie of ANTIOCH the one and twentith day of October, in the yeere 1097: the gouernour whereof vnder the Perſian Sultan, was one Caſsianus (of ſome alſo honoured with the name of a king) who at the comming of the Chriſtians, had with him in the citie ſeuen thouſand horſemen, and twentie thouſand foot of the Turks, with H great ſtore of victuals, and all manner of other prouiſions neceſſarie for the defence thereof. This citie called in antient time EPIDAPHANE, or EPIPHANE, and of the Hebrewes, REBLATHA, ſometime the ſeat of the Sirian kings, and afterwards the Metropoliticall citie of SYRIA, hauing vnder it an hundred and fiftie biſhops (famous for many things, and amongſt others, for that it was the ſeat of the bleſſed Apoſtle Saint Peter, and firſt place whereas the profeſſours of the Chriſtian religion tooke the name of Chriſtians) is ſituate vpon the riuer ORONTES, about twelue miles from the ſea, and was then ſtrongly fortified both by nature and art, being compaſſed about with a double wall; the vttermoſt whereof was of hard ſtone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towres in the ſame, and an inpregnable caſtle at the Eaſt end thereof, whereunto was joyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great riuer which watred the South ſide of the citie. I Round about this ſtrong citie (one of the moſt aſſured refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Chriſtian princes encamped, except on that ſide which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be beſieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the citie, duing the time of the ſiege, made many a fierce & deſperat ſally, being ſtil by the Chriſtians moſt valiantly repulſed: eſpecially at the bridge which the Chriſtians had made of boats for their more commodious paſſage too and fro ouer the riuer. In this ſort was the ſiege continued, vntill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloodie skirmiſh. At which time ſuch abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man find any place to lie drie in: and the ſcarſitie of victuall grew ſo great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to ſay) to aſſuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late ſlaine enemies. In theſe extremities, many died of hunger and cold; yea K their horſes alſo periſhed for want of meat, ſo that in the whole campe were ſcarcely left two thouſand horſes fit for ſeruice, the reſt being either all dead, or brought ſo low, as that they were altogether vnſeruiceable. Theſe miſeries dayly increaſing diuers men of great account whom no terrour of the enemie could haue diſmaid, began ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of the campe, with purpoſe to haue ſtolne home; among whom were Peter the heremit, authour of this war, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the reſt as fugitiues, were ſharply reprooued by Hugh the French kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren and fellow ſouldiers, and ſo enforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perſeuerance. Bohemund in the meane time going to ARETHVSA, a towne not far off, by good fortune cut off a great part of the Turks there in garriſon: who after their vſual manner L ſallying out to haue cut off the forrages of the Chriſtians, were now themſelues caught tardie: whereby the countrey for a time was more open for the diſtreſſed Chriſtian ſouldiers to ſeeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertie ſo lately gained, laſted not long, when newes was brought vnto the campe, That the Turks in great number out of the prouinces about ALEPPO and DAMASCO, were comming to the reliefe of their beſieged friends in ANTIOCH. Neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians truſting vnto their owne ſtrength, & the ſtrength of the place wherein they were encamped, lay ſtill, and at their comming ſo encountred them that they ſlew 2000 of them, and put the reſt to flight: In which conflict the Chriſtians got great ſtore of prouiſion & victuals, which the Turks had thought to haue put into the citie. The heads of the ſlaine Turks the Chriſtians ſet vpon ſtakes before the citie, to the more terrour of the defendants. This ouerthrow of M the Turks, wherein Caſsianus had loſt his eldeſt ſonne, with others of his beſt captaines, ſo daunted the beſieged, that they requeſted a truce for a time of the Chriſtian princes: which granted, they of the citie came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewiſe into the citie: Caſsianus ſtill expecting reliefe from the Perſian Sultan. Whilſt the Chriſtian princes were thus

A thus busie in ASIA, the Venetians with a great fleet of two hundred gallies scouring the seas, vnder the conduct of Henrie Contarenus the bishop, and of Vitalis the dukes sonne, meeting with the gallies of Pisa at the RHODES, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherein the Venetians hauing the vpper hand, tooke eighteene of their gallies, and in them fiue thousand souldiers: whom they seeing to be marked with the red crosse, the cognisance of the sacred warre, they presently set at libertie together with the gallies, detayning onely thirtie of the better sort as hostages. After that, the Venetians sayling into IONIA, tooke the citie of SMYRNA, and spoiled all along the coasts of LYCIA, PAMPHILIA, and CILICIA, before for feare abandoned by the Turks.

The truce before taken betweene the Turks and the Christians at the siege of ANTIOCH, be-
B ing in short time after broken by the death of one Vollo a French man, slaine by the Turks: the war was againe begun, and the citie more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernour who in the time of this long siege, which had now continued nine months, had lost most part of his best souldiers, was glad for the defence of so great a citie to vse the seruice of diuers Christians, then dwelling in the citie. Amongst whom was one Pirrhus, a citizen of great reputation, vnto whom he had committed the guarding of a tower, called the two Sisters, but afterward saint Georges tower. This Pyrrhus had secret intelligence with Bohemund prince of TARENTVM, with whom he agreed to giue him there entrance into the city, vpon condition, That he should of the other Christian princes procure the gouernment of the citie vnto himselfe; and that he, with the rest of the Christian citizens in the citie might be at his hands well vsed: Which thing being
C easily obtayned, and all things agreed vpon, Bohemund with his souldiers were by night by Pyrrhus let into the citie, who made way for the rest of the armie to enter. The citie thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the castell, the rest were put vnto the sword, man, woman, and child; and amongst them also many of the Christians, the furious souldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but small store of victuals. Cassianus the late gouernour flying out of the citie to saue himselfe, in wandring through the mountaines, fell into the hands of the Christian Armenians, who lately thrust out of IERVSALEM were fled thither for refuge, by whom he was there slaine. In the citie were slaine about ten thousand persons. Thus was the famous citie of ANTIOCH, which the Turks had long before by famine taken from the Christians, againe recouered the third day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord God 1098. The D poore oppressed Christians in IERVSALEM hearing of this so notable a victorie, gaue secret thanks vnto God therefore, and began to lift vp their heads in hope that their deliuerie was now at hand. Of this victorie, the princes of the armie by speedie messengers and letters certified their friends in all countries, so that in short time the fame thereof had filled a great part of the world. Amongst others, Bohemund prince of TARENTVM, vnto whom the citie was deliuered, sent the joyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother prince of APVLIA: whose letters, as the most certaine witnesses of the historie before reported, I thought it not amisse here to set downe.

The letters of Bohemund prince of Tarentum, to his brother Roger prince of Apulia, concerning the winning of Antioch.

I suppose you to haue vnderstood by the letters of your sonne Tancred, both of the great feare of E some of vs, and the battels which we haue of late with our great glorie fought. But concerning the truce, and the proceeding of the whole action, I had rather you should be certified by my letters, than the letters of others. King Cassianus had required a time of truce: during which, our souldiers had free recourse into the citie without danger, vntill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, slaine by the enemie, the truce was broken. But whilst it yet seemed an hard matter to winne the citie, one Pyrrhus a citizen of ANTIOCH, of great authoritie and much deuoted vnto me, had conference with me concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; yet vpon condition, That the gouernment thereof should be committed to me, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust. I conferred of the whole matter with the princes and great commanders of the armie, and easily obtained that the gouernment of the citie was by their generall consent alotted vnto me. So our armie entring by a gate opened by Pyrrhus, tooke the citie. Within a few daies after, the towne ARETVM was by vs assaulted, but not without some losse
F and danger to our person, by reason of a wound I there receiued. I assure you much of the valour of your sonne Tancred, of whom I and the whole armie make such account and reckoning, as is to be made of a most valiant and resolute generall. Farewell from ANTIOCH.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege of ANTIOCH, Corbanas (the Persian Sultan his lieutenant)

lieutenant) with a great armie beſieged EDESSA, with purpoſe after the taking thereof, to haue G reliued the citie of ANTIOCH. But this citie being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpoſe with a ſtrong garriſon for the defence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to looſe ANTIOCH, the ſafeſt refuge of the Turks in all thoſe parts, riſe with his armie and ſet forward againſt the Chriſtians: where by the way it was his fortune to meet with Sanſadolus, Caſ- ſianus his ſonne, but lately fled from ANTIOCH, by whom he vnderſtood of the loſſe of the citie, and by what meanes the ſame was moſt like to be againe recouered: vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightie armie kept on his way, with a full reſolution to ſet all vpon the fortune of a battell. Whoſe comming much troubled the Chriſtians; for that although they were poſſeſſed of the citie, yet was the caſtell ſtill holden by the Turks. Neuertheleſſe leauing the earle of THOLOVS in the citie with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the caſtell, H they tooke the field with the whole ſtrength of the armie, and ſo in order of battell expected the comming of their enemies: who couragiouſly comming on as men before reſolued to fight, ioyned with them a moſt terrible and bloodie battell. Neither were they in the citie in the mean time idle; for that the Turks in the caſtell hauing receiued in vnto them certaine ſupplies from Corbanas the Sultans lieutenant, with a great armie commeth to recouer againe the citie of Antioch.

Corbanas, ſallied out vpon them that were left for the ſafegard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without was to be ſeene a moſt dreadfull fight of reſolute men, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: yet after long fight and much effuſion of blood, the fortune of the Chriſtians preuailing, the Turks began to giue ground, and afterwards be-tooke themſelues to plaine flight, whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, made of them a woon-derfull ſlaughter. In this battell were ſlaine of the Turks aboue an hundred thouſand, and of the I Chriſtians about foure thouſand two hundred. There was alſo taken a great prey: for beſides horſes and other beaſts for burden, were taken alſo fiue thouſand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of Iune, the caſtell was by the Turks (now diſpairing of releife) yeelded vp vnto the Chriſtians.

ANTIOCH thus taken, Hugh the French kings brother, ſurnamed the Great, was ſent from the reſt of the princes to CONSTANTINOPLE, to haue deliuered the citie vnto Alexius the emperour, according to the agreement before made. But he, guiltie in conſcience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had ſent no reliefe at all during the long and hard ſiege of ANTIOCH; neither performed any thing of that he had further promiſed, and therefore knowing himſelfe hated of them; had in diſtruſt ſo great an offer of the princes, ſo euill deſer- K ued, and therefore refuſed to accept thereof. Whereupon Bohemund by the generall conſent of the whole armie was choſen prince, or (as ſome call him) king of ANTIOCH.

The plague in the Chriſtian armie.

After this long ſiege and want of victuals, enſued a great plague in the armie of the Chriſti-ans, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fiftie thouſand men to haue died, and amongſt them many of great account. But the mortalitie ceaſing, the Chriſtians, in Nouember following, by force tooke RVGIA, and ALBARIA, two cities, about two daies journey from whom followed the duke Godfrey, and the earle of FLANDERS with their regiments. The reſt L of the princes wintred ſome at RVGIA, ſome at ALBARIA, from whence Raimund made ſun-drie light expeditions further into the enemies countrey: But the ſpring approching, the Chriſtian princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from ANTIOCH, beſieged TORTOSA. Raimund in the meane time with the reſt, beſieging the citie of TRIPOLIS: who become much more inſolent than before, by reaſon of ſome fortunate roads he had made vpon the enemies the laſt winter, ceaſed not ſtill to ma-ligne Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to haue diuided the whole power of the Chriſtians, & to haue turned their weapons vpon themſelues: which Bohemund wel conſidering, riſe with his armie; and becauſe he would not with his preſence trouble the proceeding of the religious war, retired himſelfe to ANTIOCH. After whoſe departure, Godfrey and the earle of M FLANDERS, tooke GABELLA, a citie about twelue miles from LAODICIA, and from thence returned againe to the ſiege of TORTOSA, whether Raimund came alſo with his armie, hauing before driuen the gouernour of TRIPOLIS to ſuch compoſition as pleaſed himſelfe, and to furniſh him with ſuch things as he wanted. Thus was TORTOSA hardly on three ſides beſieged

by

A by the Christians, but so notably defended by the Turks, that after three months hard siege the Christians were glad to depart thence: and marching alongst the sea side, spoiled the countrey about SIDON. But forasmuch as that citie was not easily to be woon, they left it,& encamped before PTOLEMAIS, which they also passed by: the gouernor thereof sending them out victuals, with such other things as they wanted; and vpon summons giuen, promising to yeeld the citie after they had once woon the citie of IERVSALEM. From thence they came to CESARIA in PALESTINE, where they solemnly kept the feast of Whitsontide, and so to RAMA, which they found for feare forsaken of the Infidels. Marching from RAMA, and drawing neere to IERVSALEM, they in the vantgard of the armie, vpon the first descrying of the Holy citie, gaue for joy diuers great shouts and outcries, which with the like applause of the whole armie
B was so doubled and redoubled, as if therewith they would haue rent the verie mountaines and pearced the highest heauens. There might a man haue seene the deuout passions of these most woorthie and zealous Christians, vttered in right diuers manners: Some, with their eies and hands cast vp towards heauen, called aloud vpon the name and helpe of Christ Iesus; some, prostrat vpon their faces, kissed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world sometime walked; others, joyfully saluted those holy places which they had heard so much of, and then first beheld: In briefe, euerie man in some sort expressed the joy he had conceiued of the sight of the Holy citie, as the end of their long trauell.

The exceeding joy of the Christians vpon the first descrying of the Holy citie.

This most antient and famous citie, so much renowmed in holy writ, is situat in an hillie countrey; not watred with any riuer or fresh springs, as other famous cities for most part be;
C neither yet was it well seated for wood, or pasture ground: But what wanted in these, and such other benefits of nature, was by the extraordinarie blessings of the most highest, so supplied, as that the Iewes there dwelling, so long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of all other people in the world justly accounted the most happie and fortunate. Yet in those so blessed times, was this citie for the sinne of the people oftentimes deliuered into the enemies hand, and the glorie thereof defaced: as well appeareth by the whole course of the historie of holy Scripture, as also by the antient and approoued histories as well of the Iewes themselues, as others. Neuertheless, it still rise againe (though not in like glorie as before in the time of king Dauid, Salomon, and the other next succeeding kings) and so was still repeopled by the Iewes, vntill that at last according to the foretelling of our Sauiour Christ, it was with a great and of all others
D most lamentable destruction, vtterly rased and destroyed by the Romans, vnder the leading of Vespatian the emperour, and his noble sonne Titus, fortie yeeres after our Sauiour his pretious death and passion. Sithence which time, it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired, or yet well inhabited, by the Iewes; but lying buried in the ruines of it selfe, all the raigne of Domitian, Nerua, and Trajan, vntill the time of the great emperour Aelius Adrianus, it was againe by him reedified about the yeere 136, and after the name of him called ÆLIA; who together with the name changed also in some part the antient situation of the citie. For whereas before it was seated vpon the steepe rising of an hill, in such sort that towards the East and the South it ouerlooked the whole ground, hauing onely the temple and the castle called ANTONIA, in the highest part of the citie: Adrian translated the whole citie vnto the verie top of the hill, so that the place
E where our blessed Sauiour suffred his most bitter passion, with the sepulcher wherein he was also laid, and from whence he in glorie rise againe, before without the citie, were then enclosed within the walles thereof, as they are at this day to be seene. Yet for all that the emperour being dead, in processe of time this new built citie recouered againe the antient name of IERVSALEM, whereby it hath euer since, and is at this day yet known. This citie so reedified, the emperour first gaue vnto the Iewes, whom he afterwards againe thrust out for their rebellion, and gaue it to the Christians to inhabit: ouer whom, one Marke, first bishop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But forasmuch as the Romane emperours were at that time altogether idolaters and persecutors of the poore Christians, the church also at IERVSALEM, with others endured sun-
F drie and many grieuous persecutions, vnder the emperors Antoninus, Commodus, Seuerus, Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Diocletianus, and Maxentius, vntill that at length Constantine the Great conuerted vnto the faith of Christ, about the yeere of Grace 320, suppressing the Pagan idolatrie, gaue generall peace vnto the afflicted church: whereby the Christian church at IERVSALEM, for the space of three hundred yeeres after, happily flourished vnder the Greeke emperours, vntill the time of the emperour Phocas; who hauing most cruelly slaine the good empe-

A briefe discourse of the state & fortune of the Holy citie of Ierusalem, from the destruction thereof, vnder Vespatianus the emperor and Titus his sonne, vntill it was now againe recouered out of the hands of the Infidels by Godfrey of Buillion and the other Christian princes of the West.

rour Maurice with his children, and ſo poſſeſſed himſelfe of the empire, gaue occaſion thereby vnto Choſroe the Perſian king, in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law, with all his power to inuade SIRIA: who as a tempeſt bearing downe all before him, tooke alſo by force the citie of IERVSALEM, hauing that yeere, which was about the yeere ſix hundred and ten, ſlaine almoſt an hundred thouſand chriſtians. But Phocas the vſurper being by them of his guard moſt cruelly ſlaine, and Heraclius ſucceeding in his ſteed, Choſroe was by him againe driuen out of SIRIA, and the Holy citie againe recouered, about the yeere 624. In theſe great wars againſt the Perſians, Heraclius had vſed the helpe of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike people of ARABIA DESERTA, altogether giuen to the ſpoile: who, the wars now ended, expecting to haue receiued their pay, were contrarie to their expectation, and without all reaſon rejected by them that ſhould haue paid them, with verie foule and contumelious words; as, that there was not money enough to pay the Chriſtian ſoldiers of the Latines and the Greeks, much leſſe thoſe vile dogs (whom they ſo called, for that they had but a little before receiued the damnable doctrine of the falſe prophet Mahomet, the great ſeducer of the world, who euen in that time flouriſhed.) Vpon which diſcontentment they at their returne reuolted from the empire, and joyned themſelues vnto their great prophet, and ſo afterwards vnto the Caliphs his ſucceſſors, extending his doctrine, together with his ſoueraigntie to the vttermoſt of their power: and that with ſo good ſucceſſe, that in ſhort time they had ouerrun all AEGYPT, SIRIA, the land of promiſe, and taken the Holy citie. With theſe (the diſciples of Mahomet and his ſucceſſors, the Saraſins, for ſo now they would be called) the Greeke emperors enſuing, had for certaine yeeres diuers conflicts, with diuers fortune, for the poſſeſsion of SIRIA. But at length wearied out, & by them ouercom, they left the aforeſaid countries wholy vnto their deuotion. Hereby it came to paſſe, that the Saraſins for the ſpace of 370 yeeres following held thoſe countries, with many others, in great ſubjection, oppreſsing ſtill the poore Chriſtians in IERVSALEM with moſt grieuous tributes and exactions: vnto whom they yet left a third part of the citie for them to dwell in, with the temple of the Sepulcher of our Sauiour, and mount SION; not for any deuotion, either vnto them, or thoſe places, but for that it yeelded them a great profit by the recourſe of deuout Chriſtians trauelling thither: reſeruing in the meane time vnto themſelues, the other two parts of the citie, with the temple of Salomon, before reedified by the Chriſtians. Now whilſt the Saraſins thus triumph it in the Eaſt, and not in the Eaſt onely, but ouer a great part of the Weſt alſo, contenting themſelues with ſuch tributs as they had impoſed vpon the ſubdued nations and countries: vp ſtart the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruell people; who firſt breaking into ASIA (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aſpiring vnto the kingdome of PERSIA, ſubdued the countries of MESOPOTAMIA, SIRIA, with the greateſt part of the leſſer ASIA, and IVDEA, together with the Holy citie: who both there and in all other places held the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in ſuch ſubjection and thraldom, as that the former gouernment of the Saraſins ſeemed in compariſon of this to haue beene but light and eaſie. Neither was there any end or releaſe of theſe ſo great miſeries to haue beene expected, had not God in mercie by the weake meanes of a poore heremit, ſtirred vp theſe moſt woorthie princes of the Weſt to take vp armes in their defence, who hauing with their victorious armies recouered the leſſer ASIA, with a great part of SIRIA, were now come vnto this Holy citie.

Ieruſalem beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The gouernour of IERVSALEM vnderſtanding by his eſpials, of the proceedings of the Chriſtians, had before their approch, got into the citie a verie ſtrong garriſon of right valiant ſouldiers, with good ſtore of all things neceſſarie for the holding out of a long ſiege. The Chriſtians with their armie approching the citie, encamped before it on the North; for that towards the Eaſt and the South, it was not well to be beſieged, by reaſon of the broken rocks and mountaines. Next vnto the citie lay Godfrey the duke, with the Germans and Loranois: neere vnto him lay the earle of FLANDERS, and Robert the Norman: before the Weſt gate lay Tancred, and the earle of THOLOVS: Bohemund and Baldwin were both abſent, the one at ANTIOCH, the other at EDESSA. The Chriſtians thus ſtrongly encamped, the fift day after gaue vnto the citie a fierce aſſault, with ſuch cheerfulneſſe, as that it was verily ſuppoſed, it might haue beene euen then woon, had they beene ſufficiently furniſhed with ſcaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault and retire. But within a few daies after, hauing ſupplied that defect, and prouided all things neceſſarie, they came on againe afreſh, and with all their power gaue vnto the citie a moſt terrible aſſault, wherein was on both ſides ſeene great valour, policie,

A licie,& cunning,with much ſlaughter,vntill that at length the Chriſtians wearie of the long fight, and in that hot countrey,and moſt feruent time of the yeere fainting for lacke of water,were glad againe to forſake the aſſault, and to retire into their trenches: onely the well of Siloe yeelded them water, and that not ſufficient for the whole campe; the reſt of the wels which were but few,being before by the enemie either filled vp or elſe poyſoned.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of IERVSALEM, a fleet of the Genowaies arriued at IOPPA; at which time alſo a great fleet of the Egyptian Sultans lay at ASCALON, to haue brought reliefe to the beſieged Turks in IERVSALEM: whereof the Genowaies vnderſtanding, and knowing themſelues too weake to encounter them at ſea, tooke all ſuch things out of their ſhips as they thought good, and ſo ſinking them, marched by land vnto the campe. There was B amongſt theſe Genowaies diuers enginers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the beſieging of cities: by whoſe deuice, a great mouing tower was framed of timber and thick plancks,couered ouer with raw hides,to ſaue the ſame from fire: out of which the Chriſtians might in ſafetie greatly annoy the defendants. This tower being by night brought cloſe vnto the wall, ſerued the Chriſtians in ſteed of a moſt ſure fortreſſe in the aſſault the next day: where whilſt they ſtriue with like valour and doubtfull victorie on both ſides, from morning vntill midday, by chance the wind fauouring the Chriſtians, carried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherewith they had thought to haue burnt the tower; with ſuch violence,that the Chriſtians taking the benefit thereof, and holpen by the tower, gained the top of the wall: which was firſt footed by the duke Godfrey, and his brother Euſtace, C with their followers, and the enſigns of the duke there firſt ſet vp,to the great encouraging of the Chriſtians; who now preſsing in on euerie ſide, like a violent riuer that had broken ouer the banks,bare downe all before them. All were ſlaine that came to hand,men,women,and children, without reſpect of age, ſex,or condition: the ſlaughter was great, and the ſight lamentable, all the ſtreets were filled with blood,and the bodies of the dead,death triumphing in euerie place.

The Genowaies come to the ſiege.

Yet in this confuſion, a woonderfull number of the better ſort of the Turks, retiring vnto Salomons temple there to do their laſt deuoire, made there a great and terrible fight, armed with diſpaire to endure any thing; and the victorious Chriſtians no leſſe diſdaining,after the winning of the citie, to find there ſo great reſiſtance. In this deſperat conflict, fought with woonderfull obſtinacie of mind, many fell on both ſides: but the Chriſtians came on ſo fiercely, with deſire D of blood, that breaking into the temple, the foremoſt of them were by the preſſe of them that followed after,violently thruſt vpon the weapons of their enemies,and ſo miſerably ſlaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppreſſed,giue it ouer, but as men reſolued to die, deſperatly fought it out with inuincible courage, not at the gates of the temple onely, but euen in the middeſt thereof alſo, where was to be ſeene great heaps, both of the victors and the vanquiſhed, ſlaine indifferently together. All the pauement of the temple ſwam with blood, in ſuch ſort,that a man could not ſet his foot,but either vpon ſome dead man,or ouer the ſhooes in blood. Yet for all that,the obſtinate enemie ſtill held the vaults and top of the temple, when as the darkneſſe of the night came ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians were glad to make an end of the ſlaughter, and to ſound a retrait. The next day (for that proclamation was made, for mercie to be ſhewed vnto all ſuch as E ſhould lay downe their weapons) the Turks that yet held the vpper part of the temple, came down & yeelded themſelues. Thus was the famous citie of IERVSALEM with great bloodſhed, but far greater honor, recouered by theſe worthie Chriſtians,in the yeere 1099, after it had beene 1099 in the hands of the infidels aboue foure hundred yeeres.

A moſt cruell and bloodie fight betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, euen in the Temple of Ieruſalem.

The next day after, hauing buried the dead and cleanſed the citie, they gaue thanks to God with publicke praiers, and great rejoycing. The poore Chriſtians before oppreſſed, now ouercome with vnexpected joy, welcomed their victorious brethren with great joy and praiſe; and the ſouldiers embracing one another, ſparing to ſpeake of themſelues, freely commended each others valour. Eight daies after,the princes of the armie meeting together,began to conſult about F the choice of their king: amongſt whom was no ſuch difference, as might well ſhew which was to be preferred before the others. And although euerie one of them for proweſſe and deſert, ſeemed woorthie of ſo great an honour; yet by the generall conſent of all, it was giuen to Robert duke of NORMANDIE: who about the ſame time hearing of the death of the Conqueror his father, and more in loue with his fathers new gotten kingdome in ENGLAND, in hope thereof, refuſed the kingdome of IERVSALEM, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found found poſſeſſed by William Rufus his yoonger brother, and ſo in hope of a better refuſing the G woorſe, vpon the matter loſt both.

Godfrey duke of Buillon by the generall conſent of the Chriſtian armie choſen firſt king of Ieruſalem.

After whoſe departure, Godfrey of BVILLON duke of LORAINE (whoſe enſigne was firſt diſplaid vpon the wals) was by the generall conſent both of the princes and the armie, ſaluted king. He was a great ſouldier, and endued with many heroicall vertues, brought vp in the court of the emperour Henrie the fourth, and by him much emploied. At the time of his inauguration, he refuſed to be crowned with a crowne of gold: ſaying, That it became not a Chri-ſtian man, there to were a crowne of gold, where Chriſt the ſonne of God had for the ſaluation of mankind, ſometime worne a crowne of thorne. Of the greateſt part of theſe proceedings of the Chriſtians, from the time of their departure from ANTIOCH vntill the winning of the Holy H citie, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth.

Godfrey of Buillon to Bohemund king of Antioch, greeting.

After long trauell, hauing firſt taken certaine townes, we came to IERVSALEM: which citie is enuironed with high hils, without riuers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Solomans, and that a verie little one. In it are many ceſterns, wherein water is kept, both in the citie and the countrey thereabout. On the Eaſt are the Arabians, the Moabits, and Ammonits: on the South, the Idumeans, Aegyptians, and Philiſtians: Weſtward alongſt the ſea coaſt lie the cities of PTOLEMAIS, TIRVS, I and TRIPOLIS: and Northward, TIBERIAS, CESAREA, PHILIPPI, with the countrey DECAPOLIS and DAMASCO. In the aſſault of the citie, I firſt gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to aſſaile, and commanded Baldwin to enter the citie: who hauing ſlaine certaine companies of the enemies, broke open one of the gates for the Chriſtians to enter. Raymond had the citie of Dauid, with much rich ſpoile, yeelded vnto him. But when we came vnto the temple of Soloman, there we had a great conflict, with ſo great ſlaughter of the enemie, that our men ſtood in blood aboue the ancles: the night approching, we could not take the vpper part of the temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turks pitifully crying out for mercie: and ſo the citie of IERVSALEM was by vs taken, the fifteenth of Iuly, in the yeere of our redemption 1099, 39 daies after the beginning of the ſiege, 409 yeeres after it fell into the hands of the Saraſins in the time of Heraclius the emperour. Beſides K this, the princes with one conſent ſaluted me (againſt my will) king of IERVSALEM: who although I feare to take vpon me ſo great a kingdome; yet I will do my deuoir, that they ſhall eaſily know me for a Chriſtian king, and well deſeruing of the vniuerſall Faith. But loue you me as you do. And ſo farewell from IERVSALEM.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing at IERVSALEM, ſuch a multitude of the Turks, and Saraſins their confederats (now in their common calamitie all as one) were aſſembled at AS-CALON (a citie about fiue and twentie miles from IERVSALEM) to reuenge the injuries they had before receiued, as had not before met together in all the time of this ſacred war. Againſt whom, Godfrey (the late duke, and now king) aſſembled the whole forces of the Chriſtians in L thoſe countries, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon in the new woon citie, ſet forward: and meeting with them, joyned a moſt dreadfull and cruell battell, wherein (as moſt report) were ſlaine of the An hundred thouſand Turks and Saraſins ſlaine. Infidels an hundred thouſand men, and the reſt put to flight. The ſpoile there taken, far exceeded all that the Chriſtians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after ſo great a victorie, returning to IERVSALEM, gaue vnto God moſt humble thanks. The reſt of the princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to ANTIOCH, Baldwin to EDESSA, Tancred into GALLILEY, whereof he was created prince: or elſe hauing now performed the vttermoſt of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the moſt honourable expedition that euer the Chriſtians tooke in hand againſt the Infidels, and with the greateſt reſolution performed, for the moſt part, by ſuch voluntary men, as mooued with M a deuout zeale, to their immortall praiſe, ſpared neither life nor liuing in defence of the Chriſtian Godfrey of Buillon firſt Chriſtian king of Ieruſalem, dieth of the plague. faith and religion; all men woorthie eternall fame and memorie. Not long after enſued a great peſtilence (the readie attendant of long war and want) whereof infinit numbers of people died, and among the reſt Godfrey, the firſt Chriſtian king of IERVSALEM, neuer to be ſufficiently commended: who with the generall lamentation of all good Chriſtians, was honourably buried

A ried in the church of the ſepulchre of our Sauiour on the mount CALVERIE, where our Sauiour ſuffred his paſsion: in which the Chriſtian kings ſucceeding him, were alſo afterwards buried. He departed this life the eighteenth of Iuly, in the yeere of our Lord 1100, when he had yet ſcarce raigned a full yeere. Whoſe tombe is yet at this day there to be ſeene with an honourable inſcrption thereupon. 1100

After the death of Godfrey, the Chriſtians made choice of Baldwin his brother, countie of EDESSA; who leauing his former gouernment to Baldwin ſurnamed Burgenſis, his neere kinſman, came to IERVSALEM honourably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Chriſtmas day with all ſolemnitie crowned king, in the yeere 1101. He aided by the Venetians and Genowaies at ſea, and by Bohemund king of ANTIOCH by land, tooke from the Infidels the citie of B CESAREA STRATONIS, ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide; and ouerthrew certaine companies of the Aegyptian Sultans at RAMA. But vnderſtanding that the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt were comming to his aid with a new power; he glad thereof, went to meet them, and ſafely conducted them to IERVSALEM alongſt the ſea coaſt, by the cities of BERYTVS, SIDON, TIRE, and PTOLEMAIS, all yet holden by the enemies. At which time the Turks at ASCALON hauing receiued great aid from the Arabians and Aegyptians, inuaded the countrey about RAMA: where betwixt them and the Chriſtians was fought a moſt cruell battell, wherein the Chriſtians receiued a moſt notable ouerthrow; many of their great commanders being there ſlaine, and among the reſt Stephen earle of CHARTERS (but lately returned home from the former expedition, and now come backe againe) and Stephen earle of BVROVNDIE and THOLOVS: yea the king himſelfe hardly eſcaped the enemies hands, and after many dangers came at length to IOPPA after it had beene conſtantly before reported him to haue been in that battell alſo ſlaine. Who hauing there in haſt repaired his armie, came againe ſpeedily vpon his enemies, fearing as then nothing leſſe; and ouerthrew them with ſuch a ſlaughter, as that they had ſmall cauſe to rejoyce of the former victorie. Neither were the reſt of the Chriſtian princes in the other parts of SIRIA and PALESTINE, in the meane time idle, but ſought by all meanes to enlarge their territories. Tancred prince of GALLILIE, hauing raiſed a great power, tooke APAMEA, the Metropoliticall citie of CŒLESYRIA, and after much toile woon alſo the citie of LAODICEA. Baldwin alſo gouernour of EDESSA beſieging the citie of CARRAS, had brought the beſieged Turks to ſuch extremitie, that they were about to haue yeelded the citie: when ſuddenly hee was ſet vpon by a great armie of the Turks ſent from the Perſian Sultan, for the reliefe of the beſieged; and being there ouerthrown, was himſelfe there taken, with Benedict the biſhop, and one Ioſcelin his kinſman: who after fiue yeeres captiuitie, found means with the Turke that had taken them, to redeeme themſelues, to the great offence of the Perſian Sultan, & of the Sultan Solyman.

Baldwin countie of Edeſſa, and brother to Godfrey ſecond king of Ieruſalem.

King Baldwin after the late victorie, liued for a ſeaſon at ſome good reſt in IERVSALEM, vnmoleſted by his enemies: but knowing his greateſt ſafetie among ſuch warlike people, to conſiſt in armes, he vpon the ſudden raiſed the whole ſtrength of his kingdome, and laid ſiege to PTOLOMAIS, otherwiſe called ACON, a citie of PHŒNICIA ſtanding vpon the riuage of the ſea; where he found ſuch reſiſtance, that he was glad to raiſe his ſiege and depart, hauing done nothing more than ſpoiled the pleaſant places without the citie. By the way in his returne backe E againe, it fortuned him to meet with certaine companies of the enemies aduenturers, by whom he was in a skirmiſh mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the wound was by his ſurgeans healed vp, yet was the griefe thereof ſo great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithſtanding the former repulſe, the next yeere, encouraged by the comming of the Genua fleet, laid hard ſiege againe to PTOLOMAIS both by ſea and land, which after twentie daies ſiege was by compoſition yeelded vnto him.

Ptolomais woon by king Baldwin.

Shortly after, the gouernour of ALEPPO with certaine others of the Turks great captaines in thoſe quarters, hauing joyned their forces together and ſo inuaded the countrey about ANTIOCH, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into ITALY, had left gouernour of F that citie) notably encountred and put to flight. At which time alſo the Caliph of AEGYPT ſending great forces both by ſea and land againſt the king of IERVSALEM, was in both places diſcomfited, at land by the Chriſtians, and at ſea by tempeſt.

Bohemund in the meane time, with a great armie of voluntarie men, and others (wherein he is reported to haue had fiue thouſand horſe, and fortie thouſand foot) returning towards the Holy land, in reuenge of many injuries done by Alexius the emperour, vnto the ſouldiers of this ſacred war, contrarie to his faith and promiſe to them before giuen: by the way landed his G men in EPIRVS, and grieuouſly ſpoiled the countrey about DIRRACHIVM, part of the emperours dominion. Neither made he an end of ſpoiling, vntill he had enforced the emperour for redreſſe of ſo great harmes, to make peace with him; and againe by ſolemne oath to promiſe all ſecuritie and kindneſſe, vnto all ſuch Chriſtian ſouldiers as ſhould haue occaſion to trauell too or fro through his countries, during the time of this religious war. After which agreement hee put to ſea againe, and ſo returned for IERVSALEM. But whileſt he ſtaid at ANTIOCH, hee Bohemund dieth at Antioch. ſhortly after there died in the yeere 1108, leauing the principalitie thereof vnto his yoong ſonne Bohemund, a child vnder the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Yet were the cities of BERYTVS, SIDON, and TIRE, alongſt the ſea coaſt, in the enemies H poſſeſsion: for the gaining whereof, Baldwin the king raiſed a great armie, and ſo came and laid ſiege to BERYTVS, which after many ſharpe aſſaults he at length woon, the three and twentith day of Aprill in the yeere 1111, and put to ſword moſt part of them that he found therein. The 1111 ſame yeere alſo he, aſsiſted by a fleet ſent vnto him out of NORWAY, beſieged the citie of SI-Sidon woon. DON: which the citizens ſeeing themſelues now beſet both by ſea and land, at length yeelded vnto him by compoſition, the nineteenth day of December. After which victorie he diſmiſſed the fleet, and returned himſelfe in triumph to IERVSALEM. Now of all the famous cities alongſt the ſea coaſt of PHŒNICIA and PALESTINE, from LAODICEA to ASCALON, was one-ly the citie of TYRE that remained in the hands of the enemies: which citie Baldwin alſo hardly beſieged; neuertheleſſe, it was ſo well defended by the Turks, that after he had all in vaine lyen I before it by the ſpace of foure months, he was glad to riſe with his armie and depart.

It fortuned, that within two yeeres after, the Turks with a mightie armie ſent from the Per-ſian Sultan, inuaded the countrey of CŒLESYRIA, where ſpoiling all before them as they went, they came and encamped vpon the ſea coaſt neere vnto TYBERIAS. Againſt whom Baldwin gathered the whole ſtrength of his kingdome, with whom alſo Tancred (who now raig-ned in ANTIOCH, the yoong Bohemund being dead) with the countie of TRIPOLI, and the reſt of the Chriſtian princes, joyned their forces: who altogether marching forward, came and encamped, not far from the enemie, being in number far moe than they. Mendus generall of the Turks armie (for ſo I find him called) vnderſtanding of their approch, ſent out certaine companies of his men to skirmiſh with them: againſt whom the Chriſtians alſo ſent out others; who K encountring them, eaſily put them to flight, being before commanded ſo to do, of purpoſe to draw the Chriſtians into the danger of a greater ſtrength, lying in ambuſh to intrap them: which according to the Turks deſire fell out. For the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing the flying enemie, fell into the ambuſh, and ſo before they were well aware, were beſet on euerie ſide with their enemies: vnto the reſcue of whom, other companies of the Chriſtians comming in, and others likewiſe from the Turks, both the great armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joyned a moſt fierce and terrible battell, with great ſlaughter on both ſides. But at length the multitude of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians were put to the woorſe, and ſo glad to flie: after whom the fierce enemy hardly followed, not without great ſlaughter. In which flight the king himſelfe hardly eſcaped, with Arnolphus the Patriarch. Whileſt Baldwin was L thus buſied abroad, the Turks & Saraſins from ASCALON, came & beſieged IERVSALEM, being then but weakly manned: but hearing of the kings comming, & that the armie of the Chriſtians dayly increaſed with new ſupplies out of the Weſt by ſea, they retired home againe, hauing burnt certaine ſtorehouſes full of corne, and ſpoiled ſuch things as was ſubject to their furie.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this king had with the Saraſins and Turks, which for breuitie I paſſe ouer, contented to haue briefly touched the greateſt. In the laſt yeere of his raigne, hauing for certaine yeeres before liued in ſome reaſonable peace, he made an expedition into AEGYPT, where he with much difficultie woon PHARAMIA, a ſtrong citie vpon the ſea coaſt, which he joyned vnto his owne kingdome. After that he went to the mouth of the riuer NILVS, and with great admiration, learned the nature of that ſtrange riuer. M And hauing therein taken abundance of fiſh, returned into the citie, and there with the ſame feaſted himſelfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feele the griefe of his old wound; and growing thereof ſicker and ſicker, returned with his armie toward IERVSALEM, where by the way neere vnto a citie called LARIS, he died (to the great griefe of all the Chriſtians) in the 1118 yeere 1118. His dead bodie being brought backe vnto IERVSALEM, was there roially buried,

neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had raigned eighteene yeeres: whose ſepulchre is yet there alſo to be ſeene, faſt by the ſepulchre of his brother.

The late king thus dead and buried, the Chriſtians with one conſent made choiſe of his couſin Baldwin ſurnamed Brugenſis, gouernour of EDESSA: who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond, was the ſecond of Aprill in the yeere 1118, ſolemnly crowned king of IERVSALEM. He was of ſtature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gratious, hauing his haire thinne and yellow, his beard mingled with ſome gray haires hanging downe to his breaſt, his colour freſh and liuely for one of his yeeres. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no leſſe redoubted of his enemies than beloued of his ſubjects, who had in him repoſed great hope both for the defence and enlarging of that new gained kingdome. Againſt him the ſame Sommer the Caliph of AEGYPT, aided by the king of DAMASCO and the Turks, in reuenge of the loſſe he had in the expedition the yeere before receiued, raiſed a great power to inuade him both by ſea and land. Againſt whom Baldwin alſo oppoſed himſelfe with his whole ſtrength, and ſo came and encamped within the ſight of his enemies. In which ſort, when both armies had lyen the one facing the other by the ſpace of three months, they both riſe: the Chriſtians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Chriſtians, and ſo retired without any notably thing doing.

Baldwin Brugenſis choſen king of Ieruſalem.

This yeere died Alexius the Greeke emperour, who euen from the beginning of this ſacred war, ſecretly repined at the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in SIRIA, although his empire were thereby greatly enlarged: after whome ſucceeded Calo Ioannes his ſonne, who all the time of his raigne right woorthily defended his territories in the leſſer ASIA againſt the inuaſion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greateſt princes of the Turks in the leſſer ASIA, with the king of DAMASCO, and Debeis king of ARABIA, joyning their forces together, with a great armie inuading the countrey about ANTIOCH, came and encamped not far from ALEPPO: againſt whom Roger prince of ANTIOCH, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Chriſtian princes his confederats, but preſuming of his owne ſtrength, went foorth with greater courage than diſcretion, whereunto his ſucceſſe was anſwerable: for encountring with them at too much ods, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrown, wherein he himſelfe was ſlaine with moſt part of his armie. Of which ſo great a ſlaughter, the place wherein this battell was fought, was afterward called, The field of Blood. But whilſt the Turks after ſo great a victorie, careleſly and at pleaſure roame vp and downe the countrey, Baldwin ſetting vpon them, ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and ſo put them to flight. After this victorie gained by the Chriſtians the fourteenth of Auguſt, in the yeere 1120, king Baldwin in great triumph entred into ANTIOCH, and ſo joyned that principalitie vnto his owne kingdome.

The yeer following, the Turks with another armie, inuaded the ſame country again: for repreſſing of whom, whilſt Baldwin with the other Chriſtian princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great commander ſuddenly died of an Apoplexie; vpon whoſe death they retired without further harme doing. Neuertheleſſe the next Spring, the king of DAMASCO aided by the Arabians, entred againe with a great power into the countrey about ANTIOCH, and there did ſome harme: for the Antiochians now deſtitute of their owne prince, and Baldwin (who had taken vpon him their protection) being far off, and otherwiſe buſied at IERVSALEM, were much more ſubject vnto the inrodes of their enemies (ſtill at hand) than before when they had a prince of their owne ſtill preſent amongſt them. But Baldwin aduertiſed thereof, was making towards them with a puiſſant armie, ſooner than they had thought it could haue beene poſsible. Of whoſe approch the Turks vnderſtanding, retired againe out of the countrey: after whom, the king thinking it not good to make further purſuit, turned a little out of the way, and tooke by force GARAZE, one of the ſtrongeſt caſtels of the kings of DAMASCO, built but the yeere before; which becauſe it was not without great charge and danger to be holden, he raſed downe to the ground.

Baldwin notwithſtanding that hee had many times thus honourably repulſed his enemies, wiſely conſidering how he was on the one ſide beſet with the Turks, and on the other ſide with the Saraſins (which yet raigned in AEGYPT, the kingdome of IERVSALEM lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to pray aid of the Chriſtian princes of EVROPE, and to that purpoſe had ſent diuers his embaſſadors vnto diuers of them, but eſpecially

vnto the Venetians; whom of all others he thought fitteſt at his need to yeeld him reliefe by ſea. G
It fortuned in the meane time, that Balac the Perſian Sultan with a great armie of the Turks, inuaded the countrey about ANTIOCH, whereof Baldwin vnderſtanding (although he certainly knew he ſhould ere long receiue aid from the other Chriſtian princes his friends, but eſpecially from the Venetians,& might therfore with great reaſon haue protracted the war vntil their comming, yet being therewith much mooued, or elſe his deſtinie ſo requiring) raiſed ſuch forces as he had of his owne, and without longer ſtaying for his friends, with greater courage than good ſpeed,ſet forward: and ſo joyning battell with the enemy,was therein ouerthrown,with the greateſt part of his armie,and himſelfe taken priſoner in the fight,with certaine other of his beſt commanders; who altogether were carried away captiues vnto CARRAS. H

Ioppa beſieged by the Saraſins.

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the king, the Caliph of AEGYPT on the other ſide tooke occaſion with all his power to inuade the kingdome of IERVSALEM; and hauing in himſelfe purpoſed the vtter ruine thereof, beſide the great armie which he ſent thither by land, which lay encamped not far from ASCALON, he put to ſea an huge fleet alſo, of ſeuen hundred ſaile,for the diſtreſsing of the ſea townes, which he well knew were not otherwiſe to be woon. This fleet of the Saraſin kings (for AEGYPT with the kingdomes of TVNES and MOROCCO were yet in poſſeſsion of the Saraſins) ariuing at IOPPA,there put a ſhore their land forces,and hardly beſieged the towne both by ſea and land. But whilſt they thus lay in great hope to haue woon the towne, Dominicus Michael, duke of VENICE, ſtirred vp by Calixtus then biſhop of ROME, was come to CIPRVS with a fleet of two hundred ſaile, for the I reliefe of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, and the Holy land: And hearing of the diſtreſſe of IOPPA, nothing diſmaid with the number of the enemies fleet, haſted thither, and came ſo ſuddenly vpon them, that he had (as ſome report) ouerthrown them, before they could put themſelues in order,or be in readineſſe to fight: or as ſome others ſay, after a great and doubtfull fight, hauing ſunke or taken a great number of them,and put the reſt to flight,he obtained of them a moſt glorious victoritie. With like good fortune alſo, were the Saraſins ouerthrown in a notable battell at land, neere vnto ASCALON, by the lord Euſtace, vnto whom the defence of the kingdome was committed after the taking of the king,who not long after ſo great a victorie died.

IOPPA relieued (as is aforeſaid) the duke of VENICE trauelled by land to IERVSALEM, where he was honourably receiued by Guarimund the Patriarch, and the confederation before K made betwixt king Baldwin & the Venetians,vpon the ſame conditions ſolemnly againe renued.

Tyre beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The Saraſins thus notably diſcomfited both by ſea and land, and the Chriſtians thereby not a little encouraged, and joyning their forces together with the Venetians, came and the firſt of March laid ſiege vnto the antient and ſtrong citie of TYRE: which they hauing beſet both by ſea and land, gaue thereunto many a ſharpe aſſault: which the Turks as men fighting for their liues, and wiues, right valiantly repulſed. In which ſort the ſiege was continued longer than the Chriſtians had at the firſt thought ſhould haue needed: yet at length, after foure months ſiege, the Turks ſore weakned with often aſſaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their ſtore being ſpent,yeelded the citie by compoſition. Thus was the citie of TYRE (the moſt famous port of PHOENICIA) yeelded vnto the Chriſtians the nine and twentith of Iune, in L 1124 the yeere 1124. The third part of this citie was giuen vnto the Venetians,according to the compoſition made betwixt them and the kings of IERVSALEM, That of all ſuch cities as were by their helpe woon from the Infidels in SYRIA, they ſhould haue a third part, with one ſtreet, and free traficke in all the reſt of the cities of the kingdome of IERVSALEM. Shortly after was king Baldwin ſet at libertie for the ranſom of an hundred thouſand ducats, after he had beene eighteene moneths priſoner among the Turkes.

The duke of VENICE hauing now ſpent almoſt three yeares in this ſacred expedition,& well confirmed the ſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, returning home, by the way tooke the iſlands of CHIOS, RHODUS, SAMOS, MITYLEN, and ANDRUS, with the citie of MODON in PELOPONESUS; all, places belonging vnto the Greekes empire. Which hee did in reuenge of the M injuries done by the emperour, in the time of his abſence, who enuying at the ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the abſence of the duke,infeſted the territories of the Venetians,for the which he was now juſtly requited with the loſſe of a good part of his owne.

Baldwin alſo not vnmindfull of the injuries vnto him before done by the Turkes, in requitall thereof, thereof, inuaded the countrey about DAMASCO, and there in three notable battels ouerthrew the king, and spoiled the countrey: wherin he tooke so great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hostage with the Turks for the payment of his ransom. He also ouerthrew the Sarasins at ASCALON, who aided by the Caliph of AEGYPT, had sundrie times inuaded the countrey about IERVSALEM. And so hauing well represſed his enemies, for a space liued in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus first master of the Templars, (an order of knights first begun in the raigne of this Baldwin) before sent to craue aid of the Christian princes of the West, against the Turks and Sarasins, returned with a great number of zealous Christians, readie to lay downe their liues for defence of the Christian faith and religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Christian princes of SYRIA joyning their forces, set forward and besieged DAMASCO, the regall seat of the Turks in those quarters. But such was the strength of this citie, with the valour of the defendants, and contagiousnesse of the aire, that the Christians (the heauens as it were then fighting against them) were glad to raise their siege in vaine begun, and so to retire. Damasco in vaine besieged by the Christians.

Whilst things thus passed in SYRIA, Fulke countie of TVRIN, MAYN, and ANIOV, a man almost of threescore yeeres, hauing as he thought best disposed of his things at home, had for deuotion sake taken vpon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations, embassadours came vnto him from king Baldwin, offring him in marriage Melisenda (or as some call her Margaret) his eldest daughter, with the succession into the kingdome of IERVSALEM in dowrie, if he should suruiue the king; and in the meane time to content himselfe with the cities of TYRE and PTOLEMAIS: of which offer he accepted, and so held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three yeeres after, that the king fell dangerously sicke, and feeling his death drawing on, hauing laid aside all regall dignitie, caused himselfe to be remooued out of his owne palace, into the Patriarchs house, which was neerer vnto the temple of the Sepulchre: and there calling vnto him Fulke the countie, his sonne in law, with his daughter, and his sonne Baldwin, then but two yeeres old, in the presence of the Patriarch, and diuers other princes & great commanders, commended vnto them the gouernment and defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulke to succeed him. And taking vnto himselfe the habit and profession of a munke, if he should haue longer liued, presently after gaue vp the ghost the two and twentith day of August, in the yeere 1131; whereof he raigned with much trouble thirteene yeeres, and was solemnly buried in the temple vpon mount CALVARIE, with the other two kings Godfrey and Baldwin, his predecessors. The death of Baldwin the second, the third king of Ierusalem. 1131

The kings funerall ended, the princes of the kingdome with one accord made choise of Fulke the old countie, earle of ANIOV, for their king: who the sixteenth day of September, was with all solemnitie by William the Patriarch crowned in IERVSALEM. This man in the beginning of his raigne, besides his troubles abroad, was also vext with domesticall and intestine discord: Pontius countie of TRIPOLIS, seeking by force of armes to haue rent the dukedome of ANTIOCH from the kingdome: and Hugh countie of IOPPA, for feare of due punishment for his treason, joyning himselfe with the Sarasins of ASCALON, and so with them infesting the territories of IERVSALEM, to the great hurt of the Christian state, and aduantage of the infidels. Which troublesome broiles were yet afterwards by the king, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarch & other princes (who seeing the danger like thereof to ensue, had interposed themselues) well againe appeased. Vengeance yet neuertheless still following both the aforesaid traitours: Pontius being shortly after slaine by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Besides these domesticall troubles, the Turks also inuaded the countrey about ANTIOCH, where they were by the sudden comming of the king ouerthrown, with the losse of their tents, and exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the disquieting of the state of that new erected kingdome, not long after, Iohn the Constantinopolitan emperour (together with the empire, inheritour also of his fathers malice, against the proceeding of the Christians in SYRIA) with a puissant armie passing through the lesser ASIA, and by the way taking by force TARSVS the metropoliticall citie of CILICIA, with the whole prouince thereunto belonging, came and besieged ANTIOCH; which Fulke but a little before had together with Constance, the daughter and heire of the late duke of ANTIOCH, giuen in marriage to Raymund countie of POITV, for that purpose sent for out of FRANCE. But in this so dangerous a state of that Christian kingdome, the other zealous Christian princes interposed themselues as me-

diatours betwixt the emperour (pretending the ſame to belong vnto his empire) and Raymund G that was in poſſeſsion thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, That Raymund for the preſent ſubmitting himſelfe vnto the emperour, ſhould from thenceforth hold his dukedome of him as of his lord and ſoueraigne: vpon which agreement the emperour returned vnto TARSVS, where he wintred, and ſo afterwards vnto CONSTANTINOPLE.

Much about the ſame time, Sanguin one of the Turks great princes, inuading the countrey about TRIPOLIS, beſieged the caſtell of MONTE-FERRAND: vnto the reliefe whereof, Fulke comming with his armie, was by the Turks ouerthrown; and for the ſafegard of his life, glad to take the refuge of the caſtell, the countie himſelfe being in that battell taken priſoner.
After which victorie, the Turks laid harder ſiege vnto the caſtell than before: the beſieged in the H meane time being no leſſe pinched within with famine, than preſſed without by the enemie. In this the kings hard diſtreſſe, the other princes hauing raiſed the whole power of the kingdome, were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turke vnderſtanding, offred of himſelfe to giue them all leaue freely to depart, and to ſet the countie at libertie, ſo that they would deliuer vnto him the caſtle: of which his offer they gladly accepting, yeelded vp the ſtrong hold, and ſo departed.
The king by the way meeting with the armie, thanked his friends for their forwardneſſe, and ſo returned to IERVSALEM.

Calo Ioannes the Greeke emperour ſeeketh to haue ſurpriſed the citie of Antioch.

About foure yeeres after, John the Conſtantinopolitan emperour, with a great armie came againe into SYRIA, with purpoſe to haue vnited the famous citie of ANTIOCH vnto his empire, and ſo to haue made a way into the kingdome of IERVSALEM, whereafter hee I had now a good while longed. But comming thither, in hope to haue found the Cilicians and Syrians readie to haue receiued him, he was deceiued of his expectation, being ſhut out by the Latins, and not ſuffred to enter, but vpon his oath, and that with ſome few of his followers; and ſo after due reuerence done vnto him, quietly to depart without any ſtir or innouation in the city. In reuenge of which diſgrace, at his departure he gaue the ſuburbs of the city as a prey vnto his greedie ſouldiers; pretending the ſame to be done for want of victuals: who made hauocke of whatſoeuer came to hand, not ſparing the verie fruit trees, but cutting them downe to dreſſe their meat withall. Hauing thus vnder colour of neceſsitie, reuenged the diſgrace receiued, he returned into CILICIA, and there wintred: where one day for his diſport, hunting of the wild boare; and hauing wounded him with his boare ſpeare, the wild beaſt therewith inraged, and K with all his force bearing forward vpon the weapon, forced the emperours hand backward vp-on the point of a poyſoned arrow, that was hanging in a quiuer at his backe, and ſo was therewith lightly wounded. Neuertheleſſe, as light as the wound was, ſuch was the ſtrength of the poyſon, that the griefe thereof ſtill increaſing, and his hand and arme more and more ſwelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arme muſt be cut off; which deſperat and vn-certaine cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his paine oftentimes pleaſantly ſaying, That the Greeke empire was not to be gouerned with one hand: ouercome with the ſtrength of the two elder ſonnes being both dead at his ſetting foorth vnto this ſo vnhappie an expedition.

The miſerable death of Fulke, fourth king of Ieruſalem.

It fortuned about this time alſo, the kingdome of IERVSALEM being now at peace, that L Fulke the king with the queene his wife, lying at the citie of PTOLEMAIS in the time of Autumne, it pleaſed the queene for her diſport, to walke out of the citie, vnto certaine pleaſant fountaines thereby in the countrey; for whoſe companie the king would needs go alſo, with certaine of his courtiers, where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was ſitting in a furrow: after which, all the courtiers on horſebacke galloped a maine, with notable outerie and hallowing. Amongſt the reſt, the king to be partaker of the ſport, forcing his horſe to the vttermoſt of his power, in the midſt of his courſe fell, together with his horſe foundring vnder him, and in falling, chanced to fall with his head vnder the horſe:
with whoſe waight, and the hardneſſe of his ſaddle, he was ſo cruſhed, that the braines came out both at his noſe and eares. In this pitifull caſe being taken vp for dead, and with great hea- M uineſſe carried backe; he yet breathing, lay ſpeechleſſe three daies, and ſo died the thirteenth of Nouember, in the yeere of Grace 1142. His dead bodie afterwards brought to IERVSALEM, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his ſubiects, buried with the other kings his predeceſſours.

Now had the late king left behind him two ſonnes, Baldwyn about the age of thirteene yeeres,

A and Almerike about the age of seuen. Of the elder of these two, the Christian princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwyn the third, was together with Melesinda his mother, partner with him in the kingdome, vpon Christenmas day with great solemnitie crowned king of HIERUSALEM, in the yeere 1142. About which time Sanguin the Turke, taking hold of the discord betwixt Raymund prince of ANTIOCH, and Ioscelin countie of EDESSA, came and with a great power besieged EDESSA, the countie being at the same time absent: And did so much, that at length he tooke the citie by vndermining of it, where the bloodie Turke exercised all manner of crueltie vpon the poore Christians in the citie. By the losse of this famous citie, so large a territorie fell againe into the hands of the Turkes, as that three archbishopricks were therby drawne B from the church of ANTIOCH. The Turke encouraged with this victorie, straightwaies after besieged COLOGENBAR, another strong towne of the Christians: where one night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkennesse stabbed, and so slaine, and the siege raised. In whose stead Noradin his sonne succeeded.

Baldwyn in the first yeere of his raigne, recouered from the Turkes the castle of SOBAL, a strong hold beyond IORDAN, which hee notably fortefied, for the defence of that side of his kingdome against the incursions of the Turks. But the next yeere vndertaking an expedition against the king of DAMASCO, he was by Noradin the Turke, the kings sonne in law, so hardly beset in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his armie escaped his hands.

C The report of the losse of EDESSA with the miseries there endured by the Christians, being bruted through all parts of Christendome, greatly mooued the Christian princes of the West. Whom Eugenius the third, then bishop of Rome, ceased not both by himselfe and by his Legates to stirre vp to take that sacred warre in hand. And therein wrought so effectually, that almost in everie prouince of Christendome preparation was made for the reliefe of the distressed Christians in SYRIA. Of all others, Conrade the third then emperour of GERMANIE was most forward, who aided by the Germane princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie men out of all parts of Christendome, had raised a most puissant armie, and therewith set forward on this sacred expedition. Of this his deuout purpose he had before certefied Emanuell the Grecke emperour, through whose countries hee was to passe, craving that hee might by his D good fauour so doe, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other such things as hee should haue need of for himselfe or his people; promising in most quiet and peaceable manner to passe, without any harme doing vnto his territories or subjects. All which the Greeke emperour, commending his zeale, seemed in most large tearmes willingly to condiscend vnto. Neuertheless he inwardly repined thereat, wishing indeed no better successe vnto the Christians in this so honourable an expedition, than did the infidels themselues, as by the sequell of his doings well appeared. For Conrade with his populous armie, indeed a terrour vnto the Greekes, entring into the frontiers of the Constantinopolitane empire, found all things in shew friendly (for why Emanuell had before giuen out strait command, that good store of victuals and all other necessaries should be readie at all places to be sold as the armie was to passe:) but they were not farre come E into the countrey, but that in the taile of the armie still followed certaine strong companies of the Greeks, to keepe the souldiors from straggling from their ensignes, roming about in the countrey, now and then cutting them short, as they tooke them at aduantage. And still the further that they trauelled, the more it was to be seene in the countenances of the discontented Greekes, how vnwelcome guests they were. Yet still on they went through the countries of their dissembling friends, little differing from open enemies, vntill they came to PHILIPPOPOLIS: in departing from whence, such contention rise betweene them that were in the rereward of the armie, and the Greekes that followed them, that it was like to haue come to plaine battell, had not those broiles, by the discretion of some of the wiser sort, been in good time appeased. So marching on they came to ADRIANOPLE, & in a few daies after to the plaine called CHEROBACHI, through F which the riuer MELAS hath his course; which in Summer being almost drie, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right suddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and so drowneth the whole countrey, that then it seemeth no more a riuer, but a sea; and swelling with the wind, is not to be passed ouer, but by great boats: This riuer then suddenly rising by night, by reason of the great raine that then fell, in such abundance, as if the flood-gates of heauen had ben opened, so ouerflowed the place wherein the armie lay encamped vpon the side thereof, that with the violence violence of the water were carried away not onely manie weapons, ſaddles, garments, & ſuch other the ſouldiors neceſſaries: but euen the horſes and mules, with their burdens, yea and great numbers of armed men themſelues alſo, a moſt miſerable and lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fell without fight, and died no man killing them: to be tall, helped not; neither did valour ſtand them in any ſtead, they periſhed like hay, and were caried away like chaffe, with ſuch outcries and lamentation, that they which ſaw it, verely ſaid, That the wrath of God was broke into the campe: ſuch a ſuddaine inundation had ouerwhelmed all, that happie was hee could make ſhift for himſelfe, without regarding one another. This misfortune ſore troubled the emperour with his whole armie. Neuertheleſſe, the water being againe fallen, and all put in ſo good order, as in ſuch a confuſion was poſsible, he marched on vnto the imperiall citie: which the ſuſpicious and malicious Greeke, had before notably fortefied and ſo ſtrongly manned with armed men gliſtring upon the wals, in ſuch ſort as if it ſhould haue preſently been aſſaulted.

Conrade the emperour not ſuffred to enter into Conſtantinople.

Conrade approching the citie, was not ſuffered to enter, but perſuaded by the Greeke emperor forthwith to tranſport his armie ouer the ſtrait, with promiſe to ſupplie his wants with whatſoeuer he ſhould require. Which was done with ſuch haſt, as if nothing had beene farther to haue been regarded, but onely to haue them ſhipped ouer: in which ſeruice the Greekes ſpared no labour, or kind of veſſell, that might ſerue to tranſport them. The Greeke emperour in the meane time, by men ſecretly appointed for that purpoſe, keeping account of the number that paſſed, vntill that they wearied with the multitude, ceaſed farther to number them. But when they were once ſhipped ouer, then began the couert mallice of the Greeke emperour forthwith to appeare. For beſides that they truſting vnto his promiſes, had brought little or no prouiſions ouer with them, the countrey people by his appointment brought nothing unto them to ſell, as before: and they of the townes and cities ſhut their gates againſt them as they marched, not affoording them any thing, but at an extreame rate, for which they would firſt receiue their money by ropes caſt downe from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleaſed therefore, yea and oftentimes nought at all. Amongſt many other vile practiſes, not beſeeming Chriſtians, the miſcheeuous Greekes, to poyſon the ſouldiors, mingled lime with the meale which they ſold vnto the armie, whereof many of the hungrie ſouldiors greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke emperour were priuie thereunto, or no, is not certainely knowne; but certaine it is, that he cauſed counterfeit money to be coined, of purpoſe to deceiue them: and in breefe, that there was no kind of miſchiefe to be practiſed againſt them, which either hee himſelfe deuiſed not, or ſet not others to deuiſe; to the intent that their poſteritie, terrified by this ſo vnfortunat an expedition, might for euer be afraid to take the like in hand againe. And that nothing might be wanting that mallice could deuiſe, he had ſecret intelligence with the Turkes themſelues, concerning the ſtrength of the armie, plotting vnto them the meanes how the ſame might beſt be defeated: whereby it came to paſſe, that ſome part thereof was by Pamplano, a captaine of the Turkes, ouerthrowne neere BATHIS, and many ſlaine. But attempting to haue done the like vnto that part of the armie that marched through PHRIGIA, they were themſelues ouertaken in their own deuiſe, and ouerthrowne, with a great ſlaughter. After which, the Turkes in great number, to ſtay the Chriſtians further paſſage, kept the riuer of MŒANDER, encamping vpon the farther banke of that winding riuer, with a moſt huge armie. There theſe worthie Chriſtians right well declared, that it was but their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before ſo long followed them, with their countries and cities they had paſſed by, were not vnto them become a prey. For the emperour comming vnto the riuer ſide, where was neither bridge nor boat to paſſe ouer, and finding the great armie of the Turkes on the other ſide, readie to giue him battell if hee ſhould aduenture the riuer, with their archers ſtanding vpon the verie banke ſide: he retired a little out of the danger of the ſhot, and there encamping, commanded his ſouldiors to refreſh themſelues and their horſes that night, and to be readie againſt the next morning to ioine battell with their enemies they were ſo farre come to ſeeke for. Little reſt ſerued him that night, early in the morning before day he aroſe, and arming himſelfe, put his whole armie in order of battell: as did alſo the enemie on the other ſide of the riuer, with their battalions orderly placed, and their archers vpon the banke ſide, readie to giue the firſt charge vpon the Chriſtians, if they ſhould aduenture to come ouer. Both armies thus ſtanding in readineſſe the one in ſight of the other, and nothing but the winding riuer betwixt them, the emperour before reſolued to fight, with cheerefull countenance and ſpeech encouraged his men as followeth:

That

A notable speech of Constantine the emperour to encourage his soldiers to aduenture the riuer Meander.

That this expedition was of vs taken in hand, for Christ his sake, and for the glorie of God, and not of man, you know right well fellow souldiers. For, for this cause hauing contemned a pleasant life at home, voluntarily seperated from our neereſt and deereſt friends, we endure miseries in forren contries; we are exposed vntò dangers; we pine with hunger; we quake with cold; we languish with heat; we haue the earth our bed, the heauen our couering: and although we be noble, famous, renowmed, rich, ruling ouer many nations; yet weare we alwaies our gorgets as necessarie bonds, and are with them and our armor loaded, as was the greateſt seruant of Christ, Peter, surcharged with two chaines, and kept with foure quaternions of souldiers. But these Barbarians (diuided from vs by this riuer) to be the enemies of the crosse of Christ, whom we of long haue desired to encounter withall, in whose blood (as Dauid saith) we haue vowed to wash our selues: Who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockish, and will not with open eies see, nor open eares heare? If we wish to ascend straight way into heauen, (for neither is God vniust, that he knoweth not the cause of this our iourney, or will not in recompence giue vnto vs the immortall fields, and shadie dwellings of Paradice, which hauing forsaken our owne dwellings, haue chose rather for his sake to die than to liue) if we call to remembrance what things these men of vncircumcised hearts do commit against our friends and countreymen, if we remember what grieuous tortures they inflict vpon them, or if we be any thing touched with the compassion of their innocent blood, vnworthily spilt; stand now couragiously, and fight valiantly, and let not any feare or terrour daunt vs. Let these Barbarians know, that by how much Christ our master and instructer doth excell their false prophet and seducer, author of their vaine impietie; so much are we superiours vnto them in all things. Seeing therefore we are an holy campe, and an armie gathered by the power of God, let vs not cowardly loose our selues, or feare for Christ his sake honourably to aduenture our liues. For if Christ died for vs, how much more right is it that we for him should die also? vnto this so honourable an expedition, let vs also giue an honourable end: let vs fight in Christs name, with a most assured hope of an easie victorie. For none of them (I trust) shall be able to abide our force, but shall all giue way, euen to our first charge. But if we shall die (which God forbid) there shall be an honourable place of our buriall, whereſoeuer we shall for Christ fall. Let the Persian archer for Christ his sake, strike me, I will die in an assured hope; and with that arrow, as with a chariot, I will come vnto that rest, which shall be to me deerer than if I should with a base ordinarie kind of death in my sinnes end my daies in my bed. Now at length let vs take reuenge of them, with whose impure feet our kinsmen and Christian brethren troden downe, are gone into that common sanctuarie, in which Christ our Sauiour, equall and associat to his father, is become a companion of the dead. We are those mightie men, we all haue drawne our swords, which stand about the liuely and diuine sepulchre, as about Solomons bed. Wherefore we that be free borne, let vs take out of the way these Agarens, the children of the bondwoman; and let vs remooue them as stones of offence out of the way of Christ: whom I know not why, the Grecians feed vp as greedie wolues to their owne destruction, and with shame fat them with their blood; when as with couragious minds and thoughts beseeming wise men, they ought so to haue beene driuen from their prouinces and cities, as rauening wild beasts from their flocks. Now for as much as this riuer, as it seemeth, is not, but by some aduenture to be passed ouer, I my selfe will shew you the way, and be the first that shall take it. Let vs, serred together, forcibly breake into the riuer, and we shall well enough ride through it. I know that the water beaten backe by our force, will be at a stand, and breake the course, returning as it were backward. By not vnlike meanes the Israelits in antient time on foot passed ouer IORDAN, the course of the riuer being staid. This attempt shall be spoken of in all posteritie, it shall by no tract of time be worne out or forgotten, but still remaine in fresh remembrance, to the great dishonour of the Turks, whose dead bodies ouerthrown at this riuer, shall lie like a mountaine, and be seene as a Trophey of our victorie, vnto the worlds end, and our immortall praise and glorie.

Hauing thus said, and the signall of battell giuen, euerie man hauing before by deuout praier commended himselfe vnto almightie God: he was the first that put spurs to his horse, and tooke the riuer; after whom followed the rest, so close and so forcibly, with such a terrible outerie, that the course of the water, being by the force of their horses staid, and as it were beaten backe towards the fountaine, the whole armie passed ouer with lesse trouble than was feared. And then charging the Turks, alreadie discouraged to haue seene them so desperatly, and contrarie to their expectation, to haue passed the riuer; after some small resistance put them to flight, wherein such infinit numbers of them fell, the Christians like fierce lyons pursuing the chace, that all the vallies lies ran with blood, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the Italians G were wounded with the Turks arrowes, and but few or none ſlaine. But what a multitude of the enemies there fell, the ſundrie and hugie heapes of bones, to be compared vnto great hils, did long time after well declare; whereat euerie man that trauelled that way did woorthily woonder, as did I my ſelfe (ſaith Nicetas Choniates) in reporting this hiſtorie. Not much vnlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, ſlaine by Marius in ſuch number, that of their bones the countrey people about MARCELLIS where the field was fought, long time after made wals for the defence of their vineyards.

Nicetas Choniates Annali primo rerum à Manuele Comneno Imperatore geſtar. fol. 139. Iconium in vaine beſieged by the Chriſtians

After this ſo great a victorie, the Chriſtians without reſiſtance came to ICONIVM, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh kings in the leſſer ASIA, which they hardly beſieged. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch H was the ſtrength of the citie, being ſtrongly fortified both by nature and art, together with the valour of the defendants; that lying there long, they little preuailed, preſſed in the meane time with greater extremities and wants in the campe, than were the beſieged in the citie: whereupon enſued ſuch a mortalitie, people dayly without number dying in the armie, that the emperour was glad to raiſe his ſiege and to returne into his countrey. The chiefe cauſe as well of this ſo great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of ſo notable an action, moſt men aſcribe vnto the malice of the Greeks; who not without the priuitie of their emperour (as it was commonly bruited) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to ſell into the armie, whereof the hungrie ſouldiers deſirouſly feeding, were therewith poyſoned, and ſo miſerably died. Of the certaine time of this journey of the emperours into ASIA, authors agree not; howbeit moſt refer it vn- I 1146 to the yeere 1146.

This expedition, though not ſo fortunat as was at the firſt well hoped of, yet profited the Chriſtian common weale in this, That the Turks therewith throughly buſied, and doubtfull of the euent thereof, Baldwin in the meane time fortified GAZA (ſometimes a famous citie of the Philiſtines, but as then ruinous) which ſerued as a moſt ſure bulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome toward ÆGYPT; and alſo for the diſtreſsing of ASCALON, the onely refuge of the Ægyptians, then left in that country: which ſtrong citie ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide, he with all the power of his kingdome afterward beſieged both by ſea and land; vnto the reliefe whereof, the Caliph of ÆGYPT, after it had beene fiue moneths by the Chriſtians beſieged, ſent a ſtrong fleet of threeſcore and ten gallies. At which time alſo on the other ſide Noradin the K Turke, who had now got into his hand all the kingdome of DAMASCO, to withdraw the Chriſtians from the ſiege of ASCALON, beſieged PANEADA, from whence he was by the valour of the citizens repulſed, as was alſo the Caliphs fleet at ſea, and the ſiege at ASCALON continued. Where at length the Chriſtians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall, but giuing thereunto an aſſault, they were with great loſſe of their men repulſed, and the breach againe by the enemie repaired; who to the greater deſpite of the Chriſtians, hanged ouer the walles in roaps the dead bodies of their ſlaine: with which ſpectacle, the chiefe commanders of the armie were ſo mooued, that they with all their power returned againe to the aſſault, with a full reſolution to gage thereon their whole forces: which they ſo couragiouſly performed, that the beſieged diſcouraged with the great ſlaughter of their men, and now with true valour ouercome, craued L parley; and ſo couenanting that they might with their liues in ſafetie depart, agreed to yeeld vp the citie, which they accordingly performed. The ſpoile of the citie was giuen to the ſouldiers, and the gouernment thereof vnto Almericke, the kings brother, earle of IOPPA. By this victorie, great ſecuritie was gained vnto that ſide of the kingdome, the enemie hauing now no place left in thoſe parts whereon to ſet his foot.

The honourable expedition of Lewis the French king, by the malice of the Greeks, and armie of other Chriſtian princes of Syria fruſtrated and brought to naught.

About the ſame time alſo (or as ſome write euen at the ſame time together with the empe- rour) Lewis the French king, the eight of that name, tooke vpon him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Holy land: who ſetting forward with all the chiualrie of FRANCE, and accompanied with diuers other great princes, with a right puiſſant armie came to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Emanuel the emperour honourably receiued, with M all the outward ſhews of faigned courteſie that could be deuiſed. But hauing paſſed the ſtrait and landed in ASIA, he found nothing anſwerable to that the diſſembling Greeke had before moſt largely promiſed. And to diſtreſſe him the more, was by falſe guides before corrupted by the emperour, conducted through the moſt deſolate and barren countries, where by the way a wonderfull number of his ſouldiers periſhed of hunger and thirſt: many of them alſo being cut off in the

the ſtrait and difficult paſſages, or as they ſtraied from the armie by the Greeks themſelues, appointed by the malicious emperour for that purpoſe. Yet after many dangers paſſed, and his armie ſore waſted, he came at length into SYRIA, and laid ſiege vnto DAMASCO, the royall ſeat of Noradin the Turkiſh king; which he ſo notably impugned that the defendants were almoſt out of hope to be able for any long time to hold him out. Neither had it otherwiſe hapned, had not enuie the inſeperable attendant of all honourable actions, fruſtrated ſo great an hope: for the beſieged Turks being brought to great extremitie, and now euen at the point to haue yeelded the citie, certaine of the Chriſtian princes of that countrey, vnderſtanding that the king had promiſed the gouernment of that ſo famous a citie vnto Philip earle of FLANDERS, if it ſhould be woon; and ſecretly grudging to haue a ſtranger preferred before themſelues; corrupted alſo (as ſome ſay) with the Turks gold, fraudulently perſuaded the king to remoue from that part of the citie where he lay and might in fine haue taken the ſame, vnto another far ſtronger: where, after he had lyen a great while, ſtriuing with no ſmall extremities, he was inforced for want of victuals, to raiſe his ſiege and to depart. And ſo without any thing done woorth the remembrance, returned againe into FRANCE, deteſting the verie name of Emanuel the Greeke emperour; by whoſe ſiniſter dealing, ſo notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great diſcouraging of all other Chriſtian princes for taking the like againe in hand. 1147

Damaſco ſiege vainebeſieged by Lewis the French king.

Now had the ſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA for certaine yeeres after the aforeſaid expeditions, reſted in good peace: when Noradin the Turke (mooued with ſome injuries done by the Chriſtians vnto the Turks and Arabians, who by the leaue of king Baldwin dwelt in the forreſt of LYEANVS) came and ſtraightly beſieged PANEADE, a citie of the Chriſtians there by: vpon whom the Chriſtians in the citie, now brought vnto great extremitie, made a moſt deſperat ſally, and had with the Turks a ſharpe and cruell fight: but oppreſſed with the multitude & enforced to retire, they were ſo hardly purſued, that the Turks together with them entred the citie, and put to ſword all that came in their way. Neuertheleſſe, the greater part of the citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themſelues into the caſtle, which was of great ſtrength, and there ſtood vpon their guard. Of whoſe diſtreſſe, with the taking of the citie, Baldwin hearing, raiſed a great armie, & ſo ſet forward to relieue thē. But Noradin hearing of his comming, & doubtfull of his owne ſtrength, after he had takē the ſpoile of what he could, ſet fire on the citie & ſo departed. The citizens thus deliuered, repaired againe the wals of the citie, the kings power ſtill defending them. Noradin with his power all the while lying cloſe in the woods not far off, ſtill awaiting the offer of ſome good opportunitie to take the Chriſtians at aduantage, which ſhortly after fell out according to his owne deſire: For the king doubting no ſuch matter, but ſuppoſing him to haue been quite gone, hauing at his returne ſent away all his footmen, followed after himſelfe accompanied onely with his horſemen, and they alſo not verie ſtrong: but as he was paſsing the riuer IORDAN, he was ſuddenly ſet vpon by Noradin and the Turks, and after a ſharpe conflict ouerthrown. The king himſelfe with ſome few hardly eſcaped to SAPHET, a towne therby; moſt part of his nobilitie being there either ſlaine or taken priſoners: amongſt the reſt, Bertrand of BLANQVEFORT, maſter of the Templars, with diuers others of great name fell at that time into the enemies hands, and ſo were carried away priſoners.

Paneade taken and ſacked by the Turks.

Paneade againe repaired by the Chriſtians.

After this victorie, Noradin ſtrengthened with new ſupplies from DAMASCO, came againe and beſieged PANEADE, in good hope that the citizens diſcouraged with ſo great an ouerthrow of the king, and out of hope to be by him relieued, would now either yeeld the citie, or elſe not be able long to hold it out. But the king contrarie to his expectation, had in ſhorter time than was thought poſsible, raiſed a great power; and aided by the prince of ANTIOCH and the countie of TRIPOLIS was marching to the reliefe of his citie: of whoſe approch Noradin vnderſtanding, although he had made diuers breaches in the wals, & brought the citizens almoſt vnto vtter deſpaire, riſe with his armie and departed. And ſo Baldwin hauing now twice relieued the beſieged citie, returned alſo to IERVSALEM.

Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this young king afterwards, during the fortunate time of his raigne: wherein that troubleſome kingdome happily flouriſhed amidſt the miſcreants, all which to recount, were long and tedious. Yet among other things, it is woorth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turke, then king of DAMASCO, beſieging SUETA, a caſtle belonging to the kingdome of HIERUSALEM, was in a ſet battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his armie. King Baldwin had before married

ried Emanuell the Greeke emperours neece: and now the ſame emperour by Guido Stephanus, G and Triſillus his embaſſadours, requeſted to haue giuen him againe in marriage one of the kings nigh kinſwomen. Vnto whom the king after mature deliberation had concerning that matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable ladie, the ſiſter of the countie of TRIPOLIS; whom the emperour refuſed: and afterward by the conſent of the king, made choice of Mary the daughter of Raymund prince of ANTIOCH lately dead. Which the countie of TRIPOLIS taking in euill part, in reuenge thereof, by certaine men of warre whom he put to ſea, grieuouſly infeſted the frontiers of the emperours dominions. Now during the time that the marriage was in ſolemniſing, the king made his abode at ANTIOCH, at which time he fortefied the caſtle of PONTISFER vpon the riuer ORONTES, againſt the incurſions of the enemies. But lying there, H he according to his wonted manner, to preuent ſickneſſe, vpon the approch of Winter tooke fell preſently into the bloudie flix, and afterward into a conſumption: whereby it was verely ſuppoſed, that he was poyſoned by the Iew, and the rather, for that ſome little part of the ſame medicine that was left, being giuen to a dog, he thereof in ſhort time died. The king thus lan-guiſhing in paine, to change the aire, remooued firſt to TRIPOLIS, & afterward to BERYTUS, where he departed this troubleſome life, to liue with his Sauiour Chriſt in bliſſe for euer. His dead bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his ſubjects conueied to HIERUSA-

Vnkindneſſe betwixt the emperour and the Sultan.

with ſo good ſucceſſe as before, being many times cut off by the garriſons of the late fortified townes: which grieuances ſtill encreaſing, cauſed the emperour to expoſtulate with the Sultan, as with an vnthankfull man, and forgetfull of ſo great kindneſſe before done vnto him, as the eſtabliſhment of him in his kingdome came vnto: who with no leſſe vehemencie vpbraided him againe with vnconſtancie and breach of promiſe, as well for fortifying the aforeſaid places contrarie to the league betwixt them, as for that hauing promiſed much more, he had thereof performed nothing. Thus vnkindneſſe dayly growing vpon euerie trifle, as it commonly falleth out among men of great ſpirit, and jealous of their owne honours: it was dayly expected when the matter ſhould fall out into open & bloodie war; both of them being men of great valour, and apt to reuenge the leaſt injurie to them offred. Yet was it the Sultans maner warely to mannage his wars by his politike and expert captaines: whereas the emperour being of an hotter nature, and couragious aboue meaſure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his owne perſon, without reſpect what danger might thereof enſue vnto himſelfe or his ſtate. Long it was not but that the emperour fully reſolued to be reuenged of ſo many wrongs done vnto him and his ſubjects by the Turks, raiſed the whole power of his empire both in EVROPE and ASIA, in ſuch ſort as if he had therewith purpoſed, not onely to haue raſed to the ground ICONIVM, the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultan, but euen vtterly to haue deſtroied the whole nation of the Turks. Thus with a moſt puiſſant and populous armie, well appointed of all things neceſſarie, he paſſed ouer into ASIA, and ſo in good order marching through PHRYGIA, LAODICEA, CHONAS (called in antient time PASSAS) S. ARCHANGEL, LAMPIS, CÆLÆNAS (where the head of the great and famous riuer MÆANDER riſeth, whereinto the riuer MARSYAS falleth) and from thence to CHONIA, he with euill lucke, and woorſe ſpeed, paſſed by MYRIOCEPHALON, an old ruinous caſtle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the euent in ſhort time after it prooued. And albeit that he marched verie circumſpectly, ſtill intrenching his armie in euerie place where he lodged; yet could he make but ſmall ſpeed, by reaſon of the multitude of his carriages, and of the baſe people that attended the ſame. The Turks in the meane while oftentimes ſhewing themſelues in troupes, and in places of aduantage, skirmiſhing ſometime with one part of the armie and ſometime with another, but neuer daring to aduenture the fortune of a juſt battell: yet by ſuch meanes were the victualers of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the paſſages for the emperour made verie dangerous. And the more to diſtreſſe the Chriſtians in their long trauell, they found the countrey before them of purpoſe deſtroied by the Turks, and the water in many places poyſoned, whereof the Chriſtians vnaduiſedly drinking, fell into many grieuous diſeaſes, eſpecially the flix, and thereof died in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readines a right puiſſant armie of his owne, & had procured great aid from the Perſian Sultan his kinſman and chiefe ſupporter: yet fearing the doubtfull euent of war, and loath to aduenture his whole eſtate vpon the fortune of a battell, ſought by his embaſſadours (ſent for that purpoſe) to grow to ſome peace with the emperour, and that vpon ſuch honourable conditions, as by the wiſer ſort were thought not to bee at any hand refuſed: which large offers, the Sultan as deſirous of peace, made vnto him not once, but againe and againe; which the emperour neuertheleſſe (repoſing great confidence in his owne power, and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace than the hard wars of the Turks) proudly rejected; and ſo diſmiſsing the embaſſadours, ſcornfully willed them to tell their maſter, That he would giue him anſwere vnto his requeſts vnder the wals of ICONIVM. Which cauſed the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the emperour and him, with all his power to take the ſtraits of ZIBRICA, whereby the armie of the Chriſtians, departing from MYRIOCEPHALON muſt of neceſſitie paſſe. The entrance into theſe ſtraits was by a long valley, on either ſide encloſed with high mountaines, which toward the North riſing and falling according as the hils gaue leaue, opened into diuers large vallies, which by little and little growing againe ſtraighter and ſtraighter, with high and craggie rocks hanging ouer on either ſide, and almoſt touching one another, gaue vnto the painefull traueller a moſt hard and difficult paſſage.

A great ouerſight of the emperour.

Into this ſo dangerous a valley, the emperour not fearing the enemies force, deſperately entred with his armie, hauing neither prouided for the cleering of the paſſages, or ſafetie of his carriages, in no other order than as if hee had marched through the plaine and champain countrey, although it were before told him (that which he ſhortly after, but too late, ſaw) that the enemie

A enemie had ſtrongly poſſeſſed both the ſtraits and the mountains,to hinder his farther paſſage. The vauward of his armie was conducted by Iohn and Andronicus, the ſonnes of Angelus Conſtantine,accompanied with Macroducas Conſtantine and Lapardas Andronicus: In the right wing was Baldwin,the emperours brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: After them followed the drudges and ſcullions, with an infinit number of carters and other baſe people,attending vpon the carriages,with the baggage of the whole armie: Next vnto theſe came the emperour with the maine battell,conſiſting for the moſt part of right valiant and worthie ſouldiers: The rereward was ſhut vp by Andronicus Contoſtephanus, with a number of moſt reſolute men. They were not farre entred into theſe ſtraits,but that the Turks from the mountains
B and broken cliffes,ſhewed themſelues on euery ſide, deliuering their deadly ſhot from the vpper ground vpon the Chriſtians below,as thicke as haile. Neuertheleſſe the ſonnes of Angelus with Macroducas and Lapardus, and the vauntguard,caſting themſelues into a three ſquare battell in forme of a wedge,with their targuets in manner of a penthouſe caſt cloſe together ouer their heads, and their archers on euery ſide luſtely beſtowing their ſhot amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies,by plaine force driue them out of the ſtraits they had before poſſeſſed, and cauſed them to retire farther off into the mountaines; and ſo hauing made themſelues way, with little or no loſſe paſſed thoſe dangerous ſtraits: vntill that at length hauing recouered the top of an hill,very commodious for their purpoſe,as the caſe ſtood,they there ſtaied,and preſently encamped themſelues. And happely, with like good fortune might the reſt of the armie haue paſſed alſo, had
C they in like order,and with like courage,preſently followed after. But failing ſo to doe, and troubled with the multitude of their carriages, which could not poſsibly make any way through thoſe ſtrait and rough paſſages(but troubled themſelues one another, as alſo the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miſerably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh archers, whoſe arrowes fell as thicke vpon them from the mountaines, as if it had been a perpetuall tempeſt or ſhoure of haile,to the great diſordering & diſmaying of the whole armie:which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountaines where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Chriſtians, and forcibly entring the plaine ground,and comming to handy blowes,firſt ouerthrew the right wing;where Baldwin himſelfe ſeeking to reſtore his diſordered companies,and to ſtay the furie of the enemie, D (now raging in the blood of the Chriſtians)with a troupe of valiant horſemen breaking into the thickeſt of them,as became a worthie captaine, was there compaſſed in with the multitude of his enemies,and ſlaine,together with all his followers, and the greateſt part of the whole wing by him commanded. With this victorie the Turkes were ſo encouraged, that comming down with all their power,they ſtopped all the waies whereby the Chriſtians were to paſſe, who as men couped vp in thoſe dangerous ſtraits,were not able either to defend themſelues,or to helpe one another: but incloſed as deere in a toyle,and one troubling another, were the cauſe both of the deſtruction of themſelues and others. For by reaſon of the ſtraitneſſe of the place, neither could they that were before,retire,either they that were behind in the rereward,come forward to relieue the one the other,as need required: the carriages alſo, which were many, and in the
E middle of the armie, ſeruing them to no other purpoſe than to the hurt of themſelues. There were the beaſts that ſerued for burden, together with the ſouldiours, ouerwhelmed with the Turkes ſhot, the vallies lay full of dead bodies, the riuers ran mingled with the blood of men and beaſts,in ſuch terrible manner,as is not by pen to be expreſſed. For the Chriſtians not able either to goe forward,or retire, were there in thoſe ſtraits ſlaine like ſheepe: if any courage or ſparke of valour were by any ſhewed againſt the enemie,fighting at ſo great aduantage, it was but loſt,ſeruing to little or no purpoſe. And to increaſe theſe miſeries,the Turks in ſcorn ſhewed vpon the point of a launce the head of Andronicus Bataza, the emperours nephew, who comming with an armie out of PAPHLAGONIA, and HERACLEA PONTICA, againſt the Turks of AMASIA, was now by the way by them ouerthrowne and ſlaine. The report whereof,confirmed by the ſight of his head,and the conſideration of the deſperat danger wherin the whole
F armie preſently ſtood, ſo troubled the emperour that hee was at his wits end: and with drie teares (if it may be ſo ſaid) diſſembling his inward greefe,as one out of comfort, ſtood doubtfull which way to turne himſelfe. For the Turks hauing ſuffred the vauntguard to paſſe,with all their power charged the emperours maine battell, as his cheefe ſtrength, nothing doubting, but that hauing once ouerthrowne it, they ſhould eaſily and at pleaſure ouerthrow the reſt. and himſelfe ſo wearied as that he was not able to lift vp his helmet, being beaten cloſe to his H manifeſt tokens of his danger.The other legions ſeeking to follow the emperour (for other way they had none) were on euery ſide hardly aſſailed by the Turkes, and infinit numbers of them ſlaine; beſide many others that periſhed in thoſe ſtraits,ouerborne and troden to death by their owne fellowes. Yea ſuch as had the fortune to eſcape out of one of theſe perrillous ſtraits,were forthwith ſlaine in the next: for this ſo dangerous a paſſage through the mountaines, was deui-ded (as is aforeſaid) into ſeuen vallies,which giuing faire and broad entrances, the farther a man went,grew ſtill ſtraiter and ſtraiter,all which ſtraits the Turkes had before ſtrongly poſſeſſed. At which time alſo,the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the light ſand raiſed with the feet of the men and horſes,was with the violence of a moſt tempeſtuous wind which then blew,carried I ſo forcibly and thicke,that both the armies grapling together, as if it had been in the darkeneſſe ſuch ſort,as that they were not able with any ſtrugling to get out: who with their hands caſt vp towards heauen,with ruthfull voices cried out for helpe to ſuch as paſſed by; but all in vaine, for euery man poſſeſſed with the common feare, and by their danger meaſuring their owne, paſſed by them without compaſsion,as more carefull of their owne ſafetie, leauing them yet liuing as men to be numbred among the dead.

The emperour in danger to haue been taken,notably defendeth himſelfe. The emperor himſelfe,as a man almoſt now ſpent,being got out of the danger,ſtood a while to breath himſelfe vnder the ſhaddow of a wild peare tree, without any page or man to attend him;whom a poore common ſouldior eſpying,and mooued with compaſsion, came vnto him, and offring him the beſt ſeruice he could,helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his armour,which before hung dangling here and there about him: when in the meane while a Turke L comming in vpon him,had taken his horſe by the bridle,in hope to haue led him away priſoner:
whom for all that,the emperour as wearie as hee was, with the trunchion of his broken launce which he had yet in his hand, ſtrucke downe to the ground,and ſo cleered himſelfe of him. Pre-ſently after came alſo another ſort of the ſtragling Turkes, readie alſo to haue ceized vpon him and to haue taken him priſoner, of whom he ſlew one with the aforeſaid horſemans ſtaffe, and with his ſword ſtrucke off the head of another of them, and ſo kept them off vntill that by the comming in of ten of his owne ſouldiors hee was relieued. Departing thence with purpoſe to haue joined himſelfe vnto the legions that were gone before in the vauward, hee had not gone farre but that he was much troubled by other Turkes that hee met, and the heapes of the dead bodies that lay in his way: yet at laſt, hauing with much labour and more danger paſſed thoſe M ſtraits,and a riuer running thereby,being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of his owne people,and ſome other of his owne ſouldiors now reſorting vnto him; he there ſaw Iohn Cataczene,a noble and right valiant gentleman that had maried his neece,fighting alone againſt a great number of the Turkes, to be compaſſed in and ſlaine;whom he was no way able to re-lieue. Which Turkes alſo ſeeing him paſſe by, followed after him as after a moſt rich prey, in hope

A hope to haue either presently taken or slaine him : whom neuertheless hee (encouraging the small companie he had about him) notably repulsed; and so sometime marching forward, and againe as occasion required, making a stand, came at length long looked for but most welcome, vnto the legions that were gone before, not so sorrie for their owne hard estate, as carefull of his danger.

But before he could come to those his legions, he readie to faint for thirst, commanded water to be brought him out of the riuer that ran fast by; which after he had tasted, and by the vnpleasant taste thereof, perceiued the same to be infected, he fetting a deepe sigh, said, O how vnfortunately haue I tasted Christian bloud : whereunto an audacious and malapert souldior there pre-
B sent, and more bitter than the cruell time it selfe, replied; Emperour, thou didst not now, thou didst not now, I say, first, but long since, and oftentimes, drinke the bloud of the Christians, euen vntill thou wast drunke againe, at such time as thou didst with most grieuous exactions vex and deuour thy poore subiects. Which reprochfull speech the emperour put vp in silence, making as if hee had not heard it. With like patience he also forbare the same rayling companion, at such time as he seeing his treasures hardly beset and in danger to be taken by the Turks, to animate his souldiors, willed them to doe what they could to rescue the same, and to take it for their labour. This treasure (said this impudent fellow) should before haue been giuen vnto thy souldiors, rather than now when as it cannot be recouered but with great danger and bloodshed: and therefore, if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldest bee accounted, and as the present case requireth, valiantly charge the C Turkes (now readie to carrie it away) thy selfe, and so recouer thine euill gotten goods. Whereunto the emperour answered no more but, Good words souldior, and so put it vp, as did Dauid the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the comming of the emperour vnto these legions of his vauntguard (the onely remainder of his armie that was left whole and vnbroken) came also Andronicus Contostephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with diuers others of great place, who had by good fortune escaped the furie of the Turks. The miseries of that day (not well to be expressed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Christians sat in the campe oppressed with a generall heauinesse, leaning their heads vpon their elbowes, and considering the present danger wherein they were, scarcely accounted themselues among the liuing : the Turks in the meane time to increase their feare, all the night running about the campe, & crying aloud
D vnto such of their countrimen in the campe, as had abjured their religion, or for other respects had taken part with the imperials, that they should that night get them out of the campe, whereas otherwise if they staied vnto the morning they should be all but lost men. In this so great an extremitie the emperour not knowing what to do, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the desperate danger they were in, together with his resolution : which was, secretly himselfe to flie, and to leaue the rest, euery man to make what shift he could for himselfe. Which his base determination, so foule as fouler could not be, they all wondering at, as proceeding from a distraughted mind : and by chaunce ouerheard by one of the common souldiors, that stood without the tent, the same souldior fetching a deepe sigh, in detestation thereof, cried out with a loud voice, What meanes the emperour : and so turning himselfe vnto him, said : Art
E not thou hee that hast thrust vs into this desolat and strait way, and cast vs headlong into destruction ? and hast as it were in a morter enclosed vs in these rockes and mountaines, readie as it were to ouerwhelme vs. What had we to doe with this vaile of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came wee into these mischieuous and rough straits ? What can wee particularly complaine of the Barbarians, which in these inextricable windings and straits haue thus entangled and beset vs ? Was it not thou that broughtst vs hither ? And wilt thou now as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, thy selfe betray vs? With which so sharpe a reprehension the emperour throughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, resoluing now to stand by it, whatsoeuer happened. But what should hee now doe beset with his enemies, still readie to deuour him ? helpe he saw none, either in himselfe or to be expected from others; nought remained but death and despaire. In this extremitie, all F mans helpe now failing, it pleased the most mightie (which chastiseth and healeth againe, which striketh and yet giueth life, and suffereth not the staffe of the sinners alwaies to rage into the portion of the just) with mercifull eye to looke downe vpon these distressed men, and with an vnwonted kind of clemencie to touch the Sultans heart, in such sort, as that he which but the other day stood in dread of the emperour, and now hauing him as it were in his power, was ouercome with his miserie : or as in times past hee by Husai ouerthrew the counsell of Achitophell, and changed the mind of Abſolon to follow ſuch aduiſe as ſhould bring him to deſtruction: ſo then G

alſo he turned the mind of the Turkiſh Sultan, that (perſuaded by certain of the chiefe men about him, who in time of peace had vſed to receiue great gifts and preſents from the emperor) he of his own accord by his embaſſadors offred peace vnto the emperor, before that he in ſo great diſtreſſe ſued vnto him for any; & that vpon the ſelfeſame conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turks in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans reſolution, early in the morning were readie to aſſault the emperours campe, in hope at once to haue ouerthrowne his whole power; and with a barbarous outcrie ſtill riding about it, came ſo nigh, that with their arrowes they ſlew diuers of the Chriſtians within their owne trenches: Againſt whom the emperour ſent out Iohn the ſonne of Conſtantinus Angelus, and after him Macroducas Conſtantinus, but to little or H no purpoſe. In the meane time came one Gabras, a man of the greateſt reputation among the Turkes, embaſſadour from the Sultan, by whoſe commandement the Turks ceaſed farther to aſſault the campe. This Gabras comming vnto the emperour, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honouring him with reuerence done euen downe to the ground: Firſt preſented him with a goodly horſe, whoſe furniture was all of ſiluer, as if it had beene for triumph, and a faire two edged ſword. Afterwards falling into a large diſcourſe concerning a peace to be made, and with many kind words, as with an enchantment, appeaſing the emperours heauineſſe conceiued of his late loſſe; he among other pleaſant conceits then vttered, ſeeing the emperor in a rich roab of yellow ouer his armour, told him, That that colour was not fit for war, as ominous and portending euill lucke: whereat the emperour a little ſmiling, gaue it him with the fortune thereof: I and receiuing the horſe and ſword ſent him from the Sultan, ſigned the peace. Amongſt other conditions of the peace (which the dangerouſneſſe of the time ſuffred not the emperour curiouſly to examine; one was, That DORILEVM and SVBLEVM before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunate war, ſhould be againe raſed. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the emperour deliuered of a great feare, purpoſed another way to returne home to auoid the ſight of the ſlaine: yet was he by his guides, euen of purpoſe as it was thought, lead backe the ſame way, to behold with his eies thoſe miſerable ſpectacles of the ſlaine, which could not with any teares be ſufficiently lamented: for the ſtraits were made plaine, the vallies were raiſed into hils, and the forreſt lay couered with the carkaſſes of the ſlaine: no man paſſed by, but with heauineſſe and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there loſt. K Hauing again paſſed thoſe dolefull ſtraits, the Turks were againe in the taile of the armie: for it was reported, that the Sultan repenting himſelfe to haue ſuffered his enemies ſo to eſcape out of his hands, had giuen leaue vnto ſuch as would, to purſue them, but followed not himſelfe with his whole power as before; for moſt of the better ſort of his ſouldiers loaded with the ſpoile, were now returned home. Yet theſe that followed after the armie, ſlew many, eſpecially ſuch as were weake or wounded, and ſo vnable to follow the reſt: although the emperour to helpe the matter, had for the repulſing of them, placed the beſt of his captaines and ſouldiers in the rearward. Being come to CHONAS, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto euerie one of his hurt ſouldiers money to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their countries. And comming to PHILADELPHIA, there ſtaid for the refreſhing of himſelfe after ſo great L miſeries. In his returne he raſed SVBLEVM according to his promiſe, but not DORILEVM: whereof the Sultan by his embaſſadors complaining, he anſwered, That what he had, enforced thereunto by neceſsitie, promiſed, he greatly forced not to performe. In reuenge whereof, the Sultan ſent out one of his moſt valiant captaines, called Atapacke, with foure and twentie thouſand good ſouldiers, choſen out of his whole armie, with ſtrait charge to waſte and deſtroy all the emperours prouinces and townes, euen vnto the ſea ſide, without ſparing man woman or child; and in token thereof, to bring with him ſome of the ſea water, an oare, and ſome of the ſea ſand: who according to his charge, ſpoiled PHRIGIA with the cities along the riuer MEANDER, euen vnto the ſea ſide. And ſo returning with a rich prey, by the way ſpoiled what before he had left vntouched. But in paſsing the riuer MEANDER, when he feared leaſt, he fell in- M to the hands of Iohn Bataza the emperours nephew, and of Ducas Conſtantine, a moſt valiant captaine, of purpoſe ſent againſt him by the Emperour with a great power; where he was by them ſlaine together with all his armie, and the rich bootie hee had taken all againe recouered. Many other hard conflicts paſſed after this betwixt the Imperials and the Turks, the one continually ſeeking to anoy the other; all which for that therein nothing fell out much woorth the remembrance,

A remembrance, I for breuitie willingly paſſe ouer. In theſe endleſſe troubles died Emanuel the Greeke emperour, when he had by the ſpace of eight and thirtie yeeres woorthily gouerned that great empire, hauing in the time of his ſickneſſe but a little before his death taken vpon him the habit of a monke, in token he had forſaken the world. All the time of his raigne he was no leſſe jealous of the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt than of the Turks in the Eaſt, and therefore euer dealt with them vnkindly. In time of war he was ſo laborious, as if he had neuer taken felicitie but in paine; and againe in peace ſo giuen ouer to his pleaſure, as if he had neuer thought of any thing elſe. After whoſe death the Turkiſh Sultan, without reſiſtance inuading the frontiers of the empire, tooke SOZOPOLIS with diuers townes thereabout in PHRIGIA; and long beſieged
B the famous cittie of ATTALIA, and ſo dayly encroched more and more vpon the prouinces of the empire, joyning the ſame vnto his owne, which was no great matter for him to doe, the Greeke empire being then no better gouerned than was the charriot of the Sunne (as the Poets faigne) by Phaëton, far vnfit for ſo great a charge: for Alexius Comnenus, otherwiſe called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a child of about twelue yeeres old, ſucceeding his graue father in the empire, after the manner of children altogether following his pleaſure; his mother with his fathers kinſmen and friends, who aboue all things ought to haue had an eſpeciall care of his education, neglecting the old emperors truſt in them repoſed, followed alſo their owne delights, without regard of the ruine of the common weale. Some enamoured with the beautie of the yoong empreſſe, gaue themſelues all to brauerie, and the courting of her: otherſome in great au-
C thoritie with no leſſe deſire in the meane time, with the common treaſures filled their emptie cofers: and a third ſort there was (of all the reſt moſt dangerous) who neither reſpecting their ſenſuall pleaſure, neither the heaping vp of wealth, looked not ſo low, ayming at the verie empire it ſelfe. As for the common good, that was of all other things of them all leaſt regarded. Amongſt theſe third ſort of the ambitious, was one Andronicus, the couſin of the late emperour Emanuel, a man of an haughtie and troubleſome ſpirit, whom he the ſaid emperor Emanuel had for his aſpiring, moſt part of the time of his raigne kept in priſon, or elſe in exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for feare of raiſing of new troubles, confined to liue far off from the court at OENUM: who now hearing of the death of the emperour Emanuel, of the factions in court, Andronicus aſpireth.
D of the childiſhneſſe of the yoong emperour Alexius, giuen wholy to his ſports; and the great men put in truſt to haue ſeene to his bringing vp and to the gouernment of the empire, ſome like bees to flie abroad into the countrey, ſeeking after money as the bees do for honie; ſome others in the meane time like hogs, lying ſtill and fatting themſelues with great and gainefull offices, wallowing in all exceſſe and pleaſure, to haue no regard of the honour or profit of the common weale: thought it now a fit time (in ſuch diſorder of the ſtate) for him to aſpire vnto the empire, after which he had all his life time longed. That he was generally beloued of the Conſtantinopolitans, yea and of ſome of the nobilitie alſo, he doubted not: for them he had long before by his popular behauiour gained, together with the diſtruſt of the late emperor, jealous of his eſtate; which as it coſt him his libertie, ſo miſſed it not much but that it had coſt him his life alſo: but now that he was dead, wanted nothing more than ſome faire colour for the ſhadowing of his
E foule purpoſe. Amongſt many and right diuers things by him thought vpon, was a clauſe in the oath of obedience which he had giuen vnto the emperour Emanuel and Alexius his ſonne, (which oath he had deliuered vnto him in writing) That if he ſhould ſee, heare, or vnderſtand of any thing dangerous or hurtfull to their honour, empire, or perſons, he ſhould foorthwith bewray it, and to the vttermoſt of his power withſtand it: which words (not ſo to haue beene wreſted) as beſt ſeruing for his purpoſe, he tooke firſt occaſion for to worke vpon. And as he was a ſtout and emperious man, thereupon writ diuers letters vnto the yoong emperour his couſin, vnto Theodoſius the Patriarch, and other ſuch as he knew well affected vnto the late emperour Emanuel: wherein among other things which he wiſhed to be amended in the preſent gouernment, he ſeemed moſt to complaine of the immoderat power and authoritie of Alexius, Ambition couered with the zeale of the commonweale.
F then preſident of the Counſell: who in great fauour with the yoong emperour, and more inward with the empreſſe his mother than was ſuppoſed to ſtand with her honour, ruled all things at his pleaſure, in ſo much, as that nothing done by any the great officers of the empire, or by the emperour himſelfe, was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was growne vnto ſuch an exceſsiue pride, hauing all things in his power, as that no man could without danger, as vpon the venemous Baſiliske, looke vpon him. Of which his ſo exceſsiue and inſolent power Andronicus by his letters now greatly complained, mooued there- G unto (as he would haue it beleeued) with the care he had of the yoong emperours ſafetie, which could not (as he ſaid) long ſtand with the others ſo great power, which he therefore (as in dutie bound) wiſhed to be abridged: agrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiaritie with the empreſſe, which firſt muttered in court, afterwards flew (as he ſaid) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the perſon of the emperour, and diſhonour of the ſtate, he forſooth as one in conſcience bound, with great grauitie and eloquence (being a verie learned man) both in open ſpeech and writing moſt ear-neſtly deſired: and thereby ſo wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithfull counſellor to the ſtate, a thing much to haue beene H wiſhed. Wherefore leauing OENUM, the place whereunto he was by the emperour Emanuel in a ſort baniſhed, trauelling towards CONSTANTINOPLE, he gaue it out in euerie place where he came, what he had ſworne, and what he would for his oaths ſake do: vnto whom men deſirous of the change of the ſtate, & ſuch as gaue credit vnto the report long-before giuen out, That he ſhould at length become emperour; flockt in great numbers, as birds about an owle to ſee him, and with vaine praiſes to chatter about him. In this ſort he came as farre as PAPHLAGO-NIA; in euerie place honourably receiued, as if he had beene a deliuerer of his countrey ſent from God. And in the imperiall citie he was not longed for of the vulgar people onely, as their light and load ſtar: but diuers of the nobilitie alſo by ſecret meſſengers and letters, perſuaded him to haſten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernment; aſſuring him that there would be I none to reſiſt him, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt his ſhadow, but all readie to receiue him: Eſpecially Marie the yoong emperours ſiſter by the fathers ſide, with her husband Cæſar (who being a woman of a great ſpirit, and grieuing much to ſee her fathers empire made a prey vnto Alexius the preſident, and the empreſſe her ſtepmother, whom ſhe naturally hated) had raiſed a great and dangerous tumult in the citie againſt them both, which was not without much bloodſhed appeaſed: and now ceaſed not by often and moſt earneſt letters (to her owne deſtruction and her husbands, as it afterwards fell out) to pricke forward Andronicus and to haſten his com-ming: who by letters and meſſengers dayly comming vnto him from the court, ſtill more and more encouraged, leauing behind him the countrey of PAPHLAGONIA, came to HERA-CLEA in PONTUS, and ſtill on towards the imperiall citie, with great cunning and diſſimula- K tion winning the hearts of the people as he went. For who was ſo ſtonie hearted, whom his ſweet words and abundant teares flowing from his gratious eies, as from two plentifull fountaines downe by his hoarie cheeks, might not haue mooued? All that he did or deſired was (as he ſaid) for the common good and libertie of the emperour. By which meanes he had drawne vnto him a woonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as he came. But com-ming into BYTHINIA, he was by Iohn Ducas gouernour of the great citie of NICE, ſhut out as an enemie to the ſtate, and ſo at NICOMEDIA alſo. Neuertheleſſe, paſsing by thoſe cities, he held ſtill on his way, vntill at length he was neere vnto a caſtle called CHARACE, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, ſent with a great power againſt him, by the great preſident Alexius;

who otherwiſe as an effeminat man giuen ouer to his pleaſure, ſpending the greateſt part of the L night in rioting by candle light, and moſt part of the day in his bed, with courtaines cloſe drawn as if it had beene night; yet doubtfull now of the comming of his enemie, left nothing vndone which he thought might helpe for the aſſuring of his eſtate. Many of the nobilitie of whom he ſtood in doubt, he gained vnto him by meanes of the emperors mother; who by her rare beau-tie, ſweet words, and gratious behauiour, as with a line drew all men vnto her: Other ſome he ouercame with gifts and great ſummes of money, whereof he now made no ſpare: And ſo wrought the matter that no man of any account or marke, went ouer to Andronicus. Who neuertheleſſe with ſuch followers as he had, joyning battell with Angelus (ſent againſt him, as is before ſaid) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great diſpleaſure and without reaſon, called Angelus (now fled to CONSTANTINOPLE) to an M account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defraying of the charges of that vnfortunat war: who ſeeing his misforturne to be ſo taken as if he had framed it himſelfe, and of purpoſe betraid the armie committed to his charge; by the counſell of his ſix ſonnes, being all men of great valour and wiſedome, firſt tooke the refuge of his owne houſe: but finding himſelfe there in no ſafetie, with his wife and his ſaid ſonnes (two of which came afterwards to be emperours)

Andronicus departeth from Oenum towards Conſtantinople.

preſently

A presently fled ouer the ſtrait to Andronicus: Who ſeeing of him comming towards him, is reported to haue vſed this text of Scripture, Behold I will ſend mine Angell before thy face, to prepare thy wayes, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the preſage of his good ſucceſſe. Wherefore encouraged with the cõming of theſe noblemen his kinſmen, he without longer ſtay marched directly vnto the ſea ſide, and there a little aboue CHALCEDON encamped almoſt right ouer againſt CONSTANTINOPLE: cauſing many great fires (moe than needed) to be made in his armie, to make it ſeeme vnto them of the citie greater than indeed it was; and with the ſight thereof to keepe the citizens in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of ſome great matter to enſue. Wherein he was no whit deceiued, for they hauing him now as it were in ſight, leauing their worke, ran ſome to the ſea ſide, ſome vp to the hils & high towers to behold his armie a far B off, willing with their friendly looks, if it had ben poſsible, to haue drawn him ouer the ſtrait into the citie. Alexius knowing himſelfe not able by land to encounter with ſo ſtrong an enemie (for now ſome which on foot could not goe ouer to Andronicus, were ſecretly in heart alreadie with him, otherſome thought themſelues ſufficiently to ſhew their fidelitie vnto the emperor, if ſitting ſtill at home, they ſhould take part with neither: for ſo haue ſubtill heads & aſpiring minds for the furtherance of their deſires taught the cõmon people both to ſay & thinke) thought it beſt by ſea to auert the preſent danger: And therefore commanded all the emperours gallies (being before rigged vp and readie) to be ſtrongly manned and put to ſea, for the keeping of PROPONTIS and the ſtrait of BOSPHORUS, that Andronicus ſhould not that way paſſe. Now had hee determined to haue made eſpeciall choice of ſome aſſured friend of his owne for to bee generall of this C fleet, as he had done of the captaines and maſters, being all his owne kinſmen or domeſticall ſeruants: but as he was about to haue ſo done, Contoſtephanus (ſurnamed the Great captaine) oppoſed himſelfe againſt it, challenging that place as due vnto himſelfe, before all others: So that ouercome by his authoritie (which it was no time for Alexius now to diſpute) he was glad to commit the charge and truſt of the whole fleet vnto him, as generall. Thus hauing (as he thought) made the ſea ſure, he ſent ouer vnto Andronicus, as from the emperour (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other inſtructions, wherof the effect was, To command him forthwith in peace to returne vnto the place from whence he came, and not farther to trouble the ſtate: promiſing him in ſo doing, the emperours fauour, with many great honors and D preferments to bee afterward beſtowed vpon him; which otherwiſe might turne to his vtter deſtruction. Which letters Xiphilinus hauing deliuered, and done his meſſage, is reported to haue ſecretly aduiſed Andronicus to proceed in his purpoſe, and not in any caſe to yeeld to that which was of him required: wherewith Andronicus encouraged, proudly rejected the graces offered, and willed the meſſenger to tell them that ſent him, That if they would haue him to returne vnto the place from whence he came, they ſhould firſt diſplace the proud preſident Alexius, and call him vnto an account for the villanies he had done; Then the emperours mother they ſhould depriue of her honours, and ſhut her vp as a Nun into ſome cloyſter, there to learne to amend her life; And laſt of all, that the emperour according to his fathers will, ſhould take vpon himſelfe the gouernment, and not be ouertopt by others, by whoſe too much authoritie, his majeſtie & honour E was (as he ſaid) too much impaired. But within a few daies after, Contoſtephanus, the great captaine and generall, carried ouer all the gallies to Andronicus, leauing nothing but their names for the preſident in his rolls to looke vpon: whoſe reuolt aboue all other things encouraged Andronicus, and caſt Alexius euen into the bottome of deſpaire. For now Andronicus his friends flocked together in the citie, not ſecretly as before, but openly in all places: and ſuch as wiſhed a change in the ſtate, impudently ſcoffing at Alexius, paſſed ouer the ſtrait to CHALCEDON in great numbers to Andronicus, where hauing filled their eyes with the beholding of his goodly perſon, his cheerefull countenance, and reuerend age, and their eares with his ſweet words and great promiſes, returned home merrie and joyfull as if they had been in ſome terreſtriall paradice, filling the citie with his praiſes. After that Andronicus his two ſonnes, Iohn and Manuell, with diuers others, whom the preſident had caſt in priſon, were ſet at libertie, and other of his chiefe fauourits laid faſt in their roomes. As for Alexius, the preſident himſelfe, with all his friends and faction in the court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the guard: a right ſtrange alteration. But about midnight Alexius himſelfe was ſecretly conueyed out of the court vnto the Patriarchs houſe, & there kept with a ſtronger guard than before. A wonderfull change and worth the marking, a man ſo honourably borne, but yeſterday in greateſt honour attended vpon vpon with many thouſands, all at his command, hauing the power to ſpill or ſaue: to day in bonds, in diſgrace, in miſerie and deſpaire, and not ſo much as a page to wait vpon him. Which he taking very grieuouſly, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not ſuffer him to ſleepe nor take any reſt. Of whoſe miſerie, the Patriarch taking pitie (although he had of him very euill deſerued) yet cheered him vp with comfortable words, perſuading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with ſuch ſpeeches as fitted not his preſent ſtate, to prouoke his keepers to vſe him euill. Within a few dayes after early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs houſe, and ſet vpon a very little bad jade, and ſo with a ragged clout vpon the top of a reed in manner of an enſigne, carried before him in deriſion, was brought to the ſea ſide; and there caſt into a little boat, was ſo brought to Andronicus, by whoſe commandement, with the generall conſent of the nobilitie, he for his euill gouernment ſhortly after had his eyes put out. This was the miſerable end of the immoderat power, or rather of the inſolent ſoueraigntie of Alexius: who, had hee with more moderation and vigilancie gouerned, might both haue kept Andronicus out of the citie, and himſelfe from ſo great miſerie; hauing at his command all the emperours treaſure, his gallies, with moſt part of the ſtrength of the empire. Now came the noble men ouer apace to Andronicus: the laſt that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodoſius, with the chiefe of the cleargie: of whoſe approch, Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horſes feet, and in a while after ariſing againe, kiſſed the Patriarkes foot, calling him, The emperours ſauiour, The louer of vertue, The defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous father Iohn Chriſoſtome, omitted not any honourable title he could poſsibly deuiſe to giue him. But the deuout Patriarch, that had neuer ſeene Andronicus before, hauing now well viewed him, and marked his ſterne countenance, his ſubtill nature, his craftie and diſſembling manners, his exceeding ſtature, being almoſt tenne foot high, his ſtately gate, his proud looke, his continuall ſeueritie, and melancholie ſilence: as it were pitying them that to their owne deſtruction had called ſuch a man in, ſaid: Hitherto I haue heard, but now I haue alſo ſeene, and plainely knowne: and fetching a deepe ſigh, adjoyned thereunto that ſaying of the Prophet Dauid: As wee haue heard, ſo haue we alſo ſeene. In which words, he couertly quipped the diſſembled meeting and ſubmiſſion of Andronicus: and withall called to remembrance the words of the emperour Emanuell, wherewith he had many times ſo painted foorth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if hee would moſt liuely haue repreſented him vnto his view.

The meeting of the Patriarch & Andronicus.

All things in the citie and in the pallace ſet in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two ſonnes, and leaue giuen vnto the emperours friends to come ouer vnto him, and to bee acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himſelfe departing from DAMALUM, in a gallie croſſed the ſtrait, oftentimes by the way merrily ſinging that ſaying of the heauenly Pſalmiſt: Returne my ſoule into thy reſt, becauſe the Lord hath done well vnto thee, hauing deliuered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The emperour with his mother Xene, then lay not in the pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE, but at another princely houſe of his in the countrey neere vnto PHILOPATIUM, as Andronicus had appointed: whether Andronicus firſt went, and comming vnto his preſence, moſt humbly proſtrate before him, with ſobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kiſſed his feet. As for the empreſſe his mother, he lightly ſaluted her, and as it were but for faſhion ſake, not diſſembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare againſt her. And ſo without longer ſtay went vnto his tent prouided for him not farre off, round about which, all the great noble men had pitched their tents alſo, flocking vnto him as chickens ſeeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Hauing there ſtaied with the emperour a good while, he was deſirous to goe vnto the imperiall citie, and to ſee the late Emperour Emanuell his couſins graue. Where entring into the monaſterie of our Ladie, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, hee wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainely out. So that diuers of the ſtanders by, ignorant of his diſſembling nature, by way of admiration ſaid: O what a wonderfull thing is this! O how he loued the Emperour, his couſin, although his fierce and cruell perſecutor! And when one of his kinſmen would haue pulled him from the tombe, ſaying that he had ſorrowed for him ynough; he would not be remoued, but requeſted them to ſuffer him yet a little to tarrie by the tombe, for that he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay vnto the dead. And ſo with his hands caſt vp and cloſe together, as if he had prayed, and his eyes faſt fixed vpon the tombe, he mooued his lips, and ſecretly ſaid ſomething, but what, no man could tell. Some ſaid it was

was ſome charme or incantation. But others more pleaſantly conceited, ſaid (and as it afterward appeared more truly) that Andronicus did then triumph ouer the dead emperour Emanuell, and reuell with his ghoſt, with theſe or like words: I haue thee now faſt, my cruell perſecutor, by whome I haue been driuen vnto many great extremities: and hauing wandred almoſt all the world ouer, haue thereunto beene made by thee a common by-word. But now this tombe riſing vp with ſeuen tops, and priſon, out of which thou canſt not ſtart, holdeth thee oppreſſed with a dead ſleepe, out of which thou ſhalt not be awaked, but by the ſounding of the laſt trumpe. And now will I be reuenged of thy poſteritie, and ſatisfie my ſelfe as a lyon with a fat prey; and take ſharpe reuenge of all the wrongs thou haſt done mee, when I haue once poſſeſſed my ſelfe of this royall citie.

Andronicus taketh vpon him the gouernment.

After that, viſiting all the emperours ſtately houſes, but ſtaying in no place long, hee diſpoſed of all matters of ſtate, according to his owne pleaſure. Vnto the young emperour hee allowed hunting, and other his vaine delights, with keepers joyned vnto him, to watch not onely his going in and out, but alſo that no man ſhould talke with him of any matter of importance. For all the gouernment of the ſtate he tooke vnto himſelfe: not for that he wiſhed ſo well thereunto, aboue others, but ſo to driue from the court all them of the contrary faction to himſelf, that were able to doe any thing, and had before borne ſome ſway. The ſouldiors, whoſe helpe he had vſed in aſpiring to the gouernment, he rewarded with great bountie; all great offices & preferments he beſtowed either vpon his owne children, or other his great fauourits; diuers of the nobilitie, of whom he liked not, were by him in ſhort time driuē into exile: ſome were by him depriued of their ſight, & ſome others caſt in priſon, not knowing any cauſe why, more than that they were by him ſecretly cōdemned for that they were of the nobilitie, or had done ſome good ſeruice for the ſtate, or excelled for their perſonage, or ſome other thing that grieued Andronicus, or els for the ſparke of ſome old diſpleaſure which yet lay hidden as fire raked vp in the aſhes. So that the ſtate of that time began to grow moſt miſerable: & the trecherie, euen of men neereſt in blood, ſeeking the deſtructiō one of another, for to ſerue their own turns, or to gratifie Andronicus, moſt horrible: not only one brother betrayed another, but euen the father his ſon, & the ſon his father, if Andronicus would haue it ſo. Some accuſed their neereſt kinſmen, that they had derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more fauored Alexius the yong emperor, then, a great offence. Yea (ſuch was the miſchiefe of the time) that many in accuſing others, were themſelues accuſed; & charging others of treaſon againſt Andronicus, were thēſelues charged by them whom they accuſed, & ſo clapt vp both together in one priſon. Neither were they of the nobilitie only, which were enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly dealt withall; but euen ſome of his great fauorits and followers alſo: For ſome whom but yeſterday he had vſed moſt kindly, and enrolled amongſt his beſt friends, vpon them to day he frowned and tyranized moſt cruelly: ſo that you might haue ſeene the ſame man the ſame day (as it is reported of Xerxes his admirall) to be crowned and beheaded, to be graced and diſgraced. Inſomuch, that the wiſer ſort deemed Andronicus his praiſings, to be the beginning of a mans diſgrace; his bountie, his vndoing; and his kindneſſe, his death. The firſt that taſted of his tyrannie, was Mary, the daughter of Emanuell the emperour, who for the hatred ſhe bare vnto Alexius the late preſident, and the empreſſe her mother in law, had (as is aforeſaid) aboue all other, wiſhed for his comming: but was now by one Pterigionites (ſometime an Eunuch of her fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, hauing in his aſpiring mind purpoſed the vtter deſtruction of all Emanuels poſteritie) cunningly poyſoned; as was her husband Cæſar, who liued not long after her, poyſoned alſo (as was ſuppoſed) with the ſame cup that his wife was. Now amongſt others of the late emperors houſe, none had euer ſtood more in his light, than had the faire empreſſe Xene, the young emperours mother, whom now he ceaſed not moſt bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuſe, as an vtter enemie both vnto the emperour and the ſtate; making as if he would leaue all, and againe depart, if ſhe were not remooued from the emperour her ſonne: and by his cunning ſo incenſed the giddy headed vulgar people againſt her, that they came flocking vnto Theodoſius the good Patriarch, readie to teare him out of his clothes, if he conſented not vntō the remoouing of the empreſſe, as Andronicus had deſired. So a counſell being called of ſuch his fauorits and others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cauſe; but aſſuredly to condemne her; the guiltleſſe empreſſe after many things falſely laid to her charge, was accuſed of treaſon: as that ſhe ſhould by her letters haue ſolicited Bela, king of HUNGARIE, her brother in law, to inuade BRANIZOBA & BELLIGRADE, two ſtrong places belonging to the empire. Whereupon ſhe was condemned, and ſhamefully caſt caſt into a moſt filthie priſon neere vnto the monaſterie of S. DIOMEDE. Amongſt other noblemen called vnto this wicked counſell, were Leo Monaſteriotes, Demetrius, Tornicius, and Conſtantinus Petrenus: who not yet altogether deuoted to Andronicus, being asked their opinions concerning the empreſſe, ſaid, They would be glad firſt to know, Whether that counſell againſt his mother, were called by the emperors conſent or not? With which ſpeech, Andronicus pearſed to the heart as with a ſword, in great rage ſtart vp and ſaid, Theſe are they which encouraged the wicked preſident to all his villanies, lay hands vpon them. Whereupon they of his guard in threatning manner ſhooke their weapons and ſwords at them, as if they would euen preſently haue ſlaine them: And the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them ſome one way, ſome another, were ſo fierce vpon them, as that they had much adoe to eſcape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire empreſſe (but the other day one of the greateſt princes of the Eaſt, and honoured of all her ſubjects) in great miſerie and diſpaire, ſcorned euen of her baſe keepers, euerie houre expecting the deadly blow of the hangman. Yet was not the crueltie of Andronicus againſt her, ſo any thing aſſuaged, but greeuing that ſhe yet breathed, ſhortly after aſſembled againe the former counſell, the miniſters of his wrath, demaunding of them, What puniſhment was by law appointed for ſuch as betraied any towne or prouince of the empire? wherunto anſwere being giuen in writing, That it was by the law, death: he could no longer hold, but that he muſt in great choller breake out againſt the poore empreſſe, as if it had ben ſhe that had done it. And therupon the wicked counſellers crying out with one voice, that ſhe was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed: by & by without longer ſtay, a damned writing was ſubſcribed by the yoong emperor her ſon, as if it had been with the blood of his own mother, whereby ſhe was (I abhor to write it) moſt vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to ſee this moſt horrible and cruell execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldeſt ſon, & Georgius Auguſtus, his neere kinſman; who both diſmaied at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the emperors cōmand, ſaid plainly, That they neuer before conſented vnto the death of the empreſſe, but had cleane hands of ſo hainous an offence, and therefore would now much leſſe ſee her innocent bodie diſmembred in their ſight. At which vnexpected anſwere Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himſelfe by the hoarie beard, and with burning eies caſting ſomtime vp his head, & ſomtime downe, ſighed at his owne moſt miſerable tyrannicall eſtate, fretting inwardly that they which were neereſt vnto him, whom he thought he might euen with a becke haue commanded to haue done any miſchiefe, abhorring his crueltie ſhould refuſe to doe the thing he ſo much deſired to haue done: yet repreſsing his anger for a while, within a few daies after he againe commanded her to be ſtrangled; which was accordingly done by Conſtantinus Trypſychus, and Pterigionites the vngracious eunuch; by whoſe helpe he had before poyſoned Mary the emperours daughter, with Cæſar her husband, as is before declared. Thus periſhed this great empreſſe, cruelly ſtrangled in priſon, by theſe two wicked men, the mercileſſe executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead bodie lately adorned with all the graces of nature, euen vnto the admiration of the beholders, was without more adoe ſecretly raked vp in the ſand faſt by the ſea ſide: a poore ſepulchre for ſo great a perſon.

Dangerous to ſpeake the truth to a tyrant.

A wicked counſell.

The miſerable death of the empreſſe.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durſt thus cruelly to deale with the yoong emperours owne mother, and neereſt friends? yet was all couered vnder the pretence of the common good, and ſafetie of the ſtate and empire. And the more to ſhadow Andronicus his ſecret purpoſes, as not proceeding of any priuat or hidden malice, or aſpiring humour, from which he of all men would ſeeme moſt free; and the more to manifeſt his deuotion and loyaltie vnto the yoong emperour his couſin, he was the onely perſuader vnto the reſt of the nobilitie, to haue him ſolemnly crowned (which as yet by reaſon of his tender age he was not;) & at the time of his coronation, with his owne ſhoulders ſupported him vp, as he was (after the manner of that ſolemnitie) carried vnto the great church, and ſo backe againe; the Crocodils teares ſtill plenteouſly running downe his aged face, as if it had beene for exceeding joy: which many of the meaner ſort beholding, and deeming thereof the beſt, highly commended his kindneſſe, accounting the yoong emperour thrice happie, in ſo graue a gouernour, and faithfull a counſellour; who in loue and kind affection towards him, ſeemed not inferiour vnto his naturall father: ſo cunningly had he vnder the vaile of pietie, ſhadowed his moſt execrable treacherie; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted moſt louing and kind. But hidden treaſon, be it neuer

A ſo well diſſembled, muſt at length ſhew it ſelfe. So Andronicus hauing got into his power both the emperour and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late emperour Emanuel being taken out of the way or elſe driuen into exile, thought it now high time for himſelfe to aſpire vnto that high ſoueraigntie after which he had ſo many yeares longed. Wherfore calling together a Coun- The ſlie preſtiſe of Andronicus in aſpiring to the empire.
cell of his flatterers & fauourits, whom he had for ſuch purpoſe promoted vnto the higheſt places of ſtate (all or moſt part of the graue councellers and friends of the late emperour Emanuel being now diſplaced, or otherwiſe taken out of the way) he as a man onely carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous ſtate of the empire, by reaſon of a rebellion raiſed in BYTHINIA at NICE, by Iſaack Angelus, & Theodorus Catacuzenus; and another at PRUSA, by
B Theodorus Angelus; requiring their graue aduice for the ſuppreſsing therof: who not ignorant of their lords purpoſe (as thereof before ſufficiently inſtructed) anſwered with one conſent, That of ſuch great miſchiefes there would be no end, except he were joyned in fellowſhip of the empire together with Alexius, by his grauitie and deepe wiſdome to ſupply what wanted for the good gouernment of the ſtate in the yong emperor his couſin. At which ſpeech, the by-ſtanders (being in number many, and for the moſt part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great ſhout, & as if it had beene alreadie graunted, with one applauſe cried out, Long liue Alexius and Andronicus the Greeke emperours; and that with ſuch a vehemencie, as if they would therewith haue rent the verie heauens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the citie, foorthwith you might haue ſeene euerie ſtreet and corner of the citie full of the vulgar people, with ſome alſo of better ſort, ſwarming together like bees, and ſounding the praiſes of Andronicus (who now was
C come out of his houſe into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long liue the Emperours Alexius and Andronicus: with which loud acclamation mixt with the heauie ſighings of many good men (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the yoong emperour awaked, and ſeeing the court full of people, and Andronicus by them ſaluted his fellow in the empire: knowing now no other remedie, thought it beſt to yeeld vnto the time, and ſo with the reſt flattering the old tyrant, welcomed him full ſore againſt his will, by the name of his Fellow and companion in the empire: which he now in diſſembling manner ſeeming vnwilling to take vpon him, and refuſing the place offred; was by the rout of his flattering fauourits enforced to his owne great contentment, to yeeld to their requeſt: ſome of them with both their hands car-D rying him vp, vntill they had as it were againſt his will placed him in the imperiall ſeat, prepared for him faſt by the yoong emperour: others in the meane time, no leſſe buſied in pulling off his priuat attire, and putting vpon him the imperiall roabs.

The next day, when this participation of the empire ſhould be publiſhed, and they both proclaimed emperours, the name of Andronicus was ſet before the name of Alexius: whereof his fauourits (though ſome others interpreted it otherwiſe) gaue this reaſon, That it fitted not with the majeſtie of the empire, that the name of a boy ſhould be ſet before the name of ſo reuerend, graue, wiſe, and excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great temple to be crowned, then firſt began to ſhew vnto the people a cheerfull countenance, and ſetting aſide his ſterne looke, after his long deuotion done,
H filled the vaine peoples heads with many large promiſes of a more happie forme of gouern-
E ment than before. All which prooued nothing but meere diſsimulation and deepe deceit, that cheerfulneſſe of countenance and ſpeech ſeruing but for a while to couer his inward and couert moſt inhumane crueltie. And the more to deceiue the world, the ceremonies of his coronation paſt, at ſuch time as he ſhould for the conſummation and confirmation of all, receiue the ſacred and dreadfull myſterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerence to be named, much leſſe with impure hands touched: after he had receiued the bread and taken the cup in his hand, he with a moſt deuout countenance framed of purpoſe to deceiue, & his eies caſt vp to hea-
F uen, as if his ſoule had there alreadie beene (the faireſt maske of hypocriſie) ſwore by thoſe dread-full myſteries, and moſt deeply proteſted in the hearing of the people ſtanding by, that he had taken vpon him the fellowſhip of the empire, for no other end or purpoſe but to aſsiſt Alexius his couſin in the gouernment, and to ſtrengthen his power: whereas his ſecret meaning was nothing leſſe, as ſhortly after appeared. For after a few daies ſpent in faigned deuotions for the proſperous beginning of his empire, he foorthwith turned his mind vnto other his more ſecret but moſt wicked and execrable deſignes. And hauing aboue all things purpoſed the death of the yoong emperour, he called together them of the counſell, his owne creatures and corrupt miniſters of his wickedneſſe, who had now oftentimes in their mouths that ſaying of the Poet: G

Eſt mala res multos dominarier: vnicus eſto,

An euill thing it is to be ruled by many,
One king and one lord, if there be any.

and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Larke. So by the generall conſent of that wicked aſſembly, vnworthie the name of a graue counſell, a decree was made, That H Alexius ſhould as a man vnfit for the gouernment of the ſtate, be depriued of all imperiall dignitie, and commanded to liue a priuat life. Which diſloyall decree of the conſpirators was yet ſcarcely publiſhed, but that another more cruell, came out of the ſame forge, That he ſhould forthwith be put to death, as one vnwoorthie longer to liue. For the execution of which ſo horrible a ſentence, Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites (one of the chiefe miniſters of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted euen vnto the higheſt degrees of the honours of the court) with Conſtantinus Trypſicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captaine of the tormenters, were ſent out; who entring his chamber by night, without compaſsion of his tender age, or regard of his honour, or innocencie, cruelly ſtrangled him with a bow ſtring: which deteſtable murder ſo performed, Andronicus ſhortly after comming in, ſpurned the dead bodie with his foot, railing at his father, the I late emperor Emanuell, as a forſworne and injurious man, & at his mother, as a common whore. The head was forthwith ſtrucke off from this miſerable carkaſſe (the mirrour of honours vnſtabilitie) and left for the monſtrous tyrant to feed his eyes vpon: the bodie wrapped vp in lead, was in a boat carried to ſea, by Io. Camaterius, and Theodoſius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauourits; who with great joy and glee, returned with the ſame boat to the court, as if they had done ſome notable exploit. But long continueth not the joy of the miſchieuous, vengeance ſtill following them at the heeles, as it did theſe two; who not long after, with the reſt that conſpired the innocent emperours death, all or moſt part of them came to ſhamefull or miſerable end. Thus periſhed Alexius the emperor, not yet full fifteen yeeres old: in the third yeare of his raigne, which time he liued more like a ſeruant, than an emperour, firſt vnder the command of his mother, and afterwards of the tyrant which brought him to his end. K

Alexius depriued of the empire

Alexius condemned to die.

Alexius the emperour cruelly ſtrangled.

An vnequall mariage.

Who joyeth now but old Andronicus, made young againe as ſhould ſeeme by his new gained honours: for immediatly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French kings daughter, (as ſome report) before betrothed to yong Alexius; a tender and moſt beautifull ladie, not yet full eleuen yeeres old, an vnfit match for threeſcore and tenne. And in ſome ſort as it were to purge himſelfe and his partakers of the ſhamefull murder by them committed, and to ſtop the mouths of the people, he by much flatterie and large promiſes, procured of the biſhops a generall abſolution for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before giuen vnto the emperour Emanuell and Alexius his ſonne: which obtained, he for a while had the ſame biſhops in great honour, and ſhortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. L
After that, he gaue himſelfe wholly vnto the eſtabliſhing of his eſtate, neuer reckoning himſelfe thereof aſſured ſo long as he ſaw any of the nobilitie, or famous captaines, that fauoured Emanuell the late emperour or Alexius his ſonne, aliue: of whom ſome he ſecretly poyſoned, as Marie the emperour Emanuels daughter, with her husband Cæſar; ſome, for light occaſions he depriued of their ſight, as he did Emanuell and Alexius, the ſonnes of the great and noble captaine Iohn Comnenus; Andronicus Lapardas, whoſe good ſeruice he had oftentimes vſed; Theodorus Angelus; Alexius Comnenus, the emperour Emanuell his baſe ſonne: Some he hanged, as Leo Syneſius, Manuell Lachanas, with diuers others: Some he burnt, as Mamalus, one of the emperour Alexius his principall ſecretaries; all men of great honour and place. For colour whereof, he pretended himſelfe to be ſorrie for them, deepely proteſting, that they died by the ſeueritie of the law, M not by his will, and by the juſt doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himſelfe (as he ſaid) to giue place; and that with teares plentifully running downe his aged cheekes, as if he had ben the moſt ſorrowfull man aliue. O deepe diſsimulation, and Crocodiles teares, by nature ordained to expreſſe the heauineſſe of the heart, flowing from the eies as ſhoures of raine out of the clouds: in good men the moſt certaine ſignes of greateſt griefe, and ſureſt teſtimonies of inward torments;

A but in Andronicus you are not ſo, you are far of another nature, you proceed of joy, you promiſe not vnto the diſtreſſed pitie or compaſsion, but death & deſtruction! How many mens eies haue you put out? how many haue you drowned? how many haue you deuoured? Moſt of the nobilitie that fauoured the late emperour Emanuel & Alexius his ſon, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, ſtrook ſuch a feare into the reſt, that for ſafegard of their liues, they betook themſelues to flight, ſome one way ſome another, neuer thinking themſelues in ſafetie ſo long as they were within the greedie tyrants reach; wherof ſhortly after enſued no ſmall troubles, to the ſhaking of the ſtate of the whole empire. Iſaack Comnenus, the emperour Emanuels nigh kinſman, tooke his refuge into CIPRVS, & kept that iſland to himſelfe. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuels brothers
B ſon, fled into SCICILIA, & there ſtirred vp William king of that iſland againſt Andronicus: who with a great army landing at DYRRACHIVM, tooke the city, & ſo from thẽce without reſiſtance paſsing through the heart of MACEDONIA, ſpoyling the countrey before him as he went, met his fleet at THESALONICA; which famous city he alſo tooke by force, & moſt miſerably ſpoiled it with all the countrey therabout, in ſuch ſort, as that he brought a great feare euen vpon the imperiall citie it ſelfe: vnto which ſo great euils Andronicus (entangled with domeſticall troubles, & not knowing whom to truſt) was not able to giue remedie, although for ſhew he had (to no purpoſe) ſent out certaine of his moſt truſty miniſters with ſuch forces as he could ſpare. For the maieſtie of his authoritie growing ſtill leſſe & leſſe, & the number of his enemies both at home and abroad daily encreaſing, & the fauor of the vnconſtant people (who now began to ſpeake hardly
C of him) declining: he vncertain which way to turne himſelfe, reſted wholy vpon tyrannie, proſcribing in his feare, not only the friends of ſuch as were fled, & whom he diſtruſted, but ſomtimes whole families together, yea & that for light occſions, ſomtime thoſe who were the beſt of his fauourits, whoſe ſeruice he had many times vſed in the execution of his crueltie. So that now no day paſſed, wherin he did not put to death, impriſon, or torture, one great man or other. Wherby it came to paſſe, that the imperiall citie was filled with ſorrow & heauineſſe, euery man hanging the head, and with ſilence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to haue been then vttered. Amongſt many others appointed to this ſlaughter, was one Iſaack Angelus, a man of great nobilitie, whom Hagiochriſtophorites (the chiefe miniſter of Andronicus his tyrannie, and for the ſame by him highly promoted) ſuſpecting, as one that bare no good will to the emperour,
D (cauſe enough of death) came to his houſe to apprehend him; & finding him at home, after ſome few hot words, commanded him to follow him. Whereat the noble man making ſome ſtay, and abhorring the verie ſight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous and fatall: Hagiochriſtophorites himſelfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not foorthwith drawn him out of his houſe by the haire of his head, vnto the priſon by him appointed. For they touched with the honour of the man, and mooued with compaſsion, forced him not, but ſtood ſtill as beholders. Iſaack ſeeing himſelfe thus beſet, and no way now left for him to eſcape, reſoluing rather there preſently to die than ſhortly after to be murdred in priſon, drew his ſword as the reſt were about to haue laid hands vpon him, and at the firſt blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochriſtophorites downe to his ſhoulders: and ſo leauing him wallowing in his owne blood, and
E like a deſperat man laying about him amongſt the reſt, made himſelfe way through the middeſt of them. And ſo embrued with blood, with his bloodie ſword yet in his hand, running through the middeſt of the citie, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for helpe in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great temple, there to take the refuge of the ſanctuarie: where he had not long ſit, in the place where the guiltie flying thither for refuge, vſed to ſit, & confeſsing their offence, craue pardon of ſuch as go in and out; but that the temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of all parts of the citie, ſome to ſee the nobleman, ſome to behold what ſhould become of him: for all men thought that he would before the going downe of the ſunne (notwithſtanding the reuerence of the place) be drawne thence by Andronicus, & put to ſome ſhamefull death. Thither came alſo Iohn Ducas, Iſaacks vncle, and his ſonne Iſaack to in-
F creaſe the tumult; not for that they were any thing guiltie of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, but for that they had before become ſureties vnto the ſuſpitious tyrant, for their kinſman Iſaack, & he likewiſe for them; by whoſe treſpas they well knew themſelues now brought into no leſſe danger than if they had been abettors therunto. And beſide them alſo, many other there were, which ſtanding in doubt of their owne eſtate, & fearing the like might happen to themſelues, prickt forward with hard ſpeeches the common people flocking thither, inſtantly requeſting them to ſtay

there,and to ſtand by them now at their need,being ſo injuriouſly wronged,whoſe pitifull com- G plaints moued right many to take part with them. At which time alſo,no man yet comming from the emperor(being as then out of the citie) to repreſſe the ſedition,nor any of the nobilitie oppo-ſing themſelues, no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloodie miniſters or officers ſhewing themſelues,nor any that did ſo much as ſpeake a good word in his behalfe, or in diſlike of the tumult,the boldneſſe of the ſeditious people increaſed, euerie man in ſo great libertie, ſaying what he liſt, and after their rude manner one encouraging another. So ſpent Iſaack that long night,not thinking (God wot) of an empire, but ſtill expecting the deadly ſtroake of An- dronicus. Yet had he with great entreating,ſo preuailed, that diuers of the aſſembly ſhutting the church dores, and bringing lights into the church, ſtaied there with him all night, and by their H example cauſed ſome others to ſtay alſo. The next morning by the breake of the day were all the citizens flockt againe vnto the temple,curſing the tyrant to the deuill,as the common enemie of mankind,wiſhing vnto him a ſhamefull death, and the honour of the empire vnto Iſaack. At that time by fortune,or rather God ſo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the citie at his pallace of MELVDINVM, on the Eaſt ſide of PROPONTIS, where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night ſtirred he not, either did any thing more, but by ſhort letters aduiſed the people to pacifie themſelues, Andronicus in vaine ſeeketh to appeaſe the tumultuous people. and not by fooliſh rebellion to caſt themſelues into farther danger. In the morning, Andronicus his fauourits began to ſhew themſelues,and to do what they might to haue appeaſed the tumul- I tuous multitude; yea and preſently after came Andronicus himſelfe, and landed with his imperiall gally at the great pallace in the citie. But with the inraged people,naught preuailed either the perſuaſions of the one,or report of the preſence of the other: for they all as vpon a ſignall giuen, and as men inſpired with one ſpirit, or ſtirred vp with the ſame furie, flocked together into the temple of S. SOPHIA, one encouraging another,and ſcoffing at ſuch as ſtood by as idle lookers on,without weapons in their hands, reuiling them, and calling them rotten lyms that had no feeling of the common harme. After that they broke open the priſons,and ſet at libertie the pri-ſoners,as fitteſt inſtruments for the increaſing of the tumult, who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people, but many of them borne of good houſes,and for ſome light fault,or inconſiderat word(whereof euery man was in thoſe times bound to giue an account) or for ſome friends offence againſt Andronicus, there laid faſt: theſe of all others moſt animated the people, K in ſuch ſort,as that they which before for feare of the danger,did but ſoftly murmure vnto themſelues againſt Andronicus, did now openly joyne themſelues with the reſt of the baſe ſeditious.
Then might you haue ſeene ſome with their ſwords and targuets, ſome alſo in their armour,but the greateſt part armed but with clubs and ſtaues and other ſuch like rude weapons, armes of furie,haſtely taken vp in their ſhops as by chance they came firſt to hand, running forth in euery Iſaack Angelus by the people in a tumult ſaluted emperour. place. By this aſſembly of the moſt furious and promiſcuous people, was Iſaack hoyſed vp, and with a generall applauſe ſaluted emperour. At which time one of the ſextons of the church,with a ladder,tooke downe Conſtantine the Great his crowne of gold (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar) and ſet it vpon Iſaack his head: Which he at the firſt ſeemed vnwilling to weare,not for that he was not deſirous ynough of the empire, but for that he feared the extream L danger of the matter, and thought thoſe things that were then done, to be but as it were a ſicke mans dreame,like ynough ſtraight way to vaniſh; beſide that, he feared in ſo doing, the more to exaſperat Andronicus: which his vncle Iohn Ducas (of whom we haue before ſpoken, ſtanding by him) perceiuing, plucking off his owne cap, and ſhewing his old bald head, requeſted the people, that if his nephew did refuſe it,they would ſet it vpon his. Whereunto the people with a great outerie anſwered,that they would no more yeeld their obedience vnto an old bald man, as hauing receiued many harmes from the hoarie haires of Andronicus; and therefore for his ſake,hated euery old man,more fit for Charons boat and his coffin,than for the empire,and eſpe-cially if he had a forked beard or bald head,as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Iſaack by the tumultuous multitude inueſted in the empire. And ſo royally mounted vpon one of the M emperours horſes,richly furniſhed with a ſaddle and trappings of gold,which they had by chance gotten,was by them brought from the temple vnto the court; Baſilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting vpon him, whom the headſtrong people had enforced againſt his will,to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the eſtabliſhing of Iſaack in the empire. Andronicus at his comming to the great pallace,perceiuing firſt by the confuſed crie of the tumultuous multitude,

A titude, and afterward by that which he ſaw with his eyes, how the world went; calling vpon his old friends and flattering fauourits, thought firſt by their helpe to haue repreſſed the furie of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himſelfe, were now for the moſt part ſhrunke from him; and thoſe which were left, ſo faintly comming on, as if in his quarrell they had had no mind to ſpend their liues: with which heartleſſe companie, Andronicus fearing to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the furie of the multitude, with his bow and arrowes in his hand, got him vp into the higheſt tower of the pallace (called CENTENARIA) and from thence beſtowed certaine ſhot among the people. But ſeeing that to bee to no purpoſe, and better perſuaded to doe more with them with faire words, than ſuch vaine force; he from the top
B of the tower cried aloud vnto them, That if they would hold themſelues contented, and depart, he would by their conſent reſigne the empire vnto his ſonne Manuell: whereat the people more inraged, ſpared not to poure foorth moſt reprochfull words in contempt both of himſelfe and his ſonne. And ſo furiouſly brake into the court, by one of the gates called CAREA: which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, caſting from him all his habillements of honour, and diſguiſing himſelfe, fled againe vnto his gallie, accompanied onely with Anna his wife, and Maraptica his minion, and ſo returned to MELVDIVM, his pallace from whence hee came. Iſaack but yeſterday in the bottome of deſpaire, and ſhaddowed as it were with the hand of death, by the ſtrange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the higheſt type of worldly honour, entring the pallace, was there againe with the greateſt applauſe of the peo-
C ple that might bee, ſaluted emperour. From whence hee foorthwith ſent out certaine companies of his moſt aſſured friends and followers, to apprehend Andronicus: who now as a man at once forſaken both of his friends, and of his better fortune, ſecretly fled with his wife and his paragon before remembred, to CHELE, attended vpon onely with a few of his truſtie ſeruants which had of long time ſerued him before hee was emperour. There taking ſhip, with purpoſe to haue fled vnto the Tauroſcythes (as not thinking himſelfe ſafe in any prouince of the empire) hee was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe againe, the wrought ſea abhorring (as it ſeemed) to carrie him that had ſo polluted it with the dead bodies of the innocent by him ſlaine; and ſtill threatening (as it were) to deuour him. Thus ſtrangely ſtayed by foule weather, or more truly to ſay, by the reuenging hand of the higheſt: hee was found
D by ſuch as were ſent out to ſeeke after him; and being by them apprehended, was with two great yron chaines faſt locked about his proud necke, and heauie giues vpon his legs, caſt into the caſtle of ANEMA: and in that miſerable habit ſhortly after preſented to the emperour Iſaack, yet buſied in appeaſing and reforming of the diſordered citie: where by the way as hee went, he was by the people moſt ſhamefully reuiled, and injuriouſly vſed; ſome plucking him by the beard, ſome by the haire of his head, ſome other in the meane time playing with his noſe, and bobbing him in the face, with a thouſand other deſpights done vnto him; eſpecially by ſuch women, as whoſe husbands he had before murthered or depriued of their ſight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull furie of the people, he had his right hand cut off; and was againe committed to the ſame caſtle, without meat, drinke, or other comfort: where after he had laine a E few dayes, hauing one of his eyes put out, hee was ſet vpon a foule leane cammell, with his face toward the taile thereof, and ſo as it were in triumph led through the market place, his bald head all bare, as if it had beene a dead mans ſcull taken out of a charnell houſe, in a ſhort old coat; ſo miſerable a ſpectacle, as might haue expreſſed a fountaine of teares out of the eyes of a right hard hearted man. But the bedlem and moſt inſolent cittizens, eſpecially they of the baſer ſort, as cookes, coblers, curriours, and ſuch like, flocking about him like bees (without regard that he had but the other day worne vpon his head the imperiall crowne, then honoured by them as a god, and extolled vnto the heauens; that they had not long before ſolemnely ſworne vnto him obedience and loyaltie) ran now as men out of their wits, omitting no kind of villanie they could deuiſe to doe vnto him: Some thruſt nailes into his head, ſome caſt durt in F his face, ſome the dung both of men and beaſts, ſome prickt him in the ſides with ſpits, ſome caſt ſtones at him as at a mad dog, and otherſome opprobrious and deſpightfull words, no leſſe grieuous vnto him than the reſt. Amongſt others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchin, caſt a pot full of ſcalding water in his face. And in briefe, their outrage ſo exceeded, as if they had ſtriuen among themſelues who ſhould do him the greateſt villanie. Hauing thus ſhamefully as in a ridiculous triumph, brought him into the theatre, they there betwixt two pillars hanged him vp by the heeles, where hauing ſuffred all theſe deſpightfull indignities, with many moe, not without G offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet ſtill held his patience, not giuing one euill word: but ſometimes ſaying, Lord haue mercie vpon me: and otherwhiles, Why doe you breake a bruſed reed? yet the furious people nothing mooued with the calamitie of ſo great a man, of all others now the moſt miſerable, ſtripped him of his bad clothes as he hung, and cut off his priuities. One among the reſt, to make an end of him, thruſt his ſword in at his throat vp to the twiſt as he hung: other two with their long ſwords, prooued their ſtrength, who could ſtrike fartheſt into his buttockes. Thus miſerably periſhed this famous emperour, after he had raigned two yeeres. That which was left of his bodie (for many had carried away ſome peeces thereof) being taken down from the place where he hung, was caſt into a baſe vault in the theatre, where H rie of the people ouerpaſſed, it was by ſome more charitable men remooued thence, and laid in a low vault neere vnto the monaſterie of the Ephori: which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this hiſtorie, ſpeaking of the time wherin he liued) ſayth, is yet there vndiſſolued to be ſeene. He was a man moſt honourably deſcended, of ſtature tall, and well proportioned: in his countenance ſat a certaine reuerend majeſtie, adorned with ſuch notable vertues, as might haue made him worthely to haue been compared vnto the greateſt emperors of his ſtock and familie, had he not obſcured the ſame with too much ambition and crueltie, whereof the one cauſed him to lead the greateſt part of his life in priſon or exile, the other brought him vnto ſuch a moſt ſhamefull end. I

Iſaack Angelus his ſucceſſour, by the fauour of the people thus exalted vnto the empire, at the firſt gouerned the ſame with great lenitie and moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the effuſion of his ſubjects blood. But afterwards not a little troubled, both with forraine enemies, and domeſticall rebellion, beſieged in the imperiall citie, by ſuch of the nobilitie as thought themſelues no leſſe worthie of the empire than himſelfe: for repreſsing of which in-others as he had in diſtruſt, that he was counted of moſt men not inferiour in crueltie to An-dronicus his predeceſſor; few daies paſsing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, beſides them of the meaner ſort, of whom he ſeemed to make no great reckoning: whereby he in few yeeres loſt the loue and fauour of his ſubjects, who before had him K which generall diſlike of the people, his ingratefull younger brother Alexius (by him before for a great ſumme of money redeemed from the Turks) tooke occaſion to riſe vp againſt him, and by the fauour of the ſouldiors, depriued him together both of the empire and his ſight:

and hauing put out his eyes, thruſt him into a Monaſterie, there to liue as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darkneſſe, after he had raigned nine yeeres and eight moneths, being not yet full fortie yeares old: Whether it were the reuenging hand of God for the hard meaſure vſed to Andronicus, or not, I leaue it to the wiſer to conſider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith hee beſt gouerneth all things, would haue a moderation vſed in puniſhment of our moſt capitall enemies, as hauing alwaies before our eyes the ſlipperie ſtate L

ment of God it oftētimes falleth out, that what hurt we do vnto others, the ſame we may receiue againe from others. In theſe ſo great and ſtrange mutations of the Conſtantinopolitane empire, now a man of great yeeres, dying, left behind him foure ſonnes, Maſut, Coppatine, Reucratine, and Catchoſroes, all men growne. Amongſt whom he deuided his kingdome. Vnto Maſut he bequeathed AMASIA, ANCYRA, DORYLEVM, with diuers other pleaſant cities of PONTVS:

A vnto Coppatine he aſsigned MELYTENE, CESAREA, and the colonie now called TAXARA: vnto Reucratine he allotted AMINSVM, DOCEA, with ſome other cities vpon the ſea coaſt: but vnto Caichoſroes, he left ICONIVM his regall ſeat, and with it LYCAONIA, PAMPHILIA, and all the countries thereabouts as far as COTTIANYVM. Of theſe foure, Coppatine long liued not after his father, for whoſe inheritance Reucratine prince of DOCEA, and Maſut prince of ANCYRA (his two brethren) fell at variance, and ſo at laſt into open war. But Maſut finding himſelfe too weake for his warlike brother Reucratine, yeelded vnto him the territories, which he ſaw he muſt needs forgo; and glad now to keepe his owne, ſo made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtie ſpirit, with his forces thus doubled,
B denounced war vnto his brother Caichoſroes; who doubting his owne ſtrength, fled vnto the emperour Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his father done before him vnto the emperour Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the emperour but of late hauing obtained the empire by the depoſing of his brother, and altogether giuen to pleaſure, reputing alſo thoſe domeſticall warres of the Turkes, ſome part of his owne ſafetie; ſent him home without comfort, as one ſtrong enough of himſelfe to defend his owne quarrell againſt his brother.

The ſonnes of Cliza ſilan at variance among themſelues.

Howbeit he was ſcarcely come to ICONIUM, but that he was by Rucratine expulſed thence, and driuen to flie into ARMENIA, where he was by Lebune king of that country, a Turke alſo, honourably receiued and courteouſly vſed, but yet denied of the aid he requeſted: the king pretending that he was alreadie in league with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or as ſome
C thought, fearing the dangerouſneſſe of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly diſcouraged, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there in poore eſtate, as a man forlorne, paſſed out the reſt of his daies.

Now hauing thus paſſed through the Turkiſh affaires in the leſſer ASIA, together with the troubled eſtate of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, no ſmall cauſe of the Turks greatneſſe; the courſe of time calleth vs backe againe before wee paſſe any further, to remember their proceedings alſo at the ſame time, and ſhortly after, in SIRIA, IVDEA, ÆGYPT, and thoſe more Southerly countries, where theſe reſtleſſe people ceaſed not by all meanes to enlarge their empire, vntill they had brought all thoſe great kingdomes vnder their obeiſance.

After the death of Baldwin king of HIERUSALEM, of whom we haue before ſpoken, Al-
D mericus his yoonger brother earle of IOPPA and ASCALON, being then about ſeuen and twentie yeeres old, was by the better good liking of the cleargie and people, than of the nobilitie, elected king: not for that there wanted in him any good parts woorthie of a kingdome, but for that ſome of them enuied vnto him ſo great an honour. Neuertheleſſe he was (as we ſaid) by the generall conſent of the people elected, proclaimed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with all ſolemnitie crowned the ſeuenteenth day of Februarie, in the yeare of Grace 1163. To begin whoſe troubled raigne, the Ægyptians firſt of all denied to pay vnto him their woonted tribute. In reuenge whereof, he in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant armie entred into ÆGYPT; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to ſtay the further purſuit and paſſage of the Chriſtians, cut the bankes of the riuer NILUS, and ſo
E drowned the countrey, that the king was glad to content himſelfe with the victorie he had alreadie gotten, and ſo to returne to HIERUSALEM.

Almericus firſt king of Hieruſalem.

The next yeere, Almericus was againe drawn downe with his power into ÆGYPT, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him againſt Saracon: whom Noradin the Turke, king of DAMASCO, had ſent as generall with an armie, to reſtore Sanar the Sultan before expulſed, and to depoſe Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being ſlaine, and Saracon hauing woon certaine townes, kept them to himſelfe: Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, joyned his forces with Almericus, and by his helpe expulſed Saracon out of ÆGYPT. But whileſt Almericus was thus buſied in ÆGYPT, Noradin the Turke making an inroad into the frontiers of the Chriſtians neere vnto TRIPO-
F LIS, was by Gilbert Lacy, maſter of the Templars in thoſe quarters, and the other Chriſtians, when he leaſt feared, ſo ſuddenly ſet vpon, that he had much adoe by flight to ſaue himſelfe, halfe naked for haſt, moſt of his followers being at the ſame time ſlaine. In reuenge of which diſgrace, he not long after with a greater power came and beſieged ARETHUSA: For reliefe whereof, Bohemund prince of ANTIOCH, Raymund the yoonger, earle of TRIPOLIS, Calaman gouernour of CILICIA, and Toros prince of ARMENIA came with their power. Of whoſe comming the Turke hearing, raiſed his ſiege and departed. After whom theſe Chriſtian princes eagerly gerly following, were by the Turks ſhut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto they had vnaduiſedly too far entred) and there with a great ſlaughter ouerthrown. In which conflict, all the chiefe commanders of the armie were taken, except the prince of ARMENIA, who foreG caſting the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine diſſuaded the reſt from the further purſuit of the flying enemie. The prince of ANTIOCH there taken, was about a yeare after for a great ſumme of money redeemed; but the countie of TRIPOLIS was after eight yeares ſtrait captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victorie returning againe to the ſiege of ARETHUSA, in few daies woon the towne: and encouraged with ſo good ſucceſſe, and the abſence of the king, laid ſiege to the citie of PANEADE, which was alſo deliuered vnto him, vpon condition H that the citizens might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart.

At the ſame time Saracon generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Chriſtians two caſtels; the one in the countrey of SIDON, the other beyond IORDAN vpon the borders of ARABIA, both in the cuſtodie of the Templars: twelue of whom the king at his returne hanged vp for treaſon.

Shortly after Saracon, king Noradin his great man of war, with all the power of the Turkes, came downe againe into ÆGYPT, with purpoſe to haue fully ſubdued all that notable kingdome vnto his lord and maſter. Of whoſe power, Sanar the Sultan ſtanding in dread, praied aid of Almericus, promiſing vnto him beſide his yearely tribute, the ſumme of fortie thouſand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readineſſe; Almericus I ſet forward with his armie, and encountring with Saracon and his Turks at the riuer NILVS, ouerthrew him in a great battell: yet not without ſome loſſe, for the Turks in their flight lighting vpon the kings carriages with the whole baggage of the armie, and ouerrunning them that had the charge thereof, caried away with them a moſt rich prey: whereby it came to paſſe, that as the Chriſtians had the victorie, ſo the Turkes enjoyed the ſpoile.

Saracon after this ouerthrow hauing againe gathered together his diſperſed ſouldiers, tooke his way to ALEXANDRIA, where he was by the citizens receiued: after whom the king following, gaue no attempt vnto the citie, for that he knew to be but vaine, but encamped cloſe by the ſide of the riuer NILVS, from whence the citie was chiefly to be victualed. Whoſe purpoſe Saracon perceiuing, and betime foreſeeing the diſtreſſe of his whole armie for want of victuals, if he ſhould there long ſtay: leauing there his ſonne Saladin (or as ſome call him his nephew) with K a thouſand horſemen for the keeping of the citie, ſecretly by night departed thence himſelfe with the reſt of his armie: and paſſing through the deſerts, did great harme in the vpper parts of ÆGYPT. Of whoſe departure Almericus vnderſtanding, was about to haue followed him, but that he was otherwiſe perſuaded by the Ægyptian captaines to continue his former purpoſe for the gaining of the citie. Wherefore now after the departure of Saracon, he began to approch the wals, and with diuers engines of war to diſturbe the defendants: wherwith the citizens (better acquainted with the trade of marchandize, than the feats of war) diſcouraged, began now to conſult among themſelues for the turning out of thoſe troubleſome gueſts whom they had ſo lately receiued: which Saladin perceiuing, certified Saracon his vncle thereof, requeſting his ſpeedie reliefe in that his ſo dangerous eſtate, and with much intreatie perſuaded the citizens for a while to L hold it out, vntill he might from him receiue anſwere: of all which the Chriſtians and Ægyptians without, hauing intelligence, laid ſo much the harder vnto the citie. Gladly would Saracon haue done what hee was by his nephew requeſted: but perceiuing it to be a matter of no leſſe danger than difficultie, he by the means of Hugh countie of CESAREA, & one Arnolphus another noble Chriſtian, both then priſoners with him, concluded a peace with the king: whereupon the citie was foorthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turkes ſuffred in ſafetie to depart. At which time alſo all priſoners were on both ſides freely and without ranſom ſet at libertie. Thus Saracon for this time diſappointed of his purpoſe for the conqueſt of ÆGYPT, returned backe againe to DAMASCO: and Almericus with great glorie to ASCALON, where he arriued with his armie the 21 of September in the yeare 1167. In this late expedition, king Almericus on the one ſide enflamed with the wealth of ÆGYPT, and on the other, encouraged with the weakneſſe of that effeminat people, reſting for the moſt part vpon forreigne ſtrength; had purpoſed himſelfe to inuade the kingdome, & ſo if poſsibly he might to joyne it to his owne. Pelusium taken by Almericus.

Saracon the Turke after the departure of Almericus, eaſily perceiuing a moſt fit time and opportunitie to be offred for him now to obtaine that, which he had in vaine before both ſought and fought for; encamped with his armie neere vnto CAIRE, and notably counterfeited himſelfe of all others the moſt deuoted friend of the Sultans: ſo that betwixt them two paſſed all the Mamalukes vtterly deſtroied: In the gouernment of whoſe poſteritie, the mightie emperors of the Turks, it hath euer ſince remained as part of their empire, vntill this day, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie God willing ſhall appeare. G

1170 Saladin thus poſſeſſed of the great kingdome of ÆGYPT, and all things ſet in ſuch order as he thought beſt for the newneſſe of his ſtate, with a great armie entred into the land of PALESTINE, in the yeare 1170, and there beſieged DARON; which towne he woon, and ouerthrew ſuch as were ſent by king Almericus to haue relieued the ſame: with which ſmall victorie contenting himſelfe, as with the good beginning of his riſing fortune, he returned backe againe into his kingdome. Yet was his armie ſo great and populous, as that the like armie of the Turkes had neuer before beene ſeene in the Holy land. Wherefore Almericus conſidering in what great danger he ſtood, his kingdome now being on both ſides beſet by the Turks, ſent out his embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdome which their fathers had woon. And for the ſame purpoſe went himſelfe in perſon vnto the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterwards ſent backe loaded with the promiſes of great matters, as were alſo his embaſſadours from the princes of the Weſt. All which for all that ſorted vnto nothing, but vaniſhed into ſmoake. H

1171 The yeare following, viz. 1171, Saladin beſieged PETREA, the metropoliticall citie of ARABIA: but hearing that Almericus with a great power was comming to the reliefe thereof, hee raiſed his ſiege and retired. As he did alſo the next yeare after, hauing in vaine attempted the ſtrong caſtle of MONT-ROYALL, on the further ſide of IORDAN. In like manner alſo the third yeare he came againe into the Holy land, and ſpoiled the countrey beyond IORDAN: but hearing of the kings comming againſt him, he foorthwith returned againe into AEGYPT. All theſe light expeditions, this politike prince made not ſo much for hope of victorie, or to prooue his enemies ſtrength, as to traine his ſouldiers, eſpecially the effeminat Aegyptians, and to make them fitter to ſerue him in his greater deſignes. I

1173 Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of DAMASCO, and in his time a moſt notable champion of the Turks, after he had raigned nine and twentie yeares. Vpon whoſe death Almericus foorthwith beſieged the citie of PANEADE, in hope to haue againe recouered the ſame: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great ſumme of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble priſoners, intreated to raiſe his ſiege and depart. So hauing ſent away his armie, and trauelling with his ordinarie retinue to TIBERIAS, where hee had the ſummer before beene ſicke of the flix, feeling himſelfe not well, he returned on horſebacke by NAZARETH and NEAPOLIS to HIERUSALEM, where his old diſeaſe increaſing vpon him, he was alſo taken with a feuer: wherewith after he had beene ſome few daies grieuouſly tormented, hee requeſted his phyſitians with ſome gentle potion to looſe his belly, which was now ſomewhat ſtaied: which they refuſing to do, he commaunded the potion to be giuen him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap ſhould: which being giuen him, and his belly againe looſed, he ſeemed therewith to haue been at the firſt well eaſed; but his woonted feauer with great vehemencie returning, before his weake & ſpent bodie could be with conuenient meats refreſhed, he ſuddenly died the tenth of Iuly, in the yeare 1173, when he had raigned about ten yeares. His dead bodie was with the great lamentation of all his ſubjects, ſolemnly buried by his brothers. Hee was a moſt wiſe prince, and withall right valiant, amongſt many moſt fit for the gouernment and defence of that troubleſome kingdome ſo hardly beſet with the infidels, if it had pleaſed God to haue giuen him longer life. Baldwin the fourth of that name ſeuenth king of Hieruſalem.

Foure daies after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his ſonne, then a youth about thirteene yeares old, by the generall conſent of the nobilitie choſen king, and by Almericus the Patriarch in the temple with great ſolemnitie crowned in the yeare 1173: vnto whom, as not yet by reaſon of his tender age, fit himſelfe to mannage the waightie affaires of the kingdome, Raymund countie of TRIPOLIS was by the whole conſent of the nobilitie appointed tutor to ſupply what was wanting in the yoong king. M

Noradin, Sultan of DAMASCO (dead as is aforeſaid) left behind him Melechſala his ſonne, yet but a youth, to ſucceed him in his kingdome. Whoſe gouernment the nobilitie diſdaining, ſent ſecretly for Saladin Sultan of Ægypt, vnto whom at his comming they betrayed the citie of DAMASCO, the regall ſeat of the Turkes in SYRIA. Whereof Saladin poſſeſſed, and entring into CELESIRIA without reſiſtance, tooke HELIOPOLIS, EMISSA, with the great citie of CESAREA;

A CESAREA; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of DAMASCO, the citie of ARETHUSA onely excepted. But thus to suffer Melechsala the young prince to be wronged, and the kingdome of DAMASCO to be joyned vnto the kingdome of Ægypt, was of the wiser sort thought not to stand with the safetie of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernour of that kingdome, made out certaine forces to haue hindred his proceeding. At which time also, Cotobed prince of PARTHIA and Melechsalas vncle, sent certaine troupes of Parthian horsemen to haue aided his distressed nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almost all slaine, neere vnto ALEPPO where Melechsala lay. As for the countie of TRIPOLIS and the other Christian princes, with whom Saladin in the newnesse of his kingdome had no desire to fall out; he appeased them with faire intreatie,
B and rewards: vnto the countie hee sent freely the hostages, which yet lay for his ransome at EMISSA: vnto the other princes he sent rich presents: and therewith so contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing against him. After which time, three or foure yeares passed in great quietnesse, to the great strengthening of him in those his new gotten kingdomes. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip earle of FLANDERS, the Christian princes in SYRIA encouraged, consulted of an expedition to be made into ÆGIPT, whereof Saladin hauing intelligence, drew downe into that countrey the greatest part of his strength. But Philip disliking of that expedition, and the rather for that he saw no great cheerefulnesse in the countie of TRIPOLIS and the rest, thereunto; they with one consent changed their purpose for ÆGIPT, and turning their forces quite contrarie way, miserably and without resistance wasted the countrey
C about EMISSA and CESARIA.

While'st the Christians were thus busied in CALOSIRIA; Saladin on the other side tooke occasion out of ÆGIPT to inuade the kingdome of HIERUSALEM: of whose comming king Baldwin hauing intelligence, with such small forces as he had left, hasted himselfe to ASCALON. In the meane time Saladin with a great armie was entred into the holy land, where burning the countrey before him, and raging in the blood of the poore Christians, hee came and encamped not farre from ASCALON: and strucke such a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in HIERUSALEM, were about to haue forsaken the citie: As for the king himselfe, he lay close within the citie of ASCALON, not daring to aduenture vpon so strong an enemie. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, dispersed his armie, some one way
D some another, to forrage the countrey. Which the king perceiuing, secretly with all his power issued out of the citie, if happily so he might ouertake the Sultan vnawares. Neither was he deceiued in his expectation: for comming suddainly vpon him, and secretly charging him, he had with him for a good space an hard and doubtfull battell, vntill that the victorie by the power of God, at length enclining to the Christians, Saladin with his Turkes fled, ouerthrown with a great slaughter, most part of his great armie being either there slaine, or lost afterward with hunger and cold. This victorie fell vnto the Christians the 25 day of Nouember in the yeare 1177, not 1177 without the mightie hand of God, the Turke hauing in his armie about six and twentie thousand horsemen, and the king not past foure hundred horse with some few footmen. After which victorie, Baldwin in great triumph returned to HIERUSALEM, and there shortly after with great E care and diligence repaired the decayed wals of the citie.

Saladin in reuenge of this ouerthrow, made diuerse incursions into the frontiers of the Christians, and did great harme, especially in the countrey about SIDON. For the repressing whereof, the king put himselfe in armes, and going against him, ouerthrew part of his armie, as they were carrying away a great bootie. Of which ouerthrow Saladin vnderstanding, came in such hast with the rest of his armie, as if it had been a suddaine tempest vpon the Christians, then in great securitie deuiding the spoile; of whom they slew a great number, and put the rest to flight: In which so suddaine a confusion, Otto, grand master of the Templars, and Hugh the eale of TRIPOLIS his sonne in law, were both taken prisoners. The earle himselfe with a few fled to TYRE: the F king also at the same time was glad to shift for himselfe, and by flight to saue himselfe as he might. After which victorie, Saladin besieged a strong castle which the king but the yeare before had built vpon the banke of the riuer of IORDAN, and giuen it to the Templars, with the countrey round about; which castle Saladin tooke by force, and put to sword all that were therein, except some few whom he carried away prisoners. By this victorie Saladin became dreadfull vnto the Christians in SYRIA, which caused them, especially such as had any charge, with more vigilan-

cie to looke about them. Yet ſhortly after, a peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan and the king; whereby their troubled eſtates breathed themſelues, almoſt the ſpace of two yeares. G

But this ſo welcome a calme was by domeſticall troubles againe by the kings friends ſuddenly troubled. For the countie of TRIPOLIS, to whom the gouernment of the kingdome was committed, comming towards HIERUSALEM, being by the ſuggeſtion of his enemies brought into ſuſpition with the king, as if he had affected the kingdome, was to his great diſgrace by the way commanded to ſtay. The cheefe authors of which diſcontentment, were the kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the kings ſteward; who in the abſence of the earle had wrought the kings ſicke mind according to their owne appetites. But the reſt of the nobilitie wiſely foreſeeing vnto what great danger that diſcord might tend; in deſpight of them, with much labour, cauſed him to be ſent for againe, and ſo reconciled vnto the king: By which meanes, that dangerous fire of diſſention was for that time appeaſed, which afterwards brake out againe, to the vtter ruine of that kingdome. H

Saladin goeth out of Ægypt to Damaſco.

Saladin now wearie of the league he had before made with king Baldwin, as no longer ſtanding with his hautie deſignes, renounced the ſame, and raiſing a great power in ÆGIPT, ſet forward toward DAMASCO. Of whoſe comming king Baldwin hauing knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to haue met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called PETRA. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the kings territorie, came and encamped before MOUNT-ROIALL, a caſtle which Baldwin had giuen vnto the Templars, about three daies march from the place where the king lay. I

Galilee ſpoiled, and the caſtle of Bury taken by the Turks.

There Saladin with the ſpoile of the countrey refreſhing his armie, now wearie of long trauell, ſet forward againe, and ſo without reſiſtance arriued with his armie at DAMASO. At the ſame time the Turks captaines about DAMASCO, BOSTRUM, and EMISSA, perceiuing the frontiers of the Chriſtians thereabout, to be kept but with ſmall ſtrength, paſſed ouer IORDAN, and ſpoiling a great part of GALILEY, beſieged the caſtle of BURY, at the foot of mount TABOR, not farre from the citie of NAIM; which caſtle they in few dayes tooke, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them about fiue hundred priſoners. Saladin being come to DAMASCO, called together all the garriſons of that kingdome, and joyning them vnto the forces he brought out of AEGYPT, entred into the Holy land: at which time the countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernour of the kingdome, lay ſicke of a burning feauer. Neuertheleſſe the king encouraged by the knights of the order, went out with his armie againſt him; and encountring with him neere vnto a village called FROBOLET, ouerthrew him in a great battell, wherein, and afterward in the flight, moſt part of the Sultans armie periſhed. Saladin himſelfe being glad by ſpeedie flight to eſcape the danger, and ſo by long marches to get him againe to DAMASCO. K

Berytus in vain beſieged by the Turks.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin hauing repaired his armie, and ſent for his fleet out of ÆGIPT, came and beſieged BERYTVS both by ſea and land: at which time alſo his brother, whom he had left gouernour in ÆGIPT, beſieged DARVM, a ſtrong towne in the vttermoſt bounds of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM towards ÆGIPT. Both whoſe forces Baldwin being not able at once to repreſſe, by the counſell of his nobilitie thought it beſt firſt to relieue BERYTVS, as the place of greater importance. And for that purpoſe ſet forward with his armie by land, hauing alſo rigged vp three and thirtie gallies at TYRE, for the releeſe thereof by ſea. Of which preparation Saladin vnderſtanding, as alſo of the kings comming (by letters intercepted by his ſcouts, directed to the beſieged, for the holding out of the ſiege, with promiſe of ſpeedie reliefe) he preſently riſe with his armie, and departed: whereof the king being aduertiſed, retired to SEPHOR. L

Saladin inuading Meſopotamia, is himſelfe inuaded by the king of Hieruſalem.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, deſirous aboue meaſure to extend the bounds of his kingdome, and ſeeing the ſucceſſe of his attempts againſt the king of HIERUSALEM not anſwerable to his deſire, conuerted his forces vnto the countries more eaſtward: and paſſing the riuer EUPHRATES, and entring into MESOPOTAMIA, partly by force, partly by corruption, got into his hand the cities of EDESSA, CARRAS, and diuers others. In which time the king of HIERUSALEM tooke occaſion firſt to ſpoile the country about DAMASCO, and after that, diuers other places of the Sultans kingdome, making hauock of whatſoeuer came in his way, and ſo laded with the ſpoile of the Turkes, retired to HIERUSALEM. M

Saladin

A Saladin with victorie returning out of MESOPOTAMIA, in reuenge of the injuries done vnto him in his abſence, marched directly to ALEPPO, the ſtrongeſt citie of the Chriſtians in that part of SYRIA, which aboue all other he longed after: where hee had not long lien, but that it was by the treaſon of the gouernour deliuered into his hands, with all the countrie thereabouts: wherwith the Chriſtian princes were ſo diſcouraged, that they euen then began to feare greater matters to enſue. The prince of ANTIOCH ſould TARSVS, the metropoliticall citie of CILICIA, to Rupinus prince of ARMENIA; for that he ſaw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being ſo farre from him, and Saladin as it were now ſtept in betwixt him and it.

Aleppo betraied vnto the Turks.

At the ſame time king Baldwin, at NAZARETH fell ſicke of a feauer; the leproſie alſo his old
B diſeaſe growing dayly more and more vpon him: inſo much that diſpairing of his life, he called vnto him Guy Luſignan countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, vnto whom he had before eſpouſed Sybill his eldeſt ſiſter, and in the preſence of his mother, the Patriarch, and all the chiefe commaunders of the ſouldiers of the ſacred war, appointed him gouernour of the kingdome, reſeruing vnto himſelfe only the title of a king, with the citie of HIERUSALEM, and a yearely penſion of ten thouſand duckats: All which was done to the great diſgrace and diſcontentment of the countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernour.

It was not long, but that Saladin hauing breathed himſelfe a little, after ſo great labours, came againe into the Holy land, where he tooke many caſtles and did infinit harme; in ſo much that the countrey people were glad for feare to forſake their houſes and to flie into cities. The Chri-
C ſtian armie in the meane time lying faſt by at SEPHOR, not once mooued, although many a faire occaſion were offred: For the chiefe commaunders affectionated vnto the countie of TRIPOLIS, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernour, were vnwilling to fight, but finding one excuſe or other, ſuffered the enemie at his pleaſure to ſpoile the countrey, and ſo in ſafetie to depart, which he had neuer before done in thoſe quarters.

Within leſſe than a moneth after, Saladin with a great armie well appointed with all the habilliments of war, needfull for the beſieging of a citie or ſtrong caſtle, came againe into the land of PALESTINE; and paſsing through the countrey beyond IORDAN, ſat downe at laſt before PETRA, in hope by the taking thereof, to haue made his paſſage betweene AEGYPT and DAMASCO more ſafe. Of which his purpoſe king Baldwin hauing knowledge, and taught by the D euill ſucceſſe of late, to what ſmall purpoſe it was to commit the managing of his wars vnto a generall ſo euill beloued, and leſſe regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; ſent againſt him with his armie Raymund the countie of TRIPOLIS, the old gouernour, whom he had againe reſtored vnto the gouernment, and diſplaced Guy. Of whoſe comming Saladin hearing, raiſed his ſiege after he had lien there a moneth, and ſo departed.

Petra in vaine beſieged by the Turks.

A little before this expedition, the king ſtill growing ſicker and ſicker, his foule diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, by the common conſent of the nobilitie appointed Baldwin his nephew by his ſiſter Sybylla, a child but of fiue yeares old, to ſucceed him in the kingdome; and the countie of TRIPOLIS to haue the gouernment of the ſtate during the time of his minoritie. This Sybilla the kings ſiſter, was firſt married to William the yoonger, marqueſſe of MOUNT-FERRAT, who
E dying within three months after, left her with child with this his poſthumus ſonne Baldwin, now by his vncle deputed vnto the hope of the kingdome. After whoſe death ſhe was married to Guy Luſignan, countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, the late gouernour: who taking in euill part this the kings deſignement, eſpecially for the gouernment of the kingdome by the countie of TRIPOLIS; departed from the court as a man diſcontented vnto his citie of ASCALON: whereof the Patriarch and the princes of the ſacred war, fearing (and that not without cauſe) great danger to enſue, came to the king, then holding a parlament at the citie of ACON, moſt humbly requeſting him for auoiding of further danger and the ſafetie of his kingdome, to receiue againe into his fauour the countie Guy his brother in law, and to make an attonement betwixt him
F and the countie of TRIPOLIS. But this their requeſt ſorted to no purpoſe, ſo that the parlament was diſſolued without any thing for the good of the commonweale in that point concluded.

Diſcord in the court of Hieruſalem.

After that time the kingdome of HIERUSALEM began ſtill more and more to decline. In the old king Baldwin (ſicke both in bodie and mind) was almoſt no hope: in the yoong king (yet vnfit for ſo great a burthen) much leſſe: and the diſſention betwixt the two counties Guy and Raymund with their fauorits, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the ſtate. Beſides that, G the countie of TRIPOLIS fearing the power of Guy his enemy, was thought to haue ſecret intelligence with Saladin the Turke, in ſo much that the king was almoſt in purpoſe to haue proclamed him traitour. Wherefore the king now reſted onely vpon the counſell of William archbiſhop of TYRE, and the maſters of the knights of the ſacred war: by whoſe aduiſe he ſent Hera- clius Patriarch of HIERUSALEM, Roger Molins maſter of the kinghts of S. Iohns, and Ar- nold maſter of the Templars, embaſſadours vnto Lucius the third, then Pope, vnto Fredericke

the emperour, Philip the French king, and Henrie the ſecond king of ENGLAND; to declare vnto them the dangerous ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, and to craue their aid againſt the Infidels. Theſe embaſſadours comming to the Counſell then holden at VERONA, with great H grauitie and diligence in the preſence of the Pope and of the emperour, declared the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians of the Eaſt, with their humble requeſt vnto them for aid: in ſuch ſort that they mooued them, with all the princes there preſent, to compaſsion. From thence they were by the Pope directed vnto Philip the French king, with whom hauing diſpatched their affaires, they from him paſſed ouer into ENGLAND, & afterward into GERMANIE: and had at length broght their negotiation to ſo good paſſe, that in euerie place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be vndertaken againſt the Turks, for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt: with which good newes, the embaſſadours returning to HIERUSALEM, filled the ſicke king with the hope of great matters. But greater quarrels ſhortly after ariſing betwixt the Pope and the emperour; and ſharpe war likewiſe betwixt the French king and the king of ENGLAND, and I the other Chriſtian princes alſo being at no better quiet, the notable expedition that had with the expectation thereof ſo filled the world, was againe laid aſide and quite daſhed. Whereof king Baldwin vnderſtanding both by meſſengers and letters from his friends, oppreſſed with griefe and heauineſſe, more than with the force of his diſeaſe (a man for his proweſſe and painefulneſſe not inferiour to any his predeceſſours) died without iſſue the 16 day of May, in the yeare 1185 1185, being but fiue and twentie yeares old, whereof he had raigned twelue. His bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his ſubjects, ſolemnly buried in the temple neere vnto the mount CALVARIE, together with his predeceſſours the kings of HIERUSALEM.

King Baldwin ſendeth embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt for aid.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned king. But then began the ſparks, which had of long lien raked vp & hidden in the aſhes, to break out into a K great fire: For Raymund countie of TRIPOLIS, contended the whole gouernment of the kingdome, & tuition of the king, to be due vnto him, by the appointment of the late king & conſent of the nobilitie; and did ſo much, that he had almoſt obtained it to haue beene confirmed vnto him in open parlament. But Sybilla, a woman of a moſt haughty ſpirit (ſiſter vnto the late king, & mother vnto the yoong king yet liuing) prickt forward her husband Guy, in no caſe to giue place vnto his competitour Raymund: and ſo animated him, that by the helpe of his owne fauourits, and the countenance of Boniface marqueſſe of MOVNT-FERRAT, who euen then was come with a great power into SIRIA, he extorted from the nobilitie whatſoeuer hee deſired. But ſeuen moneths were ſcarce well paſſed, but that this yoong king Baldwin was dead and buried;
poyſoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the deſire ſhee had of the kingdome her ſelfe: L whoſe death ſhe with all ſecrecie concealed, vntill ſhe had obtained of the Patriarch and other princes of the kingdome, That Guy her husband might be proclaimed king: So by her meanes it was ſo wrought, that vpon one and the ſelfe ſame day, the yoong king Baldwin was buried by his vncle, and Guy the countie crowned. This yoong king Baldwin by reaſon of his tender yeares and ſhort raigne, is of ſome not reckoned amongſt the kings of HIERUSALEM: howbeit, ſee-ing he was by his vncle and the princes of that time, thought woorthy of the kingdome, let him alſo haue his place amongſt the reſt, as the eight king of HIERUSALEM.

Guy the ninth and laſt king of Hieruſalem.

When Guy was thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome, the countie of TRIPOLIS ſeeing himſelfe out of all hope of the gouernment, and highly therewith diſcontented, did what he might by all meanes to croſſe the doings of the king: whoſe ſicke and aſpiring mind Saladin prickt dayly M more and more forward, promiſing him his helping hand whenſoeuer hee ſhould need; which courteſie the countie deſirouſly imbraced. For now the fatall period of the kingdome of HIE-RUSALEM drew faſt on, and all things tended to deſtruction, diſcord raigning in euerie place:
which Saladin well perceiuing (after that he had compacted with the countie) by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, inuited the Turks, Saraſins, & Ægyptians, as men agreeing in one and the ſame religion,

A gion,generally to take vp armes in ſo fit an oportunitie of the diſcord of the Chriſtians,aſſuring them of great prey and ſpoile, beſides the honour of the conqueſt. The citie of PTOLEMAIS was the place by him appointed,where all this power ſhould meet: whether ſuch a multitude of the barbarous Mahometanes (partly for the hatred of the Chriſtian religion,partly for the hope of the rich ſpoile which Saladin had promiſed them) came flocking out of all places, that in ſhort time there was met together about fiftie thouſand horſemen, beſides an infinit number of foot. And vnto ſuch as could not ſafely paſſe by the borders of HIERUSALEM, to them the falſe countie gaue ſafe conduct, by the countries of TIBERIAS, NAZARETH, and GALILEY.

Saladin vpō the diſcord of the Chriſtians, taketh occaſion to invade the Holy land.

All the power of the infidels thus aſſembled,Saladin laid ſiege vnto the citie of PTOLEMAIS: Ptolemais beſieged by Saladin.
B which the Templars and the knights Hoſpitalers had notably fortefied and ſtrongly manned, (as before vnto them giuen by the kings of HIERUSALEM to defend againſt the infidels) and 1187 therein now were both the maſters of both thoſe honourable orders,with the whole flower of the knights of their profeſsion. Vnto this citie, Saladin gaue a moſt terrible aſſault vpon May day in the morning, in the yeare 1187; which was by the Chriſtians notably defended, and the enemie with great ſlaughter ſtill beaten downe. In the heat of this aſſault, the two great maſters ſallying out,with certaine troupes of their moſt readie horſemen,aſſailed the enemies campe,and bearing down all before them,raiſed there a great tumult: and by and by turning vpon the backs of them,that were aſſaulting the citie,made there an exceeding great ſlaughter. Inſomuch,that Saladin diſmaied, firſt with the confuſion in his campe,and now with the ſuddain danger behind
C him, was glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and to turne his whole forces vpon them: where was fought a moſt bloodie and terrible battell. Amongſt others that there fought, the countie of TRIPOLIS,now an enemie vnto God and his country,diſguiſed in the habit of a Turke,notably helped the infidels,and meeting with the great maſter of the knights Hoſpitalers,vnhorſed him, who ſurcharged with the waight of his armour, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies,there died. Neuertheleſſe,ſuch was the valour of theſe woorthie men,and new ſuccour ſtill comming out of the citie,that Saladin hauing in that battell,and at the aſſault, loſt fifteene thouſand of his Turks,was glad with the reſt to betake himſelfe to flight. Neither was this ſo notable a victorie gained by the Chriſtians without blood,moſt part of the worthie knights Hoſpitalers being together with their grand maſter there ſlaine.

D Saladin by this ouerthrow perceiuing, that by open force he ſhould not be able to doe much againſt the Chriſtians,thought it good vnto his forces to joyne alſo pollicie. Wherein the falſe countie of TRIPOLIS was the man he thought beſt to make choice of, as his fitteſt inſtrument to worke by. Him hee compacted withall to ſeeke for grace at the king of HIERUSALEM his hands,as of his dread ſoueraigne, and after ſo long diſcord, to ſue to be reconciled vnto him, as now weatie of the Turkes amitie, with whom he ſhould make ſhew to be vtterly fallen out. At which time alſo (to giue the matter the better grace) Saladin of purpoſe with a great armie came and beſieged TIBERIAS, a citie of the counties juriſdiction: for the reliefe whereof, the traiterous countie craued aid of the king and the other princes of the ſacred warre. Who with an armie,though not great,yet very well appointed,came according to his deſire, & encamped neere
E vnto the fountaine of SOPHOR: where they had not long ſtayed, but that they met with the huge armie of the Turkes, being in number one hundred and twentie thouſand horſe, and one hundred and ſixtie thouſand foot: with whome they joyned a moſt ſharpe and terrible battell: which by reaſon of the extremitie of the heat of the weather (it then beeing the twelfth of Iuly) and the approch of the night,was againe giuen ouer; both armies (as if it had been by conſent) retiring. The next day the battell was againe begun,wherein the Turkes by the treaſon and ſhamefull flight of the falſe countie of TRIPOLIS, gained the victorie. In this battell Guy the king himſelfe, with Gerard maſter of the Templars, Boniface marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, and diuers Guy king of Hieruſalem taken priſoner.
others,men of great marke,were taken priſoners. And to ſay the truth, in this battell was broken the whole ſtrength of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt.

F The Chriſtian commonweale by the treaſon of the falſe countie thus betrayed vnto the Infidels, Saladin without any great reſiſtance had the cities of PTOLEMAIS, BIBLIS, and BERITHVS deliuered vnto him: in all which places, he vſed his victorie with great moderation, not enforſing any Chriſtian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but ſuffering them there ſtill to remaine,as before,yeelding vnto him their obedience,with ſuch tribute as he had impoſed vpon them. With like good fortune,he within the ſpace of one moneth tooke all the port townes betwixt SIDON and ASCALON, alongſt the ſea coaſt, excepting only the auncient citie of TYRE; G vnto the citie of ASCALON alſo he laid ſiege by the ſpace of nine daies: but loath to ſtay the courſe of his victorie, by the valour of the defendants reſolued there to ſpend their liues, hee de-Hierusalem beſieged. parted thence, and marched directly vnto HIERUSALEM, the chiefe citie of that kingdome. And approching the ſame, gaue ſummons thereunto, perſuading the citizens yet whiles they had time to yeeld themſelues, together with the citie, vnto his mercie. Which they refuſing to doe, he in-Hierusalem taken by Saladin. cloſed the ſame with his armie, and by the ſpace of foureteene dayes laid hard ſiege vnto it, leauing nothing vndone or vnattempted that might helpe for the gaining thereof. At which time the citizens conſidering the danger they were in, and that the ſtrength of the kingdome with the flower of their chiualrie were in the late battell loſt, and that they were not now to expect any H forraine aid, agreed vpon certaine conditions to yeeld vp the citie: which were, That ſuch Chriſtians as would, might remaine ſtill, with their libertie and goods; and that ſuch as would not, might in ſafetie depart, with ſo much of their goods as they could carie vpon their backs. Theſe conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy citie was vnto him deliuered the ſecond of October in the yeare 1187; after it had been by the Chriſtians holden frõ the time that it was by Godfrey of BUILLON & other Chriſtians woon, about 89 yeares. Saladin entring into the citie, prophaned firſt the temple of the Lord, conuerting it vnto the vſe of his Mahometane ſuperſtition, the other churches he vſed as ſtables for his horſes; onely the temple of the ſepulchre, was by the Chriſtians for a great ſumme of money redeemed and ſo kept vndefiled. The Latine Chriſtians he thruſt out of the citie, yet with leaue to carrie with them ſuch things as they were able them- I ſelues to beare: who trauailing with heauie burdens, but much more heauie hearts, ſome to TRIPOLIS, ſome to TIRE, ſome to ANTIOCH (for onely theſe three cities were now left vnto the Chriſtians in SYRIA) were by the falſe countie of TRIPOLIS by the way lightened of their burthens, to the increaſing of the heauineſſe of their hearts, moſt of them being by him and his followers ſpoiled of that little they had by the mercie of their enemies ſaued in the ruine of their ſtate.

Vnto the other Chriſtians that were naturall Syrians, Greekes, Armenians, Georgians, and ſuch like, Saladin appointed certaine places of the citie for them to dwell in, where ſome of their poſteritie were long time after to be found. All the monumenss of the Chriſtians were by the barbarous Mahometanes and Turkes defaced, onely the ſepulchre of our bleſſed K Sauiour Chriſt, with the monument of Godfrey of BUILLON, and his brother Baldwin, for the reuerence of the men were by them ſpared. In theſe ſo great troubles, aboue twentie thouſand of the Chriſtians periſhed: amongſt the reſt, the countie of TRIPOLIS was ſhortly after found
The death of Raymond, the traiterous counte of Tripolis. dead in his bed, and (as ſome ſay) circumciſed, a manifeſt token of his reuolt, not from the king onely, but from the Chriſtian faith alſo.

HIERUSALEM thus woon, Saladin returned againe to the ſiege of ASCALON, which after he had by the ſpace of tenne dayes moſt ſtraitly beſieged, was vnto him by compoſition deliuered: wherein amongſt other things agreed vpon for the ſafe departure of the citizens, was compriſed alſo, that he ſhould freely ſet at libertie Guy the king, and Gerard maſter of the Templars, both before taken priſoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed. L

Thus the victorious Turke ſtill vrging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to haue taken TRIPOLIS; but hauing made ſome proofe of his owne forces, and the valour of the defendants, he was glad to giue ouer the ſiege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his armie, becauſe he would leaue no place vnattempted, he laid ſiege vnto the citie of TIRE, where Conrade marqueſſe of MONT FERRAT was a little before arriued with Iſaack Angelus the Greeke emperours fleet, and a ſupplie of certaine companies of good ſouldiors. Vnto which place were come great numbers of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians fled from HIERUSALEM, and other places, ſo that the citie was full of men.

This citie Saladin moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, but was by the Chriſtians notably repulſed, not without the great loſſe of his beſt ſouldiors. At which time alſo the admirall of SICILIA diſ- M comfited his fleet at ſea, and landing his forces, came vnlooked for vpon the backe of him: ſo that hauing his hands full before by them of the towne, and charged behind by theſe newcome enemies, he was glad to retire in ſuch haſt, as that he left his tents with all that therein was, vnto the ſpoile of the Chriſtians.

Within a few daies after, Saladin hauing againe repaired his armie, inuaded the countrey about

A about ANTIOCH: with fire and ſword deſtroying whatſoeuer was ſubject to his furie, euen to the gates of the citie; but knowing that ſo ſtrong a citie was not without great charge and long ſiege to be woon, he thought it good to make proofe if it might by pollicie or corruption bee gained. Wherein he ſo cunningly dealt with the Patriarch, that he had by his meanes, the caſtle (otherwiſe almoſt impregnable) for gold betrayed vnto him. By meanes whereof, hee in ſhort time became lord and maſter of that famous citie, (about ninetie yeares before hardly gained by the whole power of the Chriſtians, after eleuen moneths ſiege) and with it fiue and twentie cities moe that depended of the fortune thereof, with all the prouinces belonging thereunto, alwayes deemed to haue been the third part of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM.

The famous city of Antioch betrayed vnto the Turkes.

B The loſſe of this ſo great a citie, together with the ruine of the whole kingdome, had in ſhort ſpace filled euery corner of Chriſtendome with the heauie report thereof. Wherwith the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt (namely Frederick the Germane emperour, with Frederick his ſonne duke of SUEVIA, Philip the French king, Henry the ſecond, king of ENGLAND, Otto duke of BVRGVNDIE, Leopold duke of AUSTRIA, with many other great princes and prelats of GERMANIE, ITALIE, and other places) not a little mooued, as alſo with the pittifull complaints of the embaſſadours at the ſame time ſent from the diſtreſſed Chriſtians; and the effectuall perſuaſions of Clement the third then Pope: promiſed, and all, or moſt part, indeed made great preparations; which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occaſions) but at diuers times imployed for the moſt part, with the danger of their owne perſons againſt the Turks, for
C the reliefe of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, and recouerie of the holy land: but with what ſucceſſe, ſhall hereafter God willing be declared.

Of which ſo great preparations made againſt him, Saladin not ignorant, ſet at libertie Guy the king of HIERUSALEM, whom contrarie to his promiſe made at ASCALON, hee had now detained a yeare in priſon; yet before his enlargement exacting of him an oath, Neuer by force of armes afterwards to ſeeke to recouer his kingdome, or to reuenge the wrongs hee had ſuſtained: hoping thereby to ſtay the comming of the other princes in his quarell. Which oath for all that, the Pope diſpenſed withall, as extorted by conſtraint from him, at ſuch time as Saladin had longer detained him in priſon than of right he ſhould.

Guy now at libertie, and yet in mind a king, came to TYRE, but could not be there receiued,
D the citizens hauing before ſworn their obedience vnto Conrade, marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, by whom they had been notably defended againſt the furie of Saladin. Wherefore departing thence with ſuch power as he had, and the diſperſed Chriſtians daily repairing vnto him out of all parts of SIRIA, he came and beſieged PTOLEMAIS: Where he had not long lien, but that firſt came vnto him the Venetian fleet, with them alſo of PISA, and after them the Flemmings with a fleet of fiftie ſaile, who all joyned their forces together for the winning of the citie. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS, came Saladin with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged: where betwixt him and the Chriſtians was fought a great battaile, wherein the Chriſtians at the firſt had the better; but afterward fainting, and readie to flie, had there vndoubtedly receiued a notable ouerthrow, had not Geffrey Lyſignan, the kings brother,
E (left for the guarding of the campe) in good time come in with new ſupplies: and not only ſtaied their flight, but alſo repreſſed the farther purſute of the fierce enemie, now almoſt in poſſeſsion of the deſired victorie. Neuertheleſſe, there were two thouſand Chriſtians there ſlaine, and amongſt them Gerard, maſter of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiuing how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue his citie, ſent for the fleet which he had ſtrongly rigged vp at ALEXANDRIA, and ſo by force put new ſupplies both of men and victuals into the beſieged citie. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often ſallies vpon the Chriſtians; and in deſpight of the Chriſtian religion, whipped the image of Chriſt crucified, which they had for that purpoſe, in the ſight of the Chriſtians ſet vp vpon the top of the wall. With the ſame fleet alſo he ſo ſcoured the ſeas, that no victuals or new ſupplies of men could that way
F without great danger be brought vnto the campe; whereby ſuch ſcarcitie and want of all things began ſhortly after to ariſe among the Chriſtians, that ſome of them not able longer to indure the famine, fled vnto the Turks campe, then lying not farre off, crying out for bread. Of which diſtreſſe in the campe of the Chriſtians, Saladin knowing right well, both by ſuch fugitiues as daily came ouer vnto him, and by his owne eſpials, yet made ſhew as if hee vnderſtood nothing thereof: but ſuddainly riſing with his armie (as doubtfull of his owne ſtrength) departed, leauing his campe full of all manner of victuals. Whereof the Christians vnderstanding, and supposing him to haue for feare been gone indeed, in great numbers hasted vnto the forsaken campe, as vnto a most desired prey: where, whilest they were gorging themselues, Saladin suddainly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great slaughter. Neuertheless, the Christians hauing now lien before the citie six months, continued the siege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardest difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Christian princes, whose comming they expected with the first of the next Spring: during which time, many an hot skirmish passed betwixt them and the Turkes both by sea and land. G

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of PTOLEMAIS, Frederick the emperour with diuers of the great Germane princes, and others, before resolued vpon an expedition for the recouerie of the Holy land, and the reliefe of the distressed Christians in SYRIA: hauing now raised a great armie, furnished with all things necessarie for so long a journey, set forward from RATISBONE, and so comming to VIENNA, and passing through HVNGARIA, BVLGARIA, and THRACIA, arriued at length at CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Isaack Angelus the emperour that then raigned, honourably entertained: but indeed more for feare and fashion sake than for any loue or good will: for that he after the suspicious manner of the Greekes, hauing in distrust so great a power of the Latine emperors, wished rather for his absence, than his presence. And therefore ceased not in what he might to hasten his passage ouer into ASIA, pretending for the colour thereof, The necessitie the Christians had of his present aid. So the emperour with his armie passing ouer the strait, and without resistance marching through the greatest part of the lesser ASIA, entred into LYCAONIA, where meeting with a great power of the Turks, that were come from the Sultan of ICONIVM to stay his farther passage, hee ouerthrew them in a great battell; and so marching directly on to ICONIVM, tooke it by force, and gaue the spoile thereof vnto his souldiors, in reuenge of the injuries before done vnto his vncle the emperour Conrade, by the Sultan of that citie. Departing thence, and marching through CILICIA, he in another battell ouerthrew the Turkes, that hauing taken the straits of the mountaines had thought to haue staied his farther passage into SYRIA. After that he tooke the citie PHILOMELA, which the Sultan had strongly fortefied, which he rased to the ground, and put to sword all the people therein, for that they contrarie to the law of nations, had slaine such messengers as he had sent vnto them for the summoning of the citie. In like manner he entred into the lesser ARMENIA, where he tooke the citie MELITENE, and subdued all the countrey thereabouts: vnto the reliefe whereof, the Turkes comming with a most huge armie, were by him with an exceeding great slaughter ouerthrowne and put to flight. After that, entring into COMAGENA, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his sonne, with a great armie of the Turks, he ouerthrew him in the plaine field, and discomfited his whole armie. But whilest he too eagerly pursueth the enemie he had then in chace, his horse foundring vnder him, as he passed the riuer SALEPH, he was so ouerthrowne, and his foot hanging fast in his stirrop, drawne through the deepe riuer, and almost drowned; and at the farther side of the riuer was so plunged by his horse, at his landing, that he was taken vp for dead. Yet breathing a little, and casting his eyes vp to heauen, with much adoe he vttered these few words, Lord receiue my soule: and so in the hands of them that tooke him vp, gaue vp the ghost, vnto the great greefe and hindrance of the Christian commonweale: for Saladin hearing of his approch, was so afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before woon in SYRIA, but how to defend himselfe in ÆGIPT. Thus miserably perished this worthie emperour, the tenth of Iune, in the yeare of grace 1190, being then of the age of seuentie yeares, whereof he had with much trouble raigned eight and thirtie. His dead bodie was caried along with the armie, and afterward with all funerall pompe buried in the cathedrall church at TYRE. H I K L

Fredericke the emperours sonne chosen generall of the Christian armie.

Fredericke the emperour thus dead, Fredericke his sonne duke of SVEVIA, was by the generall consent of the princes in the armie chosen generall in his steed: vpon whom with the rest of the armie, yet mourning for the death of the emperour, the Turkes gaue a sudden and fierce charge, in hope so to haue ouerthrown them: But finding greater resistance than they had before supposed, and hauing lost some of their men, they with like speed that they came, retired againe. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great armies) to increase in the campe: for why, the Turkes for that purpose had before destroied, or carried away all that was in the countrie, leauing nothing for the Christians more than the bare ground. Wherefore M

Frede-

A Fredericke turning a little out of the way, came to ANTIOCH, which was easily deliuered vnto him, and his hungrie souldiers well refreshed by the citizens, being as yet for the most part Christians. But he had not there staied past fifteene daies for the refreshing of his armie, but that the plague (the handmaid of famine and another scourge of the greatest multitudes) began to rage among his souldiers, in such sort, that he was glad with his armie to forsake the citie and to get him abroad againe into the open field: where foorthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodequin generall of such forces as Saladin had sent for out of ÆGYPT (which were not small) was by great journeis comming towards him: against whom he in good order set forward, with his fathers corse still carried in the middest of his armie. These two armies meeting together, and A great battell betwixt the Turks and the Christians.
B both willing to fight, joyned a great and doubtfull battell, fortune enclining now to the one side, and by and by to the other; the Christians exceeding their enemies in valour, and they them againe in number. At length the Christians in the vauntguard began to retire, and they that seconded them were also hardly charged: when Fredericke mindfull of his fathers valour, with a troupe of valiant horsemen brake into the enemies battell, with such force, that the Turkes were glad to giue ground: after whom Leopold duke of AVSTRIA comming presently on with his footmen, brought such a feare vpon the whole armie of the Turkes, that they betooke themselues to speedie flight. In this battell were foure thousand of the enemies slaine, with small losse of the Christians; and about one thousand mo taken prisoners, with fifteene of their ensignes. After which victorie, Fredericke marching further in CÆLO-SYRIA, pacified LAODICEA then
C in mutinie, and like to haue been deliuered vnto the Turks. He also with a little labour tooke BERYTHVS with diuers other cities of SIRIA, which before belonging vnto the kings of HIERUSALEM, were now reuolted vnto the Turks. So afterward comming to TYRE, he there solemnly buried his father (dead, as is before said:) & from thence certified Guy the king (still lying with the other Christian princes at the siege of PTOLEMAIS) of his comming: who forthwith sent the Marques of MONT-FERRAT, with part of the fleet to transport him with his people that were left, by sea: for that by land he could not so safely haue come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladin; who with a great armie lay still houering about his besieged citie, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was duke Frederick with his souldiers yet left, safely by sea conducted from TYRE to the campe at PTOLEMAIS, and there joyfully receiued by the king and D the other princes, with the generall applause of the whole campe.

In the meane time the Turks sayling out of the citie of PTOLEMAIS, had done great harme among the Christians, by whom they were not without some losse againe repulsed. But after the comming of duke Frederick and his Germains, it was thought good by the generall consent of all the great commanders in the armie, that the citie should be assaulted round: and to that purpose was euery mans regiment appointed what place to assaile. The king himself with the Tem- Ptolemais assaulted by the Christians.
plars and the Italians from PISA, vndertooke that part of the citie which was toward the sea: vnto duke Frederick and his Germains was allotted all betwixt the bridge ouer the riuer BELE, and the bishops palace: the Venetians, Genowaies, and knights Hospitalers, were appointed vnto the rest of the wall as farre as the court of Raymund: the Frislanders, Flemings, and Hol-E landers, tooke vp all the rest of the wall vnto the sea side. Thus was the citie at once in euerie side assailed by the Christians, with such furie, as if they had thereon purposed to gage their whole forces; seeking by a thousand wounds, and a thousand kinds of death to haue by their scaling ladders, gained the top of the wals; the Turks with no lesse courage still beating them down againe. But in the heat of this so dreadfull and desperat an assault, Saladin still houering aloofe, came now vpon the sudden & assailed the camp of the Christians, filling the same with feare and tumult: whose charge they that were left for the defence of the same, at the first notably receiued, but finding themselues too weake, began to giue ground; by which means the Turks tooke certaine tents with some ensignes, and fired some other of the pauilions of the Christians, hauing slaine somewhat mo than an hundred of the defendants.

F The Christians in the meane time little preuailing in the assault, & troubled with the danger of their campe, retired to the reliefe thereof. But the Turke perceiuing himselfe too weake for the whole power of the Christians, retired also; yet not with such hast, but that he had there almost lost himselfe. This notable assault was giuen the fourteenth of October: after which many light skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks, but more for bootie than for any other great purpose.

In

In the meane time, diuers great princes of the West that had vowed themselues vnto this sa- G cred warre came thither, whose number rather increased the want of victuals than furthered the seruice. At which time also the discord betwixt Guy the king (whose wife and children were now dead) and Conrade marquesse of MONT-FERRAT (who had married Isabell the late queenes sister, by whom he pretended a claime vnto the title of the imaginarie kingdome) did much harme vnto the proceedings of the Christians: So pleasing a thing these haughtie stiles be vnto the loftie minds of the ambitious. Shortly after the Christians yet lying at the siege, the contagion and famine still encreasing, it fortuned that duke Frederick fell sicke of the plague, whereof he died: and with the great mourning of the whole armie, was afterward solemnly buried fast by his father in the cathedrall church at TYRE. After whose death the Christians attempted no H great matter against the citie, although they were oftentimes by the Turkes prouoked, but lay still strongly entrenched, expecting some greater aid from the princes of the West.

Now all the hope of the Christian affaires in SIRIA, and in the land of PALESTINE, rested vpon the comming of the two mightie princes, Philip the second of that name king of FRANCE, and Richard the first king of ENGLAND: who hauing agreed betwixt themselues, with their combined forces to relieue the distressed Christians of the East; and againe (if it were possible) to repaire the broken state of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM, were now met together at MARSEILLES in PROVENCE. From whence the French king first departing with his fleet for CICILIA, and with a prosperous gale for certaine daies holding on his course, & now come nigh vnto the island; was by force of a furious tempest suddenly arising, so tossed and tum- I bled in the deepe, that many of his ships there perished, eaten vp of the sea; others by force of weather driuen vpon the sands and rocks, were there broken all to pieces; and the rest some with their masts broken, some with their tacklings and sailes rent, and all in generall sore weatherbeaten, with much adoe arriued at MESSANA the desired port: at which place king Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arriued with his fleet also. Both the kings now met together, resolued there to winter: the French king enforced by necessitie so to doe, for the repairing of the late losses he had receiued, as well in his people and prouision, as in his shipping; all which was to be relieued by new supplies out of FRANCE: and the king of ENGLAND staying to take order for the dowrie of his sister Ioan (widdow of William the late king of CICILIA) with Tancred the base sonne of Roger, that had now aspired vnto the kingdome of that island. About K which matter great stirs arise betwixt king Richard the queenes brother, and Tancred the new king, in so much that it was like to haue broken out into open warre, had it not to the good contentment of king Richard beene otherwise taken vp, and so the controuersie ended. But whilst these two great kings thus wintred in this fruitfull island, and oftentimes as good friends met together, sometime for their disport, and sometime to confer of their so waightie affaires; the way (as was thought) to haue appeased all former displeasure, and to haue encreased loue: it fell out cleane contrarie, jealousie and distrust, not onely reuiuing the old, but also still raising new quarrels betwixt them, to the great hinderance of the common good by them intended: which may serue for a warning to all great princes, willing to continue in amitie & to hold a good opinion one of another, Neuer to see one the other; or comming so to an interuiew, not to con- L uerse or stay long together: which as it is not often done without the danger of their persons, so can it not possibly be long continued, but that it will engender in themselues as well as in their followers, jealousie, enuie, hatred, and mistrust (as we haue before said) and hereafter in the course of this historie may appeare.

An old grudge betwixt Philip the French king and Richard king of England

There was an old quarrell betwixt these two great kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French kings sister; whom Richard hauing before (his father yet liuing) affianced, had now rejected, as her whom his aged father Henrie the second had too familiarly vsed: and in steed of her, to the great disgrace of the French, espoused the ladie Berengaria, daughter to the king of NAVAR: which indignitie with diuers others, then arising betwixt the French and the English, as then with great heart burning smouldred vp in respect of the common cause then in hand, after- M wards brake out againe, to the shamefull ouerthrow of this most honourable expedition, and lamentable disturbance of both realmes.

Winter past, and the Spring now come, the French king not altogether the best pleased: first loosed from MESSANA, and with his fleet in safetie arriued at PTOLEMAIS, where he was by the Christians, now the third yeere lying at the siege, so joyfully receiued, as if he had beene

A to them ſent with ſuccours from heauen. After whom, ſhortly after followed alſo king Richard; of whoſe fleet (by force of weather ſore beaten & diſperſed) two ſhips by the rage of the tempeſt driuen a ground vpon the coaſt of CYPRUS, were by the iſland people ſpoiled, and the men that in them had hardly eſcaped the danger of the ſea, with moſt barbarous inhumanitie, ſome ſlaine and ſome taken priſoners: the reſt of the fleet arriuing there alſo, were with like inciuilitie forbidden to land; the Cipriots readie at hand in all places to keepe them off. With which ſo great an indignitie the king juſtly mooued, and by force landing his people, with incredible celeritie and ſucceſſe ouerran the whole iſland, neuer ceaſing vntill he had made a full conqueſt thereof, and taken Iſaack Comnenus, commonly called the king of that iſland, and of ſome (for what reaſon I know not) emperour of the Griffons, priſoner: yet was he indeed neither king nor emperour, but
B being a man of great nobilitie and power, and of the honourable ſtocke of the Comneni, had in the troubleſome raigne of Andronicus Comnenus the emperour, his couſin, laid hold vpon that fruitfull iſland, and there tyrannized as a reputed king; vntill that now he was by king Richard taken priſoner, and for his vnfaithfull dealing ſent faſt bound in chaines of ſiluer into SIRIA. The king thus poſſeſſed of the whole iſland, there at LIMOZIN married the ladie Berengaria the king of NAVARS daughter, brought thither by Ioan late queene of CICILIA, the kings ſiſter. And ſo diſpoſing as he thought beſt of all things for the ſafe keeping of the iſland, ſet forward againe with his fleet towards SIRIA. Where by the way he light vpon a great ſhip of the Sultans, laded with victuals & other warlike prouiſions for the reliefe of the beſieged; all which
C became a prey vnto him. So holding on his courſe, hee at length arriued at PTOLEMAIS, where he was by the French king, and the reſt of the Chriſtians there lying, moſt honorably receiued.

King Richard reuengeth the iniurie done vnto his people by the Cipriots.

King Richard arriueth at Ptolemais.

Now had the citie of PTOLEMAIS beene three yeares beſieged by the Chriſtians, and notably defended by the Turks: during which time many an hot aſſault and bloodie skirmiſh had paſſed betwixt them. And now the eies of all men were fixed vpon the two kings of ENGLAND and FRANCE, vnto whom all the reſt offred their obedience and ſeruice. The Chriſtian campe was great, compoſed eſpecially of Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almaines; not them that were left of the emperour Frederick his armie (for they were for the moſt part dead, or elſe returned home againe into their countries) but of ſuch as (mooued with the zeale they bare vnto D this religious war) came dayly in great numbers thither: as did alſo many others of diuers nations, deſirous in ſome meaſure to be partakers of ſo honourable a war.

Theſe religious and venterous Chriſtians thus lying at the ſiege, had with much painefull labour vndermined one of the greateſt towres of the citie, called the Accurſed Towre, with ſome part of the wall alſo, by meanes whereof they were in hope to find a way into the citie. Wherefore all things being now in a readineſſe for the fiering of the mine, it was thought good by generall conſent, that an aſſault ſhould alſo at the ſame time be giuen vnto the citie. And thereupon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wall to aſſaile, which they all with great courage vndertooke. In the heat of which aſſault, the aforeſaid vndermined towre with ſome part of the wall (the timber whereon it ſtaied, now burnt) fell down with a great fall, laying open a
E fair breach for the Chriſtians to enter. Wherwith the Turks diſmaied, forthwith craued to come to parle: which graunted, they for ſafegard of their liues yeelded foorthwith to giue vp the citie, and to reſtore vnto the Chriſtians the Holy Croſſe, with two thouſand captiues, and two hundred horſemen, ſuch as they ſhould require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; beſides 200000 Conſtantinopolitane duckats, to bee by him giuen vnto the two kings, for the coſt by them beſtowed in the ſiege. For payment whereof, the Turkes in the citie were to remaine as hoſtages vnder the ſafe keeping of the Chriſtians, ſo that if all the couenants aforeſaid were not within fortie daies performed by Saladin, they ſhould all for their liues be at the kings mercie. So was this ſtrong citie, after it had been almoſt three yeares beſieged, deliuered vp vnto the Chriſtians the 12 of Iulie, in the yeare 1191. The firſt that entred were the Germanes of Au-
F STRIA, who as if they had been the only men by whoſe valour the citie had been woon, at their firſt entrie preſumptuouſly aduaunced their enſignes vpon the top of the wals, to the great offence of all the reſt of the Chriſtian princes, but eſpecially of king Richard, who not vnworthely for his princely courage commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon, not brooking ſo proud an indignitie, cauſed the enſignes of Leopold their duke, to be puld downe, and foiled vnderfoot; which ſhortly after gaue him occaſion of repentance, as ſhall be hereafter ſeene.

The two kings poſſeſſed of the citie, deuided the ſame, with all the people and ſpoile thereof betwixt them, without regard of the reſt of the other noble Chriſtians, that had ſuſtained the whole trauaile of that long ſiege: for which cauſe moſt part of them, ſeeing themſelues ſo deluded, withdrew themſelues from them, & with one conſent ſent them word, That they would forſake them, except they were made partakers of the gaines, as they had beene of the paines. Which the two kings to content them, promiſed they ſhould. Howbeit, they delayed ſo long their promiſes, that many worthie men, conſtrained by pouertie, departed diſcontented from them into their countries. G

But long it was not, that this one citie, ſo lately gained, could containe theſe two great kings; whom two large kingdomes could not retaine in peace. For albeit that they were in bodie together preſent, and in one, and that a moſt honourable action, combined; yet were they in hearts farre aſunder, and their ſecret deſignes much different: enuie and diſtruſt ſtill reuiuing vnkindnes paſt, and miniſtring new matter of greater diſcontentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more deſirous, than to haue the warre continued, vntill they had made a full conqueſt of SYRIA & the land of PALESTINE; and for that cauſe requeſted the French king to bind himſelfe together with him by ſolemne oath, there to ſtay yet three yeares, for the regaining of thoſe countries. But he in mind long before eſtranged from king Richard, and in his deepe conceit plotting matters neerer home better fitting his purpoſe, would by no meanes bee perſuaded ſo to do; but ſtill found one occaſion or other for to colour his departure. And ſhortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extreamely ſicke, he requeſted king Richard and the other Chriſtian princes to come vnto him: vnto whom being come, he in few words declared his purpoſe of returne, as followeth: H I

I cannot (my lords) longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the aire in this extreame hot ſeaſon. If my death might profit the Chriſtian Religion, or any one of you, or the Chriſtian commonweale; there ſhould be no diſtemperature whatſoeuer, that could ſeperate me from you, or withdraw me from hence. But more may the life of one abſent, ſerue and profit you, than the death of him preſent. I muſt of neceſſitie depart, yet at my departure I will leaue you fiue hundred men at armes, and tenne thouſand footmen, the flower and choice of all the forces of Fraunce, vnder the conduct of my couſin Odo, duke of BVRGVNDIE, vnto whom I will giue pay and intertainement, with a continuall ſupplie of all things for them neceſſarie. K

The French king ſweareth vnto king Richard, in his abſence not to inuade his territories in France.

This excuſe of the French kings, king Richard could not take in good part: but ſaid, That it was apparant to all men, that he abandoned the warres in SYRIA, to returne into FRAVNCE, for no other end or purpoſe, but the more eaſily to inuade the prouinces of GVIEN and NORMANDIE, now diſfurniſhed of their garriſons, and ſo ſubject to his mallice. Which point hee ſo vrged, that the French king could haue no leaue with his honour to depart, vntill ſuch time as he had by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe vnto king Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud againſt him, or any thing of his, vntill fiftie dayes were expired after king Richard his return home. Which how well it was by the French king obſerued, I leaue it to the report of the hyſtories of that time. And ſo the French king, not to be intreated longer to ſtay, leauing behind him the aforeſaid number of men he had promiſed, embarking the reſt of his armie, and accompanied with three tall ſhips of the Genowaies his friends, and Ruffin Volta their admirall, departed from PTOLEMAIS to TYRE, the firſt of Auguſt; and two daies after, looſing thence alongſt the coaſt of ASIA, and cutting through the Mediteranean, atriued at length in the mouth of the riuer of TYBER, and from thence went to ROME: where after he had viſited Pope Celeſtine, and the famous places of that moſt renowned citie, he returned againe to his fleet, and ſo by ſea arriued in ſafetie in FRAUNCE; hauing in that great expedition, ſo honourably by him intertained, performed nothing anſwerable to that the world looked for. L

After the French king, followed Leopold duke of AUSTRIA, with his Germans: and not long after him, the Venetians alſo, with them of PISA and GENUA. Of whoſe departure Saladin vnderſtanding, and that the Chriſtian forces were thereby much empaired, refuſed either to pay the money, or to reſtore the priſoners, as was promiſed at the giuing vp of PTOLEMAIS: threatning moreouer to chop off the heads of all ſuch Chriſtian captiues as he had in his power, if the king ſhould ſhew any extremitie vnto the pledges of the citie. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortly after he ſent his M

A embaſſadours with great preſents vnto the king, requeſting a longer time for the ſparing of his pledges; which his requeſt, together with his gifts, the king refuſed to graunt or accept. Whereupon Saladin foorthwith cauſed ſuch Chriſtian captiues as were in his power, to bee beheaded: which albeit king Richard vnderſtood, yet would hee not preuent the time before agreed vpon for the execution of his priſoners, being the 20 day of Auguſt: vpon which day hee cauſed the Turks priſoners, to the number of 2500 (or as the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the ſight of Saladines armie to be executed.

The loſſe of the ſtrong towne of PTOLEMAIS, much empaired the reputation of Saladin, euen among his owne people; as it commonly falleth out, that the euill ſucceſſe of a great commander in his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, and opinion, eſpecially of the vulgar ſort,
B which judge of all things by the euent. And albeit that his loſſes were great, and ſuch as much daunted him: yet he thought it beſt, as the caſe then ſtood, to make them greater, and with his owne hands (as it were) to ruinate and ouerthrow ſuch townes and cities as he ſaw hee could not keepe, rather than to ſuffer them whole and vndefaced to fall into the enemies hand. So carried headlong with deſpaire, he cauſed all the townes he had alongſt the ſea coaſt in SYRIA and PALESTINE, to be ſacked and ruinated, and their wals ouethrowne; eſpecially ſuch as were of moſt importance, and like to ſtand the Chriſtians in ſtead, namely PORPHIRIA, CESAREA, IOPPA, ASCALON, GAZA, and ELAM, with diuers other caſtles and citadels in the countries thereabouts; moſt part whereof were againe by king Richard and the Templars fortified and repeopled, although Saladin in the meane time did what he might to haue letted the ſame.

C Nothing more hindred the good proceeding of the Chriſtian princes, in this, and other their moſt honourable expeditions againſt the Infidels, than the diſcord among themſelues; one ſtill enuying at anothers honour, and euery one jealous of his owne. Great ſtrife and heart burning there had beene betweene the two kings of FRAVNCE and ENGLAND, during the time they were together in this ſacred expedition, to the great hinderance of the ſame: No leſſe contention had there ben betwixt Guy the late king of HIERUSALEM, and Conrade marques of MONTFERRAT, about the title of that loſt kingdome: whereby the whole power of the Chriſtians in SIRIA was deuided into two factions. Richard king of ENGLAND, Baldwin earle of FLAUNDERS, Henrie earle of CHAMPAINE, the knights Hoſpitalers of Saint Iohn, the Venetians and Piſans, taking part with Guy: And Philip the french king, Odo duke of BURGUNDIE, Ro-
D dolph earle of CLAREMONT, the Templers, the Genowayes, the Lantgraue of THURIN, Leopold duke of AVSTRIA, and Robert countie of NASSAU, taking part with Conrade the marques. But Conrade ſhortly after the taking of PTOLOMAIS being ſlaine, by two of the deſperate Aſſaſsins, or (as ſome others ſay) by two deſperate ruffians (ſuborned thereunto by the prince of TORONE, in reuenge of the diſpite done vnto him by the ſaid marques, by taking from him Iſabell his eſpouſed wife) as he was walking in his citie of TYRE and doubting no ſuch treaſon: king Richard ſeeing now a fit occaſion offered for the vtter extinguiſhing of that claime, and how to intitle himſelfe vnto that kingdome; perſuaded the aforeſaid Iſabell (the widdow of the late Marques, and in whoſe right hee had laied claime vnto the kingdome) to relinquiſh that ſo troubleſome a title, and to take to her husband Henry earle of CHAMPAINE, his nephew,
E vnto whom he gaue the citie of TYRE: Guy the king exclaiming to the contrarie, as of a wrong done vnto himſelfe. Shortly after he began alſo to temper with Guy, perſuading him to reſigne vnto him that little right and intereſt hee had in the kingdome of HIERUSALEM, and in lieu thereof to receiue at his hands the kingdome of CIPRUS. Which his offer the poore king was glad to accept. By which exchange Guy became king of CIPRUS: and Richard, king of HIERUSALEM; which honorable title he afterwards, as ſome report, vſed in his ſtile, as did ſome others his ſucceſſors the kings of ENGLAND after him. So Guy with all his wealth paſsing ouer into CIPRUS, took poſſeſsion of the kingdome, where he long liued not. Neuertheleſſe, that pleaſant kingdome continued in his familie of the Luſignans, by the ſpace of about 283 yeares afterwards:
F vntill that at length that familie failing in the poſthumus ſonne of Iames the baſtard, laſt king of that Iſland, it fell into the hands of the Venetians: by whom it was holden as a part of their ſeignorie almoſt an hundred yeares, vntill that it was in our freſh remembrance again from them taken by Selymus the ſecond, great emperour of the Turks, in the yeare 1571, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall in due place (God willing) be declared.

Now was king Richard, for the increaſe of his honour, more deſirous than before of the citie of of HIERUSALEM, as the moſt precious and honourable prize of all that religious warre. And G thereupon with all the power of the Chriſtians then at his command, ſet forward from PTO-LEMAIS, and was come on his way as farre as ARSUA, a towne ſituate betwixt CÆSAREA and IOPPE. In the vauward was king Richard himſelfe, with the Engliſhmen: after whom followed Odo, duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his French: and in the rereward Iaques de Auenes, with the Flemmings, Brabanders, and Wallons, who after the death of their countie Philip at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS, had put themſelues all vnder his regiment. Saladin with a great armie ſtill at hand, and as it were attending vpon them, firſt with certaine ambuſcadoes charged the rereward, and ſo afterward came on with his whole power: vpon whom Iaques turning himſelfe, with his Flemmings, receiued the charge with great aſſurance, and ſo long themſelues endured H the ſame, vntill the French came in to their ſuccours, and after them the Engliſh alſo. There was fought a notable battell, and great valour ſhewed both on the one ſide and the other, but eſpe-cially by them of the Turkes part; who knew well the purpoſe of the Chriſtians for the beſie-ging of HIERUSALEM, and that thereon depended their onely hope, and that hee that could hold the ſame, might almoſt aſſure himſelfe to carrie away the glorie of that warre. The French and Engliſh in that battell honorably ſtroue who might ſhew the greateſt valour: neither would the Low countrey men vnder Iaques their generall, ſeeme to bee any thing behind them. This ſharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going downe of the Sunne. King Richard (as ſome write) was there wounded with an arrow; and Iaques valiantly there fighting, was ſlaine, hauing ſold his life deere, to the great admiration of the infidels, and dying left the vi- I ctorie vnto the Chriſtians. It is reported, that in this battell were ſlaine moe Turks and Saraſins than in any one battell within the memorie of man before: of the Chriſtians were not loſt any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforeſaid Iaques, the valiant generall of the Flemmings,

A notable battel fought betwixt king Richard & Saladin.

The next day the Chriſtians remooued to BETHLEM, a towne about the mid way betwixt IOPPE and HIERUSALEM. But Winter now comming faſt on, and want of victuals like ynough to increaſe, the king changing his mind for the ſiege, returned with the greateſt part of the armie to ASCALON, which he that Winter new fortefied, the wals thereof being before by Saladin in his deſpaire demoliſhed: the duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his Frenchmen, all that while quietly wintering at TYRE. In the meane time, the power of the Chriſtians was that K Winter greatly deminiſhed, ſome one way departing from the campe, and ſome another: The Italians for the moſt part, with them of PISA (who in theſe three yeares warres had ſtriuen with the Venetians for the honour of their ſeruice) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themſelues alſo. Neuertheleſſe, Winter now paſt, and the Spring time come, king Richard took the field againe, and came to BETHLEM: where by the way hee met with an exceeding great number of cammels, charged with great ſtore of victuals and munition, ſent by Saladin out of ÆGYPT to HIERUSALEM, all which he tooke. But purpoſing to haue gone on to the ſiege of HIERUSALEM, he was by the backwardneſſe of the French glad to change his purpoſe, and to returne to PTOLEMAIS: for the Frenchmen, perſuaded by the duke their generall (who well knew the French kings mind) That if any thing woorth remembrance were done, it was to bee L done by them, and that the glorie thereof ſhould wholly redound vnto the king of ENGLAND, as there in perſon preſent, and to his Engliſhmen; ſhewed themſelues ſo vnwilling to the ſiege, as that therin was nothing done; to the great griefe of that worthy prince. At which time alſo news was brought vnto king Richard, How that Philip the French king (forgetfull of his ſolemne promiſe made before his departure out of SYRIA) had now inuaded the country of NORMANDIE, and excited earle Iohn (the kings brother, a man of an hautie & aſpiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdome of ENGLAND in his abſence: as had before in like caſe William the yonger brother ſerued duke Robert his elder brother, then abſent at his father the Conquerours death, in the firſt ſacred expedition vnder Godfrey of BVILLON. Wherfore king Richard, beſide the preſent difficulties, fearing leaſt while he was ſo far off in wars for defence of the Chriſtian commonweale, he M might loſe his kingdome at home; thought it beſt to grow to ſome good end with Saladin, and ſo to make his returne. But the politicke and watie Sultan, not ignorant of the diſcord of the Chriſti-ans, and that their forces daily decaied in SYRIA; either of the troubled eſtate of the kings affairs at home in his kingdome, or of his deſire to returne; would not hearken to any other conditions of peace, but ſuch as might both for the preſent, weaken the forces of the Chriſtians in SIRIA, and King Richard purpoſing to haue beſieged Hieruſalem, is by the backwardnes of the French enforced to retire.

diſcourage

A discourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, whē they should see that for naught they should trauell to conquer that, which in the end they must of necessitie restore againe. The conditions he offered, were, That the Christians should foorthwith restore whatsoeuer they had woon in those three years wars, PTOLEMAIS only excepted; and that from thenceforth for the space of fiue yeares the Turks should not in any thing molest the Christians, but to suffer them in peace to liue by them: which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the king was glad to accept, and so concluded a peace. Wherby the labor and trauell of the two great kings, and so many nations with them, were all become frustrat and vaine; hauing now to no purpose lost their men, their money, their time, their hope, their blood, their long trauell, to gaine that they must now in one houre forgo; nothing more left vnto the poore Christians in SYRIA, than
B the cities of ANTIOCH, TYRE, and PTOLEMAIS.

This done, king Richard leauing the affaires of ASIA vnto the charge of Henrie countie of CHAMPAGNE his nephew, shipping the greatest part of his people, with his wife Berengaria, first for SICILIA and from thence for ENGLAND, where they in safetie at length arriued, followed shortly after with some few himselfe, where by the way by extremitie of weather, he was in the Adriatique driuen to land vpon the coast of HISTRIA: where trauelling with a small retinue homewards in the habit of a Templar, he was discouered and taken prisoner by Leopold duke of AVSTRIA, whom he had before disgraced at the winning of PTOLEMAIS (as is before declared:) who now glad to haue him in his power, made prize of him, and sold him to Henrie the emperor, for fortie thousand pounds, by whom he was kept prisoner by the space of a yeare and C three months, and then ransomed for the summe of an hundred and fiftie thousand pounds.

King Richard returning out of the Holy land taken prisoner by Leopold duke of Austria.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greatest terrour of the Christians: who mindfull of mans fragilitie and the vanitie of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his death no solemnitie to be vsed at his buriall, but onely his shirt in manner of an ensigne, made fast vnto the point of a launce to be carried before his dead bodie as an ensigne, a plaine priest going before, and crying aloud vnto the people in this sort: Saladin Conquerour of the East, of all the greatnesse and riches hee had in his life, carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his shirt. A sight woorthie so great a king, as wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, more than the true knowledge of his saluation in Christ Iesu. He raigned about sixteene yeares with great honour, and dying, left nine sonnes, which were all murthered by Saphradin
D their vncle, excepting one called also Saphradin Sultan of ALEPPO, who by the fauour and support of his fathers good friends, saued himselfe from the treacherous practises of his vncle. Of this Saphradin the vncle, discended Meledin Sultan of ÆGYPT, and Coradin Sultan of DAMASCO and HIERUSALEM: Saladin his great kingdome being by them now againe rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in short time bruited abroad, with the discord amongst the Turks and Sarasins, about his dominions; put Celestinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the citie of HIERUSALEM might in that change and hurle, be easily againe recouered, and that kingdome established. But when hee had in vaine dealt to that purpose with the kings of FRANCE and ENGLAND (then altogether busied in their wars the one against the other) he perswaded Henrie the
E sixt, then emperor, to take the matter in hand: who (for that he well could not, or else would not himselfe in person vndertake that long expedition) sent Henrie duke of SAXONIE his lieutenant with a great armie into ASIA: vnto whom were joyned two Legats, Conradus Archbishop of MOGUNSIA another of the electours, and Conradus the bishop of HERBIPOLIS. At which time also many other great princes tooke vpon them that holy war, namely, Herman Lantgraue of THURIN, Henrie Palatine of RHENE, Henrie duke of BRABANT, Conrad marques of MORAVIA, Frederick duke of AUSTRIA, and Albertus Hapspurgensis, with some others: vnto whom also joyned themselues the bishops of BREME, HALBERSTAT, and F RATISBON, with diuers other great prelates. Who hauing passed through HUNGARIE and THRACIA, and by the Greeke emperour Alexius Angelus relieued with all things necessarie, were by the Græcian ships transported vnto ANTIOCH, and so by land came to TYRE, and from thence to PTOLEMAIS, with purpose to haue gone to relieue the Germains besieged in IOPPE; who before their comming were all by treason slaine and the citie rased, wherefore being come to the ruins thereof, they departed thence to SIDON, which they found also abandoned by the Turks. After that they tooke BERITHUS, which citie they fortified, and so went to beſiege TORONE; which citie when they had brought vnto the extremitie as that it muſt needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or bee taken, the Turkes came on ſo faſt to the reliefe therof, that the Chriſtians were glad to raiſe their ſiege and to be gone: which they in garriſon at BERITHUS perceiuing,& ſeeing the enemie to approch them,they abandoned the citie,and joyning themſelues vnto the reſt of the armie marched all together to IOPPE, a little before ruinated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemie comming to BERITHUS, and finding it forſaken raſed it downe to the ground,and ſo in few moneths ſpace was BERITHUS both repaired and raſed in the yeere 1197.

The Turks ouerthrown by the Chriſtians.

But whileſt the Chriſtians were repairing the citie of IOPPE, the Turks proud of that they had done at BERITHUS, came now to diſturbe alſo the fortifying of that place. Of whoſe comming the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, remooued by night about fiue miles from the citie, of purpoſe to draw the Turks vnto a conuenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to haue beene fled for feare, ſent part of their armie to aſſaile the citie: and with the other followed after them diſorderedly, as if it had beene after men they had had in chace. Vpon whom the Chriſtians turning, had with them at the firſt a ſharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight: in which conflict certaine thouſands of the Turks fell; of whom the Chriſtians taking the ſpoile, and hauing put the reſt to flight, returned againe vnto the fortifying of the citie. But the joy of this victorie was by the ſudden death of two of the greateſt princes in the armie,greatly diminiſhed: for the duke of SAXONIE hauing in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a woorthie generall and valiant ſouldier,had ouer heated himſelfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold,died of a feauer the fourth day after. The duke of AUSTRIA mortally wounded in the battell,died alſo the night following.

Ioppe repaired by the Chriſtians

About this time,or not long after,died Celeſtinus the pope,author of this expedition;and Henrie alſo the Germaine emperour: after whoſe death great troubles began to ariſe in GERMANIE about the chuſing of a new emperour. Whereof the biſhop of MOGUNSIA, then chiefe commander of the armie of the Chriſtians in SIRIA, one of the electors, and the other Germaine princes with him hauing intelligence, could not by any perſuaſion or praiers of the poore Chriſtians (in whoſe quarrell they were come) bee perſuaded longer to ſtay, but that needs home they would,& indeed home they went the ſame way that they came. After whoſe departure the Turks tooke IOPPE,hauing one of the ports betraied vnto them by one of the citie,at ſuch time as the Germains there in garriſon,after the manner of their countrey, vpon S.Martins day were careleſly making merrie together in their pots: vpon whom,ſo ſurcharged with wine,the Turks entring by the port giuen vnto them, put them all with the reſt of the Chriſtians to the ſword, and ſo afterward raſed the citie downe to the ground. Of which victorie they became ſo proud, that they had thought without ſtop to haue driuen the Chriſtians quite out of SIRIA: but by the comming of Simon countie of MONT-FORT (a moſt valiant and expert captaine ſent thither by Philip the French king with a regiment of tall ſoldiers, at the inſtance of Innocentius Tertius that ſucceeded Celeſtinus in the papacie) and by ciuill diſcord then raigning among the Turks themſelues for ſoueraigntie, their furie was repreſſed, and a peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians concluded for the ſpace of ten yeares; during which time the Turks promiſed not to moleſt the Chriſtians in TYRE or PTOLEMAIS: which hapned in the yeare 1199 (or as ſome others ſay 1198.) After which peace ſo concluded,the woorthie countie returned again with his ſouldiers into FRANCE: with whom we alſo will repaire into the leſſer ASIA (whither the courſe both of the time and of the hiſtorie now calleth vs) to ſee the other greater affaires of the Turks in thoſe Eaſtern countries; leauing for a ſeaſon theſe poore remainders of ſo many Chriſtians in TYRE and PTOLEMAIS, now for a while in peace,but to be ere long deuoured of the infidels their enemies, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall in due time and place appeare.

The Germaine princes returne home.

The

The ruine of the Turks first Empire in Persia: with the succesſe of their ſecond kingdome in the leſſer Asia vnder the Aladin Kings.

Kingdomes after the manner of other things haue but their time to flouriſh in, and ſo againe decay.

AS no kingdome or Empire vpon earth (were it neuer ſo flouriſhing or great) was euer yet ſo aſſured, but that in the reuolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ſicke bodie been ſubject vnto many ſtrange innouations and changes, and at length come to nothing: ſo fared it now with the Turkiſh empire, which firſt planted by Tangrolipix in PERSIA and the other far Eaſterne countries, increaſed by Axan his ſonne, and ſo by the Turkiſh Sultans their ſucceſſors (although their names and doings, as too farre off, be not vnto vs all knowne) for the ſpace of one hundred and ſeuentie yeareas continued, muſt now (I ſay) giue place vnto a greater power, and ſettle it ſelfe elſewhere, the ineuitable deſtinie thereof ſo requiring. It fortuned that about this time (when in the ſpace of a few yeares ſuch mutations as had not before of long beene ſeene, chanced in diuers great monarchies and ſtates) that the Tartars or rather Tattars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare countries in the North ſide of ASIA (of all others a moſt barbarous, fierce, and needie nation) ſtirred vp by their owne wants, and the perſuaſion of one Zingis (or as ſome call him, Cangis) holden amongſt them for a great prophet, and now by them made their leader, and honoured with the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to ſay, the Mightie king (commonly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the ſand of the ſea; and conquering firſt their poore neighbours of condition and qualitie like themſelues, and eaſie enough to bee entreated with them to ſeeke their better fortune, like ſwarms of graſhoppers ſent out to deuour the world: paſſed the high mountaine CAUCASUS, part of the mountaine TAURUS of all the mountaines in the world the greateſt, which beginning neere vnto the ARCHIPELAGO, and ending vpon the orientall OCEAN, and running through many great and famous kingdomes diuideth ASIA into two parts: ouer which great mountaine, one of the moſt aſſured bounders of nature, that had ſo many worlds of yeares ſhut vp this rough and ſauage people, they now paſsing without number, and comming downe (as it were) into an other world, full of ſuch natures pleaſant delights as neuer were to them before ſeene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing being now able to ſtand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate leader dead in this ſo great an expedition, Hoccata his ſonne, eldeſt of his twelue brethren, a man of great wiſedome and courage, tooke vpon him his fathers place: who ſending part of his great armie for the ſubduing of the countries Weſtward, turned himſelfe with a world of people towards the Eaſt: where hauing ſubdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with diuers others he entred into INDIA, and ſubduing that rich countrey on both ſides the riuer INDUS, euen to the Eaſt OCEAN, there in the countrey of CATHAI built the famous citie of CAMBALU, in circuit eight and twentie miles about; for pleaſure and plentie of all things neceſſarie for the life of man, of all the cities of ASIA the chiefe: where the great Cham of TARTARIE ſtill reſiant as in his emperiall citie, commaundeth ouer one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt empires of the world. In whoſe kingdome alſo, in the prouince of MANGY more towards the Eaſt, hee hath another moſt famous citie called QUINSAY, of all the cities in the world the greateſt, in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himſelfe dwelt therein about the yeare 1260. It is ſituate in a lake of freſh water, and hath in it twelue thouſand bridges: of which, ſome are of ſuch an heigth that tall ſhips with their ſailes vp may eaſily paſſe vnder them. In this populous citie the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof, alwaies thirtie thouſand men in garriſon. The Tartar kingdome thus planted in CAMBALU, Hoccata contenting

ting himſelfe with the rich pleaſures of INDIA, afterward mannaged his wars by his lieutenants, G being for the moſt part his brethren, or other his nigh kinſmen; of whom hee ſent out with his armies ſome Northward, ſome Weſtward, and ſome toward the South: by whom he ſubdued the Arachoſians, Margians, and diuers other great nations, & entring into PERSIA, ſubdued the
The Turks driuē out of Perſia by the Tartars. countrey, with all PARTHIA, ASSYRIA, MESOPOTAMIA, & MEDIA. At this time in the citie BALCH or BELCH, in the countrey of CHORASAN in the fartheſt part of PERSIA, raigned ouer the Turks one Curſumes, of the Greekes called Corſantes; who finding himſelfe far too weake to ſtand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leauing vnto them both the citie and the countrey, which he and the Turks his predeceſſours had euer ſince the time of Tangrolipix poſſeſſed: which citie the Tartars raſed and tooke the countrey to themſelues. In this gene- H rall flight of the Turks, when as euery man was glad to make what ſhift he might for himſelfe, Curſumes their Sultan died, the laſt of the kings of the Selzuccian family that raigned ouer the Turks in PERSIA: whoſe ſonne Vgnan Chan taking vpon him the leading of ſuch multitudes of Turks as followed his father, ceized vpon the great citie of BABYLON, now called BAGADAT, neere vnto the ruines of the old BABYLON: where hauing put to the ſword all the inhabitants thereof, he there, and in the countrey thereabout ſeated himſelfe with the Turks his followers: but long he had not there reſted, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, purſued him, tooke him priſoner, & expulſed thēce all his people. There was at the ſame time alſo another kingdom of the Turks at NACHAN a citie in PERSIA, giuing name vnto the countrey wherein it ſtood, not farre from CHORASAN: wherein then raigned one Solyman of the Oguzian family, as had I diuers other of his progenitors before him, who terrified with this dreadfull ſtorme ſo ſuddenly riſen out of the North, and warned by the ſudden fall of the Selzuccian Sultan & his kingdome, of farre greater fame and power than himſelfe or his, fled alſo with ſuch his ſubjects as would follow him into the leſſer ASIA. But of him and his proceedings more ſhall bee ſaid hereafter in the riſing of the victorious Othoman family, as lineally from him diſcended. After this the Tartars together with their good fortune ſtill extending the bounds of their empire, conquered ARMENIA the greater, with the countries of CHOLCHIS and IBERIA: ſo that now their empire was become of all others the greateſt and moſt flouriſhing. This great conquerour (the Tartar) had in his proud conceit purpoſed to haue ſubdued all ASIA, and to haue made the ſea the onely bounder of his empire: but ouercome with the delicacies of INDIA, hauing diuided a- K mongſt his people thoſe great prouinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities and pleaſant fields, he ſo reſted, embracing the maners and ſuperſtition of the people he had ouercome. Long it were and farre from our purpoſe to recount all the famous victories and conqueſt of this bare Northren people; ſufficeth it to the hiſtorie we haue in hand, that the Turks were by them then driuen out of PERSIA, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togran kingdome (as they call it) firſt founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguiſhed, about the yeare of our Lord 1202. The 1202 Turkes thus driuen out of PERSIA and their kingdome ouerthrown, retired themſelues into the leſſer ASIA, poſſeſſed by the Turkes their countreymen, long before brought thither by
The beginning of the Aladinian kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, at Sebaſtia and Iconium. Cutlu-Muſes and his ſonnes (as is before declared) and by them euer ſince in ſome part, though with diuers fortune, holden. Where theſe Turkes now arriuing out of PERSIA vnder the lea- L ding of Aladin, the ſonne of Kei Huſreu, diſcended alſo of the Selzuccian family in PERSIA, and taking the opportunitie offred them by the mortall diſcord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greeks among themſelues, ceized vpon CILICIA with the countries thereabouts, and there firſt at SEBASTIA, and afterward at ICONIUM, erected their new kingdome; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the kingdome of the Aladin kings, although their names were not all ſo.

Now about this time, and within the courſe of ſome few yeares after, ſuch great and ſtrange mutations happened in the Conſtantinopolitane empire, as had not therein at any time before beene ſeene: whereby the whole eſtate of that great empire which ſometime commanded ouer a great part of the world, was almoſt vtterly ſubuerted, and a fit opportunitie giuen vnto the M
Turks and infidels for the ſure ſetling of themſelues, and eſtabliſhing of their kingdomes both in SYRIA and the leſſer ASIA: which briefly to run thorow ſhall not be from our purpoſe; their affaires proſpering by theſe troubles, and their proud and ſtately empire that now braueth all the reſt of the world, being raiſed out of the ruines of that Chriſtian empire; and at this preſent triumphing euen in the ſame imperiall citie wherein theſe ſo great innouations hapned through

A the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and deſtruction of a great part of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Alexius the vſurper, but now emperour, not contented (as is before declared) traiterouſly to haue depriued Iſaack his elder brother of his empire and ſight together: ſought alſo after the life of the young prince Alexius, his brothers ſonne, and heire apparent of the empire: who ſeeing the villanie committed in the perſon of his father, ſaued himſelfe by flight from the furie of his vncle, and ſo accompanied with certaine great lords of the Greekes, his fathers friends, fled to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, whom the Grecians commonly call the Latins. And firſt he tooke his way to Philip the Germane emperour, who had married Irene his ſiſter, B the emperour Iſaack his daughter, by whom he was moſt honourably receiued and entertained. This great ladie, not a little mooued with the miſerie of her father, and the flight of her brother, ceaſed not moſt inſtantly to ſolicite the emperour her husband, not to leaue vnreuenged ſo great a villanie, by the example thereof, dangerous vnto himſelfe and others of like majeſtie and ſtate. She declared vnto him, what an execrable indignitie it was, to ſee her father the emperor vnworthely impriſoned, depriued of his empire, and ſight, and of the ſocietie of men, by his brother, that had by him receiued and recouered his life, his light, and his libertie: and to ſee the heire apparent of the empire baniſhed by the wickedneſſe of his vncle, to wander vp and downe here and there like a beggar: a great part of which diſgrace, as ſhee ſaid, redounded vnto her ſelfe, the daughter of Iſaack, and ſiſter to the young wandering prince, and to himſelfe alſo the ſonne in law vnto the C vnfortunat emperour her father. Moreouer ſhe ſaid, that the murderer Alexius durſt neuer haue been ſo hardie as to commit ſo great and deteſtable a villanie, if he had not lightly regarded and contemned the majeſtie of the ſaid Philip; whom if he had had in any reuerence or honour, or at all feared, he durſt not haue attempted ſo villanous an act. This Greeke ladie, mooued with juſt griefe, with theſe and ſuch like complaints ſo preuailed with her husband, that he promiſed her to be in ſome part thereof reuenged, which he could not for the preſent performe, letted by the wars he then had with Otho his competitour of the empire. At the ſame time it fortuned, that great preparations were in making in FRAUNCE and ITALIE, and diuers other places of Chriſtendome, for an expedition to be made againſt the Turks into the Holy land. The chiefe men wherein, were Theobald countie of CHAMPAGNE (a man of great fame, and generall of the Chriſtian D armie) Boniface marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, Baldwin earle of FLANDERS and HENAULT, and Henrie his brother earle of S. Paul, Henrie duke of LOVAINE, Gualter earle of BREAME, with diuers other noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious; vnto whom reſorted alſo many valiant and deuout Chriſtians out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome, ready to haue ſpent their liues in that ſo religious a war: ſo that now the number of them was great, and the armie right populous. But being thus aſſembled together, they thought it not beſt to take their way to CONSTANTINOPLE, through HUNGARIE and THRACE, and ſo to paſſe ouer into BITHINIA; for that the Greeks had ſtill in all former times ſhewed great vncourteſie vnto the Latins, in paſsing with their armies that way: and therfore they thought it much better now, by the way of ITALIE to take their journey by ſea into the Holy land; and for their tranſportation, eſpecially to vſe the helpe of E the Venetians, whom they found much the eaſier to be intreated, for that by the means of ſo great an armie, they were in hope to ſcoure the Adriaticke (then much infeſted by the Dalmatians) as alſo to recouer IADERA, with ſome other cities vpon the coaſt of SCLAVONIA, before reuolted from their ſtate to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this armie was marching out of FRANCE, and come into PIEMONT, the noble countie of CHAMPAGNE, generall thereof, there fell ſick and died, to the exceeding griefe & ſorrow of the whole armie: in whoſe ſtead, the marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, a man of great nobilitie, and well acquainted with the wars of the Eaſt, was choſen generall. This great armie, tranſported by the Venetians into SCLAVONIA, took IADERA, with diuers other port townes along the ſea coaſt, and hauing there done what the Venetians moſt deſired, was about again to haue ben embarked for SYRIA, and ſo into F the holy land. But the yong prince Alexius in the meane time had by himſelfe and the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) ſo wrought the matter with the Latine princes of the Weſt, eſpecially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the emperour his brother in law, and Philip the French king, that they pittying his eſtate, & induced alſo with ſome other conſiderations more proper vnto themſelues, took him as it were into their protection, commending by letters & meſſengers for that purpoſe ſent vnto the armie (which they might cõmand) the defence both of himſelfe and his cauſe: who with the commendation of three ſo great princes, comming to the armie yet lying at IADERA (expecting but a faire wind for to haue paſſed into SYRIA) was there of them all moſt honorably receiued, as the ſonne of an emperour, and as became one vnto them ſo highly commended. And he himſelfe alſo, as one that knew his good, was not in any thing wanting vnto himſelfe, but recommended himſelfe to their protection, as a poore exiled prince in diſtreſſe, yet of a good and liuely ſpirit, gracious in ſpeech, beautifull to behold, and very yong; and withall, fully inſtructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might ſerue to further his purpoſe. And foraſmuch as this great armie was compoſed of diuers nations, eſpecially of the French, Italians, and Venetians, not all to be by one meane moued, he fitted euery one of them with ſuch motiues as hee thought might moſt preuaile with them: Vnto the French he promiſed to pay the great ſummes of mony they had borrowed of the Venetians, for the furniſhing of themſelues in this war: Vnto the Venetians he promiſed to recompence thē for all the injuries they had ſuſtained by the late Conſtantinopolitan emperors, eſpecially by the emperor Emanuell (who for that they had refuſed to aid him in his wars againſt William king of SICILIE, did in one day confiſcat all the goods of the Venetian marchants within his empire, of a wonderfull value: & afterwards contrarie to the law of nations, ſhamefully intreated their embaſſadors ſent vnto him, amongſt whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune generall for the Venetians in the armie: who moued as well with the wrong in particular done vnto himſelfe, as with the common, deſired to be reuenged both of the one and of the other; which although he could not haue of Emanuell himſelfe, being long before dead, yet was he ſtill deſirous to haue it of ſome one of the Greeke emperours, whoſoeuer he were:) Vnto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the noblemen with him, had before promiſed, That the Greeke Church ſhould for euer acknowledge the ſupremacie of the church of ROME, and from thenceforth ſubmit it ſelfe therunto, as vnto the ſoueraigne judge of all the churches of Chriſtendome: which cauſed the Pope Innocentius by letters, by legates, by embaſſadours, and by all other meanes poſſible, to further the cauſe of the yong prince Alexius, ſo combined with his owne: alleadging the diuerſitie of opinions in matters of religion, betwixt the Greekes and the Latines, to haue been the chiefe cauſe that the Mahometanes had not been long agoe by their vnited forces ſubdued, or vtterly rooted out. In briefe, the young prince ſpared not to promiſe moſt bountifull rewards in generall to all that ſhould take his part againſt his vncle the vſurping emperour.

By this meanes, the deuout warre, taken in hand for the reliefe of the poore Chriſtians in SYRIA, was laid aſide, and the ſame forces that ſhould haue beene therein employed, now conuerted againſt the Greeke empire, to the great weakening of that ſide of the Chriſtian commonweale, and aduantage of the common enemie; who might then eaſily haue beene oppreſſed, had he with the vnited forces of the Chriſtians been on this ſide charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian warre thus reſolued vpon, it ſeemed beſt vnto the great commanders of the armie, to march directly to CONSTANTINOPLE, as to the head of the Grecian ſtate, and place where the tyrant whom they ſought after, was reſiant. In the mean time it was by them giuen out through all the Greeke cities which the emperour had ſtrongly manned and fortefied for the ſtaying of their paſſage, that their purpoſe was not to make warre againſt the Grecians their friends, but onely to reſtore their lawfull emperour vnto his former ſtate and honour: And that foraſmuch as euery citie and towne in ancient GREECE had appointed rewards, and almoſt diuine honors vnto ſuch as had deliuered them from tyrants, they ſhould now more fauourably receiue and intreat them that came to reſtore vnto euery citie, and to euery man in generall, their former libertie and honour. And ſo vpon the reſolution for CONSTANTINOPLE, embarking their armie, and paſsing through the Ionian ſea into the Ægeum, and ſo without let through the ſtraights of Heleſpontus into Propontis, and entring the ſtraits of Boſphorus Thracius, which deuide EUROPE from ASIA, they came to an anker euen in the face of the citie. In this fleet were two hundred and fortie ſaile of tall ſhips, ſixtie gallies, ſeuentie ſhips for burden, and one hundred and twentie ſaile of victualers: which all together made a moſt braue ſhew, couering that ſtrait in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed rather a wood than a part of the ſea. Thus for a ſpace they lay facing the citie, attending if happily vpon the comming and ſight of ſo great a fleet, and the report of ſo puiſſant an armie as the yong prince Alexius had brought with him, any tumult or ſedition might ariſe in the citie. But the warie tyrant had ſo well prouided therefore beforehand, that the citizens although they in heart fauoured the young prince, and wiſhed him

A great fleet of the Latines before Conſtantinople.

A him well,yet durſt they not once moue or ſtirre in his quarrell. Whileſt the fleet thus lay, embaſſadours came from the iſle of CRETE, in two great gallies,with three banks of oares,yeelding vnto the yong prince that goodly iſland,with all the townes and cities therein: which he foorthwith gaue vnto the marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, generall of the armie,thereby to encourage the other great commanders of the armie to do the vttermoſt of their deuoire,in hope of recompence and rewards anſwerable to their deſerts and valour.

Before the arriuall of this fleet, Alexius the emperour had with a great chaine made faſt the entrance of the hauen betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, and appointed twentie great gallies well manned for the keeping thereof: but a great gale of wind ariſing, the generall ſent
B out the greateſt and ſtrongeſt ſhip in the fleet (of her greatneſſe and ſwiftneſſe called the Eagle) which with all her ſailes vp,carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chain,and made a way for the reſt of the fleet to enter; which the Greekes in the gallies ſeeing, for feare fled,leauing the gallies for a ſpoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The hauen thus gained,Theodorus Laſcaris the emperours ſonne in law,was preſently readie vpon the ſhore with a ſelect companie of the braueſt gallants of the citie and of the court,to haue hindered the Latines from landing;who running their ſhips a ground, landed with ſuch cheerefulneſſe and courage,and with ſuch haſt, that in one moment you might haue ſeene them leape out of their ſhips,take land, enter into the battell,and lay about them like mad men. This hote skirmiſh endured a great while,for that they were onely footmen that ſuſtained
C this brunt,for the horſes could not ſo ſoone be landed, and the Greekes were brauely mounted. All this great fight the Conſtantinopolitanes beheld, with doubtfull hearts expecting what ſhould bee the euent thereof. There were in the citie ſixtie thouſand of the flower of Greece, which brauely ſallying out,made the battell much more doubtfull; yet ſuch was the valour and reſolution of the Latines,that in fine the Greekes diſcomfited,were glad to retire themſelues againe into the citie,but with what loſſe,was not certainely knowne: eaſie it were to gueſſe, that it was right great, for that the old tyrant Alexius diſcouraged therewith, and doubtfull of his owne ſtate, with Theodorus Laſcaris his ſonne in law, and ſome few others of his truſtie friends (hard to be found in ſo dangerous a caſe) the next night following ſecretly fled out of the citie, carrying away with him a wonderfull maſſe of treaſure (which hee againſt all ſuch euents had D cauſed to bee ſecretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monaſterie of Nuns within the citie, whereof ſhe was the abbeſſe) and ſo ſaued himſelfe.

The Latines by force enter the hauen of Conſtantinople.

A hot skirmiſh betwixt the Greekes and the Latines at their landing.

The flight of the tyrant once bruted,the next morning the Conſtantinopolitanes taking the old emperour Iſaack out of priſon,ſaluted him againe for their emperour, rejoycing greatly for his deliuerance,and the ſafegard of his life: and after that opened the gates of the citie vnto the Latines,calling and ſaluting them by the names of the reuengers and ſauiours of the libertie of the Greekes, as alſo of the life and majeſtie of their emperour; they requeſted them that they might ſee and ſalute Alexius their young prince,whom they had ſo long deſired: and ſo was the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the ſubmiſsion of the citizens, for that time ſaued from ſaccage and ſpoile. The old emperour thus deliuered,and together with his ſonne Alexius again
E placed in the imperiall ſeat,gaue the moſt heartie thanks that poſsibly he could vnto the Latine princes,for that by their bountie,charitie,and valour,the Greeke empire had beene deliuered out of a long and miſerable ſeruitude: and for his owne particular, that he had receiued of them ſo great good, that albeit his ſight could not be reſtored to him againe,neuertheleſſe,hee acknowledged his life,his libertie,his empire, his countrey,his ſonne,to haue been vnto him by them reſtored, and he likewiſe to them: for which their ſo great deſerts he could not(as hee ſaid)render them condigne thankes,or deuiſe rewards or honours anſwerable to their demerits and valour: and that therefore he did ratefie and confirme whatſoeuer his ſonne had before promiſed vnto them for his deliuerance: and not onely that, but farther promiſed, That if they were not therewith contented, hee would of his owne bountie giue them better contentment, not meaning F they ſhould goe diſcontented, that had ſaued his life, and otherwiſe ſo highly pleaſured him. Hereupon this good old emperour began to conſult with his friends about the meanes whereby he might ſatisfie and content the Latines in ſuch things as the young prince his ſonne had vnto them promiſed. And to the intent that the citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE might the more willingly doe that he was to command them,and the more cheerefully pay ſuch impoſitions as hee was to lay vpon them, hee intreated all the Latines to retire themſelues out of the citie into their their campe or about their ships, which they accordingly did. But the impoſition being ſet G downe, and what euery man was to pay, ſeemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accuſtomed to receiue tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter moſt heauie and intollerable.

In this verie inſtant that this exaction was required, died the old emperour Iſaack, who hauing of long beene kept in a darke and ſtinking priſon in continuall feare of death, and now deliuered and reſtored to his empire, could not endure ſo ſudden and vnexpected a change, both of the aire and of his manner of liuing, but ſo ſuddenly died.

At this exaction impoſed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Conſtantinopolitans grieuouſly murmured and exclaimed, ſaying, That it was a villanous thing to ſee the Greeke empire engaged and bound (by a yoong boy) vnto a couetous and proud nation, and ſo to bee H ſpoiled and bared of coyne: That the great and rich iſland of CRETE lying in the midſt of the ſea, was by him giuen as a gift vnto the Latines: That the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE and the Greeke church, had by him beene enforced and conſtrained to yeeld vnto the See of ROME, to receiue the opinions of the Latine church, to ſubmit it ſelfe vnto the obeiſance of old ROME, from whence it had once happily departed euer ſince the time that the empire was by Conſtantine the Great tranſlated thence to them. Thus euerie one ſaid for himſelfe in particular: thus all men ſaid in generall. And therof the noble men in their aſſemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grieuouſly complained: whereupon a great ſedition and tumult was raiſed in the citie. Some preſently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged ran furioufly diſordered vnto the palace, with a purpoſe to haue committed ſome great outrage vpon I the perſon of the yong emperour Alexius: who in that ſo ſudden an inſurrection, as might well haue troubled a right conſtant man, without longer ſtay reſolued vpon a moſt wholeſome and neceſſarie point for the appeaſing of the peoples furie; vnto whom (aſſembled in a woonderfull multitude) he ſhewed himſelfe from aboue in his pallace, promiſing them to remaine in their power, and not from thenceforth to do any thing without their aduice and liking, but wholy to depend vpon them: with which good words the people held themſelues well content, and ſo was the tumult for that time appeaſed. But foorthwith the yoong emperour conſidering the iniurie done vnto him, began to burne with the deſire of reuenge and to change his purpoſe. Hee could not together ſatisfie the citizens and the Latines: for if he would keepe his promiſe with the Latines, he muſt of neceſſitie offend his owne people; neither was there any meanes to bee K found to ſatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himſelfe more bound to keepe his promiſe with the Latines, whoſe forces he knew not how to withſtand, he ſent ſecretly to requeſt the marques of MONT-FERRAT, generall of the armie, to ſend him about midnight certaine companies of ſouldiers into the citie, aſſuring him to receiue them in by a gate neere vnto the pallace, which ſhould be opened vnto them by certaine of his truſtie ſeruants there left for that purpoſe. Of this plot Alexius Ducas (of his bittle browes ſurnamed Murzuſle, whom of a baſe fellow the emperour Iſaack had promoted vnto the greateſt honours of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aſpiring mind, and in theſe troubleſome times hauing long thirſted after the empire, tooke now this occaſion to worke vpon.

Alexis ſeeketh to bring the Latines againe into the citie.

The night following, he by his agents, men inſtructed for the purpoſe, raiſed a tumult in the L citie, not inferiour vnto that which had happened the day before: and at the ſame inſtant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came ſuddenly vnto the yoong emperour in the dead time of the night (which he might at all times do, by reaſon of the great confidence the emperour had in him) and with a ſad countenance told him, That the people were vp againe in an vprore, and eſpecially they of his guard, and that they were comming towards him to do him ſome violence for the loue he bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected newes the yoong emperour terrified, demaunded of him as of his moſt faithfull counſellor, what were beſt in that caſe for him to doe? Who preſently embracing him in his night gowne, lead him out by a ſecret dore into a tent hee had of his owne in the court, as if hee would there haue kept him ſafe: but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeaſe the tu- M mult, had before taken order, That he ſhould preſently after his departure, be caſt in bonds, and ſo be clapt vp into a cloſe ſtinking priſon. Which done, the falſe traitor openly ſhewing himſelfe, made an oration vnto the people, wherein he ſhewed himſelfe to haue great compaſſion of the Greeke empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themſelues, eſpecially in that they were gouerned by a youth vnfit for the gouernment, who ſuffered himſelfe to be miſſe-led according to the pleaſure

The Conſtantinopolitans againe in an vprore.

A pleaſure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, the ſeat of the Greeke empire, to looke about it, and to haue an eie vnto it ſelfe, ſith it was betraied & ſold by them which ought to preſerue and keepe the ſame: that they had now need of a man that loued his countrey and countreymen, before that which yet remained of the Græcian name were vtterly extinguiſhed by the Latines.

This his ſpeech, fitted of purpoſe vnto the humour of the ſeditious, was receiued with the great outcrie and applauſe of the windie headed people. Some cried out that hee, and none but he, was to be made chiefe of the common weale that was by them to be eſtabliſhed: otherſome cried as loud to haue him made generall of the armies and forces of the ſtate: but the greateſt crie was to haue him choſen and created emperour; whereunto the reſt giuing place, hee was B by the generall conſent of the tumultuous people, without longer ſtay, choſen and proclaimed emperour.

Alexius the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull ſucceſsion, but onely by the furie of the tumultuous people, thus created emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to breake the forces of the Latines, of whom onely he now ſtood in dread. And therefore to begin withall, he firſt attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch, flax, brimſtone, and ſuch like matter apt to take fire, to haue burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies ſo ſet on fire & carried with a faire gale of wind amongſt the fleet, had beene like enough to haue done great harme, had it not by the warineſſe of the Venetians bene preuented: who being good ſea men, & not vnacquainted with ſuch deuiſes, eaſily and without danger auoided the ſame, by keeping themſelues aloofe C one from another in the ſea. This fineneſſe ſorting to no purpoſe, he to colour the matter ſent certaine meſſengers to the generall, and other commaunders of the armie, to giue them to vnderſtand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had beene done without his priuitie, by the malice of the tumultuous people; and that for his part he would be glad of their fauour and friendſhip, aſſuring them likewiſe of his, and promiſing them to aid them both with men and money, and whatſoeuer elſe they ſhould haue need of in their wars againſt the infidels. Whereunto an anſwer was giuen by Dandulus the Venetian generall, That he would beleeue it, when Alexis the ſonne of the emperour Iſaack, whom the Latines had placed in the empire, ſhould aſſure them thereof, and intreat for the people, vpon whom the fault of that outrage was laid: D which anſwere the more mooued the traiterous tyrant, to rid himſelfe cleane of the feare of the yoong prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the people of the hope and great deſire they had to grow to ſome peace with the Latines, by taking him out of priſon, and receiuing him againe for their emperour: For the people (by nature mutable, and not deſirous of the good of themſelues, but according to the occurrents preſent, without any great regard of that they haue alreadie done, or ought to haue done) began now to repent themſelues of that they had done againſt the yoong emperor Alexis in the fauour of the tyrant, and commonly ſaid, That they muſt find ſome meanes, whatſoeuer it were, to remedie their fault together with their troubles. Wherfore Murzuſle fearing this ſudden mutation of the people, with his owne hands moſt villanouſly ſtrangled the yoong prince Alexis in priſon, hauing as yet not E raigned much aboue ſix months, and immediately after cauſed it to be bruited abroad, That the ſaid yoong prince diſpairing of his eſtate, had as a man deſperat hanged himſelfe.

Murzuſle attempteth to burne the Venetian fleet.

The tyrant in vaine hauing thus attempted the burning of the fleet, and ſtill fearing the reuenging ſword of the Latines, reſolued now by plaine force to meet them in the field, and there to dare them battell. So hauing made readie and armed the whole ſtrength of the imperiall citie, he with cheerfull ſpeech encouraged his ſouldiers, requeſting them valiantly to maintaine and defend their countrey of Greece, the monuments of their fathers, the glorie of their anceſtors, their honour preſent, and the future hope of their poſteritie: that hauing before their eies the wals of their citie, within which they were borne, nouriſhed, and brought vp in hope of great matters, they would haue pitie and compaſsion of their temples, their wiues, their children, F and in no caſe to ſuffer them to fall againe into ſo miſerable and wretched a ſeruitude, but rather to die a thouſand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterpriſe taken in hand for the defence of his countrey (as he would haue the world to beleeue it) with the colour of a ſuperſtitious deuotion alſo, hee cauſed the prieſts in their eccleſiaſtike attire and ornaments, to march foorth in the armie, with an enſigne, hauing in it diſplaied the picture of the Virgin Marie. So courageouſly marching forward, hee firſt charged that quarter of the campe where Bald- win the countie of FLANDERS lay, where at the firſt was fought a right fierce and doubtfull battell. But afterward the alarum running throughout all the campe of the Latines, and new ſupplies comming in on euery ſide, the Greekes were put to the worſe, and enforced againe to retire into the citie, hauing loſt a great number of men, together with their ſuperſtitious enſigne. It was a woonderfull thing to ſee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of diuers nations, continued this expedition vndertaken againſt the Greekes. Seuentie two daies was the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE ſtraightly beſieged by the Latines both by ſea and land, without giuing any time of reſt or repoſe day or night vnto the beſieged, freſh men comming ſtill on to the aſſault, as the other fell off, and in ſuch ſort troubled the Greekes in the citie, that they knew not well what to doe or which way to turne themſelues. The Venetians, vnto whom was committed the charge to aſſault that ſide of the citie which was toward the hauen, vpon two great gallies made faſt together, built a ſtrong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiers of the town, out of which they both with ſhot and fire-workes much troubled the defendants, wherewith they in the time of the aſſault approching the wall, by their fine deuiſes fired that ſide of the citie: by the rage whereof, a great number of houſes were burnt, with many other ſtately buildings and antient monuments of that famous citie: and had at that preſent gained a great tower neere vnto the port, deſtitute of defendors, had not the tyrant himſelfe in good time come with new ſupplies to the reſcue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the reſt, aſſailed the other ſide of the citie by land, where they were to fight not againſt the defendants onely, but againſt deepe ditches, high and ſtrong wals, and bulwarkes alſo: neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the valour and furie of the Latines, with the deſire of victorie, as that they were not with any difficulties to be diſmaied; but preſsing ſtill on, by a thouſand dangers, at length after a moſt ſharpe aſſault they gained one of the greateſt baſtillions on that ſide of the citie, called the Angels tower, and ſo by plaine force opened a way both for themſelues and the reſt into the citie. Whereof Alexius vnderſtanding, and ſtrucke with preſent deſpaire both of his ſtate and life, the night now comming on, fled with Euphroſina the emperour Alexius his wife, and Eudocia her daughter, whome hee had married when he had raigned about a moneth and 16 daies.

Conſtantinople ſet on fire.

The tyrant, author of all this miſchiefe and of the calamities enſuing, thus fled, and the Latines furiouſly entring; the prieſts and religious men in their ſurplices, and other eccleſiaſtique ornaments, with their croſſes and banners (as in ſolemne proceſsion) met the Latines, and falling downe at the ſouldiors feet, with flouds of teares abundantly running downe their heauie countenances, beſought them, but eſpecially the captaines and commanders, to remember the condition of worldly things, and contenting themſelues with the victorie, the glorie, the honour, the empire, the immortalitie of their name, to abſtaine from ſlaughter, from burning, from ſpoiling and ranſacking of ſo beautifull a citie: And that ſeeing they were themſelues men, they would alſo haue pitie of men: and being themſelues captaines and ſouldiours, they ſhould alſo haue compaſsion vpon captaines and ſouldiours; who although they were not ſo valiant and fortunate as they were, yet neuertheleſſe were both captaines and ſouldiors: And that they would keepe and preſerue their citie, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might haue much more pleaſure and commoditie, than if they ſhould deſtroy the ſame, which as it had been the principall ſeat of the Greeke empire, ſo might it now bee of the Latines: That ſeeing they had thereof had a carefull regard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now vpon better reaſon to haue more care thereof, being their owne: That the authors of all theſe troubles and miſchiefes, Alexius the elder, and Murzuſle, had alreadie receiued a reward anſwerable to their follies, in that they were driuen into exile: That they would haue pitie and compaſsion of an innocent and vnfortunat multitude of poore people, oppreſſed and grieuouſly tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous lords and gouernours: That in ſo doing, God the Lord of hoaſts, the giuer and guider of battels, the God of mercie, would therefore reward them: To conclude, they humbly beſought them to pardon their citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious and mercifull lords and fathers, not of enemies and rough maſters, of forgiuers, not of reuengers: and to vnderſtand by their teares, their miſerable eſtate and woes paſſed. With this ſo humble a ſubmiſsion and complaint of the religious, ſome of the better ſort were happely mooued: but with the common ſouldiors, breathing nothing but victorie, with their weapons in their hands, and the ſpoile of an empire in their power, what auailed prayers or teares? euery man fell to the ſpoile, and in ſo great choice and libertie of all things, fitted his owne diſordered appetite, without reſpect of the wrong

A or injurie done to others: onely from the effusion of innocent bloud they abstained; they whose liues they sought after, being alreadie fled, together with the tyrant. Other injuries and outrages (so great, as that greater could none be) were in euery place so rife, that euery street, euery lane, euery corner of the citie was filled with mourning and heauinesse. There might a man haue seene noblemen earst of great honor, and reuerend for their hoarie haires, with other citizens of great wealth, thrust out of all they had, walking vp and downe the citie weeping and wringing their hands, as men forlorne, not knowing where to shroud their heads. Neither staied the greedie rage of the insolent souldiors within the wals of mens priuat houses, but brake out into the stately pallaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes also, where all was good prize, and nothing dedicated to the seruice of God, left vnpolluted and defaced, no place vnsought, no corner vnrifled:
B right lamentable and almost incredible it were to report all the miseries of that time. Some of the Greeke Historiographers, men of great marke and place, and themselues eye witnesses and partakers of those euils, haue by their writings complained to all posteritie, of the insolencie of the Latines at the winning of the citie, to their eternall dishonour: but that disordered souldiours in all ages in the libertie of their insolent victorie, haue done such outrages, as honest minds abhorre to thinke vpon. Thus Constantinople, the most famous citie of the East, the seat and glorie of the Greeke empire, by the miserable ambition and dissention of the Greekes for soueraignetie fell into the hands of the Latines the twelfth of Aprill, in the yeare 1204, or after the account of others, 1200. 1204

Nicetas Chõniates, annall. fol. 180.

C CONSTANTINOPLE thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the princes and great commanders of the armie held a counsell, to consider what were best to be done concerning the citie and the new gained empire: for after so great a victorie, they thought it not good to raise so auncient and important a citie, seated as it were a watch tower vpon the theatre of the world, ouerlooking both ASIA and EUROPE from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuersall; and so commodiously planted, as was no other citie of the world, for the keeping vnder of the enemies of the Christian Religion: but that it were much better to place there a Latine gouernour, to establish there the Latine lawes and customes, and to vnite the Greeke church as a member vnto the church of ROME. In which consultation, some were of opinion, not to haue any moe emperours in Christendome but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the Germane emperour, author of this warre, whose wife Irene was the onely daughter and heire of the late em-
D perour Isaack Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers empire belonged. But the greater part, considering that the troubled affaires of GREECE, in so great a change and newnesse of the empire, had need of the personall presence of a prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themselues, who there still resiant in that place, might at all times giue aid vnto the Latines in their sacred warres, taken in hand against the infidels: which opinion as the better, was approoued of them all. The cheefe men in this election of the new emperour, were Baldwin countie of FLAUNDERS and HAINAULT, Henry his brother, Lewis countie of BLOYS, Symon de Montfort, Iohn de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh countie of S. Paul, Iohn countie of BRENNE, Boniface marques of MONT-FERRAT, Stephen countie of PERCH, and fiue gentlemen of VENICE: vnto whom also were joyned two Bishops of SYRIA, the one of
E BETHLEM, the other of PTOLEMAIS, who had oftentimes come to the campe of the Latines to stirre them vp for the taking in hand of the sacred warre in SYRIA; with two bishops of FRANCE also, namely of SOISSON and TROY in CHAMPAGNE, & the abbot of LEMBLY. These great lords and prelats assembled into the church of the holy Apostles, after they had there with great deuotion craued of God to enspire them with his spirit, for the choice of a good and just prince fit for so great a charge; with one consent made choice of Baldwin countie of FLAUNDERS and HAINAULT for emperour of GREECE: a braue and valiant prince about two and thirtie yeeres old, who was afterward the sixteenth day of May in the yeare 1204 (or after the computation of others in the yeere 1205) in the great temple of S. Sophia solemnely
F crowned by Thomas Mauroceno a Venetian, first Patriarch of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE. From which time the Greeke church in CONSTANTINOPLE began to receiue the rites and ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the supremacie of the church of ROME.

It was not long after that CONSTANTINOPLE was thus taken by the Latines, but that they dividing their forces without any resistance, tooke in the most part of the great countries and

and prouinces on EUROPE ſide, belonging to the Greeke empire in the time of Iſaack Angelus the late emperour: the fortune of the whole empire, as it were following the fortune of the imperiall citie. Which large countries ſo gained from the Greeks, the Latines diuided amongſt themſelues, as good prize taken from their enemies: Vnto Baldwin the emperour and his ſucceſſors in the empire, was aſsigned the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the countrey of THRACIA, with a limited ſoueraignty ouer all the reſt of the prouinces by the Latines alreadie or afterwards to be gained: Vnto the Venetians in this diuiſion of the empire, was allotted for their ſhare all the rich iſlands of the ÆGEUM, and IONIAN, with the famous iſland of CANDIE alſo; which although it were before by the yoong emperour Alexis in the beginning of theſe warres, giuen vnto the marques of MONT-FERRAT, yet in this diuiſion of the empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and giuen to the Venetians, as for them more fit: In ſteed and lieu whereof, the marques had the citie of THESSALONICA with all the kingdome of THESSALIE, and a great part of PELOPONESUS aſsigned vnto him, with the royall title of a king. Of the aforeſaid iſlands (in number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the ſtate fortified ſome few of the greateſt with conuenient garriſons, the reſt they left to be poſſeſſed and defended by the better ſort of the citizens at their priuat coſt and charges; who according to their abilitie, tooke into their poſſeſsion, ſome one iſland, ſome another, and ſome two or three, one, as they were able to ſet out their gallies one, two, or mo, for the keeping of the ſame: ouer all which, the ſeigniorie neuertheleſſe had a generall care, ſtill keeping a fleet with one of their admirals at ſea; by whom they not onely repreſſed the Genua pirats then buſie in thoſe ſeas, but alſo tooke in certain ſtrong townes in the maine vpon the coſt of PELOPONESUS, namely MODON and CORONE; all which they of long time after held as a part of their ſeigniorie. Some other particular places, yet parts alſo of the empire, were giuen vnto particular men; as the dukedome of ATHENS vnto one Geffrey of TROY in CHAMPAIGNE a Frenchman, a valiant captaine, whom they alſo made prince of ACHAIA: Another dukedome was alſo giuen to the countie of BLOYS; as were diuers other countries and townes alſo vnto other more priuat men: who neuertheleſſe were bound to hold the ſame of the emperour, as of their lord, and to pay him yearely a fourth part of the reuenue ariſing thereof towards the maintenance of his ſtate. Yea the Greekes themſelues in this ſhipwracke of their ſtate and empire, although they diſdained nothing more than the ſtrange gouernment of the Latines, yet could they not be perſuaded to joyne together in ſo common a calamitie, but after their woonted maner ſought euerie man how to ſhare out ſomething for himſelfe, without regard of the common good: one ſeized vpon one ſtrong towne or citie, and ſo likewiſe another; which for all that they held not long, driuen thence for the moſt part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their owne countreymen.

The man whom the diſcontented Greeks moſt looked after, was Theodorus Laſcaris, the emperour Alexius Angelus his ſonne in law: who at the taking of the citie fled to ADRIANOPLE, and afterward into BYTHINIA, where he was of the people, not of that countrey onely, but of others alſo farther off, joyfully receiued and honoured as their emperour. So taking into his hands the countries of BYTHINIA, PHRIGIA, MISIA, IONIA, and LYDIA, euen from the windings of the famous riuer MÆANDER Southward, vnto the EUXINE ſea Northward; he with the generall good liking of the people, tooke vpon him the ſtate of an emperour, and ſo in the renowmed citie of NICE made the ſeat of his empire. At the ſame time alſo Dauid, and Alexius Comneni, the nephews of the tyrant Andronicus (ſometime emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE) by his ſonne Manuel, poſſeſsing the more Eaſtern countries of PONTVS, GALATIA, and CAPADOCIA, erected vnto themſelues another empire in TRAPEZOND, where their poſteritie of the honourable houſe of the Comneni raigned in great glorie many yeares after, vntill their empire, together with the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, was by the great emperour of the Turks, Mahomet the ſecond, ſubuerted and brought to naught, as ſhall bee afterward in due time and place declared. Thus the Greeke empire expoſed (as it were) to the generall ſpoile, was no longer one, but many empires: Baldwin raigning in CONSTANTINOPLE, the marques of MONT-FERRAT in THESSALIE, Theodorus Laſcaris at NICE, Alexius Comnenus in TRAPEZOND, & the Venetians in the iſlands; all in royall dignitie. Beſides whom were many other leſſer princes, which had here and there according to their abilitie ſeized vpon ſome one or other part of the empire, and there erected their Toparchies, raigning therein as

A pettie kings: as did Aldebrandinus in ATTALIA, Michael Angelus in EPIRVS, with diuers others too long to rehearse.

Baldwin (as is aforesaid) created emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the helpe of the Venetian Admirall Dandulus, and other great commanders of the armie, in short time brought vnder his obeisance all the cities of THRACIA, excepting the citie of ADRIANOPLE, whereunto the better sort of the discontented Greekes, together with Theodorus Lascaris (disdaining the gouernment of the Latines) were fled, as vnto a most safe sanctuarie: which Baldwin knowing, and withall desiring whilest yet he had his friends about him, to set his new empire in some good stay, without farther delay came and laid hard siege to the same. Now the Greeks
B generally euill entreated by the Latines, & grieued to be gouerned by them, were some of them fled into other their neighbours princes countries, but especially into BVLGARIA, otherwise called MISIA, a large kingdome, lying betwixt the great mountaine ÆMVS and DANVBIVS: by whose persuasion, Iohn king of that countrey, aided by the Scythians (a fierce Northren people, but lately come into those quarters) and by the fugitiue Greekes themselues, tooke vpon him to relieue the besieged citie: and so with a great armie approching the same, sent before certaine troupes of the Scythian archers on horsebacke, to fetch in such booties of horses or cattle as they should find neere vnto the emperours campe: and withall commaunded them that being charged by the imperials, they should foorthwith retire, so to draw them out of their trenches, into the place where the king with the greatest part of his armie lay couertly to entrap
C them. Which the Scythians (well acquainted with such seruice) so well performed vnder the leading of one Cozas their generall, that hauing once or twice drawn their enemies vnto some light skirmishes, and so retyring, and ere long againe with a greater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the emperour with all his armie, in hope to doe some great matter vpon them, euen as they wished into the place whereas the king with his armie lay in wait among the woods and mountaines for them; where they wearied and out of breath in the former pursuit, and now on euery side beset with fresh enemies, were ouerthrowne with a great slaughter. In which conflict, to increase the losse, Baldwin the emperour himselfe was taken and sent prisoner in bonds to TERNOVA: where afterwards by the commandement of the Barbarous king he was most cruelly put to death, hauing his hands and feet cut off, and so dismembred was cast
D out into a deepe valley, where he yet lay miserably breathing three daies after, and so died; leauing his bodie as fortunes scorne for a prey vnto the wild beasts and birds of the aire, no man vouchsafing to burie it. Thus perished this woorthie prince, for his vertues commended euen of the Greeks themselues, being about the age of three and thirtie yeeres, and not hauing raigned yet a full yeare, in the yeare of our Lord 1206.

The victorie thus gained, & the citie relieued, the barbarous king with his sauage souldiors hauing tasted the wealth of the Latins, ouerthrowne in the late battell, and the pleasures of THRACIA, now subject to their lust; greedily pursued their good fortune, without respect of all humanitie: the open countrey they ouerran, spoiling whatsoeuer came to hand, the rich and famous cities they rifled, and afterward rased them downe to the ground, namely SERRÆ, PHILIPPO-
E POLIS, APRI, RHEDESTVM, PERINTHVS, DAONIVM, ARCADIOPOLIS, MESENA, ZURVLVS, and ATHYRA: the citizens and countrey people fled into the cities for refuge, they put all to the sword, without respect of age, sex, or condition, except some few whom they carried away with them prisoners, so that of all the prouinces of that rent and ruinated empire, the countrey of THRACE, was most miserable; as first spoiled by the Latines, and now laid desolat by the Bulgarians and Scythians. Onely some few of the strongest cities, as DIDYMOTICHVM and ADRIANOPLE, valiantly defended by the Greekes and Latines, escaped this furie of the Barbarians, all the rest that fell into their hands being laid wast and desolat. 1206

In this so troubled a State of the new erected Empire of the Latines in CONSTANTINO-PLE, the Latines made choise of Henrie the late Emperour Baldwins brother, as of all others
F the fittest to succeed him in the empire; who aided by the marquesse, now king of THESSALIE, and the other Latine princes, notably repulsed the Barbarians, and left them not vntill that at length he had recouered from them all such townes and cities as they had before taken, and driuen them quite out of the countrey, and so well established himselfe in his new empire.

Henry second emperour of the Latines in Constantinople.

But to leaue this dismembred empire, now in the hands of many, and to come neerer vnto our purpose: Alexius Angelus the vsurper, driuen out of the imperiall citie by the Latins, to saue himselfe, fled into THESSALIE, and from thence vnto Leo Scurus (then a man of great fame among the Greekes) who tyrannising at NAUPLUS, as had his father before him, was in these troublesome times growne greater by surprising of the two famous cities of ARGOS and CORINTH: by whose meanes he cunningly entrapped Alexius Ducas, surnamed Murzuphle the traitor, and for a secret grudge not commonly knowne, put out his eyes: himselfe an exiled man being a most heauie enemie vnto the other also exiled; and himselfe thrust out of the empire, a deadly foe vnto the other, oppressed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which losse of his sight, he was by chaunce taken by the Latines, and so brought backe to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was for murdering the young emperour Alexius, worthily condemned vnto a strange and horrible kind of death: for, cast off from an high tower, and tumbling heeles ouer head downeward, he was with the waight of himselfe, and violence of the fall, crushed all to pieces, and so miserably died: a death too good for such a traitour. Not long after it fortuned also, that Alexius himselfe wandering vp and downe in THRACIA, was by the marquesse of MONT-FERRAT going against SCVRVS, taken and stript of his great treasure, and whatsoeuer else hee had; and so sent away naked, long time after in beggers estate wandered about in ACHAIA and PELOPONESVS, now farre vnlike that Alexius which sometime proudly raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE: but such is the assurance of euill gotten honour. He hearing that Theodorus Lascaris, his sonne in law, raigned in ASIA, and there held the state of an emperour, rejoyced not thereat as a kind father in law, but inwardly greeued thereat as an enemie, sorrie that any other but himselfe should be honoured with the title of the Greeke emperour: in which malicious humour he sayling out of GREECE into ASIA ouer the Ægeum, came secretly vnto the Turkes Sultan Iathatines his old acquaintance, then lying at ATTALIA, (which famous citie he had not long before taken from the Christians) vnto whom he declared his heauie estate, and how his empire had been rent from him, as well by the Greekes as the Latines; requesting, that by his meanes he might be restored againe into some part thereof, especially that in the lesser ASIA, which was by Theodorus Lascaris, together with the honour of the Greeke emperour, vnjustly (as he said) detained from him. This Iathatines, now Sultan of ICONIVM, was the younger sonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long surviuing his father Cai-Chosroe, left his kingdome vnto his two sonnes, Azadin and Iassadin, of the Greekes called Azatines and Iathatines: where long it was not, but that these two brethren falling out for the soueraignetie (which admitteth no equalitie) Iathatines was by Azatines his elder brother driuen into exile, and for the safegard of his life glad to flie vnto this Alexius, then raigning at CONSTANTINOPLE, by whom he was honourably entertained, and as some write, conuerted and baptised. But Azatines the Sultan shortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home againe, and renouncing the Christian religion, was by the Turks receiued for their Sultan: of whom the emperour Alexius in like extremitie now craueth aid. The Sultan not forgetfull of his owne troubles before passed, or of the kindnesse hee had receiued, and mooued with the pittifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers, beside that he was in hope to share out some good part of whatsoeuer he got for himselfe; tooke him into his protection, and foorthwith sent embassadours to Lascaris, threatening vnto him all extremities, except he did foorthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom as vnto the Greeke emperour, those countries which were by him possessed, of right (as he said) appertained. With which vnexpected message, Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old emperour. Neuertheless, hauing propounded the matter in counsell, and finding the minds of his subiects well affected towards him, and a readinesse in them in his quarrell to aduenture their liues; he encouraged therewith, accompanied onely with two thousand choise horsemen, together with the Sultans embassadour, without farther stay set forward to PHILADELPHIA: the Sultan at the same time with Alexius (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceiue the people withall) and twentie thousand Turkes, besieging the citie of ANTIOCH, situate vpon the winding banks of the riuer MEANDER. Which the emperour Theodorus well vnderstanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that strong citie (standing vpon the passage of the great riuer, the bounder of his empire) should open a faire way for himselfe into the heart of ROMANIA ASIATICA, to the great hazard of his whole empire, resolued with those few he had, to doe what hee might to relieue his citie. And so setting forward vpon the spurre, carrying nothing with him more than a little victuall: and now come neere vnto the citie, sent before the Sultans embassador, following him

A at the heeles. Who comming vnto the Sultan, and telling him of the emperours approch with so small a power, could hardly persuade him that it was so, although hee bound it with many oathes: yet at length persuaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was so, hee in all hast put his armie in the best order he could vpon such a suddain, but not to his best aduauntage, being hindred so to do, by the straitnesse of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thousand select horsemen in the emperours armie, were eight hundred Italians, all most resolute men, who gi-uing the first charge, brake through the midst of the Sultans armie, disordering his whole battell as they went; after whom followed also the Greeks, though not with like courage: but those Italian horsemen now deuided from the rest, & in number but few, in comming back again, were by B the disordered Turks, some on horseback, some on foot, so beset on euery side, as that there was no way left for them to passe, but there valiantly fighting were altogether slaine, hauing both before and at the time of their death, made such a slaughter of the Turks, as is hardly to be beleeued to haue been possible for so few men to haue made. The Greekes also hardly laied to by the Turkes, and discouraged by the slaughter of the Latines, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when as the Sultan, now almost in possession of a certaine victorie, descrying the Greeke emperour, and trusting to his owne great strength, singled him out, being as readie as himselfe to meet him; when as at the first incounter, the Sultan with his horsemans mase gaue him such a blow vpon the head, as might haue killed a bull, so that the emperour therewith astonied, fell downe from his horse: who yet euen in the fall comming something againe vnto himselfe, and C although dismounted, yet quickly recouering his feet, with his faulchion hoxed the hinder legs of the mare whereon the Sultan rid, being a most beautifull beast and of a woonderfull height; which now suddainely faultring vnder him, and so the Sultan tumbling downe as from an high tower, before he could recouer himselfe, had his head cut off by the emperour: which by and by put vpon a launce, and so holden vp, with the sight thereof so dismaied the Turks, that strucken with a suddaine feare, they presently fled, leauing the victorie vnto the emperour, before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that considering his small number, durst no farther pursue them, but entering the citie, gaue thankes to God for so great a victorie. Vnto whom the Turks shortly after sent their embassadours, and so vpon such reasonable conditions as it pleased him to set downe, concluded with him a peace. Alexius himselfe, author of these troubles, taken in D this battell and carried to NICE, was by the emperour his son in law, notwithstanding his euill deserts, well intreated and vsed.

Iathatines the Sultan slaine by Theodorus Lascaris the Greeke emperour.

Whilest the Latins thus spend those forces in subuerting of the Greeke empire, which should haue been imployed for the releese of the Christians in SYRIA; and that the Greeke emperour Liscaris was thus troubled with the Turks; the affaires of the Christians in SYRIA and the Holy land, grew still worse and worse. Whereof the knights Hospitalers and Templars (the cheefe champions of the Christian religion in those countries) greatly blamed Almericus the king of CYPRUS, for that he being so neere at hand, and hauing married Isabella, the heire of that kingdome, and so in her right taken vpon him the title of the king of HIERUSALEM, gaue himselfe wholly to pleasure, doing nothing for the defence or reliefe of the poore distressed Christians, or E repressing of the Turkes: who although they were yet in league with the Christians there, and at some discord also among themselues, yet spared not, as occasion serued, still more and more to encroach vpon them, and by building of new castles & fortresses, to cut them short. Of all which things, the aforesaid knights by their embassadours certefied Innocentius the Pope, requesting his fatherly care for the remedie therof; certefying him withall, That there was yet liuing one Mary, the daughter of the marquesse of MONT-FERRAT, a ladie of rare beautie, whom they as her tutors, had brought vp in hope of the kingdome; and now were readie to bestow her vpon some such man as he should thinke worthie of her, together with the right she had vnto the kingdome.
Hereupon Innocentius discharging Almericus of the title of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM, gaue it to Iohn countie de Brenne of DAULPHINIE in FRANCE, a man of great fame and va-F lour, then in armes with the other Latin princes against the Greeks. Who now returning home, commended his earledome to his brother, and with such power as he was able to make, setting forward, came first to VENICE, where he was royally entertained: and from thence sayling to CONSTANTINOPLE, was with like honour receiued by the emperour Henry, and so at length the fift of September arriued at PTOLEMAIS in SYRIA, where he was with the great rejoycing and applause of the people receiued as their king. And the last of the same moneth marrying

Iohn Brenne by Innocentius the Pope appointed king of Hierusalem.

the aforeſaid ladie Marie at TYRE, was there together with her with great ſolemnitie crowned G 1209 king in the yeare 1209: which Almericus the old king of CYPRUS hearing, ſhortly after died for griefe. Neither wanted this noble gentleman, thus honoured with the title of a kingdome, ſome that enuied at his promotion, and therfore commonly called him in diriſion, a king, but ſtill with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to ſay, without a towne.

Now was the ten yeares peace before taken betwixt the Turkes and the Chriſtians in SYRIA, at the comming ouer of Simon marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT (as is before declared) almoſt expired: which had not ſo much giuen to thoſe poore remnants of the Chriſtians ſome time of reſt and breathing, as had the diſcord of the Turkes among themſelues; which hauing by the ſpace of nine yeares continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the ſoueraignetie, was H now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himſelfe with the gouernment of ALEPPO: and Corradin and Meledin, the two ſonnes of Saphadin, deuiding their fathers king-

About this time alſo, or not long after, Innocentius tertius, yet Pope, ſummoned a generall counſell to LATERAN, whereunto beſides a multitude of great biſhops and other reuerend prelates, repaired alſo the honourable embaſſadours of moſt of the princes of Chriſtendome: vnto whom ſo aſſembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous eſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, and how the ſame was by the helpe of the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt to bee relieued. Whereunto all the fathers and princes there aſſembled, eaſily gaue their conſent: and I thereupon were ſome appointed in euery countrey and prouince to publiſh this decree of the Counſell, for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians, and to ſtirre vp the deuout people, for the vndertaking of ſo religious a warre. The chiefe furtherers of this ſacred expedition (to be thus taken in hand againſt the infidels) were the biſhops of GERMANIE, eſpecially the three great biſhops of METS, CULLEN, and TRIVERS, whoſe example mooued alſo many others, all which to rehearſe were tedious. Out of FRANCE alſo were ſent Henry the countie of NIVERS, and one Gualter, the kings great chamberlaine, with a great number of the gallant youths of FRANCE, and ſo out of diuers other places alſo: So that at length ſuch a number of men were met together at diuers ports of the Adriaticke, as made vp a fleet of two hundred ſaile: which with a proſperous wind carried ouer into SYRIA, arriued in ſafetie at PTOLEMAIS, the chiefe citie of K the Chriſtians, now that HIERUSALEM was loſt. After whom followed alſo Andrew, king of HUNGARIE, long before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promiſe, for the vndertaking of that ſacred expedition: with whom came alſo Lewis duke of BAVARIA, and Leopold duke of AUSTRIA, with their forces all well appointed: vnto whom alſo, Iohn king of HIERUSALEM joined himſelfe with his power. Great hope and expectation there was of ſome great matter to haue ben done, now that ſo great forces of the Chriſtians were thus met together. Who ſetting forward from PTOLEMAIS, & the firſt day marching into GALILEE, by the way met with certaine companies of the Turks, whom they eaſily ouerthrew & put to flight. The next day they came to the riuer of IORDAN, where they alſo diſtreſſed certaine of the Turks gariſons. There the king of HUNGARIE bathing himſelfe in the riuer, forthwith (as one diſcharged of his vow & promiſe) returned with all his power vnto PTOLEMAIS, & ſo from thence back L again into his coũtry, all the reſt of the army of the Chriſtians crying out vnto him to the cõtrary: who after the kings departure ſtill marching on, came to the mount THABOR. But ſhortly after, winter now comming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned ſome to PTOLEMAIS, ſome to TYRE, and there wintred. King Iohn and the duke of AUSTRIA in the meane time tooke a caſtle betwixt CESAREA and CAIPHA, called The caſtle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts, all that winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the armie againe met together, it was thought beſt by all the great commaunders (that for ſo much as the kingdome of ÆGYPT was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan ſuperſtition againſt the Chriſtians in thoſe parts; and that ſo M long as it ſtood vpright, they ſhould not be able to do any great matter in SYRIA) to attempt the conqueſt thereof, as an exploit beſt beſeeming their valour, and ſo great preparations: for that that kingdome being once ſubdued, the citie of HIERUSALEM with all the land of PALESTINE, would of themſelues without more adoe yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous citie of DAMIATA, called in antient time PELVSIVM, not much inferiour to ALEX-

ANDRIA,

A ANDRIA, was the firſt and moſt commodious port for their purpoſe, as neereſt vnto SYRIA; and that by the taking therof, they ſhould haue a faire entrance into the great riuer NILVS, with the command of a moſt rich and pleaſant countrey about it: they reſolued there to begin the warre: and thereupon embarking themſelues with all things neceſſarie for ſo great an enterpriſe at PTOLEMAIS, and carried with a faire wind, they in ſhort time arriued at the deſired port. Now that rich and antient citie, the key of that ſide of the kingdome, ſtood about a mile from the ſea, & ſomewhat diſtant alſo from the great riuer, enuironed with a nauigable ditch or cut, drawn out of the Nile, in manner of an iſland as a man commeth from SYRIA by land; and compaſſed about with three ſtrong ſtone wals, the worke of the good emperour Aelius
B Pertinax, and of him as ſome affirme called alſo ÆLIOPOLIS. At the mouth of this cut, as you ſhould enter vnto the citie, ſtood a ſtrong watch-towre for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of faire houſes in manner of a prettie towne entrenched. Beſide that, for the more ſafetie thereof, the ſame cut was barred with a great ſtrong yron chaine, in ſuch ſort as that it was not poſsible for any ſhip, without breaking of the ſame, to enter. The Chriſtians with their fleet entring the mouth of the riuer, and comming to this cut, by great ſtrength brake the chaine: but thinking ſo to haue made their paſſage vnto the citie, they found a greater ſtay at the watch-tower, which ſtrongly built of ſquare ſtone, and well ſtored with warlike engines of all ſorts, and a good garriſon of valiant ſouldiers, ſtaied their further paſſage, ouerwhelming them as they approched, with ſhot, fire, ſtones, timber, and ſuch like, before prouided for that purpoſe.

The ſituation of Damiata in Aegypt.

C The Chriſtians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had vpon certaine flat veſſels built certaine high towers of wood for the aſſailing of the watch-tower: in the approching whereof, they were not only troubled with the enemie, but with the tumult and ſtur of their owne people alſo; ſome crying that they ſhould yet draw neerer vnto the tower; otherſome crying out as faſt, to haue the bridges caſt out, thereby to enter: and the enemie likewiſe with much clamour encouraging one another for the repulſing of the Chriſtians. So the ſouldiers hindred the mariners to do their buſineſſe, and the mariners the ſouldiers. In the midſt of this hurly burly and tumult, one of the woodden towers ſurmounting the reſt in heigth, ouercharged with the preſſe
D of men, fell, and in falling made ſuch a noiſe, as if heauen it ſelfe had fallen, where in a moment (as it were) was preſently to be ſeene a moſt heauie ſpectacle: many ouerwhelmed with the falling of the tower lay there cruſhed to death; ſome grieuouſly hurt, and yet not dead, lay oppreſſed with the timber, crying out for helpe; others bruiſed or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for feare of further harme, leapt ſome into the NILE, ſome aboord the other ſhips neere by, ſome crying out of his arme, ſome of his leg, ſome of his head or other part of his bodie, to the great diſcomfiture of the reſt, in ſo much that the aſſault was for that time giuen ouer.

King Iohn (as well for his valour as for the title of the king of HIERUSALEM, choſen generall of the armie) after he had appeaſed this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, vnto skilfull ſurgeons, & buried the bodies of ſuch as were found drowned or ouerwhelmed; with cheerfull ſpeech encouraged the reſt of his ſouldiers, perſuading them not to bee diſcouraged with the accident of the fall of a tower, which was neither to be imputed to E their cowardiſe, or the valour of the enemy, but onely to the chance of war.

In the meane time Meledin the Ægyptian Sultan, had with a great armie encamped himſelfe within the ſight of DAMIATA, thereby to encourage the beſieged, and to fill them with hope of reliefe: ſending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, meſſages, victuals, ſouldiers, armour, and whatſoeuer elſe they wanted. The chiefe cauſe of his ſtaying there, was to take occaſion for the ſurpriſing of the Chriſtians, if any ſhould be offered, either by chance or their owne negligence. Euery day ſome skirmiſh or other paſſed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, our men ſtill carrying away the victorie: yet could theſe Barbarians neither be drawn foorth vnto battell, neither could our men keepe them from victuals; for as much as they had the riuer of NILE at commaund, whereby victuals were out of the vpper part of ÆGYPT in great abundance con-
F ueighed into the Sultans campe: Whereas on the contrarie part, the ſame riuer diuiding it ſelfe into many armes, in ſome places here and there ouerflowing, in another cut into many ditches and channels, and in ſome other pent vp by wals and cauſies, gaue vnto our men a thouſand diſpleaſures. And therefore ſeeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battell, they reſolued againe to lay ſiege to the towre. Wherefore hauing with great cunning vpon two ſhips made faſt together, framed a towre of moſt ſtrong timber, equall in heigth vnto the watchtowre, they brought the ſame neere vnto the Turks towre, and the ſuburbs adjoyning thereun- G to, after which followed alſo all the reſt of the fleet well appointed for the aſſault. At which time all the reſt of the armie at land, ſtood in battell ready ranged, as well to diſcourage them of the towne, as that the Sultan ſhould not bee able to helpe them without the hazarding of battell.

There began a fierce and cruell aſſault; they of the ſuburbs right valiantly defending themſelues againſt their enemies. Within theſe ſuburbs, the towre, and the trenches, dwelt not only Ægyptians (the naturall inhabitants of the countrey) but alſo Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Indians, Moores, and Æthyopians, who were there reſiant, for that, that citie was a publike mart whereunto all kind of marchandize were brought from farre out of the remoteſt parts of the world, and ſo from thence in like manner tranſported alſo: which encouraged them the more to fight H for the defence of their liues and goods, the two things which men hold moſt deare: and in like ſort animated our men vnto the aſſault, as well in the quarrell of the Chriſtian religion, as to inrich themſelues with the ſpoile of thoſe rich nations. The Chriſtians with their ſhips drew as neere as poſsibly they could vnto the land, to the intent that vpon the banke of the riuer, they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and ſo come cloſe vnto their enemies.
But the Barbarians on the other ſide, ſought by ſhot and all other meanes they could to keepe them farther off, and ſo from landing.

A deſperat act of a Chriſtian.

That which moſt feared the Ægyptians, was that as one of our ſhips by chance ran a ground
vpon that ſide of the riuer where the enemie lay, and being boorded by the enemie, thronging in as faſt as he could, and there making a cruell ſlaughter: one of the Chriſtian ſouldiers going I downe vnder the hatches, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly comming in, ſunke the ſhip before the enemie was aware, and ſo drowned a great number of the Ægyptians, together with the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the high towre built vpon the two ſhips, joyning now cloſe vnto the watch-towre, and mating the ſame, diſmaied the defendants with the ſtrangeneſſe thereof, as with a miracle, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtrucken with a great feare, as now being to fight with a ſtrange, hardie, and cruell kind of men, without any great reſiſtance forſooke
the towre and fled. The watch-towre thus taken, and they that ſhould haue defended the ſame, ſome ſlaine, and ſome fled: they in the ſuburbs diſcouraged, and flying away were many of them wounded from aboue out of the watch-towre, but now gained by the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the other ſhips landed the ſouldiers, who entring the ſuburbs, put all they found there K to the ſword, euen vnto the laſt man. There was found great abundance of victuals, but farre greater ſtore of riches, in ſo much that it ſeemed to haue beene the ſpoile of ARABIA, PERSIA, and the rich INDIES.

Damiata in vain aſſaulted.

Now yet remained the ſtrong towne of DAMIATA, which was foorthwith aſſaulted by the Chriſtians, more to prooue if in that heat and ſuddaine feare it would be yeelded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But hauing done what they could both byſcaling and by other engines, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, and ſo retired. Neuertheleſſe, they lodged themſelues in the ſuburbs, and laied a great part of the armie betwixt the Sultan and the beſieged citie, to the intent that no ſupplie or victuals ſhould bee brought vnto it; yet both the enemie oftentimes attempted to haue entred the citie, and the beſieged to haue ſallied out, but L both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would haue done, and that not without the great loſſe of their men: for why, the towne was now on euery ſide ſo incloſed by the Chriſtians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, it fortuned that the riuer of NILE ſwelling with a great Eaſterne wind, riſe aboue the bankes, and ſo ouerflowed the places wherein the Chriſtians lay, that they could keepe nothing drie, and that moſt part of their victuals were therwith ſpoiled. With which vnſeaſonable riſing of the riuer the Chriſtians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagius the Popes legate, gaue themſelues to faſting and prayer, by the ſpace of three daies: But the wind falling the fourth day, and the riuer againe decreaſing, they gaue themſelues more earneſtly to prayer than before, thanking the Almightie, that as he had put them in a great feare, ſo he had in mercie againe com- M forted them.

Now with long lying began victuals to grow ſcant in the Sultans campe, ſo that he was glad to ſend away halfe of his armie vp againe into the countrey of CAIRE. At which time alſo it chanced (as if it had beene in an extreme and common danger of the Mahometan ſuperſtition) that embaſſadors ſent from Corradin Sultan of DAMASCO and HIERUSALEM, vnto the prin-

A ces of the Christian armie,came to sue for peace, both for himselfe and his brother the Ægyptian Sultan;promising in regard thereof againe to restore vnto them the Holy crosse,and whatsoeuer else himselfe,his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them: of which their offer,most part of the armie liked well, saying, That they had therefore taken vp armes for the recouerie of that which had been before gotten,and gained by the valour of the worthie Christian captaines, and had of late beene taken from them; and to blot out the ignominie of the losse thereof,to the end it should not bee said,that they could not leaue whole and entire vnto their children, what their fathers had got, when they had the keeping thereof; neither hauing lost it, bee able againe to recouer it: that all these things being restored,there rested not any further occasion of warre, A faire offer euill refused.
B or let to stay them as most victorious conquerours to returne home. Neuertheless Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legat (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars was before dead at PERUSIUM) with king Iohn,the masters of the kinghts Hospitalars and Templars,the duke of AUSTRIA, and the Germains, were of opinion to the contrarie: alleaging, That this sacred warre was vndertaken generally against the infidels, and for religions sake against the Mahometan superstition,whereof the kingdome of ÆGYPT was the chiefe seat and stay; and that therefore they ought especially to impugn that. Which persuasion,together with the authoritie of the persuaders,so preuailed,that the Sultans large offers were rejected, and so the embassadours dispatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin fearing that the Christians would at length come to HIERUSALEM, as the place they most desired; and doub-
C ting how he should be able to defend the same, foorthwith rased the wals thereof, and the more to deface it,ouerthrew and pluckt downe most of the goodly houses,and other stately buildings therein, sparing yet the Tower of Dauid and the Holy Sepulchre; which he is said to haue done at the humble request and intercession of the Christians of diuers countries, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Sarasins.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of DAMIATA, the plague began to arise in the campe, whereof so many died, that it began to repent the great commaunders of the armie that they had so much harkened to the persuasion of the Legate (a man making no profession of armes)rather than to the sound aduise of others,who by long experience taught the sudden alteration of matters of war, would willingly haue accepted of the Sultans large offers: So began
D Pelagius the Legate to be generally euill spoken off. There were now alreadie six moneths past since the beginning of the siege,and the Sultan lying in sight had not with him so great an armie as before, but onely the flower and choice of his people, hauing (as we haue before said) for want of victuals sent away the rest vp againe into the country. Now it fortuned that the Christians,as men wearie of the long siege,stood not so carefully vpon their guard,with watch & ward, as before,but gaue themselues more to ease: which the Sultan perceiuing, drew neerer vnto the towne, in hope vnder the couert of the silent night, to send new supplies vnto the besieged; which companies by him appointed for that seruice, couragiously set forward, in hope to haue deceiued the Christian sentinels, and so indeed came neere vnto the towne vnseene or discouered. And now the foremost of those companies were alreadie entred the towne; when the Succours sent vnto the besieged.
E Christians perceiuing them, and raising an alarme, put themselues in armes, and so furiously assailed the hindermost of them, and in such sort,that they which were before within, and those that were but now entred, fearing least the enemie in that hurly burly should pell mell enter in with the rest, shut them out of the gates, exposed to the butcherie, where they were all presently cut in peeces.

The Christians encouraged with this victorie,the next day leauing a great part of the armie before the town to continue the siege, presented themselues before the Sultans campe to giue him battell: who for all that well considering that the losse of a battell might endanger the whole state of his kingdome, would by no meanes be drawne out of his trenches, but lay still; wherewith the Christians, especially the Frenchmen (in their first charge naturally furious) greatly in-
F couraged, attempted to haue forcibly entred their rampiers, but not with successe answerable to their courage.For the Ægyptians perceiuing the small number of their enemies,notably repulsed them, and in fine enforced them to retire, hauing lost Gualter one of their chiefe commanders, with diuers others: yea king Iohn in assailing the camp,lost many of his men,& grieuously burnt in his face,hardly escaped himselfe with life.After which discomfiture they resolued not to thinke of any thing els but of the siege,& aboue all things to prouide that no succours should be broght

vnto the towne. They in the citie more ſtraitly beſet & beſieged than before, & now broght vn- G to extreame neceſsitie & famine, & out of all hope of reliefe, aſſembled themſelues to conſult of their affaires, and what were beſt for them to doe in ſo dangerous a ſtate: Some one or other of them by night or otherwiſe ſecretly flying into the campe. And that more was, the citie had vndoubtedly beene yeelded by the greater part, had not the chiefe commanders within mured vp the gates, and commaunded that none of the inhabitants vpon paine of death ſhould come vpon the wals, or rampiars, to the intent they ſhould not get out or caſt themſelues from aboue ouer the wals into the ditches. The chiefe commaunders and captaines went here and there vp and downe the citie, to ſearch and view all things, eſpecially the ſhops and ſtorehouſes, where finding ſmall ſtore of Wheat, they deuided it in ſmall portions among themſelues: the com- H mon people inforced with want, eat whatſoeuer came to hand, were it lawfull or vnlawfull, or forbidden by their ſuperſtition, wholſome or vnwholeſome, good or bad, ſalt or freſh, roſted or raw; and ſo prolonged their liues with ſuch things as they could find. Now the beſieged, not able to endure theſe extremities of the Famine (being the paſsion that moſt grieuouſly and often troubleth mankind) they were alſo attached with the wrath of God: for the Plague (the furie whereof had before attainted the campe of the Chriſtians, and afterward quite ceaſed) was now got into the citie, where it made a great ſlaughter: which mortalitie day by day in ſuch ſort increaſed, that men were not onely now no more to be found, to viſit, comfort, ſuccour, ſerue, and helpe the ſicke; but were wanting alſo to burie them, to draw them out of their beds and houſes, and to ſeperate the liuing from the dead: the ſtreets and houſes full of dead bodies, gaue foorth a moſt I horrible ſtinke, with a moſt grieuous and infectious aire: there was not any place cleare from the plague, or any man that could boaſt that he had not beene attainted therewith, or the feare thereof; and remedie was there none. The rage and furie of theſe two deuourers, the Famine, and Plague, deuoured them without number, chuſing rather ſo to die, than to ſubmit themſelues vnto their enemies; or to humble themſelues ſo low, as to craue their fauour. That they within were thus pinched with famine, the Chriſtians knew: but that the plague ſo raged among them, they knew not. Now the Chriſtians had of purpoſe caſt vp certaine trenches and baricadoes, for the keeping in of ſuch as the famine ſhould enforce to come out of the towne; thinking that the beſieged, to eaſe their wants, would thruſt the baſer ſort of the people and vnprofitable mouths out of the citie, vnto whom the Chriſtians meant not to giue any paſſage: for they hauing long K before ſo ſtraitly enuironed the citie, as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it, lay now ſtill expecting when the beſieged, enforced by neceſsitie, ſhould yeeld themſelues; and ſo without loſſe of any man, to become maſters of ſo ſtrong and rich a towne. It was now more than a yeare that the Chriſtians had thus lien at the ſiege of DAMIATA, when as certaine of the ſouldiours vpon a braueric aduentured with a few ſcaling ladders to mount the wall: in which doing, finding no reſiſtance, and withall hearing ſo great ſilence, as if there had beene no bodie within the citie; they ſtood ſtill a great while hearkening, but ſeeing that dumbe ſilence ſtill to continue, they returned vnto the campe, giuing the captaines to vnderſtand how the matter ſtood; who at the firſt thought it to bee ſome pollicie and fineneſſe of the deceitfull enemie: yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certaine men, to prooue their fortune, and to cauſe certaine L companies well appointed to ſcale one of the bulwarkes of the citie, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould haue gone againſt a puiſſant enemie, that had had the power to reſiſt them. And hereupon were ſcaling ladders brought foorth, and all things made readie, as for a great aſſault. So the Chriſtians courageouſly mounting the ladders, without reſiſtance tooke the bulwarke. But as they were entring farther into the towne, a ſmall companie of the Turkes and Barbarians (all the ſouldiors that the furie of the plague had left, and they alſo with the famine and infection of the aire very weake and feeble) met them, and began to make ſome ſmall reſiſtance, but to no purpoſe, being forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherewith the gates of the citie were mured, was preſently remooued, the gates ſet open, and the Chriſtians with enſignes diſplaied let in. But euen at the very entering in at the gates, they were attainted with a moſt greeuous and hor- M rible ſtinke, they ſaw a faire citie diſpeopled, and that which was moſt fearefull to behold, the ſtreets couered with bodies of the dead, and ſuch a dreadfull deſolation, as might mooue euen the enemie himſelfe to compaſsion. The Chriſtians were entred, as men appointed to haue done a great execution, and to haue made the channels run with blood, as men juſtly prouoked with the long ſiege and the paines they had endured; they had their ſwords and weapons in their hands, Damiata without reſiſtance taken by the Chriſtians.

Damiata vnpeopled by the ſiege.

A hands,but found none againſt whom to vſe them: for a man could not enter into any houſe, or goe into any ſtreet, but hee muſt paſſe ouer the dead, or others which being not yet altogether dead,were miſerably drawing toward their end. Of ſeuentie thouſand perſons in the citie, were not found aboue three thouſand aliue,and thoſe for the moſt part yet young children: for all the reſt were dead,taken away either with the ſword,famine,or the plague; the greateſt part whereof lay yet ſtinking aboue the ground vnburied. Theſe three thouſand that were left,were ſo maigre and poore,that pitie it was to behold them: vnto whom their liues were graunted,vpon condition that they ſhould make cleane the citie, and burie the dead,which they were three moneths in doing.

B Thus was DAMIATA taken by the Chriſtians the fift day of Nouember, in the yeare 1221, after it had ben more than a yeare by them beſieged. The ſpoile there taken was great,for beſides the rich marchandiſe brought thither from farre,was found great ſtore of gold, ſiluer,and precious ſtones. The Chriſtians thus enriched(and the citie made clean)ſtaied there more than a yeare after,as in a Colonie wherein they had been willing to dwell, forgetfull of their owne countrey. In the beginning of theſe warres, the princes of the armie had with one conſent agreed, That whatſoeuer citie or territorie ſhould by them be taken from the Turkes or Infidels, ſhould be giuen vnto the king of HIERUSALEM,whom after the departure of the king of HUNGARIE they had made generall of the whole armie. But now that the citie was taken, Pelagius the legat,pretending,That by the vertue of his legation,it belonged vnto him to diſpoſe of all things taken
C in that ſacred warre,(as a man not vnmindfull of his maſter) adjudged the citie from thenceforth to belong vnto the See of ROME: With which indignitie & wrong, the king inwardly diſcontented (and yet for the authoritie of the Legate,diſſembling the matter) withdrew himſelfe, and ſo retired to PTOLEMAIS. 1221

The yeare following,Pelagius wearie to ſee the armes of the Chriſtians to corrupt with ruſt, and nothing doing: conſidering the deſire and hope he had vtterly to haue ruinated the infidels, together with their ſuperſtition,commaunded,That euery man ſhould againe take vp armes for the proſecuting of this warre againſt the Sultan, and the beſieging of CAIRE. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would,or could, the ſoldiors little regarding his command, with one voice cried out,That they would not be commanded by any, but by the king of HIE-
D RUSALEM onely. So that the Legate,enforced by the ſouldiors,was glad to ſend vnto the king, to requeſt him to returne againe vnto DAMIATA, and to take vpon him the charge for the managing of that warre,taken in hand for the defence of the Chriſtian religion: who for all that excuſed himſelfe from ſo doing, one while by his owne particular affaires, another while by his owne indiſpoſition: yet in fine, preſſed and ouercome with the praiers and requeſts of the other Latine princes,he returned to DAMIATA, at the ſelfe ſame time that the duke of BAVARIA arriued there with a goodly companie of braue men, brought thither out of his owne countrey, after he had been now from thence ten moneths abſent. 1222

Pelagius the Legat perſuadeth the princes of the Chriſtian armie to proceed for the conqueſt of Aegypt.

The Legate deſirous of the proſecution of this warre, requeſted and vrged the king,with the reſt of the princes and great commanders,without delay to take the field, telling them, That the
E enterpriſe of the Holy warre was growne old,and cold,by thoſe long delaies and protracting of the time: and that they which kept wars ſo far from home, ought to make haſt to force the enemie,to take all occaſions to loſe no time but euer to be doing,and to prooue all things for the annoying of the enemie: and that that was the way, whereby the woorthies of antient times, both kings and emperours,had gained vnto themſelues empires, glorie, greatneſſe, and wealth: That it was for them that were inuaded and aſſailed, vpon whoſe liues depended the ſafetie of their countrey, their wiues, their children, and goods, to delay and prolong the time as they might,to delude the enemie,to fruſtat his deſigns, to defeat his attempts,and with delaies to dally him off,vntill that hauing thereby weakned his forces,he ſhould together with his courage looſe alſo his hope: CAIRE (he ſaid) to be indeed a great citie, but yet that the greateſt cities that euer
F were,had by warres become great deſarts,forced by the power of their puiſſant and ſpeedie enemies: And that great empires, as were thoſe of the Sultans, ought not to be inuaded or aſſailed by any forraine force,if they were not at the firſt onſet ouerthrown,or at leaſtwiſe ſo weakned,as that they could not afterwards lift vp their heads or recouer themſelues; for otherwiſe, that they which had prepared a diſtruction for others, ſhould fall into the ſame themſelues: That it behooued either not to haue attempted or aſſailed ÆGYPT at all; or elſe now after it had beene

once aſſailed, not ſo to giue it ouer before it were conquered. The king of HIERUSALEM, G whether it were that he were pricked with the griefe, That being called the king of the Holyland, he could not haue the citie of DAMIATA (vnder his leading and conduct woon by the Chriſtians come to the ſacred war) giuen vnto him by the Legate; or that he had before prooued that the higher countrey of ÆGYPT was not without great and manifeſt danger to be attempted; ſaid, That that he would not in any caſe go: alleaging that honorable and ſacred war to haue ben taken in hand, onely for the recouerie of the Holy land, and not for the winning of MEMPHIS, BABYLON, or THEBES in ÆGYPT; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie or alleageance, and could not poſsibly be kept by force: Whereas SYRIA, by Godfrey of BUILLON and the other great princes his aſſociats, entred into, conquered and poſſeſſed; and ſince his time, by diuers other Chriſtian kings and princes holden, was H in right their owne: And that therefore he greatly commended the forwardneſſe, the dilligence, the courage, the deſire, and whatſoeuer thing elſe Pelagius commended: but that hee ought to employ the ſame in SYRIA, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawne or expected. Neuertheleſſe the Legat wedded to his owne opinion, by the power of his authoritie, commanded the king of HIERUSALEM, the duke of BAVARIA, with the reſt of the great commanders and captaines, to take vp their armes and to get them into the field vpon the expedition by him appointed againſt the Sultan; threatning the paine of the high ſentence of excommunication againſt him or them, that ſhould ſhew themſelues backward or vnI willing to doe what he had commaunded. So as it were enforced by the Legat, they began with euill will and woorſe ſpeed to ſet forward in Auguſt, in the verie hotteſt time of the yeare. At which time the Sultan beholding the great armie of the Chriſtians, in number about ſeuentie thouſand, retired as a man afraid into ſuch places as he thought beſt, farther off: which the Legat ſeeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of war) rejoyced greatly, as if the victorie had beene already more than halfe gained; commending vnto the heauens them that he ſaw couragiouſly marching forward, ſaying, That fortune alwaies fauoured the valiant, and that vnto cowards all things fell ſtill out to the woorſt. By the way the Chriſtians ceized vpon a bridge, which the enemie had made ouer the NILE, and cut in peeces ſuch cómpanies as were left for the keeping thereof. So marching on, they drew neere vnto CAIRE, and there in the ſight of that great and K rich citie, encamped: where running vp and downe, the more to terrifie them of the citie, prouoked them to battell, vpbraiding vnto them their lazines, their cowardiſe, and ſloth, brauing them (if they were men) to come out: Yet for all that, they would not ſo do, but keeping themſelues cloſe and couert within the citie, let them alone to brag and boaſt at their owne pleaſure. This ſiege continued long, of purpoſe protracted ſtill from day to day by them of the citie: and the great opinion the Chriſtians had of their owne valour, with the ſmall regard they had of their enemies, made them ſo proud and careleſſe, that they remembred no more to take good care of the warre, of their dutie, their watch, or their ſentinels: their confidence was in their owne valour and good fortune, not conſidering or remembring that they were come into ÆGYPT, and that they had put themſelues within the trenches, ſallies, channels, and cuts, of a deceitfull riuer, which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies, but alſo fortified them; who by how much L they were the leſſe valiant and leſſe vnderſtood of the art of war, the more they vſed of craft and ſubtiltie for the preſeruing of themſelues. So the craftie enemies drew the Chriſtians out at length, abuſing them with many delaies and deceits; making ſemblance of great feare, to make themſelues the leſſe to be feared; and more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the paſſages and ſtraights of the countrey, and reſeruing themſelues vnto the occaſions and aduantages both of the time, and of their enemies, might circumuent them and entrap them at ſuch time as they leaſt feared any ſuch matter. The Chriſtians, at all aduenture had encamped themſelues in a low ground, within the banks and cauſies of that fennie countrey, vnder the couert thereof, thinking themſelues ſafe as in their tenches, againſt all ſudden ſallies or attempts of their enemies. But theſe places wherein they lay, were ſoft and durtie, for ſo much as the coun- M trey people vſed at their pleaſure to water them by channels & ſluces out of the riuer of NILE: which now pluckt vp and opened, the riuer began to riſe and ouerflow all. Then too late they perceiued themſelues taken as in a grin, without power to defend themſelues, or to make any reſiſtance, or by any other meanes to ſhew their valour. So the riuer ſtill ariſing and ouerflowing, gaue vnto the Turks and Ægyptians good hope of their wars, and of a victorie more deſired than

The Chriſtians encamped vnder the leaue of the riuer Nile.

A than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Christians lay encamped, was couered with water, so high that the victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to stand or lie drie in.

Now at the same time the Ægyptians had taken the high places, with the passages vpon the wals and banks in that drowned countrey, to the intent that the Christians should not be able to retire or to saue themselues out of the bogs and marishes couered ouer with water. So was their rash valour and presumptuous confidence in themselues, exposed vnto the enemies shot and furie; and when they would by force haue defended themselues, their hardinesse was ouercome by the craftie subtiltie of the weak enemie. Then began euery man to crie out against Pelagius the
B Legat, accusing, condemning, and railing at him: the king himselfe they blamed not, for that he had done his dutie, in dissuading of this expedition, and was contrarie to his good liking himselfe drawn into this warre, the charge whereof he had not without great intreatie taken vpon him: neither might he with his credit well complaine of this misfortune, least in so doing, he might seeme to haue had no comfort in himselfe. But as for the Legate, what counsell could he then giue, what counsell could hee then take for himselfe? They of VENICE, PISA, and GENUA, left at DAMIATA, were indeed strong at sea, but how could they come to relieue him at CAIRE? And how, or by what forces could the Christians breake out of the banks and sluces of the cuts and channels; which winding in and out with a thousand inextricable turnings, inclosed them, beset also on euery side with the victorious enemie. After they had been thus coupt
C vp, and enuironed with the waters three daies, you might haue seene the poore soldiers in euery place fall downe dead for want of food and sleepe, and so perrish in the water; the like miserable kind of death, the rest were also in short time after to expect: other helpe was there none but to yeeld vnto necessitie, and to accept of such conditions as it should please the proud enemie to propound. Now the Sultan desired not so much their liues, as the libertie of his countrey: and therefore required to haue the citie of DAMIATA againe restored vnto him, and all things else in such sort as was before the besieging thereof: and so the Christians without more adoe to depart his countrey. Hard conditions, if a man respect the hope whereupon the Christians had vndertaken this war, and were so come into ÆGYPT, with the toyle by them there endured: but vnto him that will but enter into the consideration of mens affaires, and especially in martiall
D matters, it will seeme but an accident to be yeelded vnto, the like whereof hath oftentimes happned vnto the greatest men of the world. These conditions (such as they were) were by the distressed Christians accepted of. But when they were brought to DAMIATA, and there propounded vnto the Christians there left, a great contention began to arise among them: Some said that they would not accept of them, or surrender the towne, which being kept would be a stay for all the affaires of the Christians in the East, and a most commodious place for them to haue recourse vnto; but being restored and lost, carried away with it all the hope of the Christians, and that therefore it were better to indure all extremities than to receiue such dishonourable and hurtfull a peace. Others of the contrarie opinion said, That they ought not to forsake them that were in danger before CAIRE, nor to expose them vnto the butcherie, but to haue a Christian
E compassion of so many thousands of soules as there lay distressed, seeing they might bee saued by the surrendrie of that one towne: Townes (they said) consisted of the number of men, and not men of the enclosures of wals and ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the deliuering vp of the towne, seeing the other obstinatly set downe to the contrarie, withdrawing themselues from the counsell, presently tooke vp armes, and by force entred the houses of them that were of contrarie opinion, and tooke from them their weapons, by that means and perforce to constrain them to yeeld to their desire. As soone as they that lay before CAIRE (almost drowned in the waters) vnderstood of this dissention at DAMIATA about the deliuerie of the towne, they sent them word, That if they would not yeeld the towne vnto the Sultan, they would foorthwith send to PTOLEMAIS, which would not faile to do what should be commanded, to haue it in the ariſing of new troubles, let vs in the meane time againe returne vnto the troubled affaires of the Turkes, Greekes, and Latines, at CONSTANTINOPLE, and in the leſſer ASIA.
F steed of DAMIATA surrendred vnto the Ægyptians. So was DAMIATA againe yeeded vnto the infidels, and so great labours of the Christians taken at the siege and winning thereof, all lost. That which made the indignitie thereof more tollerable, was that Meledin the Sultan, hauing without bloodshed gained so great a victorie, did neither by word or deed any thing in despite or reproch of the Christians, but vsed thē with all courtesie, relieuing them also with victuals & such other things as they wanted, & by faithfull guides conducting them in safetie out of the country.

The death of Henry emperour of Conſtantinople. Henry the ſecond emperour of the Latins at CONSTANTINOPLE, after he had (as is afore-ſaid) with much adoe repreſſed the furie of the Bulgarians and Scythes, his barbarous enemies, and ſo giuen peace vnto the miſerable countrey of THRACIA, died, hauing raigned a moſt trou-Peter emperour. bleſome raigne, about the ſpace of eleuen yeares. After whom ſucceeded Peter, countie of AUS-SERRE, his ſonne in law, third emperour of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE: who in the beginning of his empire willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to reuenge himſelfe of Theodorus
Angelus, a great prince of EPIRUS, competitor of his empire, beſieged him in DIRRACHI- K VM; which ſtrong citie, the ſaid Theodorus had but a little before ſurpriſed, belonging to the Venetian ſeignorie. At which ſiege Peter the emperour lying, was ſo cunningly by the wilie Greeke vſed, that a peace was vpon moſt honourable conditions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kind of friendſhip joyned. Inſomuch, that the emperour at his requeſt, not well aduiſed, came vnto him as his gueſt: who now of his enemie become his hoſte, entertained him with all the formalities that faigned friendſhip could deuiſe. But hauing him now in his power, and fearing no harme, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hoſpitalitie, he moſt traiterouſly ſlew him, as he was yet in the middeſt of his banquet. Of whoſe end, ſome others yet otherwiſe report, as that he ſhould by the ſame Theodorus haue been intercepted about the pleaſant woods of TEMPE in THESSALIA, as he was trauelling from ROME to CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſo afterwards L to haue been by him cruelly put to death. Of whoſe misfortune, Tepulus gouernour of CON-STANTINOPLE vnderſtanding, for the more ſafetie of the ſtate in that vacancie of the Greeke empire, made peace with Theodorus for fiue yeares, and the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert emperor of Conſtantinople. Robert (the ſonne of the aforeſaid vnfortunate emperour Peter) with his mother to CONSTAN-TINOPLE, and there in his fathers ſtead was ſolemnely ſaluted emperour; but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for ſhortly after his comming he tooke to wife a faire young ladie, the daughter of a great rich and noble matrone of the citie, but before betrothed vnto a gallant gentleman, a Burgundion borne: with whom the old ladie broke her promiſe, and more carefull of her daughters preferment, than fidelitie, gaue her in marriage vnto the new em-perour. The joy of which ſo great an honour was in ſhort time conuerted not into a deadly hea- M uineſſe, but euen into death it ſelfe: For the young Burgundion, more enraged with the wrong with a companie of luſtie tall ſouldiors, acquainted with his purpoſe, and awaiting his time when the emperour was abſent, by night entred the court with his deſperat followers, and firſt meeting mother

A mother into the sea: and so fled out of the citie into the woods and mountaines, with those desperat cut-throates, the ministers of his barbarous crueltie. The emperour pierced to the heart with this so great a disgrace, shortly after went to ROME, to what purpose was not certainely knowne; but in returning backe againe through ACHAIA, he there died, leauing behind him his yoong sonne Baldwin, yet but a child, begotten by his first wife, to succeed him in the empire: who by the name of Baldwin the second was crowned the fift and last emperour of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE. And for because he was as yet but yoong and vnfit for the gouernment, he was by the consent of the nobilitie affianced, and afterward married vnto Martha the yoonger daughter of Iohn Brenne king of HIERUSALEM, a woorthie old captaine (but as then B gouernour of RAVENNA; which citie, he being certaine yeares before sent for out of FRANCE for that purpose, by Honorius the Pope, he notably defended against the emperour Frederick his sonne in law, but that affinitie was before broken off by the death of the said emperours wife) who now sent for out of ITALIE vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, had committed to his charge and protection both the person and empire of the young emperour Baldwin, now his sonne in law. Which great and heauie charge he for certaine yeares after worthely and faithfully discharged, vntill such time as that Baldwin was himselfe grown able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, with the countries of THRACIA, THESSALIA, MACEDONIA, ACHAIA, PELOPONESUS, and the rest of the prouinces of GREECE, were all or for the most part vnder the gouernment of Baldwin the emperour, C the Venetians, or other the inferiour Latine princes: yet were the oppressed Greekes, the naturall inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing more than that their forraine gouernment; but wholly deuoted to their owne naturall princes, Theodorus Lascaris, & Alexius Comnenus, the one raigning at NICE in BITHYNIA, and the other at TRAPEZOND in PONTUS, both called by the Greekes, emperours, and so of them generally reputed. Lascaris of the two the better beloued, and by far of greatest power, had during the time of his raigne fought many an hard battell (as is in part before declared) and strongly fortified his cheefe citties against the inuasion of his enemies, as well the Turkes as the Latines: and so hauing as it were erected a new empire in ASIA, and there raigned eighteene yeares, died, leauing behind him one Iohn Ducas Batazes, that had married the faire ladie Irene his daughter and heire, to succeed him in the Greeke empire in ASIA. This Iohn was a man of a great wit and spirit, and of more grauitie, for his yeares, than was Theodorus his father in law; neuer vndertaking any thing before he had thereof well considered; and once resolued, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance therof. So that it was not vnfitly said of the Greeks, The planting of this new empire to haue required the celeritie of Lascaris, but the stay thereof to haue been the grauitie of Ducas. He in the beginning of his raigne, in very short time hauing set all things in good order, greatly augmented his legions, and shooting at a fairer marke than the empire he yet held, euen the imperiall citie it selfe, and the recouerie of all THRACIA and GRECIA out of the hands of the Latines, which could not be done without a fleet at sea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the lesser ASIA. And so hauing rigged vp and manned a strong fleet, and scouring the E seas, in one Summer tooke in most of the Ilands of the ÆGEUM, namely, LESBOS, CHIOS, SAMOS, ICARIA, COOS, with the famous Island of the RHODES, and many others also. And not so contented to haue encreased his empire, the next spring crossing the HELLESPONT and landing his forces, first inuaded CHERSONESUS; and afterward to terrifie the Latines, forraged the countrey far and neere, euen to the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, no man daring to oppose himselfe against him. At which time also he took many cities & strong towns alongst the sea coast, as CALLIOPOLIS, SESTUS, & CARDIA, with diuers others therabout, some by force, some by composition, the Greeks almost in euery place yeelding themselues, where they were not so oppressed by the Latines as that they could not helpe him. Now by these proceedings of the Greek emperor in EUROPE, was plainly to be seen again the ruin of the Latin empire in the East, F all things prospering in his hand according to his hearts desire, Assan the Bulgarian king, no small terror both vnto the Latins & the Greeks, moued with the fame hereof, by his embassadors sent of purpose vnto Iohn the Greek emperor, offred his daughter Helena in mariage vnto yong Theodore his son: of which offer the emperor gladly accepted. For being busied in his greater affaires, he was loth to haue so great a king as was Assan, his enemie, able at his pleasure to cal in the Scythes; who with their multitude, as a great flood breaking ouer the bankes, had oftentimes caried away whole countries before them. Wherefore the match agreed vpon, the two great princes by appointment met together about CHERSONESUS, where Helena, king Aſſans daughter, being then about ten yeares old, was with great joy and triumph ſolemnly married vnto yong Theodor the emperours ſonne, much of the ſame age. Not long after embaſſadours were alſo ſent vnto the emperour from the Sultan of ICONIUM, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to haue driuen the Turkes out of PERSIA and the farre Eaſterne countries, began now alſo to cut them ſhort in their prouinces in the leſſer ASIA: wherefore the Sultan of ICONIUM, fearing leaſt whiles he had his hands full of thoſe his moſt dreadfull enemies, of themſelues too ſtrong for him, he ſhould behind be ſet vpon by the Greeke emperour, and ſo thruſt out of all, ſent theſe embaſſadours vnto him for peace; which he for many cauſes eaſily graunted. Firſt, for that he foreſaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintaine warre at once both in ASIA againſt the Turks, and in EUROPE againſt the Latines: then by this warlike nation, as by a moſt ſure bulwarke, to keepe his owne countries ſafe from the inuaſion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whoſe furie he ſhould himſelfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both ſufficient reaſons for the emperour to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: ſo was the peace concluded, and the embaſſadors diſpatched. This peace exceedingly comforted and afterward inriched the emperours countries: for now the people generally deliuered of the feare and miſerie of continuall warre, began on all hands to fall to their fruitfull labours of peace. Yea the emperour himſelfe to the ſtirring vp of others to the like good husbandrie, cauſed ſo much land to be plowed vp for corne, & ſo many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully ſuffice his owne houſe, and ſuch poore as he daily relieued; with a great ouerplus, which he cauſed to be carefully laid vp in ſtore. He kept alſo great heards of cattell, flockes of ſheepe, and foules of all ſorts without number. The like he cauſed his kinſmen & other of the nobilitie to doe, to the intent that euery great man hauing ſufficient for his own ſpending at home, ſhould not take any thing from the poore countreyman, that ſo euery man contenting himſelfe with his owne, might liue in peace without the grieuance of others. By which means in a few yeares euery barne and garnarie was full of corne, euery ſellar full of wines, euery ſtable full of cattell, euery ſtorehouſe full of victuals: the fields were couered with corne and cattell, and in euery mans yeard were to be ſeene all kinds of tame foules, without number. At which time alſo there fortuned a great famine among the Turkes: inſomuch, as that they were inforced to fetch their greateſt reliefe from out of the Chriſtian countries. Then might you haue ſeene euery way full of Turks, men, women and children, trauelling to and fro into the emperours prouinces for victuals: their gold, their ſiluer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Chriſtians for food; a little corne was woorth a good commoditie, euery bird, ſheepe, and kid, was ſold at a great rate: by which meanes the countrey mens houſes were full of the Turkes wealth, and the emperours cofers ſtored with their treaſure. The greatneſſe of the profit ariſing of this plentie of the Chriſtians, and penurie of the Turks, may hereby eaſily be gathered, for that of egges daily ſold, ſo much money was in ſhort time gathered, as made the empreſſe an imperiall crowne of gold, richly ſet with moſt orient pearle and pretious ſtones of great price; which the emperour called Ouata, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus flouriſhed the Greeke empire in the leſſer ASIA, vnder the good emperour Iohn Ducas. The Turks at the ſame time declining as faſt, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and conſumed with famine at home.

Plentie enſuing of peace.

1227 Fredericke the Germane emperour, had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land: for performance whereof, he was hardly called vpon, firſt by Honorius quartus the Pope; and afterward for his long delay, excommunicated by Gregorie the ninth: not ſo much for the zeale they had vnto the ſacred warre, as to buſie the emperour a farre off in warres abroad, whileſt they in the meane time, to increaſe their owne power, drew from him ſome one part or other of his empire: which he not without cauſe fearing, from day to day, and yeare to yeare, delayed the performance of his vow, ſo much vrged by the Pope; by his preſence and power, ſtill diſappointing all the ſlie deſigns of the Popes, conceiued or put in practiſe againſt him. But now at length mooued, or more truly to ſay, enforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he reſolued to ſet forward in the yeare 1227. About which time Iolenta or Yoland his wife, the king of HIERUSALEM his daughter, died in childbed, being before deliuered of a faire ſonne. Now were met together at BRVNDUSIVM an exceeding great number of courageous

A gious and deuout ſouldiors out of all parts of Chriſtendome, eſpecially out of GERMANIE, vnder the leading of Lodowicke Lantgraue of THURINGE, & Sigefride biſhop of ANGUSTA; all ſtirred vp with the fame of ſo notable an expedition. But whileſt they there ſtaied ſomewhat long, the plague ariſe among the Germanes, whereof in ſhort time after, both the Lantgraue and the biſhop died, with many of the other beſt ſouldiors. The emperour himſelfe was vpon his way as farre as MALEA, vpon the farther ſide of PELOPONESUS, where falling deſperatly ſick of a burning feauer, and put backe with contrarie winds, he returned againe to BRUNDUSIUM, and there ſtaied a great while after. Then began the Pope againe to fret and fume, and to caſt out his excommunications againſt the emperour, as if it had beene thunder and lightening, accuſing
B him of perjurie, infidelitie, and many other grieuous crimes; of all which the emperour was readie to haue cleared himſelfe in an open aſſemblie of the princes of GERMANIE, to haue beene holden at RAVENNA, had it not beene by the Pope and the troubles of LOMBARDIE diſturbed. Neuertheleſſe, he by open proteſtations and writings fully anſwered all the Popes vniuſt accuſations wherewith he had been ſo hardly charged: And yet deſirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, hauing ſet all things in good order, and put himſelfe againe in readineſſe, he ſet forward from BRUNDUSIUM in Auguſt in the yeare 1228, leauing the charge of his 1228 territories in ITALIE, vnto the care of Reynolde duke of SPOLETO. The Pope diſpleaſed, for that the emperour at his departure had neither reconciled himſelfe, nor taken his leaue of him, and deeming therein his excommunications and fulminations to be contemned & ſet at naught;
C fell into ſuch a rage and choller, that he forbad all the Chriſtian forces that were in SYRIA to follow him, or to yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters alſo vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy land: which very letters the Sultan afterwards ſent vnto the emperour. Neither yet ſo contented, immediatly after his departure ran vpon his kingdome of NAPLES, and ſo filled all ITALIE with troubles. Neuertheleſſe the emperor happely arriuing at PTOLEMAIS, was there honourably receiued of the Chriſtian forces, notwithſtanding the Popes threats and curſings. Of whoſe arriuall, Sultan Meledin hauing intelligence, and loath to draw ſo mightie an enemie as was the emperour, vpon him, by his embaſſadours offered him moſt honourable conditions of peace: Which be-
D fore he would accept of, he by conuenient meſſengers ſent vnto the Pope, to haue his conſent & approbation. But ſuch was his rage, as that he would not ſuffer the meſſengers to come into his preſence, or vouchſafe to read the emperours letters, being brought vnto him; but like a mad man preſently rent them in peeces. All which indignities the emperour neuertheleſſe tooke in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turks for ten years, vpon theſe conditions: firſt, That he ſhould be annointed and accounted king of HIERUSALEM: then, That the holy citie, with all the land of PALESTINE, ſhould be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That he might at his pleaſure fortefie the cities of NAZARETH and IOPPE: fourthly, That all ſuch places as were ſometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth king of HIERUSALEM, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, ſhould be reſtored: and laſt of all, That all priſoners on both ſides ſhould be ſet at libertie without ranſome. So the peace concluded, the emperour with his armie came to the deſolate
E citie of HIERUSALEM, and there vpon Eaſter day was with great ſolemnitie crowned king thereof in the yeare 1229. And ſo hauing repaired the wals of the citie, with certaine churches, forti- 1229 fied NAZARETH and IOPPE, and furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons, and appointed Raynold duke of BAVARIA his leiutenāt in SYRIA, he with two gallies only returned into ITALIE: Euer ſince which time the kings of SICILIA haue beene alſo called kings of HIERUSALEM, and haue oftentimes borne the armes of both kingdomes.

Fredericke the emperor crowned king of Hierusalem.

The next yeare Pope Gregorie in deſpite of the emperour Frederick, more than for any zeale 1230
vnto the Chriſtian religion, did by the Dominicans & Franſciſcans (two orders of friers but then lately erected) as by his trumpeters, ſtir vp a woonderfull number of zealous and deuout Chriſtians, almoſt in euery part of Chriſtendome, to take vpon them the croſſe (as they termed it) the F cogniſance of ſuch, as had by vow bound themſelues to take vp armes againſt the Turks & Saraſins, for the recouerie or defence of the Holy land. Theſe deuout men met together in great number, vnder the leading of Theobald king of NAVAR, Americus countie of MONT FORT, Henrie countie of CHAMPAIGNE, and others too long to rehearſe (of purpoſe ſtirred vp to trouble the ten yeares peace before concluded betwixt the emperour and the Turks in SYRIA) ſet forward, and after long trauell paſsing the ſtrait of BOSPHORUS, not far from CONSTANTI-

NOPLE into BYTHINIA, came to the riuer of SANGARIUS, and there ſtaied a while to refreſh themſelues. Afterwards paſsing through GALATIA, and ſo from countrey to countrey through the leſſer ASIA, they came at length vnto the ſtraits of the mountaine AMANUS (a part of the mountaine TAURUS) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of ICONIUM himſelfe not far off encamped with a ſtrong armie. Neuertheleſſe the valiant countie MONTFORT, which had the leading of the vantguard, couragiouſly marching forward, by plaine force opened the paſſage of the mountaine, hauing ſlaine or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof: the king of NAVAR in the meane time (though in vaine) aſſailing the Sultan in his campe; who fearing the great power of the Chriſtians, kept himſelfe within his own ſtrength and would not ſtir. Wherfore the king ſeeing it to no purpoſe there longer to ſtay, diuiding his armie into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the Countie, placing his baggage in the midſt, & the beſt of his ſouldiers in the rereward. But whileſt they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turks better acquainted with thoſe paſſages, were ſtill at hand, aſſailing them ſometime behind, ſometime on the one ſide, ſometime on the other, as they ſaw occaſion: and at length taking them at an aduantage in a great plaine, ſet vpon them (now before almoſt ſpent with hunger and trauell) and there ſlew of them an exceeding great number. But by the comming on of the night, the battell was broken off, and the Chriſtians repairing vnto their enſignes, paſſed the ſtraits, and ſo at length arriued at ANTIOCH, hauing loſt by the way the greateſt part of the armie, with all their wealth, their victuals, & moſt part of their horſes: the remnant yet left, hauing a little refreſhed themſelues, were by ſea tranſported to PTOLEMAIS; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to GAZA, where they lay, & of the ſpoile of the countrey greatly enriched themſelues. As for any other great matters they were not able of themſelues to take in hand; and help of ſuch forces as the emperor had before left at HIERUSALEM, and other places, they could haue none; hauing expreſſe charge from the emperour himſelfe, not to do any thing againſt the enemie, tending to the breach of the ten yeares league: which the Turks well perceiuing, and that they had to do but with theſe new come gueſts, and ſome few others their partakers; hauing gathered together their forces, lay in ambuſh for them in euery corner to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that theſe of GAZA going far into the countrey, and returning laded with ſpoile, were ſet vpon by the Turks; whom they (caſting away the ſpoile they had before taken) notably repulſed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a far greater number of Turks than before; which now comming on, charged the Chriſtians, who all that night had ſtood watching in their armour, and ſo joyned with them a moſt cruell battell: wherein the Chriſtians ſhewed ſo much valour as was poſsible for men to do; but wearied with long fight, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, they were ouercome and ſlaine almoſt euery mothers ſonne. Among the reſt, the two counties Americus and Henrie, fell: the king of NAVAR himſelfe hardly eſcaped by the exceeding ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, & by vncertaine waies wandring vp and downe the countrey, not knowing well which way to take, after two daies came by good fortune to IOPPE: ſome few others eſcaped by flight to PTOLEMAIS, the heauie meſſengers of the misfortune of their fellowes. The king afterwards viſiting the Holy places at HIERUSALEM, returned home into his counrrey, with ſome few of his followers, hauing performed nothing of that the world expected.

The Chriſtians by perſuaſion of the Templars breake their league with the Turkes

About foure yeares after, Raynold duke of BAVARIA, whom Frederick the emperour had left his lieutenant in HIERUSALEM, died: hauing by the ſpace of fiue yeares peaceably gouerned that bruiſed kingdome. After whoſe death, the Templars (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the league, but that they were by his authoritie and wiſedome reſtrained) now tooke occaſion to ſtir vp the people to take vp armes againſt the Turks, without reſpect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to enſue. Whereof the Ægyptian Sultan hearing, raiſed a great armie, ſending alſo for the Choraſines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto BABYLON, to come vnto his aid. Thus become verie ſtrong, he firſt laid ſiege to GAZA, but a little before repaired and fortified by the king of NAVAR and the Templars, which he at length tooke by force, and put to ſword all that were therein, as well the citizens as the garriſon ſouldiers. In like manner he dealt alſo with them of ASCALON, and other places as he went. To repreſſe this his furie, the Templars and Hoſpitalers had aſſembled the whole ſtrength of that weake kingdome, and neere vnto TYBERIAS came to haue giuen him battell. Who vpon their

A their approch haſtely retired, as if he had for feare ſhunned battell. But whiles the Chriſtians as victors the night following lay negligently encamped along the riuer ſide, he returning backe again with his armie, came vpon them before they were well aware, halfe ſleeping halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed, with a moſt horrible outcrie. The Chriſtians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the ſuddenneſſe of the matter, haſtily and diſorderly (as muſt needs in ſo great a confuſion) tooke vp their weapons, ſuch as came firſt to hand, and ſo courageiouſly oppoſed themſelues againſt their enemies. There was fought a moſt terrible and doubtfull battell, and that alſo for a long ſpace; the Chriſtians ſtill encouraging one another to do their laſt deuoir. But the Turks ſtill keeping their order, againſt the diſordered Chriſtians, and far mo
B alſo than they in number, preuailed, and there ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, but not without the loſſe of many thouſands alſo of their owne men, which there lay dead vpon the ground. Moſt part of the beſt commaunders both of the Templars and Hoſpitalers were there ſlaine, ſuch as eſcaped fled to TYRE.

The Sultan encouraged with ſo great a victorie, marched foorthwith to HIERUSALEM, 1234 which he tooke without reſiſtance; and there put to ſword all that he found therein, men, wo- Hieruſalem taken and raſed by the Turks.
men and children, without reſpect of ſex or age: and afterwards hauing rifled the ſame, raſed it downe to the ground, burning the buildings, and ouerthrowing the wals, not long before repai red by the emperour Frederick, and much beautified by his lieutenant Raynold. And carried with an infernall furie, defaced, and moſt ſhamefully polluted the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour, ne-
C uer before then violated or defiled, but of all nations vntouched & reuerenced; which for all that, may ſeeme to haue been done, not ſo much for the hatred vnto the Chriſtian religion, as for that it was the place of all others moſt deſired of the Chriſtians; and for the gaining whereof they had vndertaken ſo many hard aduentures, and ſo much troubled the Saracins and Turks

Thus by the vnfaithfull breaking of the league, the moſt antient and famous citie of HIERUSALEM, ſometime the terreſtriall ſeat of the moſt Higheſt, and glorie of the world, fell againe into the power of the Turks and infidels, in the yeare 1234, in whoſe hands it hath euer ſince remained euen vntill this day: now a poore ruinous citie, gouerned by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous than for the ſepulcher of our bleſſed Sauiour; againe repaired and much viſited by the deuout Chriſtians, and not vnreuerenced by the Turkes
D themſelues.

The loſſe of this ſo famous a citie, together with the dangerous ſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, much grieued the other Chriſtian princes of the Weſt; eſpecially Frederick the emperor, by whom it had beene but a few yeares before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedie the matter according to his deſire, being himſelfe grieuouſly entangled with the endleſſe troubles which Pope Gregorie had (as it were by tradition) left vnto the other Popes his ſucceſſors, for the troubling of his ſtate, vntill at length they had depriued him of his empire, and not long after of his life alſo. Among other the great princes, careſull for the poor Chriſtians in SYRIA, was Lewis the French king the ninth of that name, a prince of great power, but of all others of that time moſt famous for his zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion, and for his deuout manner of life: who
E abounding in wealth and all things elſe of a great prince to be deſired; and withall oftentimes conſidering the notable expeditions many Chriſtian princes had (to their immortall glorie) made, ſome into SYRIA, ſome into ÆGYPT againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians; was many times about to haue taken vpon himſelfe the like. But in theſe his deuout motions, before he could reſolue vpon ſo great an enterpriſe, he fell dangerouſly ſicke, in ſo much that for certaine daies he lay ſpeechleſſe deuoid of ſenſe and motion, without any ſigne of life, but that hee did a little faintly breath: when comming a little vnto himſelfe (whether mooued with deuotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine, is vncertaine) the firſt thing he asked for, was the croſſe (the cogniſance of ſuch as vowed themſelues vnto the ſacred warre) which he ſolemnely receiued at the hands of the F biſhop of PARIS. At which time alſo his three brethren, Alphonſus countie of POITIERS, Charles countie of ANIOU, and Robert countie of ARTHOIS, with Hugh duke of BURGUNDIE, William earle of FLANDERS, Hugh countie of S. Paul, and afterwards moſt of the nobilitie of FRANCE, to accompanie the king, tooke vpon them the ſame charge. Neuertheleſſe, it was not by and by taken in hand, but ſome few yeares let paſſe in the conſultation and preparation for ſo great an enterpriſe: many in the meane time diſcharging their vow, by dying before 1248

at home in peace in their owne countries. At length the deuout king ſtill reſolute in his former determination, hauing taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and put all things in readineſſe for his journey, came to LYONS to take his leaue of Pope Innocentius the fourth (who for feare of the emperour Frederick then lay there for his more ſafetie) and from thence to MARCEILLES, where embarking himſelfe with his armie the fiue and twentith day of Auguſt in the yeare 1248, he the twentieth day of September following arriued in ſafetie in the iſland of CYPRUS, and was there royally entertained by Guy Luſignan then king of that countrey.

King Lewis ſetteth forward toward the Holy land.

Now was the French king deſirous to haue gone directly for ÆGYPT, without longer ſtay in CYPRUS, had he not beene otherwiſe perſuaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet come, and the time of the yeare began to grow vnſeaſonable, and the weather tempeſtuous. But whileſt he there ſtaied, paſſing the winter, the plague (one of the readie attendants of great armies) began to ariſe in the campe, which dayly encreaſing, had in ſhort time taken away a great number of men, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort. Amongſt whom were Robert biſhop of BEAUVAIS, Iohn countie MONT-FORT, the counties of VENDOSME and DREUX, Archambaut lord of BURBON, with diuers other knights and gentlemen, to the number of 240: ſo that by force of the infectious contagion, the king was conſtrained to diuide his armie into diuers places of the iſland, attending vntill the infection ſhould ceaſe. In the meane time the Templars hauing in ſuſpect both the French and the Turks: the Turks, for feare they ſhould ouerrun all; and the French, leaſt hauing gotten the victorie, they ſhould take all into their own hands, and ſo diminiſh their power and authoritie, wherewith they tyrannized ouer the other poore Chriſtians; ſent ambaſſadours ſecretly vnto Meledin Sultan of ÆGIPT, to perſuade him betimes to come to ſome good agreement for peace, ſo to auert the power of the French king from doing him further harme, or proceeding further in that war. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, ſent one of his noble men to intreat with the maſter of the Templars concerning a peace, ſo that it might be by cõſent of the Frẽch. The Templars glad of ſo honorable a meſſage, writ vnto the French king out of SYRIA, how the matter ſtood; perſuading him to accept of the peace offred, ſetting out in great words the Sultans great preparations and power. And ſo indeed had abuſed the king, had not the king of CYPRUS acquainted with his doings, perſuaded him that it was but a fineneſſe of the Great maſter, and that he had firſt ſent vnto the Sultan, and procured that noble man to be ſent: which the king vpon farther conſideration perceiuing to be true, fed the Turks embaſſadour with hope of peace, but writ vnto the maſter of the Templars vpon the price of his head from thencefoorth not to receiue any embaſſage from the enemie, or to haue any further intelligence with him.

Winter now paſt, and the plague well ceaſed, diuers noble gentlemen and great commaunders which following the king, and ſetting foorth ſomewhat late, or for feare of the plague had ſtaied by the way, and wintred ſome in one place, ſome in another, began to repaire vnto CYPRUS: as Robert duke of BURGUNDIE, who hauing wintred in ACHAIA, came now in the beginning of the Spring vnto the king, with a number of good horſemen; and with him William prince of ACHAIA, with a great fleet out of PELOPONESUS, which countrey, with moſt part of GRECIA, was then vnder the commaund of the Latines; amongſt others came alſo William, ſurnamed Long-eſpie, earle of SARISBURIE, with a band of luſtie tall ſouldiors. So the armie being met together, and all things againe in a readineſſe, king Lewes departing from CYPRUS, and toſſed at ſea with cõtrary winds, about fiue daies after fell with the coaſt of ÆGIPT, & there with all his fleet came before the ſtrong towne of DAMIATA, being (as we haue ſaid) the key of that kingdome. The Sultan long before vnderſtanding of the French kings purpoſe for the inuaſion of his countrey, had ſtrongly fortified his frontier townes, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, beſide the great power he kept with himſelfe in readineſſe at all aſſaies, as occaſion ſhould require. Vpon the approch of the Chriſtians, the gouernour of DAMIATA was ready vpon the ſhore, with a number of braue ſouldiers to keepe them from landing; who neuertheleſſe reſolutely before ſet downe for the performing of that they came for, manning foorth their long boats with their archers and croſſebowes to beat the enemie from the ſhore, ran a ground with their other ſmall boats made of purpoſe for the landing of men; and ſo without longer ſtay came to handie blowes, where for a while was fought a moſt ſharpe and cruell battell, the Chriſtians ſtriuing to land, and the Turkes to keepe them off, many falling on both ſides. But what

ſhould

A ſhould an handfull doe againſt ſo many? The Turkes oppreſſed with the multitude ſtill landing more and more, and hauing done what was poſsible for them to doe, fled into the towne, leauing behind them their gouernour, with fiue hundred of their beſt ſouldiors dead vpon the ſhore.

This citie of DAMIATA was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres not been taken but by more than a yeares ſiege, (as is before declared) and that not ſo much by the valour of the Chriſtians as by the extremitie of the plague and famine: ſince which time it had been ſtrongly fortefied by the Turks, with deepe ditches, high wals, and ſtrong bulwarkes; and was at that time well ſtored with victuals alſo, and all things elſe for the enduring of a long ſiege. Neuertheleſſe, the ſouldiors that were left, and the citizens (diſcouraged with the loſſe of 1249

B their gouernour, and remembrance of the miſeries before endured in the former ſiege, and ſeeing the Chriſtians now readie againe to beſiege the ſame) the night following, a little before the breake of day, ſet fire euery man vpon his owne houſe, and ſo by a bridge which they had made of boats, fled ouer the great riuer, breaking the bridge when they were ouer, for feare their enemies ſhould thereby haue followed after them. The Chriſtians perceiuing their flight, without reſiſtance entred the citie, and being ſtrangers, did what they could to quench the fire and to ſaue that which the inhabitants themſelues would faine haue with fire deſtroyed; and ſo afterwards found great abundance of riches, with plentifull ſtore of all manner of victuals, wherewith the ſouldiors both enriched and refreſhed themſelues. This ſo happie & vnexpected a victorie happened vnto the Chriſtians about the beginning of October, in the yeare 1249. Sultan Meledin

C himſelfe, diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo ſtrong a citie, offered vnto the French king for the redeeming thereof, and to haue peace at his hands, more territorie in SIRIA and the land of PALESTINE, than the Chriſtians had of long time before: which large offer was by the French, eſpecially by the earle of ARTHOIS the kings brother, proudly rejected, and ALEXANDRIA the moſt famous port and mettropoliticall citie of ÆGIPT, further demaunded, to the great diſcontentment of the Turkes and Saraſins. In theſe troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloued of his people: in whoſe ſtead Melechſala (or Melexala, as ſome call him) a valiant and couragious prince, well beloued of his ſubjects, and but euen then returned out of SIRIA and ARABIA, where he had been to craue aid of the other Mahometane princes, was choſen Sultan. Which princes, eſpecially the Sultan of DAMASCO, although they had not of

D long been at any good accord among themſelues, or with the Ægyptian; yet in this common danger of their ſuperſtition, which by the loſſe of ÆGIPT was like to be greatly weakned, they joyned hands together, and ſo ſent him great aid.

The citizens of Damiata ſet fire vpon the citie, and ran away by the light.

The new Sultan thus ſtrengthened, drew neerer vnto the Chriſtians, which then lay encamped not farre from DAMIATA, and had with them a hot skirmiſh, wherein hee was put to the worſe, and ſo with ſome loſſe glad to retire. But the Chriſtians the next day, in hope of like ſucceſſe ſallying out againe, were ouerthrowne, with ten times more loſſe than was he the day before, and ſo faine to flie vnto the campe. By which victorie the Sultan encouraged, began now to conceiue better hope of the ſucceſſe of his wars; and by ſtopping the paſſages both by water and land, to prouide, that no victuals could without great perill bee brought either vnto the

E citie or the campe, inſomuch that at length victuals began to grow ſcarce in both: whereof the Sultan was not ignorant, as being thereof throughly informed by ſuch fugitiues, as for want, or other cauſes, oftentimes fled out of the French campe into his.

Winter thus paſsing, and wants ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that the gouernour of the great citie of CAIRE (vpon the fortune whereof depended the ſtate of the whole kingdome) a man not euill affected vnto the Chriſtian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his brother by him wrongfully executed: by ſecret meſſengers perſuaded the French king to come on with his armie to the citie, the regall ſeat of the Sultan, promiſing him to deliuer it into his power, with full inſtructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining thereof. Whereupon the king who had before of himſelfe purpoſed the ſame exploit, but now

F filled with a greater hope, aſſembled together the greateſt forces he was able to make. At which time alſo he ſent for the earle of SALISBURIE, with the reſt of the Engliſh men, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (eſpecially by the earle of ARTOIS the kings brother) whereof they could haue no redreſſe, were gone to PTOLEMAIS, without purpoſe to haue any more ſerued in thoſe warres: But now being ſent for by the king, with promiſe of better vſage and honourable recompence for the wrongs paſt, returned againe into ÆGIPT,

there to doe their laſt endeuour. With whoſe comming the king ſtrengthened, but more by the new ſupplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonſus out of FRANCE, leauing the duke of BURGUNDIE with a conuenient gariſon, with the queene his wife, Odo the Popes Legat, and diuers other great ladies in DAMIATA, he himſelfe ſet forward with his armie towards CAIRE. Of whoſe comming the Sultan hearing, and loath vpon the fortune of one battell to aduenture his whole eſtate, offered by his embaſſadours to reſtore vnto him all the land of PALESTINE, with a great ſumme of money for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars, and all the priſoners he had taken, ſo that he would redeliuer vnto him the citie of DAMIATA, and ioine with him in league and amitie. Which faire offer for all that, the French king, by the perſuaſion of the Legat and others, refuſed. So the king marching ſtill on, was to paſſe an arme of the great riuer NILUS (the Sultan on the other ſide ſtill readie with his armie to ſtay his paſſage) which he had thought to haue made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the ſame purpoſe: but better conducted by a fugitiue Saraſin vnto a foord, before to him vnknowne, ſent his brother Robert, earle of ARTOIS, with the third part of the armie before him, accompanied with the maſter of the Templars and the earle of SALISBURIE, with their followers. Who paſsing the riuer at the aforeſaid foord, ſuddainly aſſailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then abſent in ſolemniſing one of their prophane feaſts) & put them to flight. With which victorie the French earle aboue meaſure encouraged, would needs on forwards, as if he would himſelfe alone haue carried away the glorie of the whole conqueſt. Whome for all that certaine of the auncient Templars, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than he, and better conſidering alſo of their owne abilitie and ſtrength, perſuaded him to content himſelfe with the honour he had alreadie got, and not to proceed any further in proſecuting of the enemie, vntill the comming of the reſt of the armie, eſpecially in that deſperat eſtate of the enemie, wherein he was to win or loſe all. Vnto whom the proud earle in great deſpight replied, That he would proſecute his victorie, and follow his good fortune; calling them daſtards and cowards, opprobriouſly obiecting vnto them the common fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy land might long ſince haue beene againe vnited vnto the bodie of the Chriſtian commonweale, but for the foule colluſion of the falſe Templars and Hoſpitalers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull ſpeech, the maſter of the Templars not without cauſe mooued, anſwered for himſelfe and his fellowes, That he ſhould, when he would, and where he durſt, diſplay his enſignes, and he ſhould find them as readie to follow as hee was to goe before them. The earle of SALISBURIE alſo willing to ſtint this ſtrife, perſuaded earle Robert not to bee ſo wedded to his owne opinion, but to liſten vnto the graue and wholeſome counſell of the Templars, being men of great experience: and ſo turning vnto the maſter of the Templars, began likewiſe with gentle words to pacifie him alſo. But whileſt hee was yet ſpeaking, the earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him daſtard and coward, and wiſhed that the armie were rid of him, and the fearefull cowards his countreymen. Whereunto the earle of SALISBURIE anſwered: Well Generall, on in Gods name, and whereſoeuer you dare ſet your foot, mine ſhall be as farre as yours; and I beleeue wee goe this day, where you ſhall not dare to come nigh my horſes taile: as afterward indeed it proued. Howbeit, the earle ſo ſaid, for that earle Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and diſdaine, after their manner, called him and his followers Engliſh tailes.

A faire offer fondly refuſed.

The proud earle conſtant in his former purpoſe, and not to be otherwiſe perſuaded, ſet forward: and firſt aſſaulted a little towne or caſtle, not farre off, called MANSOR, whereunto hee inconſiderately approching, was notably repulſed; and hauing loſt a number of his men, was as a man diſcouraged, about to haue retired. When ſuddainly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the earle had thought, ſtirred vp with the noiſe of the alarum, came on with his whole power; and finding the armie of the Chriſtians now deuided (as he had long wiſhed) with the multitude of his people encloſed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherein though the Chriſtians right woorthely behaued themſelues, for the ſmall number they were, yet oppreſſed with the multitude, and on euery ſide beſet, they were ſlaine downe right. Then, but all too late, it repented the earle of his fooliſh raſhneſſe, and that he had not hearkened vnto better counſell; and ſeeing the earle of SALISBURIE valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to flie, ſeeing God (as he ſaid) fought againſt them. Whereunto the noble earle anſwered no more, but God forbid that my fathers ſonne ſhould run away from the face of a Saraſin. The French earle thinking

A king by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe to haue ſaued his life, flying out of the battell, and taking the riuer of THAMES, ouerladen with his armour, was there drowned. The earle of SALISBURIE couragiouſly enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully ſlew many a Turk and Saraſin that day, vntill that at length hauing his horſe ſlain vnder him, and himſelfe ſo wounded in the legs as that he was not able longer to ſtand, yet vpon his knees laying about him like a deſperat man, and ſelling his life as deere as he could, was there ſlaine, but not vanquiſhed. With him periſhed the whole armie, ſo encloſed by the Sultan, that ſcarce any one eſcaped aliue, more than two Templars, one Hoſpitaler, and one common ſouldiour, the meſſengers of this heauie newes.

Earle Robert in flying, drowned.

The earle of Salisburie valiantly fighting, ſlaine.

B About the ſame time alſo ſickneſſe daily increaſing in the French campe, the king purpoſing to march forward to CAIRE, ſent a great number of ſicke and weake people downe the riuer of NILUS to DAMIATA: of whoſe going the Sultan vnderſtanding, cauſed a great number of ſmall boats to be caried in carts by land vnto the riuers ſide, which well manned, and meeting them by the way, ſet vpon them, and burnt or drowned them euery mothers ſonne, ſauing one only Engliſhman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in fiue places of his bodie, eſcaped yet into the French campe, reporting there what had happened vnto the reſt.

Now had the Sultan alſo got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernour of CAIRE and the king, for the betraying of the citie: and thereupon had cauſed him to be ſuddainely apprehended and put in ſafe keeping, vntill hee were at better leiſure to vnderſtand farther of the

The gouernor of Caire apprehended.

C matter: which no leſſe troubled the French king, than did the former misfortune; all his hope for the yeelding vp of the citie, being thereby cut off. Thus his hopes, together with his ſtrength, daily decreaſing, he would haue gladly accepted of the cõditions which he before refuſed, which the Sultan now growne very ſtrong, would by no meanes heare of; but in ſtead thereof, by way of deriſion, ſent to know of him, What was become of all his mattocks, forkes, rakes, ſythes, plowes, and harrowes, which he had brought ouer with him? and why he ſet them not to work, but ſuffered them like an euill husband to rot and ruſt beſide him? All which, with much more, the good king was glad to put vp. For now his forces greatly deminiſhed, as well by ſickneſſe, as by the former loſſes, finding himſelfe farre too weake, he would faine haue retired backe againe to DAMIATA: which the Sultan foreſeeing, got ſo betwixt him and home, that now there was

D no remedie, but either to fight it out, or yeeld. The king himſelfe had been often before intreated by his nobilitie, whileſt the riuer was yet vnpoſſeſſed by the enemie, to haue conueyed himſelfe by water to DAMIATA, for that in the ſafetie of his perſon conſiſted (as they ſaid) the ſafetie of his kingdome, whatſoeuer became of them: whereunto hee could neuer bee perſuaded, ſaying, That he would neuer forſake his people, becauſe he would not be forſaken of them, but was reſolued to endure with them whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe God to lay vpon him. So paſsing the riuer by the ſame foord whereby his brother had not long before vnfortunatly paſſed, and comming to the place where the battell was fought, hee might ſee the dead bodies of the Chriſtians pitifully mangled, with their heads and hands cut off: For the Sultan the more to encourage his ſoldiors, had before the battell proclaimed, That whoſoeuer ſhould bring him the head or hand

E of a Chriſtian, ſhould haue a great reward for his labour; in hope whereof, they had ſo diſmembred them. But long he had not there ſtayed, but that the Sultan began ſuddainely to appeare, with a moſt huge great armie, as if he would euen with the ſight thereof haue diſcouraged the Chriſtians: againſt whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order oppoſed themſelues, & for the ſpace of three houres made great reſiſtance: but what could one doe againſt ten, and he alſo fainting for ſickneſſe and food? the hard plight wherein the greateſt part of the French armie then was. In concluſion, oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all ouerthrowne and ſlaine, except ſome few, ſaued in hope of great ranſome. The king himſelfe, with his two brethren Alphonſus and Charles, and ſome few others, were taken priſoners, & brought vnto the Sultan: who demaunding of him, What had mooued him ſo to make

F war againſt him? was anſwered by the king, That it was for religion, & the defence of the name of his God. In this vnfortunat battell, fought the fift of Aprill, in the yeare 1250, beſides the common ſouldiors, were ſlaine moſt of the nobilitie of FRANCE, and all their tents taken.

The Sultan preſently vpon this ouerthrow, ſent of his owne ſouldiors the like number that the French were of, with French enſignes, and diſguiſed in the attire of the ſlaine Frenchmen, to DAMIATA, where the duke of BURGUNDIE, the French queene, and the Popes Legat lay; in

hope to haue been ſo let in for Frenchmen: but they were not ſo well masked, but that they were G by them of the citie diſcouered for enemies, and ſo kept out and deceiued of their purpoſe.

The Chriſtians thus ouerthrowne, and the French king taken priſoner, Melech-ſala the Sultan taking compaſsion vpon him, and yet minding of his life to make his owne gaine; cheering him vp with comfortable ſpeeches, began to talke with him of his deliuerance, and of a good attonement to be made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the king ſhould foorthwith deliuer againe vnto him the citie of DAMIATA, and moreouer pay vnto him for the ranſome of himſelfe and his, and for the charges of the war, eight thouſand pound of gold; That all priſoners ſhould on both ſides be frankly ſet at libertie, and ſo a peace to be taken for ten yeares. For the more aſſurance whereof, the Sultan offered to ſweare, H
That if he failed in the performance therof, to renounce his Mahomet: requiring likewiſe of the king to ſweare, If he failed in any thing that he had promiſed, to denie his Chriſt to be God: Which prophane oath the king deteſting, and wiſhing rather to die than to giue the ſame; the Sultan woondring at his conſtancie, tooke his word without any oath at all, and ſo publiſhed the league. But whileſt they were comming together to DAMIATA, Melech-ſala now in the pride of this victorie, fearing nothing leſſe than the ſudden change of fortune, or the miſchiefe hanging ouer his head, was in the preſence of a number of his noble men ſuddenly ſlaine by two deſperat Mamalukes; and one Turqueminus a ſturdie ſlaue of their owne order and vocation (by whoſe procurement it was ſuppoſed to haue beene done) by the conſent of the whole armie created Sultan in his ſtead: who reuoking the league before concluded by Melech-ſala, I made another in his owne name with the king, much vpon the ſame conditions that the other was; which after he had receiued DAMIATA, he cauſed to be openly proclaimed. Neuertheleſſe after that king Lewis had paied his ranſome, and was with the remnant of his armie by the Genowaies tranſported from DAMIATA to PTOLEMAIS, the falſe miſcreant performed not the halfe of that he had promiſed, of twelue thouſand Chriſtian captiues that ſhould haue been ſet free, ſcarce enlarging foure thouſand; and killing all the ſicke ſouldiers whom by his promiſe he ought to haue reliued; neither ſuffring any Chriſtian to carrie any of his goods with him out of ÆGYPT, which by the league he ought to haue done alſo.

The French king comming to PTOLEMAIS, and purpoſing to haue returned home, was intreated by the maſter of the Templars and Hoſpitalars, and other the nobilitie of the Chriſtians, to ſtay, which he did almoſt by the ſpace of foure yeares: in which time he repaired the cities of CESAREA and IOPPE, and fortified many ſtrong places for the defence of the Chriſtians againſt the infidels: And ſo commending the protection thereof vnto the knights of the ſacred war, and ſending his brethren away before him, followed after himſelfe, greatly lamented for by all the Chriſtians in SIRIA, and ſo arriued in FRANCE the ſixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and vnfortunat expedition of Lewis the French king, wherein as ſome write, were eightie thouſand Chriſtians loſt: howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their loſſe, report, of two and thirtie thouſand French, ſix thouſand to haue returned againe into FRANCE. The citie of DAMIATA in the ſpace of a few yeares twice woon, and twice loſt by the Chriſtians, was ſhortly after the deliuering vp thereof, by the Sultan K raſed downe to the ground, becauſe it ſhould no more ſerue the Chriſtians for an entrance into his kingdome. L

The beginning of the Mamalukes and their kingdome.

The late Ægyptian Sultans thus oftentimes inuaded by the Chriſtian princes, and repoſing no great aſſurance in the proweſſe of the effeminat Ægyptians, a people fitter for marchandize and other baſe occupations than for chiualrie and war, had for the ſtrengthening of their kingdome, bought an infinit number of ſlaues, eſpecially of the poore and hardie Circaſsians, called in antient time Getæ and Zinchi, neere vnto COLCHIS and the EUXINE ſea, brought vnto ALEXANDRIA and other ports of ÆGYPT out of thoſe bare cold countries, by marchants, and from thence tranſported to CAIRE and other cities of ÆGYPT: of which poore ſlaues, the late Ægyptian Sultans taking their choice, and culling out from the reſt ſuch as were like to be of M greateſt ſpirit and abilitie of bodie, deliuered them vnto moſt skilfull and expert teachers; by whom they were carefully taught to run, to leape, to vaut, to ſhoot, to ride, with all other feats of actiuitie, and withall cunningly to handle all manner of weapons, as well on horſebacke as on foot: and ſo inſtructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their ſchooles into pay, and enrolled together as the Sultans choice horſmen, were commonly called by the name of Mamalukes.

lukes. In whose good seruice the late Sultans finding great vse, spared for no cost, both for their maintenance and encreasing of their number; dayly erecting new nurseries stored with yoong frie, which growing vp and readie, was still joyned to the other. It is woonderfull to tell vnto what a strength and glorie this order of the Mamalukes was in short time grown, by the care of the Ægyptian kings: By them they mannaged their greatest affaires, especially in time of wars; and by their valour, not onely defended their countrey, but gained many a faire victorie against their enemies, as they did now against the French. But as too much power in such mens hands, seldome or neuer wanteth danger, so fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech-sala, and those masterfull Mamaluke slaues: who proud of their preferment, and forgetfull of their dutie, and seeing the greatest strength of the kingdome in their hands, traiterously slew Melech-sala their chiefe founder, setting vp in his place (as aforesaid) one Turquimanus, a base slaue, one of their owne order and seruile vocation, but indeed otherwise a man of a great spirit and valour. This Melech-sala murthered by the Mamalukes, was the last of the free borne kings of ÆGYPT; in whom the Turks kingdome in ÆGYPT, erected by Sarracon and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before said) and in his stocke and family euer since continued, tooke end, as did also all the power of the Turks in that great and rich kingdome. For the proud Mamalukes hauing now got the soueraigntie into their hands, and exalted a Sultan out of themselues, imperiously commanded as great lords ouer the rest of the people, not suffring them to haue the vse either of horse or armour, or to beare any sway in the common weale: but keeping them vnder with most heauie impositions, and still preferring their owne slaues (wherewith the countrey of ÆGYRT now swarmed) made the naturall countrey people, of all others most miserable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than merchandize, their husbandrie, or other their base mechanicall occupations: whereof the greatest profit still came vnto the Mamalukes, who as lords of all, with great insolencie, at their pleasure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan, they still chose him from among themselues, not suffering any the Sultans children to succeed their fathers in the kingdome; for feare least they in processe of time, proud of their ancestors and parentage, should recken of them as of his slaues (as indeed they were) and so at length bring in another more free kind of gouernment.

The ruine of the Turks kingdome in Aegypt.

Against which they prouided also, not onely by this restraint of their Sultans children, but of their owne also: taking order and exstablishing it as an immutable law, That though the sonnes of the Mamalukes might enjoy their fathers lands & wealth after their death, yet that it should not be lawfull for them in any case to take vpon them the name or honour of a Mamaluke: so embarring them from all gouernment in the common wealth, to the intent it might still rest with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahometan parents (which could not be slaues) or of the race of the Iewes, to be admitted into that Order; but onely such as being borne Christians and become slaues, had from the time of their captiuitie beene instructed in the Mahometan superstition; or else being men grown, and comming thither, had abjured the Christian religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right strange it is to consider, vnto what honour and glorie this slauish empire in short time grew: many of those poore slaues by rare fortune or secret diuine power, exalted out of the dust vnto the highest degree of honour, prooving most excellent and renowmed princes, of such strength and power, as was dreadfull euen vnto the greatest princes of the world. In which great glorie, this seruile empire (to the worlds woonder) flourished from this time amongst the greatest by the space of 267 yeates; vntill that hauing run the appointed race, it was with a great destruction, by Selymus the victorious emperour of the Turks, ouerthrown in the yeare 1517, and the kingdome of ÆGYPT with all SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, brought into the forme of Prouinces, vnited vnto the Turks empire, as they are at this day, and as in the course of this historie shall in due time and place (God willing) at large appeare.

But leauing the kingdome of the Turks thus ouerthrown in ÆGYPT, and the Mamalukes there triumphing; the French king returned into FRANCE, and the Christians in peace in SYRIA: let vs againe returne into the lesser ASIA, and vnto the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, whether the affaires both of the Turkes and of the Christians now call vs. All this while the Greeke empire (for so the Greeks will haue it called) flourished both in peace and plentie in the lesser ASIA, vnder their emperour Iohn Batazes: the power of the Latines in the meane time declining as fast at CONSTANTINOPLE, vnder the rule of the Latin emperour Baldwin

Baldwin the ſecond. As for the Turks whom we left grieuouſly troubled both with famine and the often incurſions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet alſo, enough and more than enough to do to withſtand the ſame enemie. At length it fortuned that Iohn Ducas the Greeke emperor died, being at the time of his death about threeſcore yeares old, wherof he had happily raigned three & thirtie: by whoſe good & diſcreet gouernment, the Greeke empire before broght low and almoſt to naught by the Latines, began againe to gather ſtrength and to flouriſh both in ASIA and ſome little part of EUROPE alſo. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpoſe I could willingly paſſe ouer, were I not by the woorthie remembrance of one of them ſtaied a while by the way.

The emperour in loue with Marceſina.

This noble and famous emperour hauing long lamented the death of the faire empreſſe Irene his firſt wife, at laſt married another yoong ladie, the ſiſter of Manfred king of SICILIE, called Anne, with whom amongſt other honourable and beautifull dames, ſent by the king her brother for the accompanying of her to CONSTANTINOPLE, was one Marceſina, a rare paragon, of ſuch a feature as if nature had in her meant to beſtow her greateſt skill. From whoſe mouth alwaies flowed a fountaine of moſt ſugred words, and out of her eies iſſued (as it were) nets to entangle the amorous in: vpon this ſo faire an obiect, the emperour not fearing further harme, tooke pleaſure oftentimes to feed his eies, vntill that at length caught with her lookes, he had loſt his libertie, and was of a great emperor become her thrall, in ſuch ſort, as that in compariſon of her he ſeemed little or nothing to regard the yoong empreſſe his wife; but ſo far doated vpon her, that he ſuffered her to be attired and honoured with the ſame attire and honour that the empreſſe was her ſelfe; whom ſhe now ſo farre exceeded both in grace and fauour with the emperour, and honour of the people, as that ſhee almoſt alone enjoyed the ſame, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whileſt ſhe thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that ſhee in all her glorie, attended vpon with moſt of the gallants of the court, and ſome of the emperours guard, would needs goe (whether for deuotion or for her recreation, I know not) to viſite the monaſterie and faire church, which Blemmydes (a noble man of great renowne, both for his integritie of life, and learning) had of his owne coſt and charges but lately built in the countrey; where he together with his monkes, as men wearie of the world, liued a deuout and ſolitarie contemplatiue life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life and profound learning, choſen Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE: which great honour, next vnto the emperour himſelfe, he refuſed, contenting himſelfe with his cell.

Marceſina the emperors concubine ſhut out of the church.

Marceſina comming thither in great pompe, and thinking to haue entred the church, had the dores ſhut againſt her by the monkes, before commaunded ſo to doe by Blemmydes their founder: and ſo was to her great diſgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impietie, to ſuffer that ſo wicked and ſhameleſſe a woman, againſt whom he had moſt ſharply both ſpoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet to tread vpon the ſacred pauement of his church. She enraged with this indignitie, hardly by ſo proud a woman to be with patience diſgeſted, and prickt forward by her flattering followers alſo; returning to the court, grieuouſly complained thereof vnto the emperour, ſtirring him vp by all meanes ſhe could to reuenge the ſame, perſuading him to haue been therein himſelfe diſgraced. Whereunto were ioyned alſo the hard ſpeeches of her pickthanke fauourits, who to currie Fauell, ſpared not to put oyle as it were vnto the fire, for the ſtirring vp of the emperour vnto reuenge. Who with ſo great a complaint nothing mooued vnto wrath, but ſtrucke as it were to the heart with a remorſe of conſcience, and oppreſſed with heauineſſe, with teares running downe his cheekes, and fetching a deepe ſigh, ſaid: Why prouoke you me to puniſh ſo deuout and juſt a man? whereas if I would my ſelfe haue liued without reproch and infamie, I ſhould haue kept my imperiall majeſtie vnpolluted or ſtained. But now ſith I my ſelfe haue beene the cauſe both of mine owne diſgrace, and of the empires: I may thanke mine owne deſerts, if of ſuch euill ſeed as I haue ſowne, I now reape alſo an euill harueſt.

Theodorus Laſcaris choſen emperour.

After the death of this good emperour, Theodorus his ſonne, borne the firſt yeare of his fathers raigne, being then about three and thirtie yeares old, was by the generall conſent of the people ſaluted emperour in his ſtead: who in the beginning of his empire renewed the league which his father had made with Iathatines the Turkiſh Sultan. And ſo hauing prouided for the ſecuritie of his affaires in ASIA; he with a puiſſant armie paſſed ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTUS into EUROPE, to appeaſe the troubles there raiſed in MACEDONIA and THRACIA, by the king of

A of BVLGARIA his brother in law, and Michaell Angelus Deſpot of THESSALIA; who vpon the death of the old emperour began to ſpoile thoſe countries, not without hope at length to haue joyned them vnto their owne: by whoſe comming they were for all that diſappointed of their purpoſe, and glad to ſue to him for peace. But whileſt he was there buſied, he was aduertiſed by letters from NICE, That Michaell Paleologus, whom he had left there gouernour in his abſence, was ſecretly fled vnto the Turks: with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cauſe of whoſe flight, as Paleologus himſelfe gaue it out, was, for that he perceiued himſelfe diuers waies by many his enemies brought into diſgrace, and the emperours eares ſo filled with their odious complaints, ſo cunningly framed againſt him, as that they were not eaſily or in ſhort time to bee
B refelled: and therefore fearing in the emperours heauie diſpleaſure to be ſuddainely taken away, to haue willingly gone into exile, if ſo happely he might ſaue his life from the mallice of them that ſought after it.

At his comming to ICONIUM, he found Iathatines the Sultan making great preparation againſt the Tartars; who hauing driuen the Turks out of PERSIA and the other farre Eaſterne countries (as is before declared) and running ſtill on, did with their continuall incurſions ſpoile a great part of their territories in the leſſer ASIA alſo; and now lay at AXARA, a towne not far off from ICONIUM: againſt whom the Sultan now making the greateſt preparation hee could, gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthie captaine, commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes; whom he had retained to ſerue
C him in thoſe warres, as he had others alſo of the Latines, vnder the conduct of Boniface Moline, a nobleman of VENICE: and ſo hauing put all things in readineſſe, and ſtrengthened with theſe forraine ſupplies of the Greekes and Latines, ſet forward againſt his enemies the Tartars: who at the firſt ſight of the ſtrange enſignes and ſouldiors, were much diſmayed, fearing ſome greater force had been come to the aid of the Turkes. Neuertheleſſe, joyning with them in battell, had with them at the firſt a moſt terrible and bloodie conflict, wherein that part of the armie that ſtood againſt Paleologus, and his Greekes, was put to the worſe; to the great diſcomfiture of the Tartars, being euen vpon the point to haue fled, had not one of the greateſt commaunders in the Turks armie, and a nigh kinſman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan, with all his regiment in the heat of the battell reuolted vnto the Tartars: whereby the fortune
D of the battell was in a moment as it were quite altered, they which but now were about to haue fled, fighting like lyons; and they that were victors, now glad to turne their backes and flie: in which flight a great number of the Turkes fell, the fierce Tartars moſt eagerly purſuing them. Paleologus with the generall of the Turks hardly chaſed by the Tartars, and glad euery houre to make a ſtand, and to fight for their liues, with much adoe after many daies flight recouered a caſtle of the Generals, neere vnto CASTAMONA, and ſo ſaued themſelues. The Tartars after this ſo great a victorie (wherein they had broken the whole ſtrength of the Turkes, and brought in hazard the whole ſtate of their kingdome) without reſiſtance forraged all the countries and prouinces ſubject vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, making ſpoile of whatſoeuer they light vpon: inſomuch, that the Sultan diſcouraged, and hauing now no ſtrength left to oppoſe againſt them, fled vnto
E the Greeke emperour Theodorus for aid; who moſt honourably entertained him with all his traine, and comforted him with ſuch ſmall aid as he thought good then to ſpare him: Which for his more ſafetie he ſent home with him, vnder the leading of Iſaacius Ducas, ſurnamed Murtzufla, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindneſſe, the Sultan gaue vnto the emperour the citie of LAODICEA, whereinto he preſently put a ſtrong garriſon: neuertheleſſe, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turkes, being a place not to be holden by the Greekes. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himſelfe ſtill too weake to withſtand the continuall inuaſions of the Tartars, and wearie of the harmes he dayly ſuſtained; by the aduiſe of his cheefe counſellors made a league with them, yeelding to pay them a certain yearely tribute, thereby to redeeme his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks, as of their tribu-
F taries and vaſſales.

Not long after this, Michaell Paleologus was by the emperours kind and gracious letters called home; with his faithfull promiſe alſo before giuen for his ſecuritie: who before his return bound himſelfe alſo by ſolemne oath, to be vnto the emperour and his ſonne alwayes loyall, and from thenceforth neuer to ſeeke after the empire, or giue cauſe of new ſuſpect for ſuch matters as he had been before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the emperour, his ſonne, or other his ſucceſſors in the empire, his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which conditions he was again G made Great Conſtable, and ſo receiued into the emperours fauour, and liued the reſt of his raigne in great honour and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Greeke emperor.

Now Theodorus the emperour hauing raigned three yeares, fell ſicke and died, leauing behind him his ſonne Iohn, then but a child of ſix yeares old, to ſucceed him in the empire: whom hee vpon his death bed, together with the empire, commended to Arſenius the Patriarch, and one George Muzalo his faithfull counſellor, as to his truſtie tutors, to ſee him ſafely brought vp, & the empire well and peaceably gouerned. This Muzalo was a man of meane parentage, but for his familiar acquaintance and ciuile behauior, of a child brought vp in the court with the emperour as his play fellow: with whom he growing vp, ſo framed himſelfe vnto his manners and diſpoſition, H that he alone was vnto him in ſtead of all, ſtill at hand, readie to ſay or doe whatſoeuer might be vnto the emperour gracious or pleaſing. And the elder they grew, ſo increaſed this their mutuall affection and loue alſo: in ſuch ſort, that with him now emperour, he was of all others in greateſt fauour and authoritie; a warie obſeruer of his delights, a readie miniſter of his affaires, and faith-full partaker of his ſecrets: for which he was in ſhort time promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the court, and honourably married vnto one of the emperours nigh kinſwomen; and now at his death, by his laſt will, with the reuerend Patriarch appointed tutor to the yong emperor and his two yong ſiſters. And for the more aſſurance thereof, a ſolemne oath of obedience vnto the yong prince as emperour, and vnto them as his tutors, was exacted of all ſort of men both high & low, of what vocation ſoeuer; and that not once, but firſt a little before the emperours death, and againe after he was now dead: for many of the nobilitie honourably deſcended, ſeeing the ſuddain Enuie in Court. change of Muzalo his fortune, among themſelues murmured thereat, as greeued with his preferment, ſeeing there were many among them, vnto whom both the tuition of the yong emperour and adminiſtration of the empire, of better right appertained; inſomuch as they were both nee-rer of kin vnto the emperor, and fitter (as they thought) for ſo great a charge than was Muzalo; whom (as they ſaid) they had many cauſes both to contemne and hate: For beſide that hee was not honourably borne, and had ſerued the late emperour Theodore, as the miniſter of his wrath againſt ſome of the nobilitie, cauſes ſufficient of the peoples hatred; if hee ſhould now alſo in ſo great authoritie affect the empire, it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted, that he would not ſpare to commit any manner of villanie, for the effecting of his inordinat deſire. Of all which K Muzalo was not ignorant, a man at all other times of a moſt quicke apprehenſion for ſuch matters, but as then eſpecially, his wits being awaked with theſe ſo great motiues & dangers. Wherfore ſpeedely calling together all the nobilitie into the court, he welcommed them one by one, and courteouſly diſcourſing with them, offered to diſcharge himſelfe both of the adminiſtration of the empire, and tuition of the yong emperour, and willingly to yeeld the ſame vnto any one of them, whom the reſt ſhould thinke fitteſt for ſo great a charge: which though they all with one conſent as it were refuſed, ſaying, That he was of all others to be preferred, vnto whom the em-perour, lord both of the empire and the child, had committed the ſame: yet Muzalo earneſtly requeſted them to the contrarie, and ſtiffely withſtood their deſire, wiſhing indeed rather to haue led a quiet priuat life in ſecuritie, than to haue been ſo ouercharged; not ſo much for doubt of the L enuie then ariſing, as for feare of ſome great danger thereof to enſue. But would he, would he not, remedie there was none, but that as the late emperour had appointed, ſo he muſt take the charge vpon him. And now was euery one, as well of the nobilitie, as of the inferiour ſort, againe with greater ſolemnitie than before the third time ſworne, to the vttermoſt of their power to defend the yong emperour in his empire, and Muzalo in the tuition of him and adminiſtration of the affaires of the ſtate, and faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience: which if they ſhould faile religiouſly to performe, they wiſhed vnto themſelues euery man, & to all theirs, a ſhamefull end and deſtruction. Yet notwithſtanding all this ſolemne ſwearing, mixt moſt times with much forſwearing, there were not fully nine daies paſt, but that certaine of the chiefe nobi-litie forgetfull or elſe careleſſe of their oath, and full of enuie, ſeldome ſatisfied but with blood, M conſpired the vnworthie death of Muzalo the protectour both of the emperour and the empire.
The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the emperour, was now come, at which time were met together at SOSANDRA (an abbey by himſelfe built in the honour of the virgine Marie at MAGNESIA) many great ladies and graue matrons, to mourne as the manner was; all the great princes of the nobilitie, and among them the conſpirators alſo: thither repaired alſo a number of ſouldi-

A ſouldiors, prepared for the ſlaughter, with an infinit multitude of the common people, as at ſuch ſolemnities is vſuall. But what needs many words, whileſt the hymns were yet in ſinging, and the obſequies in performing, the ſoldiors as they were before inſtructed, ſuddainly breaking into the church, with their drawne ſwords in their hands, ſlew Muzalo (then fled vnto the altar for refuge) with his two brethren Andronicus and Theodorus, both men of great account, and diuers others appointed to the maſſacre. So the matrones & the reſt of the multitude breaking off their mourning, and for feare thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as faſt as they could, ſome one way, ſome another, as they thought for their moſt ſafetie: but the prieſts and monkes thinking to haue done the like, were by the imperious ſouldiors, whether they would or not, againe inforced
B into the church; where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with great force & violence, and ſcarce able to ſtand, by reaſon of the ſlipperineſſe of the blood there ſhed vpon the pauement, they in great feare made an end of thoſe bloodie obſequies. This outrage appeaſed, Arſenius the Patriarch, and only tutor of the yong emperour now left, was therewith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the perſon of the yoong prince, and quietneſſe of the ſtate; but what good courſe to take therein, he could not tell: for as he was a man for his learning and integritie of life, not inferiour to the beſt, ſo in matters of ſtate he was as far to ſeeke; as it commonly happeneth the contemplatiue man, buried in his meditations, to be vnfit for temporall gouernment; whereas he that ſhould performe both, muſt vnto his rare vertues and great learning joine a ciuile conuerſation, with great experience in worldly affaires, not to be learned but by great and
C long practiſe. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wiſhing all well) calling together the nobilitie, conſulted with them what were beſt to be done for the gouernment both of the yong emperour and the empire, now that Muzalo was dead; not conſidering in the mean time who they were with whom he conſulted, or that counſell grounded vpon no wiſe foreſight or approoued experience, was more dangerous vnto him whom he would haue prouided for, than all the enemies murthering ſwords, as ſhortly after appeared.

Amongſt others of the nobilitie called to counſell, was Michaell Paleologus (of whom we haue before ſpoken) much ſuperiour to the reſt, as deſcended of the imperiall houſe of the Comneni, a man of a cheerefull countenance, gracious, and courteous, and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall, whereby he eaſily woon the hearts of all men in generall, but eſpecially of the D colonels, captaines, and other martiall men, commaunders in the armie; of whoſe aſpiring to the empire, many preſages and common rumors (not alwaies vaine) had in former time paſſed alſo to the mouing of many: yea the Patriarch himſelfe not conſidering his hautie and aſpiring nature, made no leſſe account of him than did the reſt, but vpon an eſpeciall fauour, committed to his only truſt the keyes of the common treaſure, at ſuch time as money was to bee deliuered out for payment of the armies or other like great occaſions of the ſtate; the moſt effectuall meanes for the furtherance of his ſecret practiſes, & the readieſt way for the effecting of that he had ſo long before plotted: for hauing in his fingring ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as he might well haue wiſhed but neuer reaſonably hoped for, he poured it out as it were by buſhels amongſt the nobilitie and martiall men, & ſuch others as he thought were able to do moſt with the people, amongſt whom
E were many of the cleargie alſo: of which his fauourits were made many meetings, and by them was the Patriarch continually ſollicited, but yet in generall tearmes, without delay (according to the neceſsitie of the time) to take order for the good gouernment of the ſtate, which now as a great ſhip in the middeſt of the ſea without a maſter, was (as they ſaid) in danger to periſh; and being once loſt, was not to be againe recouered. At which time alſo, the name of Paleologus was in euery mans mouth, as the only man for his wiſedome and experience, fit to take vpon him the charge and gouernment of the empire, vntill the yong emperour were come to age. Vnto which cõmon good liking, the Patriarch alſo (ſeeing no more, or peraduenture not ſo much as the reſt) gaue his conſent. And ſo without longer ſtay, to the great contentment both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him gouernour of the empire, and tutor to the yong emperour, wanting
F now nothing of an emperor himſelfe, more than the title and imperiall ornaments. This was the firſt ſtep whereby this aſpiring man (twice before in diſgrace with the two late emperours, Iohn Ducas, and his ſonne Theodorus) mounted at laſt vnto the empire.

Michael Paleologus aſpireth.

It was not many dayes after, but that his fauourits held another counſell, wherein it was alledged, That it was not ſeemely for him that was tutor vnto the emperour, gouernour of the ſtate and empire, and to giue audience vnto the embaſſadours of forraine nations, to want the honour

next vnto the emperour, as well for the magnificence of the ſtate, as for the credit of his place: whereupon hee was both by the Patriarch and the yoong emperour honoured with the title of the Deſpot, another ſtep vnto the empire. But what contentment find the ambitious euen in the greateſt honours, ſo long as there is one aboue them? Little ſure, or none at all, more than that it ſerueth them to ſtep at next, vp to the higheſt: as did this new made Deſpot, who ſhortly after was by certaine of the nobilitie, his great fauourits, neere vnto MAGNESIA, with the great applauſe of the people hoyſed vp and ſaluted emperour. Whereof Arſenius the Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the yong child, the right heire of the empire. And firſt he was about to haue excommunicated, as well him that was made emperour, as them that had ſo made him: but afterward changing his purpoſe, for feare of greater troubles, he thought it better by ſolemne oath to bind both him and the reſt, That they ſhould not ſeeke after the life of the child, or by any force or colour goe about to depriue him of the empire; which was ſo done. Yet it was not full a moneth after, but that euen hee that had ſo great a care of the yoong child and ſo prouided for his ſafetie (perſuaded by them of the nobilitie and the cleargie) with his owne hands, and all the accuſtomed ceremonies, ſet the imperiall crowne vpon this vſurpers head; yet not as vpon him that ſhould ſtill enjoy the empire, but as vpon a man according to the preſent neceſsitie of the time and ſtate thought fitteſt for ſo great a charge, vntill the yoong child came to age; vnto whom then he was to giue place, and to reſigne to him the empire. All which being by more ſolemne oath than before confirmed, good newes (as the certaine ſignes of his fortunat gouernment) were brought vnto him of a great victorie obtained by his captaines, againſt Michaell Angelus Deſpot of ÆTOLIA and EPIRUS: Who hauing married the late emperours daughter, and hearing of his death, with the great troubles in ASIA; aided by the king of SICILIA and the prince of PELOPONESUS and ACHAIA, his ſonnes in law, had thought in that hurle and perturbation of the ſtate to haue taken vnto himſelfe the greateſt part of the emperours territories in MACEDONIA and THRACIA: and for the ſame purpoſe was with a great armie entred into them, burning and ſpoiling the countrey before him; whereof Michaell Paleologus (then but newly made Deſpot) hauing intelligence, ſent his brother Iohn, and ſome other his beſt captaines, with a great armie againſt him; by whom he with his complices were put to the worſe, and not without great loſſe enforced to retire: the joyfull newes whereof he receiued, euen as he was crowned. Which was ſhortly after confirmed by the comming of the great commaunders themſelues, bringing with them the prince of PELOPONESUS and ACHAIA, by them taken priſoner. Who for his ranſome was afterward glad to giue vnto the emperour Paleologus, MONEMBASIA, MAINE, and SPARTA, three of the beſt cities of PELOPONESUS: whereinto he put ſtrong garriſons, vnder the commaund of Conſtantinus his brother by the mothers ſide, a right valiant captaine. By whoſe good ſeruice, and the commodious ſituation of the places, he gained diuers other townes and cities, and at length the greateſt part of PELOPONESUS, out of the hands of the Latines: for the vtter rooting out of whom, hee ſhortly after with a great armie paſſed ouer into THRACIA, with purpoſe (as was thought) to haue beſieged CONSTANTINOPLE: but finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was before ſuppoſed, he left that, and laied ſiege to the caſtle of PERA, oueragainſt it on the other ſide of the hauen, in hope by winning of that caſtle to haue become maſter alſo of the towne: where he was notably repulſed, and enforced with loſſe to retire. So riſing with his armie, hee fortefied diuers caſtles and ſtrong holds in the countrey about CONSTANTINOPLE, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, charging them, with continuall incurſions to trouble the Conſtantinopolitanes, and to cut them ſo ſhort, if it were poſsible, as that they ſhould not dare to looke out at the gates of the citie. Which they ſo well performed, that in ſhort time the Latines in the citie were driuen to ſuch extremitie, that for want of wood they were faine to burne many of the faireſt houſes in the cittie in ſtead of fewell; which done, hee returned againe to NICE, the cheefe ſeat of the Greeke emperours, euer ſince that CONSTANTINOPLE was taken by the Latines.

Michaell Paleologus crowned emperor by Arſenius the Patriarch.

Now raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE the Latine emperour Baldwin the ſecond (as is before declared) a man of ſmall courage, and leſſe power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greekes or Latines: who for the maintenance of his ſtate was glad to ſell away the publick ornaments of the citie, and to pawne his ſonne vnto the Bruges marchants for money; by whom hee

was

was left at VENICE to be brought vp: which gaue occasion for some writers to report, That he was pawned vnto the Venetians.

About this time Mango, the great Chan of TARTARIE, stirred vp by Aitonus the Armenian king, by whose persuasion he had also receiued the Christian religion, sent his brother Haalon with an exceeding great armie against the Turkes and Sarrasins in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE. This Haalon conuerted also vnto the Christian faith by his wife, setting forward with a world of people following him, in the space of six moneths ouerran all PERSIA, with the countries adioyning, excepting one strong place in the mountains (which some say was SAMARCHAND, afterward the royall seat of the great terrour of the world, the mightie Tamerlaine) which besieged by ten thousand horsemen, by him there left for that purpose, and so continued by the space of seuen and twentie yeares after, was then at length (as Aiton himselfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, onely for want of clothes to couer their nakednesse. Haalon in whose armie those ten thousand (left behind) were not missed, marching on, and as a violent tempest bearing all downe before him, entered at length into ASSYRIA, and there laied siege vnto the great citie of BABYLON, then the seat of the great Caliph; whom all the Mahometane princes honoured aboue all others, as the true successour of their great prophet Mahomet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their law, as most diuine oracles. Which great citie Haalon woon, and putting to sword all he found therein, men, women, and children, with the spoile thereof and the rich treasures of the Caliph, enriched his souldiours. The Caliph himselfe (reserued for that purpose) he commaunded to be set in the middest of the infinite treasure which hee and his predecessours had most couetously heaped vp together, and that he should of that gold siluer and precious stones take what it pleased him to eat, saying (by way of derision) That so gainefull a guest should by good reason be fed with nothing but things of greatest price, whereof he willed him to make no spare: In which order the couetous wretch kept for certaine daies, miserably died for hunger, in the middest of those things whereof he thought hee should neuer haue had ynough; which though they were in valour great, and with great care laied together, yet serued they him not now to suffice nature, best contented with a little. BABYLON thus sacked, and almost rased, the Tartar marching on through MESOPOTAMIA, by the way took the citie of RHOAIS, where Aiton the Armenian king and author of this the Tartars expedition, came vnto him with twelue thousand horsemen, and fortie thousand foot, as reporteth Aiton the Armenian kings nephew, then there present. So entering into SYRIA, in a few daies tooke ALEPPO, which hee sacked and rased in the yeare of our Lord 1260, with diuerse other strong townes sometime belonging vnto the kingdome of ANTIOCH. Then was one Malacnesar Sultan of DAMASCO, commaunding ouer all SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE: who terrified with the losse of his cities, and the feare of farther danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himselfe before the Tartar prince, in hope so to haue saued vnto himselfe some good part of his kingdome. Wherein he was much deceiued, being (as some say) carried away a farre off into exile, because hee should not hinder the Tartars proceedings: or as others report (and happely with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his prisoner, and afterwards to the terror of his sonne, cut in peeces in his sight vnder the wals of DAMASCO, after that it had in vaine beene twice assaulted by the Tartars: which strong citie for all that he afterwards tooke by strong hand, and sacked it, and by the persuasion of his wife ouerthrew all the Mahometane temples, as he had before in euery place where he came. But purposing to haue gone on forward to HIERUSALEM, and to haue conqueted the whole land of PALESTINE, newes was brought him of the death of his brother Mango, the great Chan: whereupon he staied his journey and returned backe againe, in hope of that great empire, hauing in this expedition spent almost six yeares.

Aleppo rased by the Tartars.

Damasco woon.

Thus by the Tartars was the kingdome of the Turks at DAMASCO ouerthrowne. At which time, the broken affaires of the Christians in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, might easily haue beene repaired, and those two goodly kingdomes againe restored to the Christian commonweale, had the Christian princes of the West then in time put to their helping hands on the one side, as did the Tartars on the other: But they then at fatall discord among themselues, and busied with their warres at home, let slip that so faire an opportunitie, the like whereof they seldome or neuer had since. Haalon the Tartar prince, in token of his good will toward the Christians and their affaires, at his departure from DAMASCO left his sonne Abaga there with twentie thou-thouſand horſemen to aid them in their warres, if they ſhould come (as was expected) for the re- G couerie of the Holy land: who hauing there ſtayed ſome while, and hearing of his fathers troubles at home, followed himſelfe after him, but yet left behind him Guirboca, a valiant captaine, with ten thouſand of his horſemen, to like purpoſe that his father had him: who by the inſolencie of certaine Chriſtian ſouldiors in garriſon about SIDON, was of a friend together with his Tartars made a foe. Theſe garriſon ſouldiors hauing by chance fet in ſome bootie out of the Tartars territorie, not onely refuſed to reſtore the ſame againe, but alſo foulely intreated ſuch as the Tartar had ſent for the demaunding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels ariſing, it for-tuned a nephew of Guirbocas, a valiant yoong gentleman, to be ſlaine: in reuenge whereof hee beſieged SIDON, and hauing taken it, ſacked it, and burnt it downe to the ground. After which H time, he and his Tartars became vtter enemies vnto the Chriſtians, doing them all the harme they could deuiſe.

The Ægyptian Sultan inuadeth Siria.

This diſcord betwixt the Tartars and the Chriſtians, gaue occaſion vnto Melech the Ægypti-an Sultan, now jealous of the Tartars neereneſſe, with a great armie of his Mamalukes & others to enter into SYRIA, and to ſpoile the countrey about DAMASCO; againſt whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in ſtrength and number far inferiour, went out. But joyning battell with him at too much oddes, and the victorie inclining vnto that ſide where moſt ſtrength was, he there valiantly fighting was ſlaine, with moſt part of his Tartars: ſuch as eſcaped fled into ARMENIA vnto the friendly king. By this victorie all SYRIA, with the land of PALESTINE, I excepting ſome few places yet holden by the Chriſtians, fell again into the hands of the Ægyptian Sultans; as did ſome of them ſhortly after alſo: for Bandocadar ſucceeding Melech in the Mama-luke kingdome, comming into SYRIA with a great armie, took ANTIOCH from the Chriſtians, & with it moſt of the other places before by them defended. The citie he burnt, & raſed the caſtle down to the ground, and afterward entring into ARMENIA, did there great harme alſo.

Antioch taken from the Chriſtians.

Whileſt the Turks kingdome thus goeth to wracke in SYRIA, ruinated by the Tartars, but poſſeſſed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the leſſer ASIA, now the whole hope of that nation, went not at that time much better: for Iathatines the Turkes Sultan, there alſo inuaded by the Tartars, and hauing loſt ICONIUM his regall citie, fled with his brother Melech to the Greeke emperour Michaell Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieued, for the kindneſſe hee had not long before ſhewed him in like caſe, when as he fled from the late emperour Theodore; whereof now K putting him in remembrance, he requeſted him either with ſome conuenient force to aid him, or els to aſsigne vnto him ſome corner in his large empire where hee might in ſafetie reſt with his wife and children, and other followers, whom with much wealth hee had brought with him in great number. The emperor on euery ſide himſelfe incombred with warres, thought it not good in ſo great newneſſe of his empire, to deminiſh his owne forces: and to aſsigne vnto him any place to inhabit, ſeemed no leſſe dangerous; for that he hauing been a great prince, and commanding ouer many great countries, and brought vp in all princely royaltie, was not like to content himſelfe with a little: beſide that, his nobilitie, then diſperſed by the Tartars, were like ynough in great numbers to reſort vnto him, as vnto their head, ſo ſoone as they ſhould once heare that he were ſeated in any place: and yet vnkindly to caſt him off that had ſo honourably vſed him in L like extremitie, the emperour was loath. And therefore feeding him vp with faire words, and foording him on from time to time with delaies, he held him a great while as a man in ſuſpence, betwixt hope and deſpaire. At length in the abſence of the emperour (though happily not without his priuitie) he was commaunded with all his traine, in number about twelue hundred, to get him to ÆNUS, a citie of THRACIA, ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt: where he much diſcontented, liued like an honourable priſoner at large, but with the watchfull eyes of ſo many vpon him, as that he could by no meanes (as he deſired) eſcape. In which caſe we will for a while leaue him, to feed vpon his owne melancholy thoughts.

1261 Now had Michaell Paleologus the emperour raigned at NICE two yeares, when new troubles began againe to ariſe in the Weſt part of his empire on EUROPE ſide, by the trecherie of M Michaell Angelus, Deſpot of EPIRUS. For the ſpeedie repreſsing whereof, he ſent one Alexius Strategopulus, a worthie captaine and a man of great nobilitie (whom for his good ſeruice againſt the ſaid Deſpot, he had in the beginning of his raigne made Cæſar) with little aboue 800 Bythinian ſouldiors, and commiſsion for the taking vp of ſo many mo as he ſhould for that ſeruice need, in MACEDONIA and THRACIA: commaunding him when he had paſſed the ſtrait, with

thoſe

A thoſe ſouldiers to take his way through the ſuburbs of CONSTANTINOPLE, to terrifie the Latines, whom he was loth to ſuffer too long to liue in reſt and quiet or to ſtir too far out of the gates, but to keepe them as priſoners coupt vp within the wals of the citie. This warlike captaine with this handfull of men, paſsing ouer PROPONTIS encamped at REGIUM, not far from CONSTANTINOPLE; where by chance lighting vpon certaine poore labouring men Greekes borne in the citie, and there dwelling, he diligently inquired of them the ſtate thereof, and of what ſtrength the Latines were, with many other things, ſuch as he was deſirous to know: who not onely told him that the ſtrength of the Latines was but ſmall, but alſo that the greateſt part thereof was gone to the ſiege of DAPHNVSIA, a towne not farre off vpon the ſide of the B EVXINE ſea: and withall (as Greekes euill affected to the gouernment of the Latines, and deſirous of the libertie of their countrey) offered of themſelues to ſhew him a meanes how to giue him entrance into the citie. Theſe poore men dwelt within the citie, cloſe by one of the gates, neere whereunto by an old ruinous mine almoſt ſwarued vp, was a ſecret vnſuſpected way into the citie, not knowne to any but to themſelues: By this blind hole they promiſed him by night to receiue in fiftie of his beſt ſouldiers; which ſuddenly ſetting vpon the watch faſt by, and diſpatching them out of the way, might preſently breake open the gate and ſo let in the reſt of the armie: whereunto they promiſed themſelues with their friends to put to their helping hands, aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof. This plot for the betraying of the citie thus laied and agreed vpon, Alexius the Cæſar well rewarding the men, and filling them with
C greater promiſes, ſent them away: who as if they had beene about their countrey worke, were after their woonted manner receiued into the citie, without ſuſpition at all. And within a few daies after according to their promiſe, at an appointed houre receiued in by night the aforeſaid fiftie ſouldiours; who aided by them, preſently ſlew the watch, and brake open the gate: whereby Alexius entring a little before day, in conuenient place put his men in order of battell; and afterward to the greater terrour of the Latines, cauſed the citie to be ſet on fire in foure places, which increaſed with the wind, burnt in moſt terrible manner, and was in ſhort time come almoſt to the emperours pallace. Who ſcarce well awaked, and ſeeing the citie all on a fire about his eares, and the enemie comming on; was about at the firſt with thoſe few Latines that hee had (for Greekes he had none) to haue made head againſt them. But better aduiſed, and perceiD uing it to be now to no purpoſe, he (the laſt of the Latine Emperours that euer raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE) with Iuſtinian the Latine Patriarch, and ſome other of his friends, fled by ſea into EVBOCA, and ſo from thence afterwards vnto VENICE, and afterwards to Lewis the French king, in hope to haue beene by him and the Venetians relieued. After whom fled alſo all the reſt of the Latines. Thus the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE by great fortune fell againe into the hands of the Greeks, in the yeare 1261, after it had beene in poſſeſsion of the Latines, about 58 yeares.

Paleologus the Greeke emperor taketh poſſeſsion of the citie of Conſtantinople

The joyfull newes of the recouerie of the imperiall citie, was in ſhort time carried vnto Michael Paleologus the Greeke emperour at NICE; who at the firſt beleeued it not, as thinking it ſcarce poſsible ſo ſtrong a citie to haue beene by ſo weake a power ſurpriſed, where as hee
E himſelfe not long before was not able with a right puiſſant armie, and much other warlike prouiſion, to win the little caſtle of GALATA ouer againſt it. But afterwards aſſured of the truth thereof, with his hands and eies caſt vp towards heauen, gaue moſt heartie thankes to God therefore; cauſing hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing to bee ſolemnly ſung in euerie church, with all the other ſignes of joy and triumph that could be deuiſed. So ſetting all other things apart, he wholy buſied himſelfe in making preparation for his going to CONSTANTINOPLE, now once againe the ſeat of the Greeke empire: wherein, and in trauelling hauing ſpent many daies, he at length with the empreſſe his wife and Andronicus his ſonne, then but two yeares old, as if it had been in ſolemne proceſsion on foot entred into the citie, by the gate called the Golden Gate; and ſo after praiers and thankes giuen, went to the pallace prepared for F him neere vnto the tiltyard: for the other imperiall pallaces of greater beautie (ſometime the ſtately dwellings of the greateſt emperours of the Greekes) had now of long during the raigne of the Latines, lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And ſhortly after, becauſe vertue and true deſert ſhould not want their due honour, he cauſed Alexius Cæſar (by whoſe meanes the citie was recouered) in ſolemne triumph in his roabs of honour, with a crowne vpon his head, not much inferiour vnto the imperiall crowne, with great pompe to bee carried through all the citie.

citie: and farther commaunded, That his name for one yeare next following, in all ſolemne G hymnes and praiers of thankſgiuing, ſhould be joyned with the name of the emperour himſelfe:
And yet not thinking to haue done him honour enough, cauſed his liuely image afterward to be moſt curiouſlly made, and as a trophie to be ſet vpon a faire marble piller, before the great church of the holy Apoſtles, in perpetuall remembrance of him, and that he had done for the deliuerie of his countrey; which ſhortly after ouerthrowne by an earthquake, was by his ſonne againe reſtored. Now was this great and famous citie, ſometime the beautie of the word, by theſe ſtrange and fatall mutations, woonderfully defaced and brought to great deſolation: in euerie place was to be ſeene great heapes, or rather (to ſay the truth) great hils of rubbidge, H
the eternall witneſſes of the ruine thereof; the houſes ſtood ſome quite fallen downe, ſome readie to follow after, and ſome other great and ſtately buildings now the ſmall reliques of great fires: for the great beautie thereof was before, at ſuch time as the Latines tooke it, moſt defaced by fire; who all the time that they had it, ceaſſed not night and day to deſtroy ſome part or other of it, as if they had knowne they ſhould not long keepe it; neither did this laſt fire raiſed by the Greekes themſelues to terrifie the Latines, a little deforme it: for which cauſe
the emperours chiefe care now was to cleanſe the citie, and in beſt ſort he could to reforme ſo great a confuſion of things not to be all at once amended; firſt beginning with the churches, which ruinous or readie to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the emptie houſes with new inhabitants. And albeit that the chiefe of the Latines were together with the emperour fled and gone, yet was the moſt part of the artificers and tradeſmen of the citie, Venetians, and of I them of PISA, mingled together; vnto whom alſo to joyne the Genowaies, and ſo to fill the citie with Latines, he thought it not altogether ſafe, although that by them he reaped great profit: wherefore he aſsigned vnto them the citie of GALATA now called PERA, on the other ſide of the hauen, for them to inhabit; graunting them great priuiledges, and euerie of thoſe companies to be gouerned by a Conſull or Poteſtate of their owne. As for the imperiall citie it ſelfe, he ſtored it (ſo neere as he could) with naturall Greeks borne.

Paleologus ieatous of his eſtate.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the emperour could himſelfe haue wiſhed; yet could he not reſt ſo contented, for feare leaſt thoſe which now did eat their owne hearts and with great griefe ſmouldred their anger, ſhould at length as the rightfull heires of the empire by K him vſurped, breake out into open force, and ſo breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps worke his confuſion. For ſuch is the tormenting ſtate of vſurping tyrants, neuer to thinke themſelues ſafe ſo long as any one liueth, whom they may ſuſpect. Wherefore at once to rid himſelfe of this feare, he thought it beſt ſo to diſpoſe of the children of the late emperour Theodorus Laſcaris, as that he ſhould not need of them to ſtand in doubt: to take them out of the way, beſides that it was a thing odious, he ſaw it like to be vnto him alſo dangerous; Marie and Theodora (two of the eldeſt daughters) being before by their father married vnto two great princes (one, the Deſpot of EPIRVS, & the other prince of BVLGARIA) with whom he had much before to do, and of them yet ſtood in ſome doubt; but theſe were ſafe enough out of his reach.
Other two yoonger ſiſters there were in his cuſtodie, Theodora & Irene, with their brother Iohn, the onely heire of the empire: Theodora he married vnto one Belicurt, a gentleman of PELO- L PONESVS; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of GENVA; both Latines, men of no great birth or power, ſuch as he needed not to ſtand in doubt of. Theſe two ladies, the daughters of ſo great an emperour as was Theodorus, thus baſely beſtowed; remained onely their brother Iohn, the one-ly heire of the empire, then but ten yeares old, whom Paleologus long before euen in the beginning of his raigne, had ſent vnto MAGNESIA, there to bee ſafely kept farre off from the court, for feare leaſt in his right and quarrell ſome diſcontented perſons deſirous of innovation, ſhould begin ſome new ſtirs dangerous to his eſtate. Which indignitie done vnto the yoong prince, Arſenius the Patriarch (put in truſt by his father for the bringing of him vp) tooke in ſo euill part, that he forſooke the court with all his eccleſiaſticall dignities, and as a man wearie of the world, retired himſelfe vnto a little monaſterie of Paſcaſius in the countrey, M there to ſpend the reſt of his daies. From whence for all that hee was after the taking of CON-STANTINOPLE from the Latines, almoſt againſt his will drawne thither by Paleologus the emperour, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with ſo great an honour to find his greater diſcontent. For Paleologus the vſurper, altogether vnmindfull of his faith ſo ſolemnly before giuen, for the ſafetie of the yoong prince, and the reſtoring vnto him of his empire; and

now fully resolued to establish vnto him and his posteritie the soueraignte of so great an empire, howsoeuer it was got, caused the yoong princes eies to be most cruelly put out: the vsuall practise of the tyrants of the East, vpon such as they are loath or feare to kill, and yet would make them vnfit for gouernment. Of which barbarous crueltie, his sister Theodora (married to Constantinus prince of BVLGARIA) hearing, ceassed not with teares and praiers and all other womanly persuasions, to stir vp her husband in reuenge thereof: whereunto also Iathatines the Turkes Sultan, gaue no small furtherance; who wearie of exile, and to bee so into a corner confined, as into a prison from whence hee might not start, by secret messengers entreated the Bulgarian prince to make war vpon the vsurping emperour: promising him a great summe of money, if by his helpe hee might recouer his former libertie. Wherewith hee the rather mooued, with a great power of his owne and aboue twentie thousand Tartars which then lay by the riuer ISTER, suddenly brake into the emperours territories, and in shorter time than was to haue beene thought, ouerrun all the countrey of THRACIA euen vnto the sea side, leauing neither man nor beast in all the countrey as he went: in good hope also to haue by the way surprized the emperour himselfe, euen then returning from his wars against the Despot in THESSALIE: who hearing of his speedie comming, being got vnto the sea side, and (hauing no way left to haue escaped by land) shipped himselfe into a galley of the Latines, which with another her consert bound for CONSTANTINOPLE, by good hap put in there for to water, and so in two daies arriued in safetie at the imperiall citie. Thus disappointed of the emperour, all his care was for the deliuerie of the Turks Sultan. Wherefore marching in hast to ÆNVM, he so terrified the citizens with his comming, that they without farther delay deliuered him into his hands, so to redeeme their owne peace. In his returne you might haue seene the souldiours, especially the Tartars, driuing before them infinit numbers both of men and cattell, in such sort, as that in the open countrey of THRACIA for a space, was hardly to be seene either countreyman or beast, it was so cleane swept both of inhabitants and likewise of cattell.

Paleologus casteth the yong emperours eyes to be put out.

Iathatines the Sultan by the Tartars carried ouer ISTER, and so by them set at liberrie, shortly after died. In whose kingdome succeeded not his sonne Melicke (as some write) but two others (as the Turkes themselues report) the one called Mesoot, the sonne of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades, the sonne of Feramcine, borne also of the Selzuccian family, as were all the other Turkes Sultans, but how neere of blood vnto the late Sultan Iathatines they say not. Betwixt which two, as his vassales, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (by whom they were so preferred) for the payment of a yearely tribute, diuided the Turkes kingdome: aportioning vnto Mesoot the cities of AMIDA in antient time called AMISVS, and AMINSVS in GALATIA, MELATIA otherwise called MELETINE in the lesser ARMENIA, SIVASTE, in antient time SEBASTIA, and HARBERIE, before SATABREA, both in CAPPADOCIA, with all the countrey about them. And vnto Kei-Cubades, ICONIUM, the auncient seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all RUMILIA ASIATICA, or the countries of the lesser ASIA alongst the sea coast; which these two princes held as the Tartars tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill such time as he was by the same Tartars againe expulsed. So that the Turks kingdome, which had of long time flourished in the Selzuccian familie in PERSIA, in SYRIA, PALESTINE, and ÆGYPT, there quite ouerthrowne by the Mamalukes and Tartars (as is before declared) & now brought vnderfoot in the lesser ASIA also, where only rested all the hope of that nation, was now at a low ebbe, deuided betwixt two weake princes, raigning but at the deuotion of the Tartar. In which confusion of the Turkish empire, so rent, not onely diuers men of greater power and authoritie amongst them, shared vnto themselues, some one corner of the declining kingdome, and some another: but many of the obscure and basest people also, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the strait passages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incursions did much harme in the countries of the Christians joyning vpon them: which was no great matter for them to doe, the garrisons which were woont to defend the same, being for want of pay quite disbanded, and the castles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the first, as a thing of small importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cause of the ruine and decay of the greatest part of their state in ASIA. These mischeefes vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turkes still gaining vpon the Greekes what they lost vnto the Tartars. Whose inuaſions (the glorie of their kingdome onely excepted) was not ſo hurtfull vnto them, as the cauſe of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of theſe aduenturous Turkes meeting together in PAPHLAGONIA, were about to haue inuaded the territories of the Chriſtians: againſt whom Michaell Paleologus the emperour ſent out a ſtrong and puiſſant armie to ſtay their further comming on, leſt breaking in that way they ſhould without reſiſtance at their pleaſure forrage the countrey before them. Which armie conducted by vnskilfull captaines, encountering with the Turkes, was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne and vtterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude eſcaping: for whileſt the Greeks vnaduiſedly purſued the Turks, retiring of purpoſe before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a greater power lying in ambuſh for them, and ſo entrapped, were ſlaine with an exceeding great ſlaughter. After which ſo great a victorie (the beginning of the miſerie of the Chriſtians in the leſſer ASIA) the Turkes without let or ſtay ouerranne all the countrey, vnto the riuer SANGARIVS: vpon the banks whereof the Greeke emperour was glad to fortifie diuers townes and forts to keepe them out of BITHINIA. Neuertheleſſe, they in ſhort time after ſubdued all the countries from PONTVS and GALATIA, vnto the LYCIAN and CARIAN ſea, and the riuer EVRIMEDON, which they diuided amongſt them into diuers Toparchies: little or nothing acknowledging the ſoueraigntie either of Meſoot, or Kei-Cubades.

Whileſt the Turkes in the leſſer ASIA thus win from the Chriſtians on the one ſide, and looſe to the Tartars on the other; many an hard conflict in the meane time paſſed betwixt the Ægyptian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the ſoueraigntie of SYRIA. The poore remainder of the Chriſtians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other: From whom and from the Armenians (then alſo much infeſted by the Mamalukes) diuers embaſſadors were ſent vnto the Pope & the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, to craue their aid and helpe in that their hard eſtate: whoſe praiers little preuailing with the reſt, yet ſo mooued Lewis the French king, and Henry the third, then raigning in ENGLAND, that they both promiſed them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of great deuotion, and alwaies forward in that ſeruice againſt the infidels, tooke vpon him the croſſe, the cogniſance of the ſacred war; cauſing his three ſonnes, Philip that ſucceeded him in the kingdome, ſurnamed the Faire, Peter countie of ALANCON, and Iohn countie of NEVERS (ſurnamed Triſtan, for that his mother was in her greateſt heauineſſe for the taking of her husband, deliuered of him in ÆGYPT) and moſt of the nobilitie of FRANCE to do the like: vnto whom alſo Theobald king of NAVAR his ſonne in law, Alphonſus his brother, and Guydo earle of FLANDERS, joyned themſelues. And ſo hauing put all things in readineſſe, tooke his way to MARSEILLES, and from thence embarking himſelfe with his armie in the Genowaies ſhips, hired for that purpoſe, ſet forward the firſt of March in the yeare 1270. But being at ſea, he was by force of weather conſtrained to land in SARDINIA, and there to ſtay a while: departing thence, he at length arriued at CARTHAGE, the place by him deſired, where in the entrance of the hauen he ſurpriſed certain of the enemies ſhips; but landing his men, and aſſaulting the town, he was there notably repulſed. This is not that antient great and famous citie which ſometime mightily ſtroue with the proud miſtreſſe of the world for ſoueraigntie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at leaſt not far from the ruines of the ſame. In the beſieging whereof, the Frenchmen found ſuch reſiſtance, as well put them in remembrance of the antient glorie of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the king thus lay at the ſiege, that the defendants made a great and fierce ſally out vpon the Frenchmen, who before commaunded ſo to do, by little and little retired, to draw their enemies farther on: betwixt whom and the citie, the Conſtable with a great power comming in and charging them behind, and they which before retired now ſtanding cloſe vnto them, they were on both ſides hardly beſet; who for all that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themſelues, and made there a great fight, though not without extreame perill: which they in the citie beholding, gaue out a moſt hideous and piteous crie, a certaine ſigne of their hard eſtate within; aſtonying with the ſuddenneſſe thereof, both their friends & their enemies. But whileſt they of the towne betwixt hope and diſpaire ſtood thus beholding the fight at land, the Frenchmen by ſea approching a bulwarke on that ſide of the towne, tooke it without reſiſtance: which ſo diſmaid them without, that they began foorthwith to flie, of whom the greateſt part caſting away their weapons, were by the kings commandement taken to mercie; and they likewiſe of the towne vpon promiſe of their liues, yeelded the

A ſame vnto the king. CARTHAGE thus woon, the king layd ſiege vnto TVNES, the chiefe cittie of that kingdome, being not farre off: where by the way he was encountred by the king of the countrey, who hauing there loſt ten thouſand of his Moores, betooke himſelfe to flight with the reſt. Who thus ouerthrowne, reſolued no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himſelfe ſafe within the wals of his citie, if happily ſo he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying ſtill and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpoſe king Lewis perceiuing, reſolued not to ſtirre from thence vntill that he were become maſter of the citie; which as it ſeemed could not hold out for want of victuals, conſidering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuertheleſſe thus beſieged both by ſea
B and land, and ſo ſtraightly hemmed in on euerie ſide, as that no reliefe could poſsibly bee brought vnto it; yet held it out by the ſpace of ſix moneths. After which time wants dayly more and more increaſing among the beſieged, embaſſadours were ſent out to the king, to entreat with him of peace: But whileſt theſe embaſſadours go too and fro, and reaſon vpon the capitulations of the deſired peace, behold a great and furious plague aroſe in the French campe, which began to cut them downe by heapes: there died Iohn Triſtan countie of NEVERS, the kings yoongeſt ſonne, borne in the firſt expedition that the ſaid king his father made into the Holy land, euen at ſuch time as hee was taken priſoner; which Triſtan died the fiue and twentith day of Auguſt in the yeare of our Lord 1270. The good king hauing yet ſcarcely performed the obſequies of his ſonne, fell ſicke of the bloodie flix, wherof he there ſhort-
C ly after died alſo. About which time arriued there Charles king of SICILIE, the French kings brother, with a great number of freſh ſouldiours: whoſe comming lightned ſomewhat the Frenchmens hearts (heauie for the death of their king) and daunted the Moores, before brag of the ſame. Shortly after whom arriued there alſo prince Edward, king Henrie the third his eldeſt ſonne, who trauelling through FRANCE, and taking ſhipping at AQVESMORT, not far from MARSEILLES, was now in ten daies with a braue companie of Engliſhmen come to TVNES; and there of the other Chriſtian princes, namely of Philip the French king (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles king of SICILIE, and of the two kings of NAVAR and ARAGON, joyfully receiued. But theſe princes had a little before his arriuall concluded a peace with the Moores king, and the infidels, vpon condition that he ſhould pay a yearely tribute of D fortie thouſand crownes vnto the king of SICILIA; and to ſuffer the Chriſtian religion to be freely preached in his dominions, by ſuch deuout perſons as ſhould be there left for that purpoſe; and that vnto ſuch perſons as ſhould by their preaching bee conuerted vnto the faith in Chriſt Ieſus, it ſhould be lawfull for them to be baptized, and to profeſſe the Chriſtian religion. Of which peace, prince Edward vnderſtanding, did what hee might to haue diſſuaded them from the ſame, ſaying, That the war was by them all taken in hand againſt the infidels, as enemies vnto the croſſe of Chriſt, with whom they were not to haue peace: and for the recouerie of the Holy citie. But ſay what he would, and what he could, the peace (to his great diſcontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they ſaid) againe breake: and thereupon with the firſt faire wind hoiſſed ſaile, and returned towards SICILIA, with purpoſe the next Spring to haue gone into SYRIA; which their determination was ſhortly after by the hand of God diſappointed. For being come vpon the coſt of the iſland not far from DREPANVM, moſt of the great princes and other nobilitie, in their long boats went on land, the reſt of the fleet lying at anker about a league off; for that being for the moſt part ſhips of great burthen, they were not able to put into the harbour: But as they ſo lay, by force of a ſudden and violent tempeſt then ariſing ſome were eaten vp with the wrought ſea; ſome falling foule one of another, there periſhed together; others driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in peeces: ſo that of that great fleet before the ſtorme ceaſſed, periſhed about an hundred and twentie ſaile, with all the people, as well marriners as ſouldiours left in them, and great ſtore both of armour and munition: In ſuch ſort that moſt of the common ſouldiours and marriners which had eſcaped the plague at TVNES, there vpon the coaſt of SICILIA periſhed by ſhipwracke. Onely prince Edwards fleet, being in number but thirteene ſhips, eſcaped free without loſſe either of ſhip or man. Neither were they that were got to land at DREPANVM in much better caſe, the plague ſtill following them; whereof died Theobald king of NAVAR, and Iſabell his wife, king Lewis his daughter, Elizabeth the French queene, with a woonderfull number of noble gentlemen, and other common ſouldiours; in ſuch ſort that Philip the French king diſcou-

discouraged with the greatnesse of the mortalitie, and the miserable losse at sea, resolued there to make an end of the intended warre, and so returned into FRANCE, as did the rest that were left, 1271 euery man into his owne countrey. Onely prince Edward hauing passed that Winter in CILICIA, with the first of the next Spring set forward againe on his voyage, and in fifteene dayes after arriued with his fleet at PTOLEMAIS: where after he had by the space of a moneth rested himselfe and his souldiors after their long trauell, and fully inquired of the state of the country, hee with six or seuen thousand souldiors marching from PTOLEMAIS about twentie miles into the land, tooke NAZARETH, and put to sword all them he found therein, and so againe returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at some aduantage, he vnderstanding thereof, turned backe vpon them, and killing a great number of them, put the rest to flight. And after that about Midsummer, vnderstanding that the Sarasins were againe making head at a place called CAKHOW, about fortie miles off, he set forwards towards them; and comming vpon them early in the morning, before they were aware, slew aboue a thousand of them, and dispersed the rest. Aided also by the nobilitie of CYPRUS, he with like successe as before, made a third expedition against the Infidels: insomuch, that his fame began to grow great amongst them, and they to stand of him in no little dread. But whilest he thus prouailed, he was by foule trecherie almost taken out of the way. The Admirall of IOPPA faigning himselfe desirous to become a Christian, and willing to further the princes proceedings, had by a secret messenger and letters sundrie times intelligence with him, as well concerning his owne good intertainement, as the effecting of that which he had promised. This messenger by the Admirall thus imployed, was (though to the prince vnknowne) one of the Assasines, a companie of most desperat and dangerous men among the Mahometanes, who strongly deluded with the blind zeale of their superstition, and accounting it meritorious, by any meanes to kill any great enemie of their religion; for the performance thereof, as men prodigall of their liues, desperately aduenture themselues vnto all kind of dangers. So now this messenger, before resolued to die, comming the fift time vnto the prince, and being searched for hauing any weapon about him, as the manner was, had accesse vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his jerkin, bare headed, because of the heat of the weather: where after due reuerence done, hee pulled out certaine letters from his lord vnto the prince, which he read with great delight, as penned of purpose for to please. But as hee was farther questioning with him of many matters, and all the companie voided, the desperat messenger making as though he would haue pulled out some other secret letters, suddainly pluckt out an enuenomed knife, which he had secretly hidden about him, thinking to haue strucke him into the bellie as he lay: For the auoiding of which stroke, the prince lifting vp his arme, was therein greeuously wounded. But as the villaine was about to haue doubled the stroke, the prince with his foot gaue him such a blow, that he felled him to the ground, and with that starting vp, caught him by the hand, where in strugling with him for the knife, in wresting it out of his hand, hee hurt himselfe therewith in the forehead: but getting it from him, presently thrust it into the murtherers bellie, and so slew him. The princes seruants being not farre off, and hearing the busteling, came running in; where finding the messenger dead on the floore, one of them with a stoole beat out his braines: whereat the prince tooke some displeasure, for so striking a dead man. This danger of the princes, much troubled and grieued all the Christians in SYRIA, and the more, for that the wound in his arme, after it had beene certaine dayes well dressed by the skilfull surgeons and physicians, began to mortefie and grow blacke, insomuch, that they and others about him began to mutter among themselues, and to looke heauily vpon the matter, as not without danger. Which he perceiuing, said vnto them: Why whisper you thus among your selues? what see you in me? can I not be healed; tell me the truth, and feare not? whereunto one of them answered: And like your highnesse, we doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painefull for you to suffer. If suffering (said he) may againe restore my health, I commit my selfe vnto you, worke on me your skill, and spare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poysoned flesh out of his arme, and in fifteene dayes after perfectly cured his wound, to the great rejoycing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himselfe of this so dishonourable a trecherie, sent three of his noblemen vnto the prince, calling to witnesse his false prophet, that the same was done neyther by him nor his consent. Which embassadours the prince honourably vsed, but suffered them

A them not to come nigh him. So hauing taried eighteene moneths at PTOLEMAIS, and no aid comming from the other Christian princes as was expected, he tooke shipping; and returning homeward, landed first in SICILIA, and from thence crossing ouer into APULIA and so trauelling to ROME, was there honourably entertained by Gregorie the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of FRANCE arriued in ENGLAND, where he was shortly after crowned king in the yeare 1272, his father the old king, Henrie the third, being a little before his returne dead.

The yeare following, Gregorie the tenth, not ignorant of the hard estate of the Christians in SYRIA (as hauing there ben of late himselfe with prince Edward, at which time he was in his absence elected pope) and now desirous to procure them some reliefe, ratified the election of Rodolphus of HAPSPURGE vnto the empire, vpon condition, That he should promise to take vpon himselfe the crosse, and to giue them reliefe: for the performance whereof, he offered vnto the emperour two hundred thousand crownes, with the tenths both of the cleargie and temporaltie for sixe yeares: and many goodly blessings were in his name also, by the preachers of that time, promised vnto all such as should with him take vpon them that sacred warre. Whereupon the emperour with all his familie tooke vpon them the crosse, the signe of the sacred expedition intended; as did also the duke of LORRAINE shortly after, with some others: Neuertheless, the emperour otherwaies busied in warres against the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying still the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him so long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope still threatening his high sentence of excommunication, the time passed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Vntill that at length the emperour hauing happily finished his warres in BOHEMIA, and finding himselfe at some good leisure in some part to discharge his vow, and to satisfie the expectation the world had of long conceiued of him, sent Henrie prince of MEGAPOLIS, or as the Germanes call it, MECKELBURG, with a strong power into SYRIA, to performe what himselfe had promised. Who comming to PTOLEMAIS made many notable incursions into the countrey about DAMASCO, with fire and sword destroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length he was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken prisoner, and so carried vnto the Sultan at CAIRE, where he remained in strait prison sixe and twentie yeares after; vntill that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) being chosen Sultan, caused him to be brought before him, and at his comming demaunded of him, If it would not doe him good to celebrate the remembrance of the natiuitie of his Christ with his friends in GERMANIE? (for now that time of the yeare was at hand) And I know (said the Sultan) that thou art so addicted vnto thy superstition, that thou respectest the same more than thy libertie. Truth (said Henrie) mightie prince: for libertie would auaile me nothing, if Christ by his most milde incarnation had not taken away our captiuitie: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, O king, diddest also vnderstand, which as I most heartely wish, so I would I could thereof persuade thee. God forbid (said the Sultan) for I remember, that at such time as I was cheefe enginer vnto thy father at KNESE-FENICKE in LIVONIA, and there did him good seruice, I was altogether of the Christian persuasion; but now hauing left that common error, haue therewith also changed my priuat fortune. But as for thy religion, I haue nothing to say, my talke is only concerning thy libertie: Wouldest thou therefore gladly be free, and so returne home to thy friends? That nature craueth (said Henrie) although my fortune gainesaieth, which yet dependeth of your pleasure: I desire indeed to returne home, which if you shall denie me, I must as I haue done, take it in good part; assuring my selfe, that my wife Anastasia, with my beloued sonnes Henrie, Leo, and Iohn, haue long since celebrated my funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceiued (said the Sultan) for I am sure that they know that thou yet liuest, and pray most heartely for thy returne: Truly I owe much vnto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day giue thee thy libertie. And hauing so said, furnished him with all things necessarie, and gaue him leaue to depart with one Martin his seruant, who taken with him, had borne him companie all the long time of his captiuitie. So taking his leaue of the Sultan, he came to PTOLEMAIS: but shipping himselfe for CYPRUS, he was by the way by certaine pyrats taken at sea, and as a fugitiue captiue brought backe againe vnto the Sultan: Who pittying his hard fortune, set him againe at libertie, and by a ship set out for that purpose, transported him into CYPRUS: where he was by the queene of that Island his aunt (as some Departing thence, he came to MARSIELLES, where after he had ſome few daies refreſhed himſelfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his owne country: where at the firſt he was not knowne of his own children and friends, as being growne old in priſon, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found againe, and by them knowne, he was of his children joyfully receiued as their father, and of his ſubjects as their prince. Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honourably buried in the monaſterie of DOBRAN.

Thus in the whole courſe of this hiſtorie it appeareth by that which is alreadie written, what notable expeditions euen the greateſt Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, to their immortall glorie from time to time vndertooke againſt the enemies of Chriſt and his moſt ſacred word, and for the reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians in SYRIA and in the land of PALESTINE: whereof as diuers of them had right glorious ſucceſſe, vnto the great profit of the Chriſtian common weale; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too ſmall ſtrength, or otherwiſe ouerthrowne by the diſcord or mallice of the Chriſtians themſelues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleſſe how vnfortunatly ſoeuer they fell out in the hands of ſuch woorthie men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glorie, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the ſonne of God, Chriſt Ieſus, and the defence of his veritie, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, and his moſt blaſphemous doctrine; ſo honourable and juſt a quarrell, as might well beſeeme the greatneſſe of the greateſt prince, yea of all the princes of Chriſtendome. Yet could not the woorthineſſe thereof, euen in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian commonweale, euen then like to periſh, (as ſome others bee now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out vnto their Chriſtian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Chriſtian princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any ſuccour or reliefe: for they little feeling thoſe harmes ſo farre off, and more regarding their owne hereditarie quarrels, employed thoſe forces one againſt another, vnto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian blood, as might haue ſufficed not for reliefe of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in SYRIA onely, but to haue regained whatſoeuer had beene before from them taken by the Turks or Saraſins. The Germane princes were ſtill at a jarre about the choice of their emperours: the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low countries: neither the Engliſh with the Scots: the Arragonians were at oddes with the French: and in Italie were almoſt as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſtians (the greateſt occaſion of their ruine and decay) Melechſares the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding by his eſpials, raiſed a great armie of the Mamalukes, and others, with a full purpoſe to haue vtterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriſtians in SYRIA and the land

1289 of PALESTINE, and ſo to haue entirely joyned thoſe two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had ſo miſchieuouſly deuiſed, he liued not to bring to paſſe, being in the middeſt of thoſe his great deſignes taken away by ſuddaine death. After whom Alphix (or, as ſome call him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the kingdome, and with a puiſſant armie entring into SYRIA laid ſiege to TRIPOLIS, which he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to ſword all the Chriſtians therein, except ſuch as by ſpeedie flight had in time got themſelues out of the danger, and raſed the cittie downe to the ground: Which calamitie betided vnto the Chriſtians the ninth of Aprill, in the yeare 1289. Preſently after he had the ſtrong caſtle of NELESINE yeelded vnto him, whereinto hee put a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building againe the late deſtroyed citie. In like manner alſo hee tooke the citties of SIDON and BERYTHUS, which hee ſacked, and laied them flat with the ground. And after that hee remooued to TYRE, which after three moneths ſtraight ſiege, was by the citizens (now out of all hope of releefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart. With like good fortune hee in ſhort time, and as it were without reſiſtance, tooke all the reſt of the ſtrong townes and caſtles which the Chriſtians yet held in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, excepting onely the cittie of PTOLEMAIS; whereunto all the poore Chriſtians fled, as vnto a Sanctuarie, to bee there defended by the honourable knights Templars and Hoſpitalers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that ſtrong cittie, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the ſpace of fiue yeares, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Chriſtian princes princes of the West, if he should at once haue then vtterly rooted out all the Christians in those countries together.

The Christian affaires thus brought to the last cast in SYRIA, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained peace: Peter Beluise, master of the Templars, with the Grand Master of the knights Hospitalers, suddenly passed ouer (as embassadours from the rest) into EUROPE, vnto Nicholaus Quartus then Pope, craning his fatherly aid: who mooued with so great miseries of the poore afflicted Christians, sollicited the other Christian princes to haue sent them relieue; especially Rodolph the Germaine emperour, who then busied with the affaires of the empire, and his troubles neerer home (as were the other Christian princes also) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet some of them vnder the colour thereof, got from their subiects great summes of money, which they employed to their other worse vses: onely the Pope sent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout persuasion, and much earnest preaching, hee had induced to take vpon them that sacred expedition, and entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom also many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, joyned themselues, as voluntarie men; who meeting together at BRUNDUSIUM, and there embarked, with the two grand masters of the Templars and Hospitalers, in safetie at length arriued at PTOLEMAIS. There was then in the citie a great number of people of all sorts; of able men there was about fiftie thousand, and about fortie thousand of the weaker sort: amongst whom, diuers murders, fellonies, rapes, and such other shamefull outrages (all hasting the dreadfull judgements of God) were daily committed, and let passe vnregarded, more than of them that were so injured. For all the cheefe commaunders were then at variance among themselues, euery one of them laying claime (not woorth a rush) vnto the vaine title of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM. Henry king of CYPRUS comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer vnto him the crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he said) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy, his auncestors. And Charles king of SICILIA, by his embassadours laid claime vnto the title of that kingdome, as due vnto the kings of that Island: and vnderstanding it to be giuen vnto Henry, king of CYPRUS, caused all the reuenewes of the Templars within his dominion to be brought into his treasuries, and their lands and houses to bee spoyled. Hugh also prince of ANTIOCH, laboured with tooth and naile to defend the ouerworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that lost kingdome. And the countie of TRIPOLIS laied in for himselfe, that hee was descended from Raymund of THOLOUS; and that beside himselfe remained no prince of the auntient nobilitie, which had woon that kingdome out of the hands of the Sarasins, and that therefore that regall dignitie did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himselfe. Neither did these foure princes more striue for the title of the lost kingdome, than for the present gouernment of the citie, straight way about to perish. The Popes Legate pretended thereunto a right also: for that king Iohn Brenne had before subiected it vnto the See of ROME. As for the claime vnto the citie of PTOLEMAIS, the Patriarch of HIERUSALEM challenged vnto himselfe the preheminence: for that the mettropoliticall citie of TYRE, vnder which the citie of PTOLEMAIS was the third episcopall seat, was vnder his jurisdiction, euen by the decree of the West church. The Templars also, and the knights Hospitalers, whose power in the citie was at that time farre the greatest, pretended the gouernment thereof of best right to belong vnto them, as the just reward of their blood alreadie, and afterward to be spent in the defence thereof: promising great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither spared the French king or the king of ENGLAND by their messengers to claime the soueraignetie of the cittie, by their predecessours sometimes woon. And they of PISA hauing still a Consull therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants growne into great affinitie with them, did what they might to get the gouernment into their hands. The Venetians also by their authoritie and great wealth laboured to gaine the good will of the people, sparing therein no cost. And they of GENUA no lesse cunning than the rest, supplanted the strongest factions, by giuing aid both apertly and couertly vnto the weaker; that so hauing weakened the faction they most doubted and hated, they might by the joint fauour of the weaker aspire vnto the gouernment of the stronger, and so consequently of the citie it selfe. The Florentines also by their continuall traffique thither, were not out of hope by one fineneſſe or other amongst so many competitours, to find a meane to ſtep vp aboue the reſt. But the greateſt part of the people for all that were moſt enclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their neereneſſe and power moſt like of all other to ſtand them in ſtead. All theſe aymed at one marke, which was the gouernment and commaund of the cittie: and moſt of them had in the ſame their owne proper lawes and courts, to deſide their cauſes and controuerſies in. Whereby it came to paſſe, that euery man might without checke or controulement almoſt doe what he liſt, the offenders from one court to another remooving their ſutes, as beſt ſerued their turnes. Thus were murders (as is beforeſaid) dayly committed in the ſtreets, men abuſed, houſes robbed, ſhops broken vp, and many other outrages done, to the haſtening of the wrath of God, and greeſe of all good men.

1291 Diuiſion and diſſention (the ruine of all commonweales) thus raigning in the cittie (the ſouldiours of late ſent thither, or in zeale come of themſelues, for the defence thereof) gaue occaſion for the ſpeedie deſtruction of the ſame: Such is the power of the Almightie, in his wrath and judgements for ſinne, euen by thoſe things wherein wee moſt truſt and joy to worke our vtter ruine and deſtruction. Theſe ſouldiors, for want of ſuch pay as was promiſed them, were enforced to ſeeke abroad, and therefore contrarie to the league before made with the Ægyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties into the frontiers of his territories, taking the ſpoile of ſuch things as they light vpon. Whereof the Sultan vnderſtanding, demaunded by his embaſſadours, That reſtitution might be made, and the offendors deliuered vnto him to bee puniſhed, according vnto the league. But in that ſo ſicke a ſtate of a dying commonweale, neither was reſtitution made, as reaſon would, or yet the embaſſadors courteouſly heard. With which inſolencie the Sultan prouoked, ſent Emilech Araphus, a notable captaine (and as ſome ſay, his ſonne) with an hundred and fiftie thouſand men, to beſiege the citie: who comming thither, and hauing made his approches, had by a mine in ſhort time ouerthrowne a peece of the wall; but in ſeeking to haue entered by the breach, he found ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, that hee was glad with loſſe to retire. Whileſt Araphus thus lay at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS, Alphir the Sultan died at DAMASCO, in whoſe ſtead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan, who more deſirous of nothing than of the glorie of the vtter rooting vp of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, was ſo farre from raiſing of his ſiege (either for the death of the Sultan, or the newes of his kingdome) that hee more ſtraitly beſet the citie than he had in the three moneths ſpace that he had there lien before. Now had they in the citie choſen Peter the maſter of the Templars, their gouernour, a man of great experience and valour: vnto whom and the reſt of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and vnto the ſouldiors their pay, with free libertie to depart, ſo that they would without more adoe yeeld vnto him the citie, which they could not long hold; Which his offer the maſter rejected, and flatly told him, That hee had not learned of his auncеſtours, to ſell for money vnto the Infidels a citie bought with ſo much Chriſtian blood; either did ſo much regard his vaine threats, as therefore to forget his ſeruice due vnto his Sauiour Chriſt and the Chriſtian commonweale. With which anſwere the tyrant enraged, the next day with all his forces aſſaulted the citie, and that in ſuch deſperat and furious manner, as if hee would euen then haue carried it; hauing before filled the ditches, and promiſed the ſpoile vnto his ſouldiors, the more to encourage them. Yet hauing done what he could, and loſt a number of his men, ſlaine both in the aſſault, and in a ſallie which the Chriſtians made out at the ſame time, he was inforced to retire backe againe into his trenches. In this ſo terrible an aſſault, not repulſed without ſome loſſe alſo of the Chriſtians, the Grand maſter and gouernour of the citie was wounded with a poyſoned dart, whereof hee in three dayes after died: with whom the courage of the defendants fainted alſo, no man being left like vnto him to vndertake ſo great a charge, although many there were, that ouerweening of themſelues, deſired the ſame. In the beginning of this ſiege, the Chriſtians had ſent away all their aged and weake people, vnfit for ſeruice, into CYPRUS, where they in ſafetie arriued. But now many of the better ſort, both captaines and others, diſcouraged, one after another conuaighed themſelues away out of the citie: of whom a great number in paſsing thence to CYPRUS, were vpon the coaſt of the Iſland, together with the Patriarch drowned. In the citie remained only twelue thouſand, which were thought ſufficient for the defence thereof: who afterwards (as ſome report) fled alſo by ſea after their fellowes, and ſo left the citie emptie vnto the barbarous enemie: ſome others reporting of

of them more honourably, as that they ſhould right valiantly defend the citie againſt the aſſault of their enemies, vntill ſuch time as that moſt of them beeing ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt by force driuen from the wals into the market place, and there for a while notably defending themſelues in flying thence vnto the ſhips, were by the way all cut in ſunder, or elſe drowned. But howſoeuer it was, the Sultan entering the citie (by the Chriſtians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiors; who after they had rifled euerie corner thereof, by his commaundement ſet it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground: and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, churches, and other publicke and priuat buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no ſigne of any citie at all; but purging the place euen of the very heapes of the ſtones and rubbidge left of the raſed citie, made it a fit place for husbandmen to plough and ſowe corne in; which he did both there at SYDON, BERITUS, and other townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, becauſe they ſhould neuer more ſerue for a refuge vnto the Chriſtians, or giue them footing againe into thoſe countries. Thus together with PTOLEMAIS was the name of the Chriſtians vtterly rooted out of SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, in the yeare 1291, about 192 yeares after the winning of HIERUSAREM by Godfrey of BUILLON and the other Chriſtian princes his confederats.

This loſſe, as tending to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtians in generall, mooued not a little euen the greateſt of the Chriſtian princes; wronged all or moſt part of them in the perſons of the Templars or knights Hoſpitalers, their ſubjects, ſo ſhamefully now quite caſt out of SYRIA and the land of promiſe: howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home, or with their neighbour princes not farre off, none of them once ſtirred for the redreſſe or reuenge thereof. Onely Caſſanes the great Tartar prince, hauing of late ſubdued the Perſians, and married the daughter of the Armenian king (a ladie of great perfection, and of a Mahometane become a Chriſtian) at the requeſt of his wife and his father in law tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpoſe hauing raiſed a moſt puiſſant armie of two hundred thouſand fighting men, and aided by the Armenians and Georgians, paſsing ouer the mountaine AMANUS into SYRIA, not farre from the citie HAMA met with Melcenaſer, the Ægyptian Sultans lieutenant, with a mightie armie, whom hee ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherein fortie thouſand of the Ægyptians are reported to haue beene ſlaine, and ſo draue him quite out of SYRIA: ſending Molais, one of his captaines, with part of his armie to purſue him, who neuer left him vntill hee had chaſed him ouer the deſart ſands into ÆGYPT. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the citie of HAMA, where lighting vpon the great treaſures of the Sultan, hee bountifully deuided it, together with the ſpoile, amongſt his ſouldiours; reſeruing nothing thereof vnto himſelfe, more than a ſword and a casket full of ſecret letters. The Ægyptian thus put to flight, he without reſiſtance tooke in moſt of the cities of SYRIA, with the citie of HIERUSALEM alſo; which in many places by the Turkes and Ægyptians defaced, he againe repaired: and together with the temple of our Sauior gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Chriſtians, repairing thither out of CYPRUS, CRETE, and other places, to inhabite. And hauing himſelfe honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his armie to DAMASCO, which was foorthwith deliuered vnto him. But lying there, with purpoſe in Autumne following to haue gone into ÆGYPT and to haue vtterly deſtroyed that kingdome, hee was certefied of new troubles ariſing in PERSIA, and ſome other parts of his empire: for repreſsing whereof, hee with the greateſt part of his armie returned himſelfe into PERSIA, leauing one Capcapus gouernour of DAMASCO; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans armie had reuolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee haue before ſpoken) gouernour of HIERUSALEM: commaunding them at his departure to redifie the citie of TYRE, and to ſend embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, to joine in league with them, for the more ſure holding of thoſe new gained countries. And ſo TYRE was indeed repaired as he had commaunded, and deliuered to the Chriſtians, with a conuenient garriſon for the keeping thereof: but the embaſſadours comming to the proud biſhop Boniface the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it beſeemed to haue furthered their buſineſſe, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For he at the ſame time fallen out with Philip the French king, thundering out his excommunications, diſcharging his ſubjects of their loyaltie, and ſo much as in him was, depriuing him of his kingdome, had giuen the ſame vnto Albertus duke of AUSTRIA, whom he had declared emperour: whereof ariſe great troubles. Beſides that, he being of the Guelphes faction, was not in any thing more carefull, than of the vtter extinguiſhing of the contrarie faction of the Gibellines, eſpecially of the moſt honourable family of the Columnij, of whom ſome hee had ſlaine, ſome he had depriued of their honours, ſome he had impriſoned, and driuen otherſome into exile; ſo that thus wickedly buſied for the maintenance of his owne proud eſtate, he had no leiſure to further the good of the Chriſtian common weale: which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulneſſe of dutie, long eſcaped not the reuenging hand of God; being when he thought leaſt ſuddenly taken priſoner at his fathers houſe in the citie of ANAGNIA (where he was borne) by Sara Columnius his mortall enemie; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirates gally, the French king had ſent for that purpoſe, with one Longaret, or as ſome call him Nogaret, a French knight: By whom the proud prelate brought to ROME, in the caſtle S. ANGELO within fiue and thirtie daies after moſt miſerably died, in his madneſſe (as ſome report) renting himſelfe with his teeth and deuouring his owne fingers. This worthie Tartar prince Caſſanes, by whom the Chriſtian common weale might haue againe riſen in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, had not the pride of the great biſhop, and the diſſention of the Chriſtian princes hindered the ſame; was as Aitonus writeth (who was preſent in this warre, following his vncle the Armenian king) a man of a verie ſhort ſtature, and exceeding hard fauour; but with valour, bountie, and other vertues of the mind plentifully recompenſing what wanted in the feature of his bodie. After whoſe departure into PERSIA, Capcapus gouernour of DAMASCO, conſidering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, to recompenſe his former treaſon of reuolting from the Sultan, with a new reuolt from the Tartar; riſe vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not onely the citie of DAMASCO, but the greateſt part of SYRIA alſo: whereof Molais gouernour of HIERUSALEM vnderſtanding, was about to haue gone againſt him with his Tartars; but aduertiſed by his eſpials, that Capcapus in this his conſpiracie had compacted with the Ægyptian Sultan alſo, perceiuing himſelfe too weake to withſtand ſo great a power, he retired with his Tartars into MESOPOTAMIA, there expecting new ſupplies both from Caſſanes and the king of ARMENIA. Of whoſe departure out of SYRIA, the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding, came directly with his armie to HIERUSALEM, which he tooke, being forſaken of the inhabitants; and profaned the temple, ſparing onely the ſepulchre of our Sauiour at the humble ſute of the religious, making there a greater ſhew of deuotion than of crueltie. After that he woon all the other leſſer townes, which the Tartars had either kept for themſelues, or giuen to the other Chriſtians, and vtterly raſed all the caſtles and forts of the Hoſpitalers and Templars: which valiant men without other helpe, for the ſpace of almoſt a yeare held out againſt the Tyrant, in which time 1300 moſt of them were honourably ſlaine: the reſt that were left aliue, being taken by the enemie, had neuertheleſſe leaue giuen them with bag and baggage in ſafetie to depart, hauing before by ſolemne oath for euer abjured the countrey of SYRIA: and ſo theſe woorthie men, the great ornaments of the Chriſtian common weale, the Hoſpitalers and Templars, which to the vttermoſt of their power had by the ſpace of 300 yeares right woorthily defended both the Chriſtians & the Chriſtian religion againſt the infidels in SYRIA & the Holy land, were now for euer driuen out thence, about the yeare of our Lord 1300, to the great diſhonour of all Chriſtendom.

The deſcription of Caſſanes.

The citie of Hierusalem with all Syria againe recouered by the Ægyptian Sultan.

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of SYRIA and the Holy land, leauing the ſame in the poſſeſsion of the Aegyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were ſhortly after like enough to haue beene againe recouered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar prince Caſſanes, and their domeſticall troubles letted: we will againe returne vnto the troubled affaires of the Turks in the leſſer ASIA, whither the courſe of time had ſomwhat before called vs, with the occurrents thereof, more proper vnto our purpoſe and the argument we haue in hand, but that all cannot be at once told: And for the better vnderſtanding of the deſirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the courſe of the aforeſaid hiſtorie drawing ſo neere vnto an end, but to make him partaker of the heauineſſe thereof.

The death of Meſoot and Cei-Cubades.

Now had the Turkes no kingdome left in the leſſer ASIA, and that alſo at the pleaſure of Gazan the great Tartar Chan diuided betwixt Meſoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vaſſals, bound vnto him by a yearely tribut (as is aforeſaid:) who both kept in awe by the greatneſſe of the Tartar, did nothing woorth the remembrance, but as they liued ſo alſo died, almoſt buried in obſcuritie. Of theſe two, Meſoot died without iſſue; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behind him his ſonne

Aladin,

Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the ſecond ſucceeding in the kingdome, vnited againe the ſame before diuided, yet paying ſtill tribut vnto the Tartar his ſoueraigne, as had his father with the other late Sultans of the Turks before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, & not to lie ſo heauie vpon the Turks as before. He was a man of a quiet ſpirit, & therefore much delighted in peace: a great freind vnto Othoman the firſt founder of the glorious and mightie Othoman empire, as in his life ſhall appeare. But this Aladin, the laſt of the Turkes Sultans of the Selzuccian family, dying without iſſue; one Sahib his Veſir-Azemes or chiefe counſeller, and then a man of greateſt authoritie, aſpired vnto the kingdome, which he had for moſt part himſelfe ſwaied all the raigne of the late Sultan his maſter: which vſurped ſoueraigntie, no way vnto him due, he could neither himſelfe long hold, or deliuer to his poſteritie: for that many others of the nobilitie, men of great power, and borne of greater families than he, enuying at his honour and diſdaining to be gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themſelues; laid hold ſome vpon one countrey or prouince, ſome vpon another, where they were able to do moſt, erecting vnto themſelues greater or leſſer Satrapies, according to the meaſure of their owne ſtrength and power, without reſpect of any ſuperioritie one ſhould haue ouer another; but euerie one of them abſolutely commanding ouer ſo much as he was able by ſtrong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, That great Monarchies deſtitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preis vnto ſuch as could firſt lay ſtrong hand vpon them: euen ſo fell it now out in the great kingdom of the Turks; euery one of their great princes, meaſuring the greatneſſe of his territorie not by the meaſure of his right, but by the ſtrength of his owne power. Wherein they ſhared ſo well for themſelues, that Sahib at firſt in poſſeſsion of all, was in ſhort time thruſt quite out of all: and ſo the great kingdome of the Turkes in the leſſer Asia, brought vnto a meere Anarchie; no king now left among them, the whole kingdome being now diuided into diuers Satrapies, or other leſſer Toparchies. The greateſt of theſe princes that thus ſhared the Turkes kingdome amongſt them, was one Caraman Aluſirius; who as ſtrongeſt, tooke vnto himſelfe the citie of Iconium, the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all the great countrey of Cilicia, and ſome part of the frontiers of the countries of Lycaonia, Pamphilia, Caria, and the greater Phrigia, as far as Philadelphia, and the citie of Antioch vpon the riuer Meander: All which large territorie, was of him afterward called Caramania, and by the ſame name is commonly at this day-knowne, and by our late Geographers deſcribed. Of this Caraman alſo diſſended the Caramanian kings, who of long time after vnfortunatly ſtroue with the Othoman Sultans for the ſoueraigntie of their empiers; vntill that at length they with their kingdome, and all the reſt of theſe Turkiſh Satrapies, were in the fatall greatneſſe of the Othoman empire, ſwallowed vp and deuoured, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall (if God ſo will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Sarchan, of whom the countrey of Ionia-Maritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Ili, and Saruchania, that is to ſay, Saruchans countrey. The greateſt part of Lydia, with ſome part of the greater Misia, Troas, and Phrigia, fell to Calamus and his ſonne Caraſius, of whom it is called Carasia, or Carasi-Ili (or as we might ſay) Caraſius his countrey. The greateſt part of the antient Misia, with ſome part of Lydia, was poſſeſſed by Aidin, and was of him called Aidinia or Aidin Ili, as his countrey. Some part of the great countrey of Pontus, with the cities of Heraclea-Pontica, Castamona, Synope, and others neere vnto the Euxine, and the countrey of Paphlagonia, fell into the hands of the ſonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him Amur: of whom that countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of ſuch princes as poſſeſſed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a citie in that countrey by the Turkes ſo named. As was alſo Mendesia, or as ſome call it Mentesia, a countrey in the leſſer Asia, ſo by the Turks called of Mendos or Myndus, a citie in Caria. There were beſide theſe, diuers other places and Toparchies in the leſſer Asia, which in the renting of this great kingdome, from the Turks receiued names, before vnto the world vnknowne; all which to proſecute were tedious: Sufficeth it vs, for the manifeſting of the Turkes Anarchie, and the ruine of their kingdome in the leſſer Asia, as in part alſo for the more euidence of the heauie hiſtorie following, to haue remembred theſe as the chiefeſt; eſpecially ſuch as tooke their names of ſuch great princes or captaines as in that ſo great a confuſion of the Turks kingdome, by ſtrong hand firſt ceazed vpon them, and ſo left them to their their poſteritie, of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter. Theſe princes one and all that thus ſhared G the late Aladinian kingdome, were diſſended of the better ſort of the Turkes which with the Selzuccian and Aladinian Sultans driuen out of PERSIA by the Tartars, had vnder them ſeated themſelues in the leſſer ASIA, as is before at large declared. Now amongſt theſe great men that thus diuided the Turks kingdom, moſt of them that write of the Turks affaires, both Greeks and Latins, reckon vp Othoman (the raiſer of his houſe and familie) for one; who indeed in the latter time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flouriſh, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily fauoured (as in his hiſtorie ſhall appeare,) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordſhip, called SUGUTA in BYTHINIA not far from the mountaine OLIMPUS (long before giuen vnto his father Erthogrull, for his good ſeruice) with ſuch other ſmall holds therabout H as he had himſelfe gained from the weake Chriſtians his neighbours. For although he were a Turke borne, yet was he not of the Selzuccian family, as were the reſt, but of another houſe and tribe, and therefore not of them fauoured or thought to haue ſo good right vnto any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who being of his houſe and holpen with the preſcription of time, enuied at the ſudden riſing of this Oguzian Turke, being vnto them as it were a meere ſtranger: whoſe fortune for all that (I know not by what ſecret foreknowledge) they ſeemed to feare, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their poſteritie; wherein they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be ſaid hereafter: leaue we him now therefore with the reſt vnto their fortunes in this the Turks Anarchie, and ſo conclude this part of our Generall Hiſtorie: Glad when I looke backe to haue waded thus far, yet I fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; ſuch a ſea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toile, and that in long time to be paſſed through.

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EMPIRE OF THE TVRKES VNDER OTHOMAN FIRST FOVNDER THEREOF, VVITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

WHat ſmall aſſurance there is in mens affaires, and how ſubject vnto change euen thoſe things are wherein we for the moſt part repoſe our greateſt felicitie and bliſſe, (beſide that the whole courſe of mans fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainely manifeſt the ſame, than the heauie euents and wofull deſtructions of the greateſt kingdomes and empires: which founded vpon great fortunes, encreaſed with perpetuall ſucceſſe, exalted by exceeding power, eſtabliſhed with moſt puiſſant armies, wholeſome lawes, and deepe counſels; haue yet growne old, and in time come to naught: So that euen as men, all things elſe belonging vnto man, are ſubject vnto the ineuitable courſe of deſtinie, or more truely to ſay, vnto the fatall doome of the moſt higheſt, prefining vnto euerie thing that in time begun, a time alſo wherein to take end, being himſelfe without time the great commander thereof, and of all things elſe done therein. The fame of the firſt Aſſyrian Monarchie, is verie antient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuertheleſſe found an end; and the more to put vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was neuer with ſo much glorie and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with ſhame and cowardiſe by Sardanapalus ſubuerted. With like neceſsitie fell the great empire of the Medes and Perſians, the time thereof being come. And after them, the Macedonians alſo. Neither hath the great Romane empire, or the proud citie of ROME it ſelfe (ſometime the miſtreſſe of the world) herein found any exemption, but runne the ſame courſe with the reſt: which growne great with continuall triumphs, and ſo ſtrong as that it was not with forreine power to be ſhaken; conuerted the forces of it ſelfe vpon it ſelfe, to the ouerthrow of the antient libertie thereof, together with the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſtate. After which time that mightie monarchie (of all that euer yet were, the greateſt) vnder the Romane emperours felt many an hard and perillous ſtorme, and by little and little ſtill declining (though ſometime like a ſicke aged bodie, by the valour or vertue of ſome one or other her woorthie emperours a little relieued, and by and by againe caſt downe by the folly or negligence of ſome others ſucceeding) it became at length a prey vnto a fooliſh rude and barbarous nation, which it had before oftentimes ouercome; and ouer which many the Romane captaines had triumphed, and thereof taken their glorious ſurnames: which now again without compaſsion, burning and ſacking it, cauſed it to ſtoope, and to yeeld vnto the ſeruile yoake which it had in former time proudly impoſed vpon the necks of others: wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then ſitting at the helme (although that may alſo much helpe the

the matter as a meane) but the inſtabilitie of worldly things neuer permanent, but alwaies changeable, and the ſooner for their heigth; and that ſo forcibly as that no man knoweth how to remedie the ſame, either if he did were he able to performe it; the greateſt meanes that men could poſsibly deuiſe for the ſtay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from aboue, conuerted vnto the more ſpeedie effecting of that, againſt the which they were by mans wiſedome prouided. The like might be ſaid of the Athenians, the Lacedæmonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What maruell then, if the antient kingdomes of the Turks likewiſe in PERSIA, and the leſſer ASIA, in SYRIA, PALESTINA, and ÆGYPT, hauing run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Chriſtians, oppreſſed on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themſelues rent in ſunder (their deſtinie ſo requiring) loſt at laſt their woonted majeſtie, and ſo fell into a meere Anarchie, as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie at large declared? Yet in this farre more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes, ſtraight way out of themſelues ariſe another, namely this Othoman monarchie, the cheife object of this Hiſtorie: which at the firſt ſcarce of the world perceiued, or of themſelues regarded, in ſhort time ſo proſpered, as that the power and glorie thereof obſcured not their former kingdomes onely (nothing, in compariſon of this) but euen the greateſt monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which, it now ſo proudly triumpheth, as if it ſhould neuer haue end: at the beautie whereof the world woondereth, and at the power thereof quaketh: within the greatneſſe whereof are contained no ſmall portions of ASIA, EVROPE, and AFRICKE, but euen the moſt famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but AMERICA only; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than in that ſhe is ſo farre from ſo great and dangerous an enemie. The foundation of this ſo great a kingdome (and now ſo mightie an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was firſt laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turkes call him Oſman; not deſcended of the Selzuccian familie; as were all the former Turks Sultans) but of the Oguzian tribe and kindred: in whoſe line this glorious empire hath euer ſince, by the ſpace of three hundred yeares and three, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, woonderfully flouriſhed; and ſo yet doth at this day vnder the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now raigneth thirteenth in diſſent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himſelfe. But for as much as both his greatneſſe, and the greatneſſe of the reſt of the Othoman kings and emperours his progenitors, tooke their beginning from this woorthy and warlike Othoman, with whoſe life and doings we purpoſe to begin this part of our Hiſtorie, it ſhall not be amiſſe both for the continuation of that we haue in hand, with that we haue already written, and for the more manifeſting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fet his race and diſcent alſo: Not meaning with a long and faigned pedegree to fet him out of Noah his arke, (which continuall ſucceſsion of princes, no nation of the world, be it neuer ſo antient, the Iewes onely excepted, and they alſo by writings and hiſtories as much as was poſsible eternized, could truely and juſtly chalenge) but onely ſo far as ſhall be pertinent vnto our purpoſe, and by the authoritie of good hiſtories to be auerred.

At ſuch time as the Turks kingdome founded by Tangrolipix in PERSIA, flouriſhed in the Selzuccian princes his ſucceſſours, there was alſo another kingdom of theirs at the citie of MACHAN, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other either in glorie and power. In this citie, and ouer this ſmall kingdome, raigned one Solyman, by his ſubjects honoured alſo with the name of a Sultan or king; at the ſame time that the Tartars vnder the leading of old Zingis their great captaine, leauing their owne countrey, and bearing downe the world before them, hauing conquered the fartheſt parts of the Eaſt, and there ſeated their kingdome, turned their forces into PERSIA, and there ouerthrew the Turks kingdome at BALCH in CORASAN, and draue the Turkes with Curſumes their laſt king, out of the countrey: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix raigned about an hundred and ſeuentie two yeares.

This Solyman of whom we ſpeake, then raigning at MACHAN, was not of the Selzuccian family (as were all the other Turkes Sultans, the ſucceſſours of Tangrolipix) but of the Oguzian tribe, a family famous alſo amongſt the Turks: Who ſeeing the Selzuccian Sultan Curſumes (or as ſome call him Cuſſumes) his countreyman, beaten out of his kingdome by the Tartar, and his countrey ouerrun, and the great Caliph of BABYLON alſo ouerthrown; thought it not good longer to ſtay in that countrey which he could not hold, but by ſpeedy flight betimes to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and of ſuch his ſubjects as would follow him. And hearing that Aladin

the ſonne of Kei-Haſreu, or as the Greeks call him Cai-Coſroe (a great man of the Seluccian familie, and neere of kin vnto the late Sultan Curſumes) who for feare of the Tartars, but lately come into ROMANIA-ASIATICA, had there by force of armes moſt honourably ſeated himſelfe and the Turks his followers, amongſt the Chriſtians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his ſuperſtition (accounting all well gotten that was gained from the Chriſtians) tooke his way after him, with ſuch of his kinſmen and ſubiects as would accompanie him in his new aduentures. And comming to ARTEZERVM, a citie in the borders of ARMENIA and CAPPADOCIA, thereabout in the countrey according to the ſeaſon of the yeare, ſeated himſelfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wiues and children after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their anceſtours, in poore tents and carts couered with a courſe kind of cloth, had followed him; being indeed nothing elſe but a verie rude and rough kind of ſturdie heardſmen, not wedded to any place, but ſtill remooning with their tents and carts vp and downe, as beſt ſerued for their purpoſe and the feeding of their cattell, as doe the Turcoman nation, the true diſcent of the Turks, in many parts of ASIA at this day: and were thereof not onely called Nomades, that is to ſay heardſmen, (by which name the proud Ianizaries will oftentimes in contempt call euen the greateſt of the naturall Turkes) but Hamaxophoretie, and Hamaxobij, that is to ſay, people carried or liuing in carts. Solyman hauing ſtaied a while about ERZERVM, remooning thence came to AMASIA; and there ſpoiling the countrey then inhabited by the Chriſtians, did them much harme, oftentimes encountring them in the plaine field, and ſometimes ceazing vpon their townes and cities, vntill he had ſubdued vnto himſelfe a right large territorie: yet at length hauing in ſo many battels by him fought, and cities by him beſieged, loſt a great number of his people, and ſo wearied the reſt as that they were not willing farther to follow him; and fearing alſo with ſuch ſmall power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the countrey by him alreadie gotten, in the midſt of ſo many enemies; thought it beſt to depart thence, and to ſeeke his better fortune elſewhere. At the ſame time it was ritely reported, that the affaires of PERSIA after ſo long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow againe to ſome good quiet, the furie of the Tartars being now well abated, and that ſtorme ouerblowne: wherefore Solyman reſolued now to returne home againe, and to viſit his natiue countrey, of him and his people aboue all others deſired. So paſsing through SYRIA (for that was now his way) neere vnto ALLEPO, he ceazed vpon a caſtle called ZIABER-CALA, and there ſtaied a ſpace for the refreſhing of his people. Afterward ſetting forward againe, he came at length to the great and famous riuer EVPHRATES, ouer which he muſt needs paſſe: But finding there neither bridge nor foord, or other meanes to get ouer, he ſtood ſtill as a man diſmaid, not knowing what to do. Stay there he would not, & go further he could not: his deſire bid him goe, but the great riuer ſaid, not ſo. In this perplexitie Solyman himſelfe with his horſe oftentimes taking the riuer, in hope to haue found ſome paſſage; but finding none, aduenturing too far, was with the force of the ſtreame carried away, and ſo together with his horſe drowned. His bodie after long ſeeking, being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried neere vnto the caſtle ZIABER, not long before by him taken: whereof they ſay the place is at this day in their tongue called Meſari-Zuruc, that is to ſay, the Turkes Graue. Some of theſe Oguzian Turks, after the death of their Sultan, wearie of their long trauell, ſeated themſelues in the countrey therabouts, vnto whom the Turks that now hold that caſtle do refer their beginning. The reſt of that great tribe and familie diuerſly diuided, went vnto diuers places as their fortunes led them; ſome of them into the waſt ground and deſarts of ARABIA and SYRIA, and are at this day called the Damaſcene Turconians: otherſome returned backe againe into ROMANIA, the ſame way that they came, of whom are deſcended the Turconians of ICONIVM and ANATOLIA: who yet with their wiues and children, as heardſmen, in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their anceſtors. Romania Aſiatica.

Solyman thus loſt, left foure ſonnes, Sencur-Teken, Iundogdis, Ertogrul, of ſome called Ortholules (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turks empire that now is) and Dunder. With theſe foure brethren, moſt part of theſe Oguzian Turks that were left, returning into ROMANIA (as is aforeſaid) after they had there reſted themſelues a while, marching vp along the riuer EVPHRATES came to a place called PASIN-OVASI, about ten miles aboue ARTERVM, where Ertogrul and his brother Dunder, with foure hundred families, not willing to go any farther ſtaied with their tents and carts, their beſt dwellings. Sencur and Iundogdis their other two bre- The ſonnes of Solyman, and their firſt aduentures.

 thren,

thren, in the meane time paſsing the riuer, returned with the reſt into PERSIA: whom we there leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brother and his three ſonnes ſtayed a while, and had diuers conflicts with the countrey people thereabout, vntill that at length he thought it beſt to returne againe into ROMANIA. So ſetting forward, he came to ANCYRA, and from thence vnto the blacke Mountaines, and ſo to a plaine, called of the Turks Sultan-Vngi about 75 miles Eaſtward from the citie of NICE in BYTHINIA, where he had many skirmiſhes with the Chriſtians.

Now a good while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom we haue before ſpoken in the former part of this hiſtorie) fled out of PERSIA, had ſubdued diuers great prouinces and countries in ROMANIA ASIATICA or the leſſer ASIA (for ſo it is more truly called) ſo that he was of all the people thereabouts accounted for a great prince, and of the Turks themſelues honoured with the name of their Vlu Padiſchach, that is to ſay, their great king or emperour. Hauing placed his regall ſeat firſt at SEBASTIA, and afterward at ICONIUM; which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein raigned, as did ſome few of his poſteritie after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the honour, glorie, and power of this great Sultan: But hauing three ſonnes, namely, Iundus, Sarugatin, and Othoman, ſent Sarugatin his ſecond ſon (a bold well ſpoken man) vnto him to requeſt him in that his ſo large a kingdome, and as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to graunt vnto them his poore exiled countreymen of long time oppreſſed with diuerſe fortunes, ſome ſmall corner for them with their families and cattell to reſt in. Which his requeſt, the Sultan not forgetfull of his owne diſtreſſe ſometime in like caſe, graciouſly heard, & with great courteſie vſed the meſſenger. Now for the furtherance of his ſute, it fortuned, that this Sultan before driuen out of PERSIA by the Tartars, and by them alſo much troubled in theſe his new gotten countries in the leſſer ASIA, had with them diuers hot skirmiſhes, and ſharpe conflicts; in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himſelfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beſet by his enemies, and in danger to haue loſt the day: when as Ertogrul but newly come into the countrey, and willing to doe the Sultan ſeruice, and awaiting all opportunities for the commending of himſelfe and his followers; vpon the ſuddaine vnlooked for, with foure hundred men came vpon the backs of the Tartars, then almoſt in poſſeſsion of a great victorie, and ſo forcibly charged them, that vnable to indure the charge and to maintaine the fight againſt the Sultan (whoſe men encouraged by this vnexpected aid, as by ſuccour ſent from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage) being both before and behind hardly beſet, they as men in deſpaire of the victorie they had before aſſured themſelues of, turned their backes and fled. After which good ſeruice, the Sultan honourably welcommed this new come Turke, giuing him his hand to kiſſe, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valour, commaunded a rich cloke to be caſt vpon him (amongſt thoſe Eaſterne nations a great honour) and all his ſouldiors to be bountifully rewarded: and preſently after gaue vnto Ertogrul and his Turks a countrey village called SUGUTA, betwixt the caſtle of BILEZUGA and the mountaine TMOLUS in the greater PHRIGIA: in which village they might liue in, in Winter; and vpon the aforeſaid mountaine, and the mountaine ORMENIUS, betwixt the riuers SANGARIUS and LICUS, feed their cattell in Summer. And yet not ſo contented thus to haue honoured him, in whom he ſaw ſuch approoued valour, committed to his protection that ſide of the countrey wherein he dwelt, being in the very frontiers of his kingdome: which his charge he ſo well looked vnto, that all the countrey thereabout, before much infeſted with the often incurſions of the enemie, was by his vigilant care and proweſſe well ſecured.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely heardſmen, become a pettie lord of a countrey village, and in good fauour with the Sultan: whoſe followers, as ſturdie heardſmen with their families, liued in Winter with him in SUGUTA; but in Summer in tents with their cattell vpon the mountaines. Hauing thus liued certaine yeares, and brought great peace vnto his neighbours, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, before much troubled with the inuaſions of the Tartars: it fortuned, that the Chriſtians of CARA-CHISAR, a caſtle thereby (called by the antient Greekes Melanopyrgon, and of later time Maurocaſtron, that is to ſay, the blacke towet or caſtle) wearie of their owne eaſe, and of the peace they had by his meanes enjoyed, fell out with him, and euill intreated both him and his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euill part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turks, ſo grieuouſly complained vnto the Sultan; that he therewith mooued, raiſed a great armie, and ſo himſelfe in perſon came and beſieged beſieged the caſtle. But lying there at the ſiege, newes was brought him, That the Tartars with a great armie, vnder the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into CARIA, and there ſpoiling the countrey, had taken HERACLEA. For the repreſsing of whom, the Sultan was glad to riſe with his armie; yet leauing a ſufficient ſtrength behind him for the continuing of the ſiege, vnder the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for ſo the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountering with the Tartars at BAGA, ouerthrew them in a great battell: whileſt Ertogrul in the meane ſpace hardly beſieged CARA-CHISAR, wherein fortune ſo much fauoured him, that at length he tooke the caſtle, the ſpoile whereof he gaue vnto the ſouldiours, reſeruing onely the fift part thereof, as due vnto the Sultan, which he ſent him for a preſent, together with the captaine of the caſtle, whom he had taken aliue: which captaine the Sultan afterward inlarged, and reſtored again to him his caſtle, for the payment of a yearely tribute, which he truly paied during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two yeares after, he refuſed any more to pay it, and ſo reuolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdome (for ſo the Turks call it) being dead at ICONIUM, after him ſucceeded Azatines his eldeſt ſonne; and after him Iathatines his yoonger brother; who ſlaine by Theodorus Laſcaris the Greeke emperour (as is before declared) after him ſucceeded in that kingdome another Iathatines, the ſonne of Azatines, who was by the Tartars expulſed, and his kingdome ſubdued (as in the former part of this hiſtorie it appeareth.) After which time the Selzuccian familie there alſo by the Tartars in the leſſer ASIA depreſſed, retained ſcarce the name and ſhaddow of their former majeſtie and glorie. In which troubleſome times, and confuſion of the ſtate, Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe at SUGUTA, as well contented therewith as with a kingdome; ſeeking by all meanes to keepe peace on euery ſide with his neighbours, as well Chriſtians as others. In which quiet kind of life hee ſweetly paſſed ouer the troubleſome times of Meſoot the ſonne of Ket-Cubades, and of Ket-Cubades the ſonne of Feramuzin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars tributaries, and raigning but at their pleaſure, vntill the time of the ſecond Aladin, the ſole & laſt heire of the Iconian kingdome, before by the Tartars deuided, which was no few years. All which time Ertogrul liued quietly at SUGUTA, as one amongſt many other of the Iconian Sultans ſubjects, wiſely conſidering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in PERSIA and at ICONIUM; as alſo the ruine of his own houſe and familie, both from royall ſtate brought almoſt vnto nothing: and therefore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of neceſsitie, contenting himſelfe with a little, bare himſelfe kindly towards all men. In which contented kind of life, he grew to great yeares, with his three ſonnes, greatly beloued and honoured of their neighbors, as well Chriſtians as Turks; and no leſſe fauoured by the ſecond Aladin, then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him: whom the yoong men his ſonnes, after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with emptie hands to ſalute their princes) oftentimes viſited with one preſent or other. In all which his ſonnes were many good parts to be ſeene, yet ſo, as that in Othoman was eaſily to bee perceiued a greater courage and ſpirit than in the other two his brethren: which was the cauſe that he was the more of all them of his tribe regarded, but eſpecially of the youthfull and warlike ſort, which commonly reſorted vnto him when he went to hawke or hunt, or to other delights of the field (the counterfeits of warre) and was of them commonly called Oſman Gazi, that is to ſay, Oſman the warlike.

Small things in time of trouble yeeld vnto the wiſe great contént.

In this frontier countrey neere vnto SUGUTA, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin diuers lieutenants and captaines, gouernors of his caſtles and ſtrong holds vpon thoſe frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and vnto whom he for friendſhip ſake oftentimes reſorted: but eſpecially vnto the captaine of IN-VNOI, for that he knew himſelfe to be of him well beloued, and therefore vnto him very welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as Othoman being yet but yoong, was going to make merry with the gouernor of ESKI-CHISAR (a caſtle about foure and twentie miles off, called of the Greekes Palæocaſtron) by the way as he went, at a place called ITBURNE (a towne in PHRIGIA) chaunced there to ſee, and afterwards to fall in liking of a faire maiden called Malhatun: vnto whom his affection daily increaſing, he without his fathers knowledge ſent a ſecret friend of his to intreat with her of marriage. Who after long diſcourſe to her made concerning Othomans affection and requeſt, gaue him anſwere, That betwixt Othoman and her was great inequalitie, a thing eſpecially to be regarded & eſchued of ſuch as wiſhed to liue an happie life in wedlocke bands; ſhe was (as ſhe ſaid) but meanly borne, and therefore was not to expect so great a match: whereas he could not want choice of other maidens of more worth, and in all respects more answerable vnto himselfe. But amongst other causes why she gaue him this answere, one was, for that some that wished her well, had put into her head, that Othoman ment not indeed to marry her, but vnder that colour to obtaine of her some few dayes pleasure, and so hauing dishonoured her, afterward againe to cast her off: which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more enflamed with her modest deniall, the more desired her for his wife. In the meane time, Othoman going againe vnto the gouernor of ESKI-CHISAR, and courteously by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth amongst familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his loue, with greater affection than discretion, commending her beautie, her feature, and gracious perfections; not dissembling also, to her greater praise, the repulse by him receiued at her hands. Which the gouernor hearing, seemed greatly to like of his choice, saying, That she was by the diuine prouidence (for so the Turks religiously vse to speake) appointed only for him to haue. But in the meane time secretly inflamed with the immoderat commendations of Othoman, without respect of friendship, he began to grow amorous of her himselfe, whom he had neuer seene; so light is that foolish affection: and that so far, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, he was not able to conceale or couer these new conceiued flames, but that Othoman by certaine conjectures and tokens perceiued the same. And yet dissembling the matter, as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his trustie seruants, secretly sent him away vnto certaine of the maidens friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, without delay to send her away vnto some safe place farther off, for feare she were not ere long taken from them by a great man, more amorous of her person than respectuous of her honour. And by and by after, taking his leaue of his vnfaithfull friend and bidding him farwell, tooke his way vnto the captaine of IN-VNGI, whom he knew to be his deare friend. But whilest he there stayed certaine dayes, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthfull disports, with the captaine his friend; the gouernour of ESKI-CHISAR, who commaunded all the countrey thereabout (called Sultan-Vngi) sent one of his trustie seruants to IBURNE, to see faire Malhatun, and how all things there went. Who comming thither, and vnderstanding of her secret departure, and that by the aduertisement from Othoman she was conueyed to certaine of her friends a farre off; at his returne from point to point certefied his master thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting aboue measure to see himselfe so deluded by Othoman, presently sent vnto the captaine of IN-VNGI (being within his jurisdiction) to commaund him without delay to deliuer Othoman vnto him. But he louing of him well, as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreatie be perswaded so to doe. Wherefore the gouernour in a great rage presently raising the greatest power he was able to make, came to the castle of IN-VNGI, requiring to haue Othoman foorthwith deliuered vnto him. Where among the souldiors there in garrison with the captain, began to arise diuers opinions; some wishing, for the auetting of the present danger for which they were now vnprouided, to haue him deliuered; and othersome abhorring so trecherous a fact, willing rather to indure all extremities. In the end after much consultation, honestie preuailed: & it was generally resolued, That he should be defended, who could not without their great infamie be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diuersitie of opinions, which had euen at the first shewed it selfe; and thinking it not for his safetie, to commit himselfe vnto the trust of such wauering men, entred into a deepe conceit of a matter of great aduenture, which was, by a suddaine sallie to make himselfe way through the middest of his enemies. Wherewith hauing made his brother Iundus and those few his followers there present acquainted, and thereupon resolued; he fiercely sallied out, and by plaine force brake through the thickest of them, & so tooke his way towards SUGUTA, still notably repulsing them that were sent to pursue him. But being come into the frontiers of his fathers territorie, and the report of his danger knowne, and that being but weakely accompanied he was by a great number of his enemies pursued; presently all the lustie youths and such as loued him well, tooke horse to come vnto his rescue: who meeting with the gouernours souldiors, that had Othoman in chace, in a sharpe conflict slew diuers of them, and put the rest to flight. Of whom some were also taken prisoners, and amongst the rest one Michaell Cosse a Christian, captaine of a little castle in that countrey called HIRMEN-CAIA, or the rocke of Ormeni: of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that offence. With which vnexpected courtesie he was so mooued, that euer after he tooke part with him,

him, and did him great ſeruice in his wars: whoſe poſteritie hath euer ſince euen vntill this our age continued, next vnto the Othoman familie, moſt honourable and famous amongſt the Turks, by the name of the Michael-Oglies, that is to ſay, The ſonnes or poſteritie of Michaell.

Ertogrul now ſpent with age, ſhortly after died, in the yeare of our Lord 1289, hauing liued 93 yeares, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian familie after the death of his father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his tribe and kinred greatly lamented, and his bodie after the Turkiſh manner honourably buried at SUGUTA, where he had of long time liued.

The Oguzian Turks in doubt of whom to make choice for their Gouernour.

After whoſe death, theſe plaine Oguzian Turks, in a generall aſſemblie conſulting whom they might chuſe for their lord and gouernour in ſtead of old Ertogrul; caſting their eyes eſpecially vpon two, ſtood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although moſt men were of opinion, That Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of bodie as of mind, was to be preferred before the reſt of his brethren, the ſonnes of Ertogrul: yet were there ſome, and they alſo men of great grauitie and experience, who had in ſuſpect the yoong mans age, as of it ſelfe ſlipperie, and for moſt part prone to vice, eſpecially in the libertie of great power: and therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls brother, and Othomans vncle) a man of far greater grauitie, judgement, and experience. But Dunder himſelfe, being indeed a wiſe man and far from all ambition, perſuaded them in that choice not to haue any regard at all vnto his honour or preferment; but to conſider what were beſt for their ſtate and welfare in generall. For he prouidently foreſaw in what danger the Oguzian ſtate ſtood, expoſed on the one ſide to the mortall hatred and trecheries of the Greekes, grieued to ſee themſelues ſpoiled by the Turks, and naturally hating them for the Mahometane religion: and on the other ſide not ſurely backt with the Sultans of ICONIUM, brought in thraldome to the Tartars, and daily growne weaker and weaker: Vnto which inconueniences and dangers (he ſaid) an old weake and ouerworne bodie (as was his) could giue no helpe or remedie at all; but required the helpe of a wiſe, politicke, vigillant, ſtirring, and valiant man, ſuch as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers ſon. Thus before he came vnto the election, he in priuat declared his mind vnto the cheefe of the Oguzian familie: and afterward at their requeſt comming vnto the generall aſſemblie, all mens minds and eyes now fixed vpon Othoman, he firſt of all (by his example to encourage the reſt) for the good of the Oguzian tribe, his antient houſe and familie, ſaluted him their great lord and gouernour, promiſing vnto him all loyaltie, with the vttermoſt of his ſeruice: whereunto by and by enſued the great applauſe of the reſt of the people, as vnto a gouernour ſent vnto them by God: Vnto whom they joyfully wiſhed all happie ſucceſſe, with long life, & a moſt proſperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernour of the Oguzian Turks, and ſo become amongſt them a great commander, and honoured with the name of Oſman-Beg, or, The lord Oſman. Yet was this his honour included in a ſmall circuit, plaine and homely, without any great pompe or ſhew, as commaunding amongſt rough and rude heardſmen and ſhepheards, not acquainted with the courteſie of other more ciuile nations: for as yet they were the ſame homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perſuaded to forſake their woonted rude and vnciuile manners, by long tradition receiued from their auncеſtors, and ſo beſt agreeing with their nature and calling. Amongſt which rude heardſmen, this new gouernour (himſelfe not too far exceeding the reſt in ciuilitie) commaunded much like vnto another Romulus; of whom alſo the Turks report many ſuch things as do the Romanes of their founder, which for breuitie I thought good to paſſe ouer.

Now it fortuned that Othoman euen in the beginning of his gouernment, fell firſt at ods with on Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicolas (captaine of EINEGIOL, a caſtle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpoſe troubled and moleſted theſe Oguzian heardſmen, in paſsing too and fro with their cattell by his caſtle. For which cauſe Othoman was enforced to requeſt the captaine of BILEZVGA (another caſtle thereby, alſo his neighbour and friend) that his people in paſsing that way to the mountaines, might with their goods and cattell as occaſion ſhould require, take the refuge of his caſtle; which the courteous captaine (well acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans father) eaſily granted, yet with this prouiſo, That none ſhould with ſuch goods or cattell haue acceſſe into his caſtle, but the Turks women only: which his courteſie Othoman refuſed not. So was the caſtle of BILEZVGA from that time forward a refuge vnto the Turks women, who paſsing that way and there ſhrowded with their goods & cattell, vſually preſented the captain with ſome one homely countrey preſent or other, which afterwards was the loſſe of the caſtle.

Yet was not Othoman vnmindfull of the wrong done vnto his people, by his euill neighbour the captaine of EINEGIOL: but purposing to be therof reuenged, made choice of seuentie of his best and most able men, whom he appointed secretly to passe the mountaine ORMENIVS, and so if it were possible, to surprise or set on fire his enemies castle. Of which his designment, the warie captaine hauing intelligence by one of his espials, in place conuenient vpon the mountaine laied a strong ambush for the cutting off of such as were by Othoman sent to haue surprised his castle: whereof Othoman (no lesse warie than he) before warned by his scouts, and augmenting the number of his men, marched directly vnto the place where the enemie lay. Where betwixt them (for so small a number) was fought a right cruell and bloodie battell, and many slaine on both sides; amongst whom Hozza, Othomans nephew was one. The victorie neuertheless fell vnto Othoman: after which time his people in much more safetie fed their cattell in the summer time on the mountaines as their manner was, and so in quiet passed to and fro.

Shortly after, Othoman by night surprised the little castle of CHALCE, not far from EINEGIOL: and there without mercie put to the sword all the Christians he found therein, and so afterwards burnt the castle; which outrage was the beginning and occasion of great troubles thereof ensuing. For the Christians of the countries adjoyning, much grieued therewith, and assembling themselues together, complained vnto the captaine of CARA-CHIZAR, the greatest commmander thereabout, That these Turks, which not many yeares before were of meere pittie receiued as poore heardsmen into that countrey, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands vpon the antient lands and possessions of the Christians; which insolencie (as they said) if it were longer winked at and suffered by him, and other such men of account and authoritie as were to reforme the same, they would no doubt in short time driue both them, and all the rest of the Christians out of their natiue countries: wherefore it were now high time and more than necessarie for him, and all the rest to awake (as it were) out of the dead sleepe wherein they had long time drousily slept; and joyning their forces together, to expulse those vnthankfull enchroching & mercilesse strangers out of their countries: The mischiefe they said being now spred far, therefore needed speedie remedie; and that repentance would come too late when it was past cure. The captaine mooued with the indignitie of the late fact, and just complaint of the poore countrey people, sent with all speed a strong company of souldiours, vnder the leading of Calanus his brother, with commaundement that they should march vnto the castle of EINEGIOL, and there to joyne with the rest of the Christian forces.

Othoman vnderstanding of this preparation made against him, gathering his souldiers together, marched to a place called OPSICIUM, neere vnto mount TMOLVS in PHRIGIA, where betweene him and the Christians was fought a sharpe battell, wherein he lost his brother Sarugatin (whom the Turks account for a saint or martyr at this day) with many other of his souldiours. In this battell was also Calanus slaine, whose belly Othoman caused to be ripped, and his intrails to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried Mesart-Repec, that is to say, the Dog-Graue, by which name the place is at this day knowne. The bodie of his brother Sarugatin he carried to SVGVTA, and there honourably buried it neere to the bodie of his father Ertogrul. Aladin Sultan of ICONIVM vnderstanding of this conflict, was verie sorie for the losse happened vnto Othoman, being a Mahometane of his owne religion: wherefore in token of his good will and fauour, he gaue vnto him the citie of PALEAPOLIS with all the territorie thereunto belonging, giuing vnto him also leaue to besiege, take, or spoile, the signiorie and castle of CARA-CHISAR: for accomplishment whereof, he sent vnto him both souldiers and munition. Othoman encouraged with this great bountie of the Sultans, straightly besieged the castle of CARACHISAR; which at last he wan, and slew all the Christians therein: the captaine he tooke aliue, whom he cruelly executed: the spoile of the castle he gaue vnto his souldiers, reseruing only the fift part thereof, which he sent for a present to the Sultan. All this happened in the yeare of our Lord 1290. This castle of CARA-CHISAR, with the rest, as EINEGIOL, BILEZVGA, CHALCE, and others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, were all situate in the borders of the greater PHRIGIA, or else neere thereunto in the confines of BYTHINIA and MYSIA: In which pleasant countries (but lately part of the Constantinopolitane empire) the Christians the antient inhabitants thereof yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks, at the rising of the Othoman empire; with whom they liued at continuall jars, vntill that at length they were by them altogether oppressed and extinguished.

Othoman

Othoman encouraged with this good ſucceſſe, and ſupported by the great Sultan of ICONIVM, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit greater matters, for the further increaſe of his honor and territorie: yet not truſting altogether to his owne deuiſe, he entred into conſultation with his brother Iundus, which way was beſt to take to diſtreſſe and bring in ſubjection his neighbours the Chriſtians. In which caſe, Iundus a man of greater courage than diſcretion, aduiſed him with all celeritie to vrge his good fortune, and preſently to inuade the Chriſtians alreadie diſcouraged with the loſſe of CARA-CHISAR. But this counſell altogether pleaſed not Othoman for (ſaid he) the caſtles & fortes by vs gained, muſt be kept with ſtrong garriſons, otherwiſe they will againe be recouered by the enemie; which garriſons cannot be maintained and kept, if we ſpoile or diſpeople the countries adioyning vpon vs, for in ſo doing we ſhal (as it were) with our owne hands cut our owne throats: wherefore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amitie and friendſhip with the Chriſtians round about vs, which league we will keepe with ſome, or breake with others, as ſhall ſerue beſt for our purpoſe. And according to this reſolution, he made peace indeed with all the Chriſtians, but eſpecially with Michael Coſsi, captaine of HIRMEN-CAIA caſtle, of whom we haue before ſpoken, who afterward ſerued him to great vſe in the mannaging of his wars, and became alſo a renegate of the Mahometane religion. All this Othoman did the rather, becauſe he was thē at great variance with one Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selzuccian familie) who enuying at the riſing of Othoman, ſought by all means poſsible to hinder his greatneſſe, as did alſo the others, his quietnes: which diſcord the Chriſtians liked well, as a meane for them to liue in more reſt by.

Othomen conſulteth with his brother Iunaus whom counſe to take for the oppreſsing of the Chriſtians his neighbours.

In the meane time, Othoman deuiſed with all carefulneſſe to beautifie and ſtrengthen his new commonweale: and for the greater concourſe of people, built a faire temple in CARA-CHISAR for the exerciſe of the Mahometane religion; appointed markets to be kept in all peaceable maner in his great townes, graunting great priuiledges vnto ſuch as reſorted thither, as well Chriſtians as Turks; vſing therein ſuch juſtice, that all ſorts of people without feare in hope of gaine reſorting thither, furniſhed his countrey and townes with all things neceſſarie: yet this care of ciuile pollicie and gouernment, could not ſo withdraw him, but that according to his aſpiring mind, he had alwaies a greater deſire and care to enlarge his poſſeſsions and territorie. Wherefore intending to make a road into BITHINIA, he requeſted Michael Coſsi, the Chriſtian captaine before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was beſt to be done? who ſo politickely directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great ſpoile and more honor. This road ſo terrified moſt of the Chriſtians thereabouts, that they were loth to giue Othoman any cauſe of offence, for feare leaſt they ſhould by him be ſpoiled.

Othoman ſetteth in order his little commonweale.

It fortuned about this time, that the captaines of BILEZVGA & CVPRI-CHISAR falling at ods; he of CVPRI-CHISAR firſt taking vp armes, fiercely inuaded the captaine of BILEZVGA: who thereupon ſent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which hee eaſelie graunted, and ſo without further delay preſently came vnto him with certeine companies of luſtie tall ſouldiors. By whoſe comming, the captaine of BILEZVGA not a little encouraged and ſtrengthened, ſet vpon his enemie: where betwixt them was made a ſharpe conflict, and diuers on both ſides ſlaine: but the victorie by the helpe of Othoman the Turke, at length enclining vnto the BILEZVGIAN, the other vanquiſhed captaine in all haſt fled vnto his owne caſtle. After whome Othoman following, laid ſeige vnto the caſtle, which at length he tooke together with the captaine, whom he cauſed to bee preſently ſlaine. It is ſtrange to tell, how prowd the lord of BILEZVGA was, to haue ſo reuenged himſelfe of his enemie, and to haue gayned the victorie; although it were indeed gotten, not ſo much by his valour as by the proweſſe of the Turke: for whom and his followers, in token of his thankfulneſſe, he cauſed a great feaſt to be prouided in the countrie thereby, where he honorably entertained them; & in the end of the feaſt, cauſed garments of great price (according to the manner of the Eaſterne nations) to be giuen vnto Othoman, in token of his fauour; and his ſouldiors to be alſo bountifully rewarded: but this was done with ſuch a preſumptious ſtate and grace, as if he had been ſome great prince, offering vnto the common ſouldiors of the Turks, in paſsing by them, his hand to kiſſe, as a great fauour. With which exceeding inſolencie, Othoman was ſo much offended, that he had much adoe to hold his hands from him: yet repreſsing his anger, he in ſecret imparted his diſcontentment vnto his coſin Dunder, his vncle Dunders ſonne; greiuouſly complayning of the intollerable pride of the Chriſtian captaine, and of the diſgrace by him done vnto the Turks, in offring them his hand to kiſſe;

kisse; requiring his opinion how he were for the same to be corrected: who but a little before, being by the said captaine made his lieutenant, franckly told his kinsman, That as then nothing was to be attempted against him; first, for that on the one side they had Germean-ogli (a great man amongst the Selzuccian Turks) their enemie, and round about them besides they were inuironed with the Christians, whom he should haue all in his neck atonce if he should offer the BILEZVGIAN captaine any wrong. By which answere, Othoman perceiuing his cosins great affection towards the Christian captaine, and doubting to haue the mischiefe he had imagined against him, by him reuealed, or at least wise hindered; without more adoe suddenly taking vp his bow in his hand, with an arrow shot him quite thorow, and so slew him.

Not long after Michael Cossi the captaine of HIRMEN-CAIA, Othomans great friend, hauing concluded a mariage betweene a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the Christian captaines of the castles thereabouts, requesting them to come to the mariage; and the rather that so they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whose power began now to grow dreadfull vnto them: hoping that such meanes might be found at that merrie meeting, that all being made friends, euery man might in more securitie possesse his owne without feare of being spoiled by him. Vnto this mariage came all these bidden guests, bringing with them such presents as they thought good to bestow vpon the new maried folks, according to the manner of the countrey: but Othomans gifts farre exceeded all the rest, who besides many other rich things, gaue vnto them whole flocks and droues of sheepe and cattell: which thing drew all the Christian captaines into no little admiration of his bountie; insomuch that they began to say amongst themselues, that Othomans wealth and good fortune did portend some greater matter, to their vtter ruine and fall: which to preuent, they thought it best by secret meanes to compasse his death. The execution of which deuise they referred to the capaine of BILEZVGA, as vnto one with him best acquainted. This captaine was of great wealth, credit, and authoritie amongst the Christian rulers thereabouts, but verie full of craft and dissimulation: which his euill disposition Othoman of long time well perceiued; yet hauing occasion to vse him, in subtill manner gaue him (in outward shew) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debasing himselfe as plaine and poore in comparison of him. But to giue a beginning to this trecherous deuise, the captaine meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him, how that he intended shortly to marie the daughter of the captaine of IAR-CHISER, earnestly requesting him to honour that his mariage with his presence, of the time whereof, he said he would giue him farther knowledge afterwards: and all was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his danger, not fearing any such treason. Othoman vnderstanding that the time of the mariage drew nigh, sent thither a present of certaine fat oxen and sheepe, in the name of his brother Iundus, for the captaines prouision against the mariage; certifying him, That Othoman himselfe, with his simple retinue, would be present at the mariage, and then present him, not with such presents as were agreeable with his honour, yet such as his poore abilitie could affoord. This message with the presents, were woonderfull welcome to the captaine, hoping assuredly that his deuised treacherie would take such effect as he wished. And therefore calling vnto him Michael Cossi, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust, declared vnto him his whole deuise (wherof he was not before altogether ignorant,) requesting him to take the paines to go vnto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed and at hand; which hee knew Cossi might easily do, being of his familiar acquaintance. And in token of great friendship, he sent vnto Othoman by the same messenger, a present of gilt plate. Cossi tooke vpon him this message: which when he had deliuered vnto Othoman, he found him verie willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Cossi inwardly grieuing to see so braue a man, and his kind friend, by such trecherous manner to be brought to his end; mooued with compassion, discouered vnto him the whole conspiracie of the captaine against him, and of the plot laied for his destruction, willing him to take heed vnto himselfe: for which ouverture, Othoman gaue Cossi great thanks, as to his friend, for sauing his life; and withall richly rewarded him, promising him greater matters if he would continue that his faithfull friendship. Now concerning the captaine of BELIZVGA (saith he) at your returne recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my selfe much bound vnto him for many courtesies, but especially for that he hath heretofore diuers times in most friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the safegard of his castle: which his friendship I most humbly request him to continue for one yeare more, enforced thereunto by rea-

reaſon of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the prince Germean-Ogli as he well knoweth: wherefore if it might ſo ſtand with his good pleaſure, I would preſently ſend vnto his caſtle ſuch things as I make moſt reckning of, requeſting him once more to be the faithfull keeper ther-of, as he hath beene before: and tell him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, deſire nothing more than to find opportunitie to be acquainted with the honourable ladie his mother; for which cauſe (if it pleaſe him) I will bring them both with me to the marriage. This Othomans requeſt, when the captain of BILEZVGA vnderſtood by Michael Coſſi; he ſent the ſame Coſſi backe againe to haſten his comming, willing him to bring with him what geſſe he pleaſed; appointing certaine time and place when and where the marriage ſhould be ſolemniſed. And becauſe the caſtle of BILEZVGA was thought to be too little conueniently to receiue the multitude of people which were expected at the mariage, there was another open place of greater receipt appointed in the countrey for that purpoſe, about three miles diſtant from the caſtle. The mariage day drew nigh, whereunto Othoman muſt repaire for his promiſe ſake: and therefore prepared with all diligence to ſet forward, and to put in execution what he had deuiſed for the ſafetie of himſelfe, and deſtruction of his enemie. Othoman had of long accuſtomed in dangerous times, to ſend by carriage the beſt of his things, made vp in packes, to be kept in ſafetie in the caſtle of BILEZVGA: vnder the colour whereof, he now made great packs in forme as he was woont; but in ſtead of his rich houſhold ſtuffe, and ſuch other things of price, he thruſt in armed men, couering thoſe packs with homely couerings, ſending them by carriages to the caſtle of BILEZVGA, giuing charge that they ſhould not come thither before twilight. After that, he appareled certaine of his beſt ſouldiours in womens apparell, as if it had beene his wife and mother in law, with their women: ſo caſting his journey, that he with theſe diguiſed ſouldiours, and the other ſent in packs, might at one inſtant meet at the caſtle aforeſaid. The captaine being now in the countrey, and vnderſtanding that Othoman was comming in the euening with a great traine of gentlewomen; thought the cauſe of his late comming to be, for that the Turkiſh women vſe to ſhun the ſight of Chriſtian men by all meanes they can. Othoman being now come to the place in the countrey where the mariage was next day to be ſolemnized, hauing done his humble reuerence to the captaine, requeſted him to do him the honour, That his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment bee ſent to his caſtle, there to haue ſome conuenient lodging where they might alight and beſtow themſelues a part from others, according to the homely faſhion of their nation; leaſt peraduenture the preſence of ſo honourable a companie of noble men and gallants, might put them out of countenance: which the captaine graunted, and hauing ſaluted them a far off after the Turkiſh manner, commaunded them to be conueyed to his caſtle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the ſame time that theſe diſguiſed ſouldiours arriued at the caſtle, came thither alſo the other ſouldiours couered in packes in the cariages: which ſo ſoone as they were within the caſtle, ſuddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their ſhort ſwords, with the helpe of their diſguiſed fellowes ſlew the warders of the caſtle, and without more adoe poſſeſſed the ſame: the greateſt part of the captaines people being before gon out of the caſtle to the place of the mariage. Othoman hauing taried ſo long with the captaine, as hee ſuppoſed the caſtle by that time by his men ſurpriſed; ſo ſoone as the captaine had taken his chamber, ſuddenly tooke horſe, with all his followers, accompanied alſo with Coſſi, taking his way directly to the caſtle of BILEZVGA: of whoſe ſudden departure, the captaine vnderſtanding, preſently tooke horſe and purſued him with all his traine, which were for the moſt part drunke; and ouertaking him before he came to the caſtle, ſet vpon him: in which conflict, he was by Othoman ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight.

The captaine of Beliguga treacherouſly ſeeking the death of Othoman, is by him, himſelfe ſlaine.

The ſame night Othoman vſing great celeritie, earely in the morning ſurpriſed the caſtle of IARCHISAR alſo, where he tooke priſoners the captaine thereof, with his faire daughter Lulufer, (which ſhould haue beene maried to the captaine of BILEZVGA the next day) with all her friends, as they were readie to haue gone to the mariage: which faire ladie he ſhortly after married vnto his eldeſt ſonne Orchanes; who had by her Amurath, third king of the Turkes, and Solyman Baſſa.

Othoman omitting no opportunitie, preſently ſent one of his captaines called Durgut-Alpes, a man of great eſteeme and valour, to beſiege the caſtle of EINEGIOL: wherein he vſed ſuch celeritie, that preuenting the fame of that was done at BILEZVGA, he ſuddenly inuironed the caſtle, in ſuch ſort that none could paſſe in or out; vntill ſuch time, as that Othoman hauing brought his his prisoners and prey to the castle of BELIZVGA, and there hauing set all things in good order, came with the rest of his men of war to EINEGIOL; which he presently by force tooke, promising the spoile thereof vnto his souldiours. The captaine called Hagio-Nicholaus his antient enemie, he caused to be cut in small peeces, and all the men to be slaine: which crueltie he vsed, because they a little before had vsed the like tyrannie against his Turks.

Othoman by admiration of iustice strengtheneth his gouernment.

When Othoman had thus got into his subiection a great part of the strong castles and forces of the greater PHRIGIA, with the territorie to them belonging, he began with all carefulnesse to make good lawes, and to execute justice to all his subjects, as well Christians as Turkes: with great indifferencie studying by all meanes to keepe his countrey in peace and quietnesse, and to protect his subiects from the spoile of others, as well Christians as Turkes: whereby it came to passe, that the old inhabitants which for the most part had forsaken the country, by reason of the great troubles therein, repaired now againe to their antient dwellings; and not onely they but many other strangers also, supplying the places of them whom the late warres had consumed. So that by his good gouernment, that wasted countrey in short time grew to be againe verie populous.

The citie of Nice besieged by Othoman.

The ciuile gouernment of his countrey well established, hee besieged the citie of ISNICA, in antient time called NICE, a citie of BITHINIA, famous for the generall Counsell there holden against Arius in the time of Constantine the Great. This citie hee brought into great distresse, by placing his men of war in forts new built vpon euerie passage and way leading vnto the same, so that nothing could be brought out of the countrey for the reliefe of the poore citizens. They in this extremitie, by a secret messenger certified the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE (vnder whose obedience they were) in what distresse the citie stood; and that except he sent them present reliefe, they must of necessitie either perish with famine, or yeeld themselues into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The emperour mooued with the pittifull complaint of this messenger, with all expedition embarked certaine companies of souldiours from CONSTANTINOPLE to relieue his besieged citie. But Othoman vnderstanding by his espials where these souldiours were appointed to land, in secret manner withdrawing most of his forces from the siege, lay in ambush neere vnto the same place where the emperours souldiours (casting no perill) landed: who before they could put themselues in order of battell, were by Othoman and his Turks, in such sort charged, that most part of them were there slaine, and the rest driuen into the sea, where they miserably perished. Othoman hauing thus politikely ouerthrowne the Constantinopolitan souldiours, returning to his siege, continued the same in straighter manner than before. The besieged citizens driuen into great penurie, and now despairing of all helpe, yeelded themselues with the great and rich citie of NICE into the hands of Othoman, with the spoile whereof he greatly enriched his men of war.

Aladin the great Sultan of ICONIVM, glad to heare of this good successe of Othoman against the Christians, in token of his fauour and loue, sent vnto him a faire ensigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a sword, and princely robe, with large charters, That whatsoeuer he tooke from the Christians should be all his owne; and also that publike praiers should be said in all the Turks temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and prosperous estate: which two things properly belonged to the dignitie of the Sultan. These extraordinarie fauours gaue occasion for many to thinke, That Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptiue sonne and successor in his kingdome.

The presents and charters sent him, Othoman humbly accepted, sending vnto Aladin the fift part of the spoile of NICE, taken from the Christians; but the princely honors due vnto the Sultan onely, he vsed not during the life of Aladin: intending not long after to haue gone himselfe in person to visit the Sultan, and so to haue grown into his further fauour. But hauing prepared all things for so honourable a journey, at what time as he was about to set forward, he was certainely informed of the death of Aladin; and that Sahib (one of his great counsellors) had taken vpon him the dignitie of the Sultan (as is before declared:) which newes much discontented the aspiring mind of this Oguzian Turke, in good hope to haue succeeded him in the kingdome, or at least wise to haue shared the greatest part thereof vnto himselfe, whereof he was now altogether disappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honours before graunted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modestie sake had forborne, Aladin yet liuing: wherefore he made one Dursu surnamed named Fakiche (that is to say, a man learned in the Turkish law) bishop and judge of CARA-CHISAR, commaunding the publicke prayers which were wont to be made for the health and prosperous raigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his owne name; which was first openly done by the said bishop in the pulpit of CARA-CHISAR. At the same time he began also to coine money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or king: which was about ten yeares after the death of his father Ertogrul, and in the yeare of our Lord 1300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turkes is vnder the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun. 1300

When Othoman had thus taken vpon him the majestie of a king, he made his sonne Orchanes prince and gouernour of CARA-CHISAR; promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours of other strong castles and forts, diuers of which places retaine the name of those captains at this day. He himselfe made choice of the cittie NEAPOLIS, about twentie miles from NICE, to seat his regall pallace in, where also diuers of his nobilitie built them houses, and changed the name of the citie, calling it DESPOTOPOLIS; as who should say, The citie of the lord or prince. For all this, Othoman ceased not to deuise by all meanes hee could, to augment his kingdome: and for that cause being accompanied with his sonne Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning vpon him, surprizing such places as might best serue his purpose, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearse were tedious.

Neapolis the first regall cittie of the Othomith kings.

The Christian princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing lest the greatnesse of Othoman might in short time be their vtter confusion, agreed to joyne all their forces together, and so to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne estates with his. According to which resolution, the Christian confederat princes, which were for the most part of MYSIA and BYTHINIA, leuying the greatest forces they were able to make, with fire and sword inuaded Othomans kingdome. Who hauing knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made against him, had in a readinesse all his captaines and men of war: and hearing that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the confines of PHRIGIA and BYTHINIA, fought with them a great and mortall battaile, wherein many were slaine on both sides, as well Turks as Christians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloodie victorie. In this battaile Casteleanus, one of the greatest Christian captaines was slaine: another called Tekensis of the country which he gouerned in PHRIGIA, chased by Othoman vnto the castle of VLUBAD, not far distant from the place where the battaile was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the same castle, and was afterward by Othomans commaundement most cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his cheefe castle: which Othoman afterward subdued, with all the countrey thereabouts. The other Christian princes and captaines saued themselues by flying into stronger holds farther off. The prince of BYTHINIA, the cheefe author of this war, fled into the strong cittie of PRUSA, which the Turks now call BURUSA, whether Othoman not long after led his armie, in good hope to haue woon the same: but finding it not possible to be taken by force, began presently at one time to build two great and strong castles vpon the cheefe passages leading to the citie, which castles he with great industrie finished in one yeare: and in the one placed as captaine Aclemeur his nephew, in the other one Balaban Zuck, both men of great courage, and skilfull in feats of war: & in this sort hauing blocked vp the citie of PRUSA, so that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he subdued the most part of BYTHINIA; and so returned home, leauing the two castles well manned with strong garrisons, vnder the charge of the captaines beforenamed.

Prusa besieged by Othoman.

Othoman returning home to NEAPOLIS, honorably rewarded his souldiors, according to their deserts, establishing such a quiet and pleasing gouernment in his kingdome, that people in great number resorted from far into his dominions, there to seat themselues: whereby his kingdome became in few yeares exceeding populous, and he for his politicke gouernment most famous. And so liuing in great quietnesse certaine yeares, being now become aged and much troubled with the gout; his old souldiors accustomed to liue by the wars, abhorring peace, came vnto him, requesting him as it were with one voice, to take some honourable war in hand for the inlarging of his kingdome, with great chearfulnesse offring to spend their liues in his seruice rather than to grow old in idlenesse: which forwardnesse of his men of war greatly pleased him, and so giuing them thanks, for that time dismissed them, promising that he would not be long vnmindfull full of their requeſt. But yet thinking it good to make all things ſafe at home before hee tooke any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Coſſi, the onely Chriſtian captaine whom for his great deſerts he had at all times ſuffered to liue in quiet with his poſſeſsions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire means (if it might be) to perſuade him to forſake the Chriſtian religion and to become a follower of Mahomets, ſo to take away all occaſion of miſtruſt: which if he ſhould refuſe to doe, then forgetting all former friendſhip, to make war vpon him as his vtter enemie. Whereupon Coſſi was ſent for, being perſuaded by the meſſenger, that Othoman had ſent for him becauſe he had occaſion to vſe his woonted faithfull counſell and ſeruice in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Coſſi thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which enſued, came accompanied with ſuch ſouldiours as he thought to vſe in that ſeruice: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnderſtanding the very cauſe why he was ſent for, and ſeeing danger imminent on euery ſide, kiſsing Othomans hand, after the manner of the Turks, requeſted him in courteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometane religion, which he promiſed euer after to imbrace: And ſo saying certaine words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his nobilitie. For which his reuolting, Othoman preſently gaue him an enſigne and a rich robe, tokens whereby the Mahometane Sultans aſſure their vaſſales of their fauour and the vndoubted poſſeſsion of ſuch land and liuing as they then hold.

Michael Coſſi turneth Turke.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his ſouldiors inuaded the countries bordering vpon him, tooke many ſtrong caſtles and forts, ſubdued the moſt part of PHRIGIA, MYSIA, and BYTHINIA, and other great regions, vnto the Euxine ſea: and being now very aged, and diſeaſed as is aforeſaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to goe into the field in perſon himſelfe, oftentimes ſent his ſonne Orchanes againſt his enemies; who to the imitation of his father atchieued many great enterpriſes, Othoman his father yet liuing.

Now happily might the conſiderat reader (and not without juſt cauſe) meruaile, what dead ſleepe had ouerwhelmed the Greeke emperours of thoſe times; firſt Michaell Paleologus, and afterward his ſonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and ſtill reſiant at CONSTANTINOPLE, thus to ſuffer the Turkes (not Othoman, for he as yet bare no ſway, but others the ſharers of Sultan Aladins kingdome) to take their cities, ſpoile their countries, kill their ſubjects, and dayly to incroach vpon them in the leſſer ASIA, and eſpecially in BYTHINIA, ſo neere vnto them, and as it were euen vnder their noſes: But let him, with me, here as in a moſt conuenient place but breath a little, and conſider the troubled eſtate of that declining empire, now haſting to an end; and he ſhall plainely ſee the cauſes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diſeaſed bodie quite ouerthrowne and ſicke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the aſpiring Turks. Michaell Paleologus hauing by great trecherie obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune recouered alſo the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE from Baldwin the emperour (as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie declared,) fearing the power of the princes of the Weſt, but eſpecially of Charles king of SICILIA, then a prince of great fame and power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late emperour) ceaſed not to ſollicite for the reſtitution of him againe into his empire, and to haue alſo joyned with him a neere bond of affinitie, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his ſonne: to auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, he by his embaſſadours offered vnto Gregorie the tenth, then biſhop of ROME, to vnite and conforme the Greeke church vnto the Latine, and to acknowledge the biſhops ſupremacie, in ſuch ſort, as that it ſhould be lawfull for any man to appeale vnto the court of ROME, as vnto the higher and more excellent court: of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promiſing to performe what he had before requeſted, for the keeping of Charles otherwiſe buſied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of religion in the Greeke church ſhould be made, Ioſeph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gaue vp his place, and ſhortly after forſaking the citie, retired himſelfe into a monaſterie neer vnto the ſtrait of Boſphorus, where he at quiet deuoutly ſpent the remainder of his life. The reſt of the cleargie alſo diſcontented with this innouation, in their ſermons openly inuaighed againſt it, perſuading the people not to receiue it, crying out, That now was come the time of their triall, the time of their martirdome, and the time wherein they were to receiue the glorious crowne of their painefull ſuffrings: inſomuch, that great tumults were ther-upon raiſed, and all the citie and the countrey in an vprore: for it was not the cleargie onely, and the vulgar people by them mooued, which diſliked and abhorred theſe the emperours proceedings, dings,and made these stirs,but many of the better sort,yea of the cheefe magistrates themselues also. So that Michaell Paleologus the emperour leauing all other forraine businesse,was inforced to conuert all his power and studie vnto the appeasing of these domesticall troubles, as deeming them of greater danger than his wars abroad. And first to perswade his discontented subjects, he told them,That this alteration was made,not for any good liking he had therunto,but in respect of the dangerousnesse of the time: and that it was a point of wisedome, to foresee dangers hanging ouer our heads,and not to delay,if any thing were to be altered,for the auerting thereof: for if the enemies as he said should come,the citie yet in many places rent,or but lately repaired, and as it were but newly raised from death to life; the present mischiefes would be far greater than those forepassed,and that then their enemies would become lords,not of their religion and ceremonies onely, but of all at once,their wiues,their children,and whatsoeuer else they had: where their liberty changed into bondage,they should be constrained to conforme themselues not with their bodily seruice onely, but euen with their minds also,vnto the wils of the Latines their enemies. And that so it would come to passe, that no man should bee able to keepe the old customes and manners of his ancestors,but should see euen their most sacred rites and ceremonies changed and quite ouerthrowne: Which he carefully foreseeing,had not (as he said) refused to yeeld vnto necessitie, and as wisdome would, neglected a little harme in respect of a greater benefit; and in the lesse,to haue yeelded vnto his enemies,to enjoy the benefit of the greater. With which the emperours persuasion, some were mooued, and so held themselues contented: and some others not; against whom he was enforced to vse other more seuere remedies, as against his rebellious subjects: of whom,some he imprisoned, some he banished,some he tortured,some he dismembred,some he depriued of their sight,or confiscated their goods,vsing(in breefe)all the meanes whereby the minds of the resolute or the weake were to be mooued. All which things, they whose zeale was grounded vpon knowledge(in number the fewest)with patience endured: but the greater part void of judgement,and the refuse of the people in simple attire, ran roguing abroad,some into PELOPONESUS, some into THESSALIA, some into ACHAIA, and some as far as COLCHOS, as men persecuted for their conscience,not regarding greatly whether,so it were out of the emperours jurisdiction,and something fitting their owne humors; neither conforming themselues vnto the religion then commonly by the emperour established, neither yet agreeing among themselues,but taking vnto them diuers names, some as the disciples of Arsenius,some of Ioseph,and some of others;some of them,themselues deceiued,and deceiuing others also. Thus for the auoiding of forraine danger out of the West,was the empire at home no little indangered,and the state thereof shaken. Wherewith the emperour was so encombred, as that he had no leisure to prouide for the tempest arising by the Turks out of the East, but was inforced wholly to imploy himselfe and all his indeuours vnto the keeping of his people & subjects in their due obedience at home. All whose deepe deuises, first in aspiring vnto the empire, (no way vnto him due) and great trauels afterwards for the assuring of the same vnto himselfe and his posteritie,against all right,euen with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeelded him in the winding vp of all,not so much as the credit of an honourable sepulture. But dying in these troubles not far from LISIMACHIA, as he was making preparation against the prince of THESSALIE, was there by his sonne Andronicus his commaundement (for whose aduancement he had strained both his faith and honour) obscurely buried in the field,a good way from his campe; as vnworthie of a better sepulture,for reuolting from the antient religion of his ancestors, although his obsequies were for fashion sake afterwards with some solemnitie celebrated. This was the end of the great emperour Michaell Paleologus,in whose time the Turks,the successors of Aladin, greatly incroched vpon him in the lesser ASIA, as is in part before declared: a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the bodie and the mind, had he not for the aduancement of himselfe and his posteritie,stained the same with foule trecherie and apostasie: for which(as some say)he euer after liued in conscience troubled, and dying, was euen by his owne sonne not thought worthie of an honourable funerall. A notable example vnto all such as with greedinesse seeke after vaine glorie,and foolishly expose themselues vnto such aduentures; as oftentimes ouerwhelme their deepest deuises, hauing in themselues no certainetie:preferring their inordinat desires(either for themselues or their posteritie)before that which is good and vertuous: Twice wretched in so doing: first in their folly, and then in their indeuours. Who beside that they find God himselfe against their designes and purposes,they by and by also euidently meet with other things than what they had forecasted, contrarie vnto them; and so themselues oftentimes, contrarie to their expectation, cast headlong into extreame miserie: for loe, euen he of whom we now speake, otherwise a man of great wisdome, and happie in his doings, ouercome with his affection towards his children, in desiring to leaue vnto them the empire, when as he ought to haue cast all the care both of himselfe and of them, especially vpon the prouidence of God; he like a blind man following his own deepe conceits, not grounded vpon the fear of God but mans wisdome only, cast himselfe before he was aware into miserable troubles, and became odious euen vnto his subiects, & them also for whom he had so forgot himselfe. For whereas God had euen from his childhood alotted vnto him the empire (as was by many euident signes & tokens to haue bin gathered) if he could haue moderated his vntimely desires, kept his tongue from periurie, and his hands from blood, and not turned out of the way after strange doctrine; he had by many degrees excelled euen the best emperours his predecessors: whereas now he lieth obscurely buried, shrouded in the sheet of defame, the report of his foule & faithlesse dealings far exceeding all his other worthy vertues.

Andronicus Paleologus succeeding his father in the empire, and thinking by restoring again the gouernment of the church, together with the rites and customes of the Greeks, to haue appeased all such troubles as were before by his father raised, by bringing in those of the Latines; found himselfe therein much deceiued, and his troubles no lesse than his fathers: they which had before receiued the Latine customes, and well liking of them, with great obstinacie defending the same: and the other of the contrarie faction now countenanced by the emperor, without modestie or measure insulting vpon them: whereof arose exceeding great stirs and troubles, especially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the encroaching Turks, who in the meane time ceased not by all meanes to increase their territories in ASIA; and not onely there, but in the ilands of the Mediterranean sea also. For Andronicus, by the death of Charles king of SICILIE, deliuered of the greatest feare, for which both he and his father before him had to their great cost and charge both built and maintained a strong fleet of gallies; now perswaded by some, whose actions and speeches were after the manner of the court, all framed vnto the princes appetite, (as the readiest way to thriue, without respect of the cõmon good) to spare that needlesse charge (as they tearmed it) which yearely cost him more than any other thing else: had discharged all his mariners and sea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laied vp, some in one creeke, some in another; where neglected & not looked vnto, they in time for most part rotted and perished. As for the mariners, they went some one way; some another, as their fortunes lead them, to seeke for their liuings in forreine countries, euen with the emperours enemies; and some gaue themselues to husbandrie, thinking it better by doing something to liue, than by sitting still to perish: which good husbandrie at the first seemed to be verie profitable vnto the emperour, but especially vnto such as being neere vnto him, and couetously giuen, made small reckoning of all other the most necessarie defences of the empire, in comparison of hoording vp of money, vntill that it was afterwards too late by experience found hereof to haue sprung many great mischiefes, vnto the great weakning of the Greeke empire. For besides that the Turkes without lette, did great harme on the sea; the pirates now out of feare of the emperours gallies, at their pleasure tooke the spoile of the rich Islands in the Mediteranian, and robbed the townes all along the sea coast, to the vnspeakable griefe of the poore countrie people. And yet not so contented, came with their gallies sometime two, sometime three, and sometime moe, as it were in contempt, euen close vnto the imperiall citie. Yea the Venetians were so bold as vpon a right small displeasure to rifle and afterward to set fire vpon the suburbes thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the emperours fleet bene preserued and maintained in the woonted strength.*

Andronicus spareth to maintain his nauie, weakneth his empire

At the same time also, Andronicus the emperour (to the great hinderance of the affaires of the empire, and aduantage of the forreine enemie) was not a little troubled with a jealous suspition of his brother Constantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had sought to haue aspired vnto the empire; seeking by all meanes to win vnto himselfe the loue and fauour of all men, but especially of the nobilitie both at home and abroad, and so by that meanes to mount vnto the height of his desires: All which (as most men thought) were but meere slanders, maliciously deuised by such as enuying at his honour, and taking occasion by the emperours suspition, ceased not to increase the same, vntill they had wrought his vnwoorthie destruction. The first ground of this false suspition in the emperours head, was for that this Constantine was euen from his childhood, for many causes, better beloued of the old emperour his father than Andronicus, dronicus, as better furnished with those gifts of nature which beautifie a prince, and of a more courteous behauior than was his brother: insomuch, that had he not been the yoonger brother, his father could willingly haue left him his successour in the empire. This was one and the cheefest cause of the emperours grudge, and the ground of his suspition. Yet was there another also, and that not much lesse than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue seperated from the empire a great part of THESSALIA and MACEDONIA, and to haue made him absolute prince thereof; and had happely so done, had hee not beene by death preuented: which thing also much grieued Andronicus, and the more incensed him against his brother. Which his secret hatred he for all that according to his wisdome, cunningly dissembled, not only during the time that his father liued, but three yeares after his death also, making shew of the greatest loue and kindnesse towards him, that was possible. Constantine in the meane time, of such great reuenues as were by his father assigned vnto him, reaping great profit, most bountifully bestowed the same vpon his followers and fauorits, and others that made sute vnto him, as well the meaner sort as the greater, and with his sweet behauior woon vnto him the hearts of all men: for affabilitie & courtesie in high degree easily allureth mens minds, as doe faire flowers in the spring the passengers eyes. This was that precept of the wise Indians, That the higher a prince was in dignitie, and the more courteous he shewed himselfe vnto his inferiours, the better he should be of them beloued. He therefore that should for the two first causes blame Constantine, should doe him wrong; as both proceeding not of himselfe, but of his fathers too much loue: but in the third hee was not altogether blameless; for if for want of experience hee prodigally gaue such gifts, as for the most part might haue beseemed the emperour himselfe, he ignorantly erred, yet did he no little offend: but if he knew, that for his too profuse bountie he could not be vnsuspected of his brother, and yet without regard held on that course, hee was greatly to bee blamed therein. For if nothing els might haue mooued him, yet he should haue considered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had sorted, and how many it had brought to vntimely end. So although perhaps that Constantine meant no harme vnto his brother, or any way to supplant him, yet did these things not a little increase and agratuate the former suspitions, and open the eares of the emperour his brother vnto such calumniation as commonly attendeth vpon immoderat bountie. But to returne vnto our purpose. This honourable Constantine then liued in LYDIA, but lately maried, and in good hope long to liue, being not past thirtie years old: but pleasantly spending the time with his wife at NYMPHEA in LYDIA, at such time as he was thus secretly accused vnto his brother, the emperour thought it good, as vpon other occasions of businesse, to passe ouer into ASIA himselfe; but indeed with a secret resolution, vpon the suddaine to oppresse his brother vnawares, as by proofe it fell out. For at his comming ouer, Constantine fearing nothing lesse, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greatest fauorits, of whom one Michaell Strategopulus (sometime a man in great authoritie with the emperour his father, and of all other for wealth, honour, and noble acts most famous) was cheefe: who together with Constantine were fast clapt in prison, where we will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiscated. But these woorthie men, especially Constantine and Strategopulus, thus laid fast; who many times in great battailes discomfited the Turks, and notably defended the frontiers of the empire alongst the East side of the riuer MEANDER; they now finding none to withstand them, forraged not only all the rich countrey beyond the riuer, but with an infinit multitude passing the same, did there great harme also: so that there was no remedie, but that the emperour must of necessitie make choice of some other woorthie captaine for the defence of those his cities and countries, by the incursion of the Turks then in danger in that part of ASIA.

There was then in the emperours court one Alexius Philanthropenus, a right valiant and renowned captaine, and then in the flower of his youth; of him the emperour thought good to make choice for the defence of those frontiers of his empire in ASIA (against the Turks) which were before the charge of his brother Constantine and Strategopulus; joyning vnto him one Libadarius, an old famous captaine, and a man of great experience also: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the cities of IONIA; and vnto the other, the frontiers along the winding bankes of MEANDER. Where Alexius hauing now gotten a charge woorthie his valour, and in many great conflicts with the Turks still carying away the victorie, became in short time of great fame: besides that, he was exceeding bountifull and courteous vnto all men; a costly, but a readie way vnto dangerous credit and renowne. Thus at the first all things prospered in his hand according to his hearts desire: yea the Turks themselues, bordering vpon him, hardly beset on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by himselfe; and yet not so much feared with their enemies behind them, as mooued with his courtesie, came ouer vnto him with their wiues and children, and serued themselues (many of them) in his campe: but as they say, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of blisse, but that he must tast also of the tun of woe: so fell it out with this great captaine; who hauing but tasted of the better tun, had the worse all poured full vpon his head. For Libadarius seeing all so prosper with him, and somewhat enuying thereat, began to feare and suspect, least he proud of his good fortune, and now growne very strong, casting off his allegeance should aspire vnto the empire, and so first begin with him, as the neerest vnto him: which thing many of the nobilitie secretly surmised also, but how truly many doubt. But this enuious plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked vp in the ashes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certaine companies of Cretensians, whom for their good seruice and fidelitie he both honoured and trusted aboue others, vsing them all for the guard of his owne person. These men proud of their credit, hearing of the surmised aspiring of their Generall, and in hope by his aduancement to raise their owne fortunes also, ceased not continually to suggest vnto him high conceits of himselfe, and to perswade him with all speed to take the matter vpon him; the verie conceit whereof (as they said) would bee vnto him no lesse danger, than if hee should enter into the action it selfe, as he might well see by the wofull examples of the noble Constantine and Strategopulus, both in extreame perill, but for the jealous conceit surmised against them. Which quicke suggestions wrought in his great mind diuers, and those most contrary motions; so that he scarce knew himselfe what he would or would not. For they which are vnto themselues in conscience guiltie of any greeuous crime, if any mischeefe hang ouer their heads therefore, it happeneth vnto them, as foreknowing and expecting the same euen from the time that they offended: vnto whom, if nothing els, yet that same very foreknowledge easeth not a little the greefe and miserie: whereas contrariwise, they which are with suddaine mischeefes and vnlooked for, ouerwhelmed, not knowing any just cause why, must needs stand as men dismaied, and almost beside themselues. But at length after diuers great conflicts with himselfe, the euill perswaders of rebellion, preuailed with him. Yet did hee at the first forbid any mention to bee made of him in the armie as emperour, which caused the Cretensians, the cheefe authors of his rebellion, almost to force him forthwith to take vpon him the imperiall ornaments, thereby to confirme the minds of his followers and fauourits: for that such resolutions were (as they said) to be forthwith put into execution; neyther that any thing required so joint celeritie and dexteritie both of the mind and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his souldiors heads with doubts, and discourage them with the feare of the vncertainetie of the euent: all which for all that moued him not so to doe; but whether for feare of the greatnesse of the danger, or for that he secretly thought how first to circumuent Libadarius, of whom he stood most in doubt, is vncertaine. The report of all which his doings and designes were in short time caried first vnto Libadarius, as the neerest, and so in post vnto the emperour: who were therewith not a little both disquieted. And had Alexius (as some perswaded him) at the first set vpon Libadarius, then vnprouided, no doubt but hee had done much: but God by whom all princes raigne, and whose power confoundeth the deuises of the prowd, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppressed, to follow after Theodorus the emperours brother, of whom hee was to haue feared no harme. This Theodorus, the first man that Alexius shot at, warned by his brother Constantine his harmes, then liued a pleasant priuat life in LYDIA, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore so much the more beloued of the emperour: but Alexius fearing least in that hurle many should resort vnto him, as vnto the emperours brother, and so hinder his proceedings; thought best first to make him sure, and afterward to oppresse Libadarius, not aware, that in stead of the bodie he followed but after the shaddow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his ouersight, and knowing money to be the sinewes of warre, gathered together all the coine hee possibly could, both of his owne and his friends, sending also for the emperours treasures to PHILADELPHIA; and with all speed raised the greatest power he possibly could out of IONIA, which he furnished with all things necessarie, promising vnto his souldiors great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten daies he would with a great armie meet the rebell in the heart of LYDIA, and there dare him battell. But withall considering, that the Cretensians, men

but of a mercenarie faith,had alwaies the guard of Alexius his person,he thought good to make proofe if they might with gold be woon to betray him: and so well wrought the matter by great summes of money presently giuen,and promises of greater preferments with the emperour,that they (somwhat before discontented with Alexius his slackenesse, and now doubting also his successe) yeelded vnto his desire, promising in the beginning of the battell to deliuer him into his hands; which they shortly after in the very joyning of the battell,accordingly performed, deliuering him fast bound vnto Libadarius his enemie. Who not a little proud thereof,vsed him with great insolencie,and within three daies after put out his eyes,for feare the emperour according to his courteous nature should haue giuen him his pardon; and so kept him in prison vntill the emperours pleasure were farther knowne. Thus through false-suspect and ambition were the greatest champions of the Greeke empire brought to confusion.

Andronicus the Greeke emperor repoling more trust in forrein aid, than in his owne subiects, greatly hurteth his state.

Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became so jealous of his owne people,as that he wist not whom to trust,reposing greater cõfidence in strangers than in his own subjects, to the great hurt of his estate. At the same time it fortuned that the Massagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond ISTER, being Christians, but oppressed by the Europian Tartars,wearie of their slauery,sent secretly vnto the Greeke emperor Andronicus; offering that if he would assigne vnto them a conuenient place for them to dwell in, they would come ouer vnto him with ten thousand of their families, and faithfully serue him in his warres against the Turkes (who then grieuously wasted his countries in ASIA, destitute of good captaines and commaunders) which their offer he gladly accepted, as standing then in need of aid and not greatly trusting his owne people. But when these Massagets in number aboue ten thousand,comming ouer with their wiues and children,were to be furnished with all things, and especially the men with horses,armour, and pay, all which the emperour could not of himselfe do; the subjects were therewith hardly charged, and commission sent out into euerie countrey and prouince for the taking vp of horses and armour: euerie citie, euerie countrey towne and village, euerie gentlemans house and poore mans cottage was searched and ransacked, and all things taken from them that was there found fit for seruice,to their great discontentment: euery man murmuring and grudging to haue his armes taken from him, and giuen to strangers. But when they were also to be contributors vnto their pay, they then openly cursed and banned them,euen vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with much adoe) these strangers well furnished with all things necessarie, were with some other forces also shipped ouer into ASIA, vnder the leading of Michael Paleologus the emperours eldest sonne, and then his companion in the empire. Who marching alongst the countrey,came and encamped about MAGNESIA: where the Turks at the first,after their woonted manner, retired themselues into the high mountaines and thick woods,that from thence they might more safely learne what strength their new come enemies were of,and what discipline of war they kept: for they knew that vpon the comming of great armies, many false reports did run, and that things were made far greater than indeed they were; as did of these also,as of a people inuincible: and therefore they thought it best so to protract the time, vntill they might see in what sort best to deale with them. But so houering ouer their heads, and perciuing them oftentimes without order to roame abroad into the countrey seeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenarie men spoiled their friends no lesse than if they had beene their enemies) they came downe in good order from the mountaines, from whence at the first they aduentured but a little: but afterward they came on further and with greater confidence,in such sort,as that it seemed they would eare long assault the yoong emperour in his campe. Wherewith he with the rest discouraged, without any stroke giuen,retired; the Turks still folowing him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the rest,any thing considered the small number of their enemies: but as drunken men whose heads filled with grosse vapours, are deceiued in the greatnesse of the object that they see, and oftentimes thinke one thing to be two; so were they also in like manner with their owne feare blinded. Beside that,most commonly it falleth out, that the armie which insolencie and iniurie forerunneth,is appointed to destruction, and by the fearfulnesse of it selfe ouerthrowne before the enemie set vpon it,they themselues becomming enemies vnto themselues; and God his iust vengeance appointing vnto them such an end as their deeds haue deserued: neither was it like that they should do any great good, that at their first setting foorth,in steed of prouision carried out with them the bitter curses and execrations of their friends. Michael the emperour seeing the Massagets flie, and not daring with those few he had left, to oppose himselfe against his enemies, retired himselfe into the strong castle of MAGNESIA, there to expect what would become of these mischiefes. But the Massagets spoiling the countries of the poore Christians as they went, marched directly vnto the strait of HELESPONTVS, and there againe passed ouer into EVROPE, as if they had beene therefore onely sent for ouer the riuer ISTER, to shew the Turkes the sooner the way vnto the sea in ASIA. For it was not many daies after, but that Michael the emperour being returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, the Turks comming downe with a great power, subdued all the countries, euen vnto the coast of LESBOS, to the great weakning of the Greeke empire.

It was not long after, these great stirs made by the Massagets, but that one Ronzerius (some time a notable pirate, but as then a most famous captaine) hearing of the great intertainment that the Greeke emperor gaue vnto strangers; by messengers sent for that purpose, offered vnto him his seruice in his wars against the Turks, as had before the Massagets. This Ronzerius of whom we speake, had out of CATALONIA a prouince of SPAINE, and out of that part of FRANCE which is called NARBONENSIS, and some other places also, gathered together a great number of base needie naked men, yet lustie able bodies and fit for seruice either by sea or land; with whom he manned foure tall gallies, and so as a notable pirate long time robbed, not onely the marchants trading too and fro in the Mediteranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich ilands, carried away thence much rich spoile also; vntill at length by the mischiefe he did being become famous, and great wars then arising betwixt Charles king of NAPLES and Theodorus king of SICILIA, he was by Theodorus sent for and requested of aid: which hee (liuing of the spoile) easily graunted, and so came vnto him with a thousand horse, and as many foot, all old expert souldiours, whose good seruice stood the king in those wars in great steed. But as the end of war is peace, so at length vpon the euill successe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two kings, and confirmed by a mariage betwixt their children, Ronzerius liuing altogether by his fortunes was to seeke for new intertainment, both for himselfe and his men, as hauing neither house nor certaine dwelling place to repaire vnto; but being as needie men met together, some out of one place, some out of another, in hope of bootie as their fortune led them: In which case Ronzerius their generall thought it best to offer his seruice vnto the Greeke emperour in his warres against the Turkes, whereof hee gladly accepted, and so sent for him: vnto whom hee shortly after came with two thousand good souldiours, called (after the proud Spanish manner) by the name of CATALONIANS, for that they were for the most part Spaniards of the countrey of CATALONIA. Of whose comming the emperour rejoycing more than hee had cause (as afterward by proofe it fell out) in token of his greater fauour, honoured him with the name of the Great Captaine; and afterwards gaue him his neece Marie in mariage. But within a while after, when as one Tensa, another Catalonian captaine sent for by Ronzerius, was come thither also with more aid; the emperour to gratifie them both, gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cæsar, and vnto the other the name of the Great Captaine. But when these new come captaines with their followers, were to be transported into ASIA, it is not to be spoken what harme they did by the way vnto the countrey people, and in the villages alongst the sea coast; abusing the men and women as their slaues, and spending their substance at their pleasure, for which they had many a bitter curse: and this was their first yeares entertainment. The next Spring they set forward to relieue the great citie of PHILADELPHIA, being as then long besieged by the Turks, and hardly bestead without with the enemie; and within, with extreame penurie and famine: which good seruice, they most valiantly performed and raised the siege: For the Turks beholding the good order of these Latine souldiours, their bright armour, and couragious comming on, rise presently and departed, not onely from the citie, but quite out of the emperours territorie. Besides that, in this armie were joyned vnto these Catalonians great numbers of the best souldiours of the Greeks, and all the power of the Massagets: so that had not the emperour expresly before commaunded, not to pursue them too far, it was by many thought all those cities and countries might then againe haue beene in short time recouered from the Turks, which they had before taken from him. But in kingdomes appointed vnto ruine, faire occasions helpe not for the stay thereof: yea the greatest helpes prouided by the worldly wise, by a secret commaunding power aboue, being oftentimes conuerted to the destruction of that they were prouided for the safegard of; as it now fell out with the emperour and

theſe Spaniſh ſouldiours : for this ſeruice done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Maſſagets alſo. But theſe Catalonians with Ronzerius their generall, roaming vp and downe the emperours territories in ASIA, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon them whom they were ſent for to relieue : alleadging that they had not their pay according to the emperours promiſe, and that therefore they muſt liue vpon them that had ſent for them and deceiued them. So were the poore people in euerie place ſpoiled, their wiues and daughters rauiſhed, their prieſts and aged fathers tortured to confeſſe ſuch ſecret ſtore as they had : all was ſubiect vnto theſe diſſolute ſouldiours rage and luſt; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themſelues, vpon the greedie ſouldiours imagination, hauing their hands or feet, or ſome other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high waies ſide begging an halfepenie or a peece of bread, hauing nothing left to comfort themſelues with, more than their miſerable voice and fountaines of teares : with which their wrongs and miſeries, woorſe than thoſe they had ſuſtained by the Turks, the emperour much grieued; and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieue them : but what remedie, his coffers were ſo bare as that he was not able to do any thing for the redreſſe thereof. Ronzerius hauing thus ſpoiled the emperours countrey in ASIA, and left nothing that pleaſed either him or his, with all his power paſſed ouer into EUROPE : and leauing all the reſt of his armie at CALIPOLIS, with two hundred of his men went vnto the yoong emperour Michael (then lying with a ſmall power at ORESTIAS in THRACIA) to demaund of him his pay, or if need were to extort it from him with threats : with whoſe inſolencie at his comming, the emperour more offended than before, his ſouldiours there preſent perceiuing the ſame, with their drawn ſwords compaſsing him in, fall by the court, ſlew him, with certaine of his followers ; the reſt in all haſt fled to CALIPOLIS to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Ronzerius ſlaine.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the yong emperor had thought to haue diſcouraged the Catalonians and abated their pride, as like ynough it was to haue done : yet in proofe it fell not out ſo, but was the cauſe of far greater euils. So when God proſpereth not mens actions, the beſt falleth out vnto the worſt, and their wiſeſt deuices turne vnto meere follies : for the Catalonians at CALLIPOLIS hearing of the death of Ronſerius their Generall, firſt ſlew all the citizens in the citie, and notably fortifying the ſame, tooke that as their refuge. Then deuiding their ſouldiors into two parts, with the one part of them manned out eight gallies, which vnder the leading of the Great captaine Tenza, robbed and ſpoiled all the marchants ſhips, paſsing the ſtraits of HELLESPONTUS, to or from CONSTANTINOPLE : the other part left in the citie, in the meane time forraging the countrey all about them. But Tenza ſhortly after encountering with a fleet of the Genowaies, well prouided for him, was by them ouerthrowne, and moſt of his gallies ſunke, and himſelfe taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellowes, and ſo againe inlarged. Now the Catalonians at CALLIPOLIS ſomewhat diſcouraged with the loſſe of their fleet and ſo many of their men, for certaine daies kept themſelues quiet within their wals, as not well knowing what courſe to take; for they feared both the Maſſagets and Thracians : them, for that they had vpon light cauſes abuſed them, and ſlaine diuers of them in the late Aſian warre; and theſe, for that they had but euen the other day burnt their houſes and ſpoiled their labours in the countrey thereby: for which and other their outrages, they vtterly deſpaired of the emperours fauour whom they had ſo highly offended. But that which moſt of all terrified them, was, for that they looked euery day when Michael the yoong emperour, who as then lay not farre off, ſhould with a great power come to aſſault them : for feare of whom they caſt a deepe ditch about the citie, with a ſtrong counterſcarfe; ſo preparing themſelues, as if they ſhould haue beene euen preſently beſieged. But the time ſo paſsing, and the emperour delaying his comming, they began to thinke of other matters : For being brought to that ſtrait, that they could not well tell which way to turne them, but that they were on euery ſide beſet with danger; they vpon a malicious reſolution, and vnto the Greekes moſt fatall, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, craued aid of the Turkes that dwelt on the other ſide of the ſtrait ouer againſt them, in ASIA : who preſently ſent them fiue hundred good ſouldiors, after whom followed alſo many other fugitiues and looſe companions, in hope of ſpoile : with whom the Catalonians for the preſent ſtrengthened, and being themſelues three thouſand ſtrong, iſſued out of the citie, and forraged the countrey thereabouts, bringing in with them great heards and flockes of ſheepe and other cattell, together with their keepers : wherwith both the emperours and their ſubiects incenſed, prepared themſelues for reuenge. This was the first calling in of the Turks into EUROPE (that I read of) and the beginning of those endlesse miseries wherewith the Christian commonweale hath beene euer since most grieuously afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none greeuing thereat, but such as themselues feele the heauinesse thereof, whom God in his mercie comfort.

The Turcopuli.

The Catalonians and Turks now lying about CYPSELLA and APRI in THRACE, Michael the emperour with his Macedonian and Thracian souldiors, the Massagets and the Turcopuli, encamped at APRI. These Turcopuli were Turks, also in number about a thousand, who (as is in the former part of this historie declared) beeing fled with their Sultan Iathatines vnto the Greeke emperour, and left behind him at such time as he was by the Europian Tartars deliuered, had forsaken their Mahometane superstition, and so being become Christians, were enrolled amongst the Greeke souldiors. Shortly after the emperour (aduertised by his scouts of the approch of his enemies) commaunded euery man to be in a readinesse, and his captaines to put his armie in order of battell: who seeing the enemies battell deuided into three parts, put theirs also in like order, placing the Turcopuli & Massagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choice horsemen in the right wing, and the rest with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the emperor himselfe riding from place to place, with comfortable speeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly against their enemies. The Sunne rising, the enemies battell began to come on, in number much inferior vnto the emperours, yet in like order; the Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians well armed in the middest. But the signall of battell being giuen on both sides, the Massagets, whether it were by agreement so before made with the enemie, or vpon a suddaine conceiued treason, presently withdrew themselues aloofe off, and so stood as idle beholders, giuing aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did also the Turcopuli their companions; which greatly dismaied the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes dismaied with that suddaine defection of their fellowes, were euen in the joyning of the battell discouraged. Which the emperor perceiuing, with great instancie intreated the captains and commaunders of his armie, calling them oftentimes by name, not to be so suddainly discouraged: but they in so great a danger little regarding his words, and still shrinking from him; when as the greatest part of his footmen were troden vnderfoot, and slaine, turning himselfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, he said: Now woorthie men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more bitter than death. And hauing so said, valiantly charged the enemie: in which charge his horse was slaine vnder him, and he in danger to haue beene taken, had not one of his faithfull followers remounted him vpon his owne horse, and so saued his life with the losse of his owne. The emperour flying to DYDIMOTICHUM, where Andronicus his father then lay, was of him joyfully receiued, but sharpely reprooued for aduenturing his person so far. The enemies pursuing the chase, slew some, tooke others, vntill that by the comming on of the night, and wearie with the long fight, they retired: and the next day deuiding the spoile, afterwards at their pleasures forraged the countrey. The renegate Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few daies after reuolting vnto the Catalonians, were of them joyfully entertained, and enrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall.

The vnfortunat battell of Michael the emperour against the Catalonians and Turks.

Shortly after this victorie, the Catalonians began to mutinie among themselues, the Great captaine Tenza, and Pharenza his companion, disdaining to bee commaunded by Recafort their Generall: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes, Tenza was slaine, and Pharenza for safegard of his life glad to flie vnto the emperour Andronicus; of whom he was, contrarie to his expectation, right honourably entertained. About this time also, the Massagets hauing done the Greekes more harme, than the Turks against whom they were entertained, and enriched themselues with the spoile of their friends both in ASIA and EUROPE, were about with their wiues and children, and wealth, to returne againe vnto their old dwellings beyond ISTER. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians vnderstanding; and bearing vnto them a secret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had by them oftentimes been wronged in the deuision of the spoile of the Greekes, lay now secretly in wait for them as they should passe the straits of the great mountaine HEMUS, which bounded the Greeke empire from the Bulgarians: where setting vpon them, fearing no such danger, they slew them almost all; & with the spoile of them, recompenced themselues for all the wrongs they had from them before receiued.

The Catalonians prowd of their victorie at APRI, and well strengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli, with continuall rodes spoiled not onely all alongst the sea coast of THRACIA, but

but all the inland countrey alſo, as far as MARONEA, RHODOPE, and BIZIA, laying all waſt before them. And hauing forraged moſt part of THRACIA, brake into MACEDONIA, and there wintred about CASSANDRIA, ſometime a famous citie, but as then all deſolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come, they remoued thence, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled the cities of MACEDONIA, and eſpecially the rich citie of THESSALONICA, where the empreſſe Irene then lay: wherein they were by the emperours good foreſight and care preuented, who doubting ſuch a matter, had fortified his cities in that countrey, and furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons and all other things needfull for their defence: which they quickly perceiuing, and finding the countrey all deſolate and forſaken by the inhabitants, were about to haue againe returned into THRACIA. But as they were thereupon reſoluing, they were informed by one that was with them captiue, how that the emperour by a mightie ſtrong wall built at a place called CHRISTOPOLIS, from the ſea ſide euen vnto the top of the mountaines, had ſo ſhut vp the paſſage, as that it was not poſsible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected newes they were at the firſt exceedingly troubled, as foreſeeing, That if they ſhould there long ſtay in that ſpoiled countrey, they ſhould in ſhort time be driuen vnto exceeding wants (for they were now in number aboue eight thouſand fighting men) and afraid alſo by a generall conſpiracie of the people about them, to be oppreſſed. Thus beſet, and not well knowing what to do, or which way to turn themſelues, they deſperatly reſolued, no longer there to ſtay, but forthwith to ſet forward, and to breake into THESSALIE, with the plentifulneſſe thereof to relieue their wants, or into ſome other countrey farther off towards PELOPONESUS, and there to ſeat themſelues, and to end their long trauailes: or at leaſtwiſe, if they could not ſo doe, to enter into league with ſome that dwelt vpon the ſea coaſt, and ſo returne againe into their owne countrey. Wherefore leauing THESSALONICA, and deliuering the emperour of a great feare, they in three daies came to the Theſſalian mountaines, OLYMPUS, OSSA, and PELIUS, where thy at the foot of them found ſuch plentie of all things neceſſarie for their releefe, that they there wintred. But Winter paſt, and the Spring being come, they paſſed ouer thoſe high mountaines and the pleaſant vallies called TEMPE, and ſo at laſt came downe into the fruitfull plaines of THESSALIE; where they ſpent that yeare at their pleaſure, without reſiſtance, deuouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of whatſoeuer thing came in their way: for as then the ſtate of that countrey was but weake, the prince thereof being but yoong, and withall very ſicke and like to die, and the ſucceſsion ſo ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death ſhould lay hand thereon; and euery man therefore more carefull of his owne priuat than of the common good. Yet to auert theſe forrain enemies, who like a conſuming fire deuoured the country before them, the nobilitie thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their captains and commaunders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into ACHAIA and BEOTIA, countries more pleaſant and fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in: promiſing alſo to giue them aid for the ſeating of them there, if they ſhould ſo need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands full of gold ſo eaſily gotten, to goe ſeeke their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and ſtrong, and helpe alſo if need were, than to hazard all vpon the ſucceſſe of a doubtfull victorie, and ſo fooliſhly to preferre an vncertaine hope before a moſt certaine benefit. So making peace with the Theſſalians, and the Spring being come, receiuing of them their promiſed rewards, & guides to conduct them; paſsing ouer the mountaines beyond THESSALIE, and the ſtraits of THERMOPILE, they encamped neere vnto LOCRIS and the riuer CEPHISUS: which riſing out of the mountaine PERNASSUS, and running toward the Eaſt, hath on the North ſide of them LOCRIS and OPUS; and on the South the inland country of ACHAIA and BEOTIA: and being a great riuer vntill it come to LEBADIA and HALIARTES, is there deuided into two riuers, the one called ÆSOPUS, and the other ISMENUS; whereof the former runneth through the countrey of ATTICA, vntill it come into the ſea, and the other neere vnto AULIS (where the noble Grecians, as they ſay, being about to goe vnto TROY, met and there ſtaied) falleth into the Euboean ſea. But the duke of THEBES and ATHENS and of all that countrey, hearing of their comming, and (as hee thought) well prouided alſo for them (as hauing all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readineſſe) with great pride and contempt denied them paſſage through his countrey, at ſuch time as they asked the ſame; making no more reckning of them, than as of a ſort of looſe wandering rogues that could find no place to reſt or thriue in: wherewith they enraged, reſolued among

among themselues, either there to seat themselues in his countrey, or to die therefore. And so passing the riuer into BEOTIA, not far from the same encamped themselues, being in number about 2500 horse, and 4000 foot. But so lying and expecting the comming of their enemies, they caused all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed vp, which they with certaine small cuts out of the riuer so watered, as that it differed but a little from a deepe marish or bog. Hether about the middle of the Spring commeth the prince of the countrey, with a gallant armie raised out of ATHENS, THEBES, PLATEA, LOCRIS, PHOCIS, and MEGARA, in number about 6400 horse and 4000 foot, an armie too strong hee thought for so contemptible an enemie. But the weakest enemie not feared, doth oftentimes the greatest harme, as here by proofe was to be seene: for the prince comming vnto the aforesaid plaine, now grown green with grasse, and casting no perill, encouraging his men, came brauely on with all his horsemen to haue charged his enemies: who stood fast vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches, as readie to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine, his horses sinking deepe into the rotten and new ploughed ground, and there intangled as in a marish, lay for the most part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders; or els plunging in the deepe, and hauing cast them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; othersome sticking fast, stood with their riders vpon their backes, as if they had been very images, not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, ouerwhelmed them with all manner of shot, and slew them at their pleasure, vntill they had almost made an end of them: and with their horsemen so speedely pursued the rest in chace, euen vnto the cities of THEBES and ATHENS, that they without more adoe euen at that instant surprised them both, with all that was in them. So the Catalonians hauing as it were at a cast at dice woon a most goodly countrey, garnished with faire townes and cities, which they neuer built; and stored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer sweat for; there ended their long trauailes, and seated themselues: Not ceasing (as saith Nicephorus Gregorias, the reporter of this historie, speaking of the time wherein these things were done, and wherein hee himselfe liued in CONSTANTINOPLE) vnto this present day, by little and little to extend the bounds of their territorie. Where leauing them with whom we happely haue too long straied from our purpose, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

In the armie of the Catalonians, at such time as they were about to haue besieged THESSALONICA, were three thousand Turkes, of whom eleuen hundred were of them (as wee said) which remained with Melech at ÆNVM, after the flight of Iathatines there Sultan vnto the Tartars, and renouncing their superstition, became Christians; and so being baptized, and hauing wiues and children, were enrolled among the emperours souldiours; but at the battell of APRI reuolted vnto the Catalonians, and were commonly known by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were such Turks as with Chalel their captaine came out of ASIA, being sent for by the Catalonians. Now all these Turks, as well the one as the other, at such time as the Catalonians were about to inuade THESSALIA, and to seeke their new fortunes in the countries more Westward, and so farther off from ASIA: partly distrusting the societie of them, as dangerous vnto them; and loth also further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into countries further off, among people to them vnknowne; began to arise in mutinie, and to refuse to go. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requested of the Generall of the Catalonians to giue them leaue with quietnesse to return: which their request he easily graunted (as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the emperours dominion) and so they gladly departed; proportionally diuiding all the captiues and spoiles they had taken in that long war, according to the number of both parts.

The Turks deuided into two factions.

These Turks after their departure from the Catalonians, diuided themselues into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turks following Melech, and the rest Chalel their generall. But Melech being before become a Christian, as were his followers also; and after that hauing receiued most honorable entertainment at the emperours hands, and yet againe most shamefully breaking his faith before giuen, and violating his religion, had reuolted vnto his enemies; dispairing of the emperours further friendship, which he had so euill deserued, made choice rather to goe vnto Vrales prince of SERVIA, by whom he was sent for, than to come againe into the sight of Andronicus the Greeke emperour. And so going vnto him with a thousand horse, and fiue hundred foot, was there of him well entertained himselfe: but his souldiours all commanded to deliuer

vnto the prince both their horſes and armour, and to fall to other trades and not to beare armes but at ſuch time, and ſo many of them as ſhould ſeeme good vnto the prince, that had receiued them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turks his followers, in number about 1300 horſe and eight hundred foot, ſtaying at MACEDONIA, offered vnto the Greeke emperour quietly to depart his countrey, ſo that he would giue him paſſage by the ſtraits of CHRISTOPOLIS by him fortified; and in ſafetie tranſport him and his ſouldiours with all their ſubſtance, ouer the ſtrait of HELESPONTVS into ASIA: vnto which his requeſt, the emperour conſidering the great harme done in his prouinces, and deſirous alſo to be diſcharged of ſo great a burthen, eaſily graunted; and ſo ſent Sennacherib, one of his moſt valiant captaines, to conduct them out of MACEDONIA into THRACIA, vnto the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS. Where the Greeke captaines and ſouldiors ſeeing the great multitude of horſes, and abundance of money and other ſpoiles, which they hauing taken from the Greeks were now about to carie away with them into ASIA; they thought it a great indignitie to ſuffer them ſo to do: and allured alſo with the hope of ſo rich a prey, as had beene of long in gathering, they entred into a deuiſe far different from that which was vnto the Turks before promiſed; neither prouiding them of ſhipping, neither carefull of their ſafetie, but purpoſing vpon the ſudden by night to deſtroy them. Whereof the Turks hauing got vnderſtanding, ſuddenly riſing, ſurpriſed a caſtle in the countrey thereby, which they notably fortified for the defence of themſelues, to the great aſtoniſhment of them that had purpoſed their deſtruction; who not now able to force them, were glad to get them farther off, and to certifie the emperour what had happened: who (after I wot not what receiued cuſtome of the Greeke emperours his predeceſſors) ſlowly diſpatching things requiring greateſt haſt, careleſly delayed the time, to the great trouble of his ſtate and aduantage of his enemies. For they wiſely conſidering the danger and diſtreſſe they were in, by ſpeedie meſſengers ſent ouer the ſtrait, craued aid of the Turks their countreymen in ASIA, which they preſently ſent them: wherewith they not a little both encouraged and ſtrengthened, with their often and ſudden incurſions grieuouſly waſted the countrey round about them, to the great diſcontentment of the Greeke captaines, not able without greater helpe to remedie the ſame. Who thereof certified the yoong emperour Michael Paleologus, requeſting him with all the power he could make, to come and beſiege the caſtle, and to ſuppreſſe theſe ſo dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof, not onely the captaines with their ſouldiours, but the countrey people in generall with their ſpades and mattocks came flocking vnto the emperour; not as if they would haue beſieged the caſtle, but haue digged it downe and ouerthrown it together with the Turks their enemies.

The vnfortunat battell of the emperour Michael Paleologus with the Turks in Cherſoneſus.

Now the emperour with his captaines and ſouldiours, and a multitude of theſe countrey people, being come thither; who all gladly followed him, moſt part of them fooliſhly thinking of nothing, but of the ſpoile of their enemies; not conſidering with what danger the ſame was to be gained: ſo that the more the enemies prouided for the neceſſarie defence of themſelues, as in number but few, and ſhut vp in their enemies countrey; the more careleſly and negligently, and without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their ſiege, for that they were in number far more, and better prouided of all things than their enemies: not reputing with themſelues, Nothing in this world to be firme and ſure; and all worldly things (as ſaith the diuine Philoſopher) to bee but the mockerie of God, and to be haſtily turned vpſide downe, and with moſt vncertaine courſe this and that way to wander. But their enemies, who before feared euen the verie fame of their comming, accounting themſelues rather among the dead than the liuing, ſeeing their confuſed and diſordered raſhneſſe; therewith much more then before encouraged, beſtowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnneceſſarie for battel, in good ſafetie within their trenches: but themſelues, with eight hundred choſen horſemen onely, and they verie well armed, ſallied out, euen vnto the place where the imperiall enſigne ſtood; being neither of any great ſafetie, neither guarded with any ſuch ſtrength or carefulneſſe as beſeemed: with which ſudden and deſperat eruption of the enemies, the Græcians terrified; eſpecially that ruſticall and vplandiſh companie, began to flie; after whom by little and little others followed, vntill at length all the reſt without farther reſiſtance, fled alſo: which the emperour ſeeing, did what he might to haue ſtaied their flight: but in ſo generall a confuſion and feare, when euerie man was to ſhift for one, who regarded him? Wherefore wearied and ſeeing no other remedie, hee was glad to take the ſame courſe and to flie with the reſt. Yet many of the more expert captaines, aſhamed of ſo foule a flight, a flight, made diuers ſtands: and ſo ſtaied the barbarours enemie from further purſuit of the emperour and the other flying Greeks. In which doing, many of them incloſed by the Turks, were of them taken priſoners: vnto whom all the emperours treaſure became a prey alſo, and whatſoeuer honourable enſignes of the empire elſe that were found in the emperours tent; yea the imperiall crowne it ſelfe, richly ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, was there taken alſo, which (they ſay) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleaſantly ſcoffed at the Greeke emperour that but late before wore it.

Thracia ſpoiled by the Turks.

After this victorie, the Turks with great pride ſpoiled almoſt all THRACIA, in ſuch ſort as that the people for two yeares together durſt ſcarcely goe out of their ſtrong walled townes to plough and ſow their land; which exceedingly grieued both the emperours, the father and the ſonne: for in their owne power they had no great confidence, God hauing (as it were) taken from their people both their hearts & courage; ſo that all their hope was to entertain forrein aid (the miſerable ſhift of the great diſtreſſed ones) wherein alſo they found many difficulties and lets, whileſt they conſidered the greatneſſe of the charge, their coffers being then (if euer) emptie, by reaſon their territories were ſo long and grieuouſly by their enemies waſted: yet need admitting no law, Andronicus the old emperour was glad to ſend to Crales prince of SERVIA his ſonne in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no haſt (as men in relieuing others commonly do) and the miſerie more and more increaſing, it pleaſed God to ſtur vp the heart of one Philes Paleologus the emperours neere kinſman, to vndertake the protection and deliuerance of his prince and countrey; and was afterward for his great valour by the emperor woorthily made lord great Martiall of the empire. This Philes of whom we now ſpeake, had all his life time beene brought vp in the court, and was for his vpright dealing and integritie of life beloued of all men, but eſpecially of the old emperour his kinſman, whom he with like affection honoured; but was a man altogether vnskilfull of the wars, as being by nature of a weake conſtitution of bodie, and ſo verie ſickly; and withall more giuen to deuotion and the ſeruice of God than the affaires of the world, oftentimes ſpending moſt part of the day at his prayers in the church. He now grieued to ſee the perplexed emperour, and the miſerie of his countrey, requeſted of him that he might with ſome ſmall power, and ſome few captaines of his owne choice, go out againſt theſe proud Turks: hoping (as he ſaid) by the grace of God to reuenge the wrong by them done, and to returne vnto him againe with victorie. Vnto which his requeſt, the emperour eaſily yeelded, ſaying, That God was juſt, which delighted not in any mans legs, either in the greatneſſe of any mans ſtrength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind; not ſo giuing his helpe vnto Michaell the emperour, his ſonne, for the offences of his parents: as happely hee might vnto this ſo vpright and deuout a man, regarding more his integritie of life, than his skill in armes: For turning me about, I haue ſeen in this world (ſaid he) I haue ſeene, the ſwift not to gain the prize; neither the valiant the victorie; wiſe men to want bread; and men of vnderſtanding, wealth; the ſimple to gaine fauour; and the ſubtill to fall into diſgrace: ſuch alteration worldly things in time find. So the emperour (as is aforeſaid) yeelding to his requeſt, furniſhed him with money, horſes, and armour, and ſuch a conuenient power as he himſelfe deſired. Which he hauing receiued, firſt of all encouraged his captaines and ſouldiors with all manner of courteſie and kindneſſe, giuing vnto them money, horſes, armour, jewels, yea ſometime he gaue vnto one his purſe, vnto another his cloake, his rapier, or ſome other ſuch thing as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardneſſe: after that he perſuaded them to an honeſt temperate courſe of life, and valiantly to play the men, promiſing according to their deſerts to reward euerie one of them, the war once happely ended: and before his ſetting forth, vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Chalel with a thouſand foot and two hundred horſe was forraging the countrey about BYZIA, he haſted his departure, that ſo he might by the way encounter them, laded with the ſpoile of the countrey: and ſo ſetting forward, came the third day vnto a little riuer, which the inhabitants call XEROGIPSUM, and there in a great plaine neere vnto the ſame, encamped. Where after he had ſet all things in order fit for battell, he with cheerefull ſpeeches, as a great commaunder, encouraged his captaines and ſouldiors; leauing nothing vnſaid or vndone, that might ſerue for the animating of them to fight. But hee had not ſo lien two daies, but that his ſcouts about midnight comming in, brought him tidings, That the enemie laden with ſpoile, was euen faſt by at hand: who by the riſing of the Sunne were come within ſight, and had themſelues a far off alſo diſcouered the Chriſtian armie, all gliſtering in bright armour. Wherfore ſtaying a while to prepare themthemſelues for battell: and firſt of all, compaſsing themſelues round with their waggons and other cariages, they beſtowed in them all their captiues faſt bound together, with the bootie they had taken: and afterwards as their manner was, caſting duſt vpon their heads, and their hands vp towards heauen, they came on. And now the Chriſtian armie came on forward alſo, Philes ſtill encouraging both the horſemen and footmen, and right well conducting them, as the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing of the armie, gaue the firſt charge vpon a ſquadron of the enemies, and at the firſt onſet vnhorſed one of the enemies, and by and by after him, another. But hauing his horſe ſore wounded vnder him, he haſtely retired out of the battell, which ſomewhat troubled the Chriſtians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcrie began moſt fiercely to preſſe vpon the retiring Chriſtians. Philes in the meane time with many cheerefull words and comfortable perſuaſions ſtill encouraging them to play the men; and with his eyes oftentimes caſt vp to heauen, with teares running downe his face, moſt heartely beſought God, the giuer of all victorie, no longer to ſuffer thoſe his enemies, and the miniſters of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did alſo the poore captiues that lay bound, doubtfully betwixt feare and hope, expecting the euent of the battell. The Chriſtian footmen at the ſame time encountering hand to hand with the Barbarians, aſſailed them, and were aſſailed; ſlew of them, and were themſelues of them ſlaine; ſo that there was a cruell fight made on both ſides. But Philes with the multitude of his men hauing almoſt compaſſed in the Barbarian horſemen, with a companie of his moſt valiant ſouldiors broke in vpon the ſide of the enemies battell, and ſo made way through the middeſt of it: and ſo troubled the Turkes, as that they well knew not how to ſtay or what to doe. So being on euery ſide circumuented and hardly charged, moſt of them there fell, excepting ſome few horſemen, whom the Greeke horſemen purſued vnto the entrance of CHERSONESUS, with purpoſe there to ſhut them vp. Philes comming thither alſo, there vpon thoſe ſtraits encamped: at which time the emperour preſently ſent out fiue gallies to keepe the ſtraits of HELLESPONTUS, ſo that no ayd might be brought vnto theſe Turkes out of ASIA. Whileſt things thus went, two thouſand choice horſemen came to the aid of Philes out of SERVIA, and the poteſtate of PERA came by ſea alſo with eight gallies moe into HELLESPONTUS to the aid of the other Chriſtians: wherfore when the Grecians and the Seruians had thus on the one ſide ſhut them vp by land, and they that were in the gallies on the other by ſea; Philes with all his power came and encamped about the towne and the trenches wherein the Turkes lay, planting his batterie againſt the caſtle, wherewith he greatly ſhooke the ſame, and made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and of their horſes, and that not onely by day, but by night alſo. But the Turkes ſeeing death now preſent before their eyes, and no way left for them to eſcape: for that they were ſo on euery ſide both by ſea and land encloſed, thought good thus to aduenture their liues, reſoluing by night to ſet vpon the Grecians rather than vpon the Seruians, whom they had hetherto accuſtomed to ouercome, and whom they had with often ſlaughters terrefied; that ſo the reſt by them alſo happely diſcouraged, they might ſo delay the aſſault: but in attempting the ſame, they perceiued themſelues much deceiued, finding them euen at their firſt ſallying out, ready in armes to receiue them: wherfore hauing in vaine giuen the attempt (as againſt a ſtrong fortreſſe) they were ſhamefully enforced to retire. Yet were they not therewith ſo diſcouraged, but that the ſtraight ſiege ſtill continuing, they gaue the like attempt vpon the Seruians; but being alſo by them in like manner with loſſe repulſed, they began now vtterly to deſpaire. Wherefore the next day, about midnight caſting away their armes, they with their boſomes and pockets full of coine ran downe vnto the ſea ſide, towards the gallies, with purpoſe to yeeld themſelues vnto the Genowaies that were therein; as fearing of them leſſe harme, as of men whom they had neuer hurt. But the night being darke and miſtie, and the Moone giuing no light, many of them vnawares came vnto the Greeke gallies, and there, flying the ſmoke fell into the fire: for being lightened of their money, they were by them forthwith without any pitie ſlaine alſo. But the Genowaies ſlew not all their priſoners, but onely ſuch as had brought with them the greateſt ſtore of coine; leaſt afterwards bewraying the ſame, it ſhould haue beene ſought after by the Greekes: the reſt they caſt into bonds, of whom, ſome they ſent vnto the emperour, otherſome they kept to themſelues as their owne priſoners. Thus by the valour and good conduct of this worthie deuout captaine, the Turks were for that time againe chaſed out of EUROPE, and the countrey of THRACIA deliuered of a great feare.

The Turks ouerthrowne.

The causes of the decay of the Greeke empire.

Now by that we haue alreadie written, is easily to be seene, the chiefe causes of the decay and ruine of the Greeke empire, to haue been, First, the innouation and change of their antient Religion and ceremonies by Michael Paleologus, whereof ensued a world of woes; then by Couetousnesse, coloured with the name of good husbandrie, the vtter destruction of the chiefe strength of the empire; next vnto that, by Enuie, the ruine of the great; False suspect, the looser of friends; Ambition, honours ouerthrow; Distrust, the great minds torment; and Forreine aid, the empires vnfaithfull porter, opening the gate euen vnto the enemie himselfe: wherunto foule Discord ioyned (as shall be foorthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemie could desire, for the helping of them in the supplanting of so great an empire? But againe to our purpose: Michael, companion with his father Andronicus in the empire, had by his wife Marie two sonnes, Andronicus who was afterward emperour, and Manuel surnamed the Despot; and two daughters, Anne maried vnto Thomas prince of EPIRVS, and Theodora married to the prince of BVLGARIA: of all these, the old emperour Andronicus their grandfather, so entirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in comparison of him he little seemed to regard either his owne children, or the rest of his nephews, wishing them all rather to perish than him: which many supposed him to do, as purposing by him the better to establish the succession of the empire in his house; as also for his excellencie of wit, and comelinesse of person; the likenesse of name also happily furthering his kind affection. For which reasons, he caused him to be alwaies honourably brought vp in his court, as not willing to spare him out of his sight either day or night. But when he was out of his childhood, and growne to be a lustie youth (at which time mens hot desires are commonly most vehement) he began to contemne all chastisement and gouernment; especially in so high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Besides that, his companions became vnto him the ministers and persuaders of all those vaine delights which vnstaied youth most desireth: and at the first began to lead him foorth to walke the streets, to hauke, to hunt, and to haunt plaies, and afterwards to night walks also, not well beseeming his state: which riotous course of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine spare allowance for his conuenient maintenance; he acquainted himselfe with the rich marchants of GENOVVAY, which dwelt at PERA. Hereof rose hard taking vp of money, great debt, fine deuises how to come by coyne, with secret consultations and purposes of flight. For when hee saw his grandfather old Andronicus long to liue, and his father Michael like to succeede him, he had no hope of aspiring to the empire; whereupon his ambitious thoughts, and impotent desires, long time tormenting his haughtie heart, suggested vnto him such purposes. For when as hee would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens counsels, as a child, hee sought after the emperiall libertie, and abundance of wealth; that he might haue that was sufficient for himselfe, and wherewith to reward others, as the followers of an emperour. Which seeing he could not doe, his grandfather yet liuing, and his father raigning; he sought after the soueraignetie of other principalities and countries: one while after ARMENIA, as belonging vnto him in the right of his mother, the king of ARMENIA his daughter; another while after PELOPONESVS, and sometime hee dreamed of LESBOS and LEMNVS, and other the fruitfull Islands of the Ægean sea: which when it was secretly told sometime to his father, and sometime to his grandfather, he was now crossed and reproued of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to passe ouer many other his youthfull prancks, hee vsed in his night walks secretly to repaire vnto a certaine gentlewomans house, more honourably borne, than honestly quallified: which woman, a certaine gallant and another Adonis, no lesse affected than himselfe; wherewith he highly offended, as with his riuall, appointed certaine ruffians and fencers to watch her house. But vpon a certaine time about midnight, Manuel the Despot (his yoonger brother) seeking after him, chanced to passe that way where these watchmen lay: who seeing him hasten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and supposing him to haue been the man they looked for, the gentlewomans best beloued, set vpon him, and so wounded him that he fell downe for dead from his horse: but being by and by after known by others comming in, he was taken vp, and so halfe dead carried vnto the court. Which outrage in the morning being knowne vnto the emperour, cast him into a great heauinesse, as beholding not the time present onely, but wisely considering what was like to ensue in the time to come also. But Manuel the Despot being dead of the wounds there receiued, and the report therof brought vnto Michael the yoong emperour his father, then lying at THESSALONICA, strooke him to the heart with ſo great a griefe, that falling ſicke with the conceit thereof, hee ſhortly after died.

Andronicus the vnſtaied youth neuertheleſſe holding on his wconted courſe, with a ſecret purpoſe to haue fled, became thereby ſtill more and more ſuſpitious vnto his aged grandfather, not a little carefull vnto what end thoſe his violent paſsions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgiannes (a man of great credit and authorie in the court, in whom as in a reconciled enemie he had moſt vnaduiſedly repoſed too much truſt) to inſinuat himſelfe into the youthfull princes acquaintance and fauour; that ſo ſounding him, and his ſecret deſignes, he ſhould not poſsibly be able without his knowledge to ſtep aſide; which of all things the old emperour feared moſt, as the beginning of greater troubles.. This Syrgiannes being a man of great place, and of a ſubtill wit, was ſometime himſelfe ſuſpected of aſpiring; and therefore as vpon the miſpriſion of treaſon, was by the old emperor impriſoned: but afterwards by him again inlarged and receiued into fauour, was now put in truſt warily to obſerue the doings of the yoong prince. But he not vnmindfull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the ſtate, either to aſpire vnto the empire himſelfe, or at leaſtwiſe to ſome good part thereof; thought now a fit occaſion to be miniſtred vnto him for him to worke vpon, both for the one and the other, by ſetting the old emperour, and his ambitious nephew together by the eares: which opportunitie he not minding to let ſlip, taking the yoong prince one day aſide, diſcouered vnto him all his grandfathers deuiſe in briefe, as followeth:

Syrgiannes his craftie ſeditious ſpeech vnto yoong Andronicus.

Your grandfather noble prince (ſaid he) hath ſet me as a watch ouer your actions, or more truely to ſay, as a blood-hound, to ſeeke after not your doings onely, but if it were poſsible euen after your moſt ſecret thoughts alſo: and ſo whileſt he malicioufly preparеth for you ſnares and fetters, you not aware thereof, fooliſhly follow your ſhallow and childiſh conceits. For what ſhall it auaile you ſecretly to flie away? whereas (if the beſt chance) yet muſt you (as the common ſaying is) put your feet vnder another mans table, and liue of his charge; if it fall not out worſe, that you be ſlaine or made away by them you flie vnto for reliefe, or elſe fall into the ſnares by your grandfather laid for you. But if ſo be that caſting behind you theſe your fond deuiſes you will hearken vnto my counſell, I will ſhew you a readie way how you ſhall in ſhort time and without any danger, aſpire vnto the imperiall ſeat and dignitie; the onely way whereunto is this, if you leauing the citie of CONSTANTTNOPLE ſhall flie out into the cities and prouinces of THRACIA. For ſeeing men are moſt commonly by nature deſirous of change, and the miſerable Thracians are with often exactions grieuouſly vexed; if you ſhall but once proclaime a redreſſe of their grieuances, with immunitie for euer, they will all with one accord follow you whether ſoeuer you will, your grandfathers long and heauie yoke being caſt off, as if it were Siſiphus his heauie ſtone, which they had long rolled and neuer the neere. If you like of this aduiſe, I will be vnto you both the authour and the leader of this exploit, and will eaſily bring to good effect the whole matter: ſo that you againe on the other ſide promiſe vnto me vpon your faith, to reward this my trauell according to my deſert therein. But what rewards ſhall theſe be? Honourable preferments, large poſſeſſions, great reuenues, the firſt place in your fauour, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my conſent and knowledge. For you ſee how willingly I make my ſelfe partaker of your calamitie, and companion of your dangers, no neceſsitie enforcing me thereunto; forgetting euen my verie faith, in compariſon of the loue and zeale I beare towards you, wherein if any miſhap ſhall by the mutabilitie of fortune betide me, I haue ſet downe my ſelfe with patience to indure it. All which conſidered, you need not to grudge to yeeld vnto my requeſts, if you tender your owne ſafetie. And for as much as the ſhortneſſe of the time will ſuffer no long conſultations, and that delay bringeth extreame danger; let vs without longer ſtay impart the matter vnto ſuch others, as for the hatred of the emperour are like to keepe our counſell, and may yet much further our deſignes.

The yoong prince mooued with this ſpeech, as if it had beene with a charme, eaſily gtaunted to his deſire, confirming the ſame by his oath conceiued in writing: at which time were preſent ſuch as were eſpecially to be acquainted with the plot of the conſpiracie, namely Iohn Catacuzene, and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honour, and the old emperours antient ſuppoſed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himſelfe) and Alexius Apocaucus the third (not of like honour with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a moſt ſubtile and deepe wit:) who all vnderſtanding the matter, ſhewed themſelues not as miniſters, but as ringleaders and captaines of the intended rebellion. This conspiracie with most solemne oaths and promises on euerie part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter: and to begin withall, Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus, by corrupting diuers of the great and most gratious courtiers, procured to themselues the gouernment of such cities and prouinces in THRACIA, as they thought fittest for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes hauing the gouernment of the sea coast, and the inland countrey euen from the sea side vnto the top of mount RHODOPE; and Catacuzenus the gouernment of the countrey about ORESTIAS. In all which places they mustred souldiors, prouided armour, entertaining also strangers, and other vagrant and masterlesse men, as for some great war: besides that, in the cities for the gouernment thereof, they placed their most trustie friends, remooving such others as they had in suspect. All which they coloured by rumours falsly raised, one while of the comming of the Europian Tartars from DANVBIVS; and another while by the comming of the Turks out of ASIA: against whose inuasions these preparations were giuen out to be made, for auoiding of suspition; and the traitours for their prouident care highly commended euen by the emperour himselfe, against whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably dissembled, oftentimes withall certifying the yong prince what he had done, and what was likewise of him to be performed.

But the old emperour, seeing his youthfull nephew not to hearken to his graue aduise, but still to proceed in his dissolute kind of life; was about solemnly to haue reproued him before the Patriarch and some others of the chiefe nobilitie: if happily such open reproofe might haue wrought in him some change of manners; if not, then to haue committed him to prison: and like enough he was to haue so done, had he not bene otherwise persuaded by Theodorus Metochita (who of all others was able to do most with him) by reason of the libertie of the time; for then it was vpon the point of Shrouetide, when as the people distempered with excesse of meate and drinke, were of all other times most fit, vpon any light occasion, to be drawne into a tumult or vprore: for feare whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrouetide past, and a good part of Lent also, the old emperour seeing no amendment in his nephew, calling vnto him Gerasimus the patriarch, & the rest of the reuerend bishops thē present in the citie, sent for his nephew, openly before them all to chide him, and to schoole him for his disordered life, but especially for his purposed flight; that ashamed of such open reproofe before such reuerend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at least wise of all men be thought justly punished for the same, if he should still proceed therin. So the young prince being sent for, came accompanied with a number of his fauourits and followers, most of them being secretly armed, and he himselfe not altogether vnprouided: for it was agreed amongst them, that if the emperour should vse gentle and fatherly admonition towards him, that then they should keepe themselues quiet, without any shew of insolencie or discontentment; but if he should in anger reproue him, or threaten to punish him, then vpon a signe giuen, forcibly with their swords drawne, to breake in vpon him and to kill him in the imperiall seat, and without more ado to place young Andronicus his nephew in his steed. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next vnto his aged grandfather, his desperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuously blamed and reproued for his former follies and euill course of life; yet with such moderation and grauitie, as that all seemed (as it did) to come of a most fatherly care and regard: so that at that time no such outrage was committed, as was by diuers his followers wished, but the assemblie quietly dismissed, and a solemne oath taken on both sides: of the grandfather, That he should not appoint any other to succeed him in the empire but his nephew; and of the yong prince, That he should neuer go about or attempt any thing, to the shortening or hurt of his grandfathers life or empire. But the conspirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted & fumed at him, as if he had broken his faith and oath before giuen them, saying, What greater wrong couldest thou do to vs, than being by vs made strong and become dreadfull vnto thine enemies, to dispose of thine affaires at thy pleasure to thine owne safetie, and to leaue vs thy most faithfull friends and seruants in the diuels mouth to be deuoured? For now they both doubted, and feared, least their conspiracie was discouered. With which speeches he both discouraged, and ashamed, sent for Theodorus Metochita his grandfathers chiefe counseller, requesting him to deale with his grandfather, for the pardoning of all his followers, as he had done for himselfe: of which motion he disliking, told him, That he was to giue God thanks that he had himself escaped so great a danger, and to him also, as a meane for the safegard of his life; although he entreated not for such traiterous traiterous persons; with whom, if he were well aduised, he would haue nothing to do, either think that they would euer be faithfull vnto him, that respecting neither God nor man, had so foulbroken their faith before giuen vnto the emperour his grandfather. With which vnexspected answer of so great and graue a counsellor, the prince not a little troubled and withall discontented, stood a while as in a muse all silent, reasoning as it were with his owne passions: but afterwards commanding him without further reply to depart, and the old companions of his follies resorting vnto him, he by their persuasion entertained againe his former disloiall thoughts and designements: which his grandfather vehemently suspecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would, as if it had beene by inspiration, oftentimes in his heauinesse say vnto them that were about him, In our time is lost the maiestie of our empire, and the deuotion of the Church. Yet to preuent the worst, he thought it good betime to lay hands vpon his suspected nephew, and so to detaine him in safe keeping: acquainting none therewith but Gerasimus the Patriarch and his ghostly father, who straightway acquainted the prince therewith, and was the cause that he hastened his flight, flying himselfe before. For he now certainly vnderstanding the danger he was in, the night before he should haue beene apprehended, with all the rest of the conspirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the citie, by the gate called GYROLIMNIA, which gate (all the rest being shut) was still at his command, for that he commonly vsed thereby at his pleasure very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to do; but the next day after came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus camp, who then both lay with a great power at HADRIANOPLE, expecting his comming. The old emperour, before the rising of the sunne, aduertised of the flight of his nephew, the same day commanded him to be proclaimed traitor, & proscribed, with all his conspirators, & whosoeuer els should take his part. And for the more suretie, euery man in the citie was sworne to be loyall and faithfull vnto the old emperour, and enemies vnto his nephew and his adherents. But he on the other side, proclaiming libertie and immunitie abroad in all the cities and villages in THRACIA, so woon the hearts of the countrey people in generall, that they resorted vnto him from all places in great numbers, ready armed to doe whatsoeuer he should command them. And to begin withall, they first laid hands vpon the collectors of the emperours monie, then abroad in the countrey, whom they foully intreated, taking from them their money. After that, and yet seuen daies not expired, almost an incredible number of horsmen, footmen, archers, and others, departed from HADRIANOPLE towards CONSTANTINOPLE, vnder the leading of Syrgiannes, in good hope at their first comming to take the citie, being at discord in it selfe; and most part of the meaner sort, in hope of gaine, fauouring their rebellious proceedings, such as the seditious find in such rebellious tumults. So hauing marched foure daies, they came and encamped at SELYBRIA: but as they were about to haue gone on farther, the old emperour doubting least the citizens, seeing so great an armie before the citie, should therein raise some tumult or stirre, to the endangering thereof; thought good before to send embassadours vnto his nephew, to proue if happily these so dangerous troubles, might by their meanes in some good sort be appeased. The chiefe of these embassadours was one Theoleptus bishop of PHILADELPHIA, a man no lesse famous for his vertue than his wisdome, and yet for both of all men honored; and with them also was sent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all others most fit to appease her sonne, & to persuade him not to approch the citie, for that thereof might ensue much bloudshed, and the destruction of the citie, or at least wise the vtter vndoing of manie; whereof if he should be the authour, how could he euer after liue in conscience quiet, but that the torment thereof would follow him euen into his graue; and therefore to request him to retire a little, and so to come to talke, and to demaund what he pleased. Syrgiannes moued as well with the presence of the reuered bishop, as with the prayers of his mother, retired to the young prince, which then lay about ORESTIAS; whither the emperous embassadours came also: with whom (after long debating) it was agreed, That the young prince should in all royall manner, hold all THRACIA, from CHRISTOPOLIS vnto RHEGIVM and the suburbs of CONSTANTINOPLE: and withall, That such lands as the young prince had already giuen vnto his followers in MACEDONIA should still remaine vnto them (which were such as yearely yeelded vnto them a right great reuenue:) And that the old emperour should hold vnto himselfe the imperiall citie, with all the cities and prouinces of MACEDONIA beyond CHRISTOPOLIS: and that he alone should haue the honour to heare the embassadours sent from forraine princes, and to giue them their dispatch; for that the young prince tooke no pleasure in those waightie affaires; as by nature more delighted in hauking, hunting, and his other youthfull pleasures. Vpon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the yoong prince, than of the old emperour; who although he was desirous otherwise to haue redressed so great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to whatsoeuer his nephew would request. Thus was the Greeke empire in EUROPE (as then all or the most part inclosed within the bounds of MACE-DONIA and THRACIA) now deuided betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: ASIA in the meane time (wherin the Greek emperors their predecessors sometime held great kingdomes) being left for a prey to the greedie Turks. Othoman on the one side euen in the heat of these troubles laying the foundation of his empire in PHRIGIA and BYTHINIA: and the other the Turks princes, the successors of Sultan Aladin, encroching as fast vpon the emperors territories and countries on this side the riuer MEANDER. And not so contented, at the same time also built great store of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Christian marchants trading to CONSTANTINO-PLE, and spoiled the coasts of MACEDONIA and THRACIA, and the Ilands of the ÆGEAN, and amongst others tooke the famous Iland of the RHODES: which they held not long, before they were againe driuen out of the same by the knights Hospitalers, vnder the conduct of William Willaret, aided by the Genowaies, and the king of SICILIA, which they from that time held (to the great honour and benefit of the Christian commonweale) by the space of 214 years, knowne by the name of The knights of the RHODES: vntill that in the memorie of our fathers it was (I say no more, but grieue therefore) shamefully lost vnto the Turke, for want of relief; neuer place being more honourably defended, as in the processe of this historie shall appeare: euer since which time, those honourable men (the flower of chiualrie) haue seated themselues in the Isle of MALTA; which they to their immortall glorie, and the comfort of all good Christians, haue most notably defended against the mightie Sultan Solyman, and all the furie of the Turks, as shall be also in due place declared.

The Greeke empire in Europe deuided.

Whilest the Greekes are at discord among themselues, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turks empire, and the other Turks encroch vpon them also.

The Iland of the Rhodes was by the knights Hospitalers recouered from the Turks in the yeare 1308.

But to returne againe vnto the troubled estate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the great captaine, and author of all the aforesaid stirs betwixt the old emperour and his nephew, had euen from the beginning thought, as a companion to the yoong prince, to haue ruled all with him at his pleasure, and that nothing either great or little should haue been done without him: but seeing it now to fall out far otherwise than he had before expected, and the prince to be wholly ruled by Cataculenus, and himselfe of all others least regarded, and not so much as called to any counsell; inwardly tormented with greefe and enuie, he began secretly with himselfe to deuise how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull prince, which vnmindfull of his former promises, had so vnthankfully cast him off. Wherefore he resolued againe to reuolt vnto the old emperour, not doubting but so in short time to ouerthrow all the counsels and deuices of the yoong prince, together with his state also, by himselfe before raised. For hee as a worldly wise man, excluding God from his counsels, had such an opinion of himselfe, that which way soeuer he went, thither must all things follow also. Wherfore by one of his most trustie friends, he secretly made the old emperour acquainted with his purposed reuolt, and how all things stood: for the greater credit thereof, alleadging, That he could not abide the sight of him that sought to corrupt his wife, meaning the yoong prince. This newes from Syrgiannes was vnto the old emperour most welcome: for it grieued him, as an old man of a great spirit, to see himselfe so contemned and deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old seruitours, of all sorts, by him spoiled of their lands and possessions in MACEDONIA and THRACIA. So a solemne oath in secret passed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer stay secretly fled to CONSTANTINOPLE:
which there bruited abroad, rejoyced many, now well hoping the whole gouernment would againe come vnto the old emperour, and that so they should againe recouer their possessions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not seeing it so good, all this hope was but vaine, as ere long it appeared: For the yong prince, who of long knew how much he was beloued of the Constantinopolitans, and by them secretly sent for, taking occasion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the citie: & being come within sight therof, encamped, laying ambushes vpon euery way & passage thereabout, for to haue intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at PERINTHUS, and the third night after, with three hundred select souldiors, deceiuing them that lay in wait for him, as if they had beene all asleepe, before the rising of the Sunne came to CONSTANTINOPLE: and if the old emperour would haue giuen him leaue, had suddainly charged them that lay in wait for him, before they were aware of his comming. But as ſoone as it was day, the prince hearing of the eſcape of Syrgiannes, and no ſuch tumult in the citie as he had expected, preſently without more adoe retired with his armie the ſame way he came, backe againe into THRACIA.

By and by after, Conſtantine the Deſpot was by the old emperour his brother ſent by ſea to THESSALONICA, to take vpon him the gouernment of MACEDONIA, and by the way to apprehend Xene the empreſſe, the yong princes mother; & after with all the power he could make to inuade the yong prince in THRACIA: that ſo ſetting vpon him on the one ſide out of MACEDONIA, and Syrgiannes with the Turks (for the emperour in this ciuile diſcord was glad to vſe their helpe alſo) and the Bythinian ſouldiours on the other, they might ſo ſhut him vp betwixt them and take him. According to which reſolution, the Deſpot comming to THESSALONICA there tooke the empreſſe, whom with all her familie he thruſt into a gallie, and ſo ſent her to CONSTANTINOPLE, where ſhe was in the palace kept cloſe, as too much fauouring the proceedings of the prince. And afterward raiſing all the power he could in MACEDONIA, inuaded the prince in THRACIA, breaking by force through the wall of CHRISTOPOLIS.

The yoong prince ſeeing himſelfe by this meanes, now like to be driuen to a great ſtrait, ſent Synadenus with his Thracian armie, to defend the frontiers of his empire towards CONSTANTINOPLE, againſt Syrgiannes with his Turkes and Bythinians: in hope himſelfe by many ſubtle deuiſes and ſlights, to be able to encounter his vncle the Deſpot. And firſt he cauſed diuers edicts and proſcriptions to be written in haſt, wherein great rewards and preferments were with great ſolemnitie of words promiſed to whomſoeuer could bring vnto him the Deſpot either quicke or dead: which were of purpoſe giuen vnto the country people paſſing too and fro, to be diſperſed abroad in the high waies, and about in the country neere vnto the Deſpots campe. And after that, he cauſed the death of the emperour his grandfather to be euerie where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Conſtantinopolitans in a tumult ſlaine: which the deuiſers thereof, in euery place reported. Yea ſome there were, that ſwore they were themſelues preſent at his wofull death, and ſaw it with their eies: otherſome, more certainely to perſuade the matter, ſhewed long white goats haires, or ſuch like gathered out of white wooll, as if they had beene by the furious people pluckt from the old emperours head or beard, at ſuch time as hee was ſlaine. Which things being commonly reported in euery towne and village, but eſpecially in the Deſpots campe, wonderfully filled mens heads with diuers ſtrange and doubtfull thoughts: then diuers alſo of the diſperſed edicts being found, and brought vnto the Deſpot, ſtrucke him (and not without cauſe) into a great feare; inſomuch, that by the perſuaſion of his beſt friends, he without longer ſtay retired in haſt to THESSALONICA. Whither ſhortly after came a gallie from CONSTANTINOPLE, with ſecret letters from the emperour to the Deſpot, for the apprehenſion of fiue and twentie of the cheefe cittizens, vehemently ſuſpected for the ſtirring vp of the people to rebellion, and ſo to haue deliuered the citie vnto the prince: all whom the Deſpot ſhould haue ſent bound in that gallie to CONSTANTINOPLE: but they in good time perceiuing the danger they were in, ſecretly ſtirring vp the people, and by and by after ringing out the bels (the ſignall appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a very ſhort time raiſed a woonderfull tumult in the citie; inſomuch, that all the cittizens were vp in armes, who running headlong vnto the houſe of the Deſpot, found not him (for he forewarned of their comming, was fled into the caſtle) but ſlew all they met of his, or els robbing them, caſt them in priſon. As for the Deſpots houſe, they tooke what they found therein, and afterwards pulled it downe to the ground. Then comming to the caſtle, they fired the gates: which the Deſpot ſeeing, and not able to defend the place, tooke horſe and fled vnto a monaſterie not far off, where being taken by them that purſued him, he full ſore againſt his will, for the ſafegard of his life, tooke vpon him the habit of a monke: neuertheleſſe, he was fro thence caried priſoner to the yong prince his nephew, who ſhewed himſelfe much more courteous vnto him, than all the reſt of his nobilitie & waiters: for they, as if they would haue eaten him vp, were euen foorthwith readie to haue torne him in peeces, had not the prince embracing him in his armes, ſaued his life. Yet the next day after, by the perſuaſion of his counſell he ſent him to DIDIMOTICHVM; where hee was caſt into a moſt loathſome priſon, being verie deepe and ſtraight, in manner of a well, no bodie to attend vpon him but one boy, where he lay in miſerable darkeneſſe and ſtinke; they which drew vp his ordure from him and the boy, whether by chance or of purpoſe, pouring it oftentimes vpon his head. Where after he had lien a great while in moſt extreame miſerie, wiſhing to die and could not; he was at length by the princes commandement (entreated thereunto by certaine religious men) remoued into a more easie prison, where we will for euer leaue him.

Andronicus the old emperor seeketh for counsell of the Psalter, as of an heauenly Oracle, and so seeketh to make peace with his nephew. Psal. 68. vers. 14.

Things falling out crosse with the old emperor, and although they were neuer so well deuised, still sorting out vnto the worst, he became verie pensiue and doubtfull what to do. So it fortuned, that one day in his melancholy mood hauing a Psalter in his hand, to resolue his doubtfull mind, he opened the same (as if it were) of that heauenly Oracle to aske counsell: where in the first verse that he light vpō was, Dum cœlestis dissociat reges, niue conspergentur in Selmon: When the Almightie scattered kings (for their sakes) then were they as white as snow in Selmon. Which he applying to himselfe, as if all those troubles, and whatsoeuer else had happened in them, proceeded from the will of God, although for causes to him vnknowne: hee by and by sought to reconcile himselfe vnto his nephew; contrarie to the mind of Syrgiannes, desiring nothing but trouble. For (as we haue before said) the yoong prince although he was desirous of the power and libertie of an emperor, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof vnto his grandfather: & had he not oftentimes and earnestly been egged forward by his companions to affect the whole empire, happily could and would haue contented himselfe with the former pacification: for being now sent for, he came first to RHEGIVM, and there visited his mother (now set at libertie, and sent thither for the furtherance of the desired pacification) where he with her and by her counsell did whatsoeuer was there done. So within a few daies the matter was brought into so good tearms, that an attonement was made, and he himselfe went and met the emperour his grandfather before the gates of the citie: the old emperour sitting then vpon his horse, and the prince lighting from his, a good furlong before he came at him: and although his grandfather was verie vnwilling and forbad him so to doe, yet he came to him on foot, and kissed his hand and foot as he sat on horsebacke; and afterward taking horse, embraced him, and there kissed one another, to the great contentment of the beholders: and so hauing talked some few words, departed, the old man into the citie, and the yoong man into his campe, which then lay neere vnto PEGA: where staying certaine daies, he came diuers times into CONSTANTINOPLE, and so went out againe; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her sonne, lay at PEGA.

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the emperour and his nephew, walked vp and downe sicke in mind, with a heauie countenance, especially for that in time of peace his busie head stood the commonweale in no stead. Wherefore in all meetings & assemblies, he willingly conuersed with them which most disliked of the present state, and spake hardly as well of the emperour as of his nephew, wronged as he thought by them both; whereas in the time of their greatest distresse hee had (as hee said) stood them in good stead. But seeing one Asanes Andronicus walking melancholie vp and downe, as a man with heauinesse oppressed; who hauing done good seruice for the yoong prince, and not of him regarded, had fled vnto the old emperour, and there found no such thing as he expected for the ease of his greefe, although he were a man honourably borne, and otherwaies indued with many good parts: with him Syrgiannes acquainted himselfe, as grieued with the like greefe that he himselfe was: with whom as with his friend, without any dissimulation he plainly discoursed of all such things as his greefe desired. But Asanes handling him with great wisedome, did himselfe with like words speake hardly both of the emperour and his nephew; but yet curiously noted whatsoeuer Syrgiannes said, for he had before hated him for his ambition, and as then tooke it in displeasure, that he was enemie vnto Catacuzenus, his sonne in law, who was all in all with the yoong prince, and did oftentimes comfort him. But the song being throughly set, Asanes came secretly vnto the old emperour, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except hee betime laid hold vpon Syrgiannes, affecting the empire, he should in short time be by him brought to his end. Whereupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapped fast in prison: whose house, with all his wealth, the common people tooke the spoile of; and not contented to haue rased it downe to the ground, conuerted the site thereof, together with the pleasant vineyards adioyning vnto the same, into a place to feed goats and sheepe in: a worthie reward for his manifold trecheries. The yoong prince shortly after going to CONSTANTINOPLE, was there crowned emperor, as fellow in the empire with his grandfather: vnto which solemnitie in the great temple of Sophia, both the emperors riding, it fortuned the old emperour by the stumbling of his horse to be ouerthrowne, and foulely beraied in the myre, the streets being then very foule by reason of the great raine but a little before fallen:

fallen: which many tooke as ominous, and portending the euill fortune which shortly after befell him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the yoong prince was a hunting in CHERSONESUS, seuentie Turkes, aduenturers, were by force of weather driuen on shore: who before they would yeeld themselues prisoners, made a great fight with the emperours men, and slew diuers of them; in which conflict the yong emperour himselfe was wounded in the foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged grandfather, held not himselfe long so contented, but after the manner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his aspiring fauorits) longed to haue the whole gouernment vnto himselfe, which hardly brooketh any partener: and therefore wearie to see his grandfather liue so long, resolued no longer to expect his naturall death, (although it could not by course of nature be farre off) but by one deuice or other to thrust him from the gouernment; or if that might not bee wrought, at once to dispatch him both of life and state together. And the surer to lay the plot whereon so foule and horrible a treason was to be built, he by the counsell of his mother & others, by whom he was most directed, sent for Michael the prince of BULGARIA, his brother in law (though before to him vnknowne, as was his wife his sister also) to make with him a firme league, to the intent by him to prouide, That if the prince of SERVIA (who had but lately married the old emperours nigh kinswoman, and so to him much deuoted) should take part with him, he should by the Bulgarian his neighbour bee intangled. Who so sent for, with his wife, the old emperours daughter, came to DIDYMOTICHUM, where they were many dayes most honourably entertained both by the yoong emperour and his mother: for why, this meeting plotted vpon great treason, was finely coloured, with the desire the yong emperour had to see his sister and her husband, as before vnto him vnknowne; and the empresse, her daughter, whom she had not seene in three and twentie yeares before. But the secret conclusion betwixt them was, That the Bulgarian prince should to the vttermost of his power aid the yong emperour against his grandfather, and he likewise him against the Seruian, as he should haue need: and further, That if his grandfather, being deposed, he should recouer the whole empire, then to giue him a great sum of mony, with certaine speciall cities and prouinces confining vpon him, as in dowrie vnto his kind brother in law, and companion in his labours. So Michael the Bulgarian prince honourably entertained by the yoong emperour and the old empresse his mother in law, loaded with rewards, and promises of greater returned home into his countrey.

A treacherous meeting.

This matter thus dispatched, the yoong emperour therewith incouraged, and knowing also the Constantinopolitans, besides the other cities of THRACIA, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings; by whom also he was secretly inuited to hasten his comming thither (as wearie of the long life and lazinesse, as he tearmed it, of his grandfather) thought it best cunningly to go about the matter; that so his grandfather being with as little stur as might be deposed, he himselfe might alone enjoy the empire. But needing money for the effecting of so great matters, he by force tooke all the money from the collectours, whom the old emperour had sent into THRACIA for the taking vp of money there; telling them, that he was an emperour also, and in need of money, and that the common charge was likewise by the common purse to be discharged. After that he tooke his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE, pretending that vpon speciall causes hee had occasion to send embassadours vnto the Sultan of ÆGYPT: for the transporting of whom he was there to take order for the setting forth of a great ship, and other things necessarie for the journey. Neither went he slenderly appointed, but with a great power; and the cities of THRACIA before well assured vnto him, such as he suspected being thrust out of office, and others more assured vnto him placed in their steads. But whilst he thus bestirreth himselfe, one of those that were most inwward with him, detesting so foule a treason, secretly fled from him vnto his grandfather, from point to point discouering vnto him all the intended treacheries; and withall, how that his nephew had determined to depose him from his empire, or otherwise to bereaue him of his life if he should stand vpon his guard: but if in the attempt hee should find easie successe, then to spare his life; and depriuing him of the imperiall dignitie, to thrust him as a monke into a monasterie: and therefore aduised him to beware how he suffered him after his woonted manner to come into the citie, for feare of a generall reuolt, but rather by force to keepe him out. Which the emperor hearing, and comparing with other things which he had heard of others, yet sounding in his eares, deeming it to be true, stood vp, and in the anguish guish of his soule thus complained vnto God : Reuenge my quarrell, ô God, vpon them that do me wrong, & let them be ashamed that rise vp against me: and preserue thou vnto me the imperiall power, which by thee giuen vnto me, he commeth to take from me, whom I my selfe begot and aduanced. After, he began to consider what course to take for the assurance of himselfe and his state in so great a danger. And first he sent vnto his nephew (come halfe way) to forbid him from entring the citie, and to tell him, That it was a great folly for him, being so manifest a traitour, both vnto his grandfather and the state, to thinke his traiterous purposes to bee vnknowne vnto the world: and beside, in way of reproofe to rehearse vnto him, how many occasions he had giuen for the breaking of the league with his grandfather: first, in taking away the money from the collectors, whereof the state neuer stood in more need, by reason of the diuision of the empire, which required double charge; then, in that hee had in the citie euerie where displaced such gouernours and magistrats as his grandfather had sent thither, and placed others at his pleasure; with many other like facts, declaring his treacherous aspiring mind, for which he was not without cause by his grandfather forbidden to enter the citie. After that, the old emperour by secret letters craued aid of Crales prince of SERVIA, and Demetrius the Despot his sonne, who was then gouernour of THESSALONICA and the countries adjoyning; commaunding him, with Andronicus and Michael his nephews (gouernours of MACEDONIA) with all the forces they were able to raise, and such aid as should be sent vnto them out of SERVIA, with all speed to joyne together and to go against the yoong emperour. But these letters thus written vnto the prince of SERVIA, the Despot, and others, (as is before said) were for the most part intercepted, by such as the yoong emperour had for that purpose placed vpon the straits of CHRISTOPOLIS, and the other passages; especially such as were written in paper, yet some others in fine white linnen cloth, and secretly sowed in the garments of such as carried them, escaped for all their strait search, and so were deliuered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in CONSTANTINOPLE, but that the yoong emperour was by one or other aduertised thereof: whereas the old emperour on the other side, vnderstood nothing what his nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their owne accord enclined vnto him, some openly both bodie and soule (as they say) and such as could not be with him in person, yet in mind and good will were euen present with him; and that not onely the common sort of the citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE, but the chiefe Senatours, the great courtiers, yea and many other of the emperours neerest kinsmen also: who curiously obseruing whatsoeuer was done in the citie, foorthwith certified him thereof. Amongst whom was also Theodorus the marques, one of the old emperors owne sons: who many years before by the empresse his mother sent into ITALY, and there honorably married, was by his prodigall course of life there, growne far in debt; so that leauing his wife and children behind him, he was glad after the decease of his mother, to flie vnto his father at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there now liued; who beside that he most honourably maintained him in the court, and bestowed many great things vpon him, paid also all his debts, which were verie great. All which fatherly kindnesse he forgetting, went about most Iudas like to haue betraied his aged father. For he also dreaming after the empire, and for many causes (but especially for that hee was in mind, religion, manners, and habit, become a Latine) by him rejected, thought he could not do him a greater dispite than by reuolting vnto the young emperour: so that the neerer he was in blood, the more he was his fathers vnnaturall enemie. Shortly after, Demetrius the Despot hauing receiued the emperours letters at THESSALONICA, called vnto him Andronicus and Michael his nephews, the gouernours of MACEDONIA; with whom joyning all his forces, and dayly expecting more aid out of SERVIA, he first spoiled the yoong emperors friends and fauourits in MACEDONIA, giuing the spoile of them in all the cities and townes of MACEDONIA vnto their souldiours, who made hauocke of whatsoeuer they light vpon: and whosoeuer seemed any way to withstand them or dislike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they confiscated, and draue the men themselues into exile. Neither was the yoong emperour Andronicus in the meane time idle, but secretly sent out his edicts into all parts of the empire, yea into the verie cities of CONSTANTINOPLE and THESSALONICA, and ouer all MACEDONIA: whereby he proclaimed vnto the people in generall, a releasement of them from all tributs, impositions, and payments; and frankly promised vnto the souldiours and men of war, the augmenting of their pensions and pay: which were no sooner bruited, but that most men were therewith mooued, both in word and deed to fauour his proceedings, doing what they

they could to further the ſame, and by ſecret letters inuiting him to haſten his comming into the citie: who thereupon comming to RHEGIVM, by his embaſſadours ſent from thence, requeſted the old emperour, Either to giue him leaue according to the league betwixt them, to come into the citie, or elſe to ſend him certaine of the chiefe of the nobilitie and cleargie, with ſome of the better and more vnderſtanding ſort of the Burgers and citizens alſo, vnto whom he might frankly ſpeake his mind: for them faithfully to deliuer the ſame againe vnto the emperor his grandfather, and the people. Which requeſts the old emperour perceiuing to be full of deceit and trecherie, for a good ſpace anſwered thereunto nothing at all, but ſtood all ſilent, as doubting which to graunt: for, to ſuffer his nephew to come into the citie, he ſaw was dangerous, the cittizens (as he well knew) being for the moſt part enclined to reuolt vnto him ſo ſoon as they ſhould once ſee him within the gates; and to ſend any forth vnto him, as he deſired, might be (as he feared) an occaſion of ſome tumult to be after raiſed in the citie: for he knew that his nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and ſecretly with great gifts and large promiſes, firſt to gaine them, and by them the reſt of the citizens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the eaſier, and ſent forth vnto him two of the moſt noble Senators, two of the moſt reuerend biſhops, two other graue prelates, and foure of the cheefe burgeſſes of the citie: vnto whom, at their comming vnto him, hee in the open hearing of all men deliuered this premeditated and craftie ſpeech:

The yong emperour ſendeth embaſſadours vnto his grandfather.

The ſpeech of the yong emperor vnto his grandfathers embaſſadors.

It is not vnknowne vnto the world, you my ſubjects to haue alwaies been vnto me more deare than I haue been vnto my ſelfe: and how that I haue not vpon any ambitious conceit, or deſire of the ſole gouernment, againſt my grandfathers good will, gone out. For you ſee how that I neither ſpare mine owne life, or attend my pleaſure, for the care I haue of you: I come not vnto you compaſſed about with a guard of armed men, as is the manner not of kings only, for the enuie of their high place; but of others alſo of farre meaner calling, whom diſaſter fortune, baniſhed from their parents and kinred, hath enforced to wander here and there, with death alwayes before their eyes. Let any man tell me how I came by theſe wounds which I yet beare in my bodie, but in fight with the enemies of my countrey which paſſe ouer out of ASIA into THRACIA; or els dwelling neere vnto ISTER, doe with their incurſions from thence miſerably waſt that ſide of THRACIA which is next vnto them? For I (to tell you the very truth) ſeeing the old emperour by reaſon of his great yeares to become ſlothfull and blockiſh, and not poſſibly to be awaked out of his drowſie ſleepe, neither any whit to greeue, when as the poore Chriſtians his ſubjects were both by day and night, ſome as ſacrifices ſlaine by the barbarous enemies, ſome carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie, and the reſt poore and naked to be driuen out of their houſes and cities; not to ſpeake in the meane time of the greater miſcheefes in ASIA, and how many cities haue beene there loſt through the old emperours ſlouth and negligence: when I ſaw theſe things (I ſay) ſtrucken with a piercing greefe, which my heart could not indure, I went out for two cauſes, Either by ſome kind of honourable death to end my greefe together with my life, or els to the vttermoſt of my power to ſtand my countrey in ſome ſtead. For by no meanes it can come to paſſe, but that a man, and he that hath of long time raigned, muſt at length become loathſome vnto his ſubjects, and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and firme: whereby it commeth to paſſe, as we ſee, that all worldly things ioy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force fortune to his deſire, and ſtriue to bind things vnto a certaine firme and conſtant courſe, he ſhall but loſe his labour, and in vaine ſtriue againſt nature. But whatſoeuer is contrary vnto nature, or exceedeth the juſt bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that cauſed the wiſe men to ſay, and to leaue vnto vs as rules: Not to dwell too long vpon any thing; and a meaſure to be the faireſt vertue. For you ſee how that my grandfather being grown to great years, and hauing raigned ſo long (I may almoſt ſay) as neuer did any but he, is become hatefull vnto all his people; and yet regardeth not either how to diſcharge himſelfe of ſo great a burthen, or how to releeue the declining ſtate of the empire, or ſo much as greeueth to ſee the ſucceſſours of the empire to die before him: for my father is dead without any fruit of the empire, except the bare title only; and others alſo neereſt to him of blood, and farre yoonger than he, are dead likewiſe: and happely I my ſelfe may die alſo before I ſhall receiue any profit thereof, For what can more eaſily happen, eſpecially vnto a man that ſhunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But ſome perhaps will ſuſpect me of ambition, for departing from the emperour my grandfather, and for refuſing to bee ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly denie, nor altogether confeſſe: for might I ſee the empire encreaſe, and the

bounds thereof enlarged, I could willingly content my selfe, and at my ease take my rest; cheering my selfe vp with such hope as doe they that beare with their cookes, making them to stay long for their dinner, in hope thereby to fare the better. But seeing the state of the empire daily to decline from euill to worse, and the miserable people carried away captiues, or slaine by their enemies euen at the gates and vnder the wals of the imperiall cittie: what deeme you mee then to thinke? For most men ease their present greefe, with the hope of future good, although the same be but vaine: but vnto mee is not left euen such vaine hope vnto my false comfort. And can you meruaile at the impotent affection of the Great Alexander of Macedon, greeued and displeased to see his father to heape victorie vpon victorie, and to cut off all the hope of his sonnes glorie, by leauing him so few occasions of war; and not thinke me (to whom you see the quite contrarie is chanced, and from whom not only the hope of the empire is cut off, for the wasting thereof, but euen the course of a quiet life) to fret and greeue thereat? Mooued herewith, and not able longer to endure it, at length I rise vp, and requested of the emperour my grandfather, but a thousand men at armes, promising him by the power of God with them to preserue the cities in Bythinia, and to driue his enemies farther off, before that hauing them, they should passe ouer the strait and besiege the imperiall citie of Constantinople: which so small a request he not onely denied me, but hath euer since taken me for his mortall enemie. But this and many other things els let passe: I haue now another request vnto him by you, which is, That he would giue me eight thousand duckats to content my souldiors withall, who now of long haue from place to place romed vp and downe with mee, following mine vncertaine fortune: which graunted, I will no more bee vnto my grandfather troublesome, but dismissing my forces, hold my selfe right well contented.

Hauing thus said, he rise out of his seat, and taking them apart one after another, courteously discourséd with them, & so filling them with great hopes, sent them away: who departing from him & comming into the citie, became as it were the open proclaimers of his praises, enflaming the people with a greater desire of him than before. Which the old emperour hearing, and perceiuing almost all his friends in the citie to be in heart reuolted from him; and withall fearing to be of them in some suddaine concourse slaine, was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet he thought it best before any such thing should happen, to proóue their minds, and to heare the counsell of the Patriarch, and Asanes, and the other bishops also: vnto whom being by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind as followeth:

The speech of the old emperor vnto the Patriarch and the rest of the bishops & nobilitie, concerning the young emperour his nephew.

Were I assured, that hauing deposed my selfe of the imperiall dignitie, I should my self liue in safetie, and see my people well gouerned; I would I should neuer be of the company of the faithfull, if I did not by much prefer a pleasant quiet contented life before an empire. For if a man would seek for the pleasure of the mind, what can be more pleasant, than to be disburdened of all cares, and free from such dangers as attend high estates? But if for my sinne and the sins of my people, as also for the sinne of mine ancestors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempest raging against vs, subuerteth our empire: and I yet but a youth, by the helpe of God reformed and quieted the state of the empire, greeuously troubled with discord in the Church, and the often inuasion of the enemie; and taught by long experience, know not now in so great a hurle and tempest which way to turne my selfe: how can I with safetie commit vnto my nephew so great a charge, who as yet is both an vnstayed youth, and so careless of his owne good as that he knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne priuat affaires? For giuing ouer his power vnto yoong vnskilfull men, and hauing flung away his imperiall possessions amongst them, hee himselfe liueth in penurie and want; neither regardeth any thing more than his dogs and kites, of whom hee keepeth few lesse than a thousand curres, and as many hawkes, and not much fewer men to looke vnto them. Wherefore vnto such a man, how may I safely commit either my life, or the administration of mine empire, by God committed vnto me? But I will neuer witting and willingly cast away either my subiects or my selfe. For my nephew I haue loued, not onely more than my wife and children, but (to say the truth) more than my selfe also; as you all know how tenderly I haue brought him vp, how carefully I haue instructed and aduised him, as purposing to haue left him the heire and successour both of my wisedome and mine empire, that so hee might the better please both God and man. But he, contemning my good counsell, hath spent whole nights in banqueting, and riot, and brothelhouses; wherein hee hath also slaine his owne brother: and to bee breefe, he hath risen and lifted vp his hand against me his grandfather, and a grandfather that had had of him so well deserued, attempting such a villanie as the Sunne neuer saw. Wherfore you ought also to hate and detest his wickednesse, and to rise vp to restraine his impudent disloyaltie, and by your ecclesiasticall censure to denounce him vnworthie of the empire and the communion of the faithfull, as one seperated from God, that so ashamed and corrected, he may louingly thither returne from whence he is shamefully departed, and againe be made heire both of mine empire and statednesse: For there is no man aliue whom I had rather haue promoted vnto the empire, so that he would heare my precepts, and obey my counsell. As for the conclusion he vsed in his former speech, it was altogether fained, craftie, and malicious: for you haue heard how many reproches he hath giuen me in all that speech, wherewith his conclusion agreeth not: but the more to stir vp the hearers thereof against me, did of purpose so conclude his speech.

Vpon this, most of the foresaid graue and learned bishops agreed that the young emperour should no more be named in the praiers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed himselfe: Howbeit the patriarch and some others secretly fauouring both him and his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore saying nothing thereunto, returned home vnto their owne houses. But meeting once or twise afterwards in the patriarch his house, they there conspired together against the old emperour; with whom also diuers of the nobilitie consented: and thereupon an oath was conceiued in writing, whereby they bound themselues, to continue constant in that their wicked resolution. Whereupon, about three dayes after, the patriarch causing the bels to be rung; and a great number of the vulgar people flocking together, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against all such as should in their publike praiers omit the name of the young emperour, or refuse to doe him all honour due vnto an emperour. Which thing not a little grieued the old emperour, as appeared by his speech, in saying, If the doctor of peace be so mad against vs, in hope of reward promised by my nephew, that casting off all shame and grauitie, he doubteth not to be the authour of sedition; who shall represse the rash attempts of the vulgar people against vs, if we respect but mans helpe? For the Patriarch so much as in him lieth is, I see, the murtherer of vs. So the bishops of the contrarie faction, moued with the notable impudencie of the patriarch, excommunicated him likewise, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authours of sedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the state: for which cause also he was by the Emperours commandement committed vnto safe keeping in the monasterie called MANGANIUM. But about two daies after, the young Emperour came to the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE, to know how his grandfather had accepted the messengers sent vnto him; earnestlie requesting that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the citie, to do his dutie to his grandfather. But neither he, neither his words were at all regarded, but was by such as stood vpon the wals himselfe with stones driuen away; who could not abide to heare him speake, but shamefully railed at him, saying all his talke to bee nothing els but deceit and fraud: and so for that time he retired a little from the wals. But night being come, certaine busie heads amongst the common people (& they not few) secretly meeting together, gaue him knowledge, That about midnight when as all the cittizens were asleepe, and the watchmen in securitie, he should come vnto the wals, where they would be readie with ropes to draw him vp vnto the top of the bulwarkes, which done, the matter (as they said) were as good as dispatched: for that they were persuaded, that the citizens so soone as they should once see him in the middest of the citie amongst them, would foorthwith all reuolt vnto him. So he according vnto this appointment, about midnight approching the wals, found there no such matter as he had well hoped, for the receiuing of him into the citie; but contrariwise, the watchmen carefully watching all alongst the wall, and calling one vnto another. Wherefore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus, his cheefe counsellors, leauing the South side of the citie, in a little boat rowed softly all along the wall that is towards the sea, if happely they might there find their friends, and so be receiued in: but there the watchmen also descrying them from the wals, and calling vnto them, but receiuing no answere, began to cast stones at them, and to make a noise: so that deceiued of their purpose, and out of hope, they were glad to get them farther off, and to depart as they came.

But the euill successe of this exploit was shortly after with his better fortune recompenced: for by and by after, secret letters were sent vnto him from THESSALONICA, requesting him with al speed to come thither, assuring him in the name of the bishop with diuers of the nobilitie, and the good liking of the people in generall, at his comming to open the gates of the citie vnto him: whereupon he leauing a great part of his armie with Synadenus, to keepe short the Constantinopolitanes, he himselfe with the rest of his power set forward towards THESSALONICA, where he in the habit of a plaine countrey man entred the citie vnsuspected: but being got within the gate, and there casting off that simple attire wherewith he had couered his rich and royall garments, and presently knowne to be the yong emperour, the people came flocking about him, and with many joyfull acclamations receiued him as their dread lord and soueraigne: yet some few, more fauouring the old emperor, fled into the castle, and there stood vpon their guard; which after they had for a space notably defended, was at length taken from them.

THESSALONICA thus yeelded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Asan Michael, the old emperors cheefe captaines, then lying with his armie not farre off, and not well trusting one another, fled; most of whose souldiors presently went ouer vnto the young emperour: who departing from THESSALONICA, came to SERRE, which by composition was deliuered vnto him also, but not the castle: for that was by Basilicus Nicephorus (the captaine thereof) still holden for the old emperour. This Basilicus was a man honourably descended, but of no great capacitie or wit, as the finer sort supposed, and therefore not of them much regarded or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old emperour for his plaine sinceritie, more than for any thing els, had made captaine of that castle and gouernour of the country thereabouts; which he yet still held, and in these most troublesome times shewed himselfe wiser than them all that had so thought of him: of whom some died in despaire, some fled, some were taken prisoners, and so suffered a thousand euils, the rest with the losse of their honour traiterously reuolting from the old emperour to the yong: whereas he alone, looking but euen forward vpon his allegeance, with his trust in God, so long as the old emperour liued opposed himselfe against these troubles, and stood fast for him, and was not to be moued with any faire promises or cruell threats of the yong aspiring emperour, whereof he lacked none. But hauing strongly fortefied the castle committed to his charge, there kept himselfe, vntill that hearing of the death of the old emperour, he then reconciling himselfe vnto the yong, as vnto his right soueraigne, deliuered vp vnto him the castle: who in reward of his fidelitie, gaue it him againe to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it from his grandfather: for wise men honour vertue euen in their enemies, as did king Philip in Demosthenes, when as he said, If any Athenian liuing in Athens, doth say that he preferreth me before his countrey, him verely would I buy with much money, but not thinke him worthie my friendship. But if any for his countries sake shall hate me, him will I impugne as a castle, a strong wall, or a bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue, and reckon the citie happie in hauing such a man. And so in few words to conclude a long discourse, the yong emperour in short time hauing romed through all MACEDONIA, and without resistance taken all the strong townes and cities therein, he there tooke also Demetrius the Despots wife and children, with all his treasure, as also the wiues of Andronicus and Asanes, and of all the Senators that followed them: after whom the great commaunders their husbands were also for the most part taken and cast in prison, some at THESSALONICA, some at DIDIMOTICHUM, some of the rest afterwards most miserably perishing in exile. Wherewith the old emperour discouraged, was about to haue sent his embassadours vnto his nephew for peace, whilest he was yet thus busied in MACEDONIA: and had indeed so done, had not another hope arising in the meane time, quite altered that his better purpose. It fortuned at the same time, whilest the old emperour was thus thinking of peace, That Michael the Bulgarian prince, in hope of great profite thereof to arise, secretly offered his aid vnto him against the young emperour his nephew: of which his offer, the old emperour gladly accepted, and embassadours were sent too and fro about the full conclusion of the matter, no man being acquainted therewith more than two or three of the emperour his most secret friends and trustie counsellors. Yet in the meane time, disdayning to be so coupt vp as he was by Synadenus, one of his nephews captaines, euen in the imperiall citie; sent out one Constantinus Assan, with the greatest part of his strength against him: who encountring him at the riuer MAVRVS, was there by him in plaine battell ouerthrown and taken prisoner, the rest of his discomfited armie flying headlong backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. All things thus prosperously proceeding with the yoong emperour, and the countries of MACEDONIA and THRACIA now almost all at his commaund, he returned in hast with all his power to CONSTANTINOPLE to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither: as fearing

leaſt that they finding the citie weakly manned, ſhould trecherouſly kill the old emperour with ſuch as were about him, and ſo ceize vpon the citie themſelues: or at leaſtwiſe giue him ſuch aid as might keepe him out, and ſo cut off all his hope for obtayning of the ſame. At which time alſo there was great want of victuall in the citie, he with his armie hauing ſhut it vp on the one ſide by land, and the Venetians with their gallies on the other ſide by ſea: who then at ods with the Genowaics dwelling at PERA, kept all that ſtrait ſea betwixt EVROPE and ASIA: in ſuch ſort, as that neither victuals nor marchandiſe could be brought that way, either to CONSTANTINOPLE or PERA. The yoong emperour comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, attempted at his firſt comming to haue entred the citie, in hope without any great reſiſtance to haue beene receiued; but repulſed by the defendants, was glad to get him further off. About this time came alſo vnto the citie three thouſand horſemen, the promiſed aid of the Bulgarian prince vnto the old emperour: who although he wanted men, and was right glad of their comming, yet remembring the harmes he had before receiued by forrein aid, and not now daring to truſt them too far, ſuffered not them to come into the citie, more than their Generall and ſome few others of their commanders with him. Now the yoong emperour vpon the comming of this aid, leaſt ſome great harme might betide either the old emperour, or himſelfe, to the vtter ſubuerſion of their ſtate: ſecretly ſent vnto his grandfather, requeſting him to be well aduiſed how he truſted thoſe forrein people too far; offering himſelfe to do whatſoeuer he ſhould commaund, rather than ſo great a harme ſhould happen vnto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the truſt the old emperour had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had ſo confirmed his mind, as that hee little liſtened vnto his nephews requeſt: beſides that, how could hee well truſt him that had ſo oftentimes deceiued him? Wherewith the young emperour much grieued, and now againe almoſt diſpairing of his farther ſucceſſe, diſlodged and drew neere vnto the place where theſe Bulgarian horſemen lay encamped: from whence hee ſent certaine embaſſadours with great gifts and preſents vnto the Generall, and the reſt of the chiefe commaunders, promiſing them farre greater, if they would without further troubling themſelues returne home againe: whereunto they willingly graunted, and ſo were of him honourably feaſted, and the next day after conducted vpon their way homewards.

Conſtantinople betraied vnto the young emperour.

It fortuned, that the young emperour returning backe againe from the Bulgarians, and encamped in the ſame place where he before lay; two of the watchmen of the citie, the one called Camaris, and the other Caſtellanus, both ſmiths, fled ſecretly vnto him: who admitted to his preſence and all others commaunded to depart, excepting Catacuzenus, offered to betray the citie vnto him, ſo that he would vnder his hand writing, aſſure them of ſuch a ſumme of money, and ſuch poſſeſsions as they required: which he eaſily graunting, and the houre and manner of performing of the ſame, being by them declared, and agreed vpon; they by and by without longer ſtay, for feare of ſuſpition, returned againe into the citie. But the emperour ſtaying foure daies in the ſame place, cauſed certaine ladders to be made of great ropes, ſuch as they vſe in great ſhips: But the appointed night being come, the two traitours hauing before prouided great ſtore of good wine, liberally gaue the ſame by way of curteſie vnto the watchmen their companions neere vnto them; who drunke ſo plentifully thereof, that not able any longer to hold vp their heads, they fell into ſo ſound a ſleepe, as that but for breathing, they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certaine ſouldiours of the young emperours, with the aforeſaid ladders; which the traitours by and by drawing vnto them by a rope caſt downe, and making them faſt vnto the top of the wall, receiued by the ſame eighteene armed men: who being got into the citie, without more adoe brake open the Romane gate, whereby the young emperour with his armie preſently entred, no man letting him. But it is woorth the marking, how things appointed to befall vs, are by no meanes to be auoided, although we bee thereof before neuer ſo plainly forewarned: For the ſame night the citie was ſurprized, immediatly after the ſetting of the Sunne, the gates being ſhut, a certaine countrey man came running in all haſt from out of a village there by, and knocking hard at the gate called Girolimna, required to ſpeake with ſome of the ſouldiours; who being come, he told them how that a little before hee had ſeene a great number of the young emperours men marching toward the citie, by the way that leadeth vnto the Romane gate: which being told vnto the old emperour, did not a little trouble him. And therefore thought it good to ſend out certaine ſcouts, to ſee if all were cleere along the wals toward the land, from ſea to ſea: which his purpoſe Metochita his great counſellor letted, ſaying,

ing,it not to beſeem a couragious mind to be vpon ſo light an occaſion ſo much moued; for that either the rumour was falſe,or the indeuour of ſo few vaine,the wals and gates of the citie being ſo filled with armed men: which happily he ſaid not ſo much vpon ignorance of martiall affaires, as blinded by a certaine commaunding power, that the ſupernall decree giuen by God himſelfe againſt the old emperour,might at length take place. And againe,the third part of that night yet ſcant paſt, diuers other countreymen came running vnto the ſaid gate Gyroſimina, and told the watchmen vpon the wals,that a great number of men were met together at the Romane gate: wherof the emperor hearing was therewith much more troubled than before; In ſo much that ſharply rebuking Metochita,he ſaid vnto him, Thou ſeemeſt to be ſtrāgely metamorphoſed into a man of yron,which art become ſo ſecure, as not to haue any feeling of the danger wherewith we are encloſed: Seeſt thou not that the matter requireth not that we ſhould thus ſit ſtill and take our reſt, for the noiſe of my nephew ſoundeth in mine eares as the ſound of a great drum,and diſquieteth my mind? I feele a ſea of calamitie broken out againſt me, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuertheleſſe he,firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of thoſe reports: and therefore roſe to go to bed, to ſhew indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as falſe alarms. But the emperour left alone and no bodie with him vnto whom he might breake his griefe, laied him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his clothes; but as if he had together with them put on extreame deſperation,lay tumbling too and fro as a man in mind troubled with many and diuers heauie thoughts. In the meane time he heard a great noiſe at the court gate, and the report of the entring of the young emperour his nephew, with a great clattering of armour; for there were aboue eight hundred ſouldiours entred with him,and withall they of the citie on euerie ſide ſaluted him with moſt joyfull acclamations. But the old emperour hearing the great tumult and outcrie, roſe from his pallet, exceedingly troubled; and deſtitute of all the helpe of his captaines and ſouldiours (for why his palace was altogether deſolate, except of ſuch as were his ordinarie waiters) betooke himſelfe vnto his praiers, Beſeeching God not to forſake him in ſo great a danger, but in his mercie to defend him from the furie of thoſe wicked men. Who preſently heard him, and ſent him preſent reliefe. For whileſt he was thus praying in the palace, the young emperour without,calling together all his captaines and lieutenants,ſtraightly charged them vpon paine of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the majeſtie of the old emperour his grandfather, nor any other about him: for this victorie (ſaid he) God hath giuen vs,& not we our ſelues; his will ordereth all things,whereunto all things obey, the ſtars, the aire, the ſea, the earth, men, flouds, tempeſts, plagues, earthquaks,ſhoures,dearth,and ſuch like,ſometimes to our bliſſe, and ſometime to our correction and deſtruction: wherefore vſing vs as the inſtruments of his chaſtiſement, he hath giuen vnto vs this preſent victorie, which peraduenture to morrow he will giue to others to vſe againſt vs,and then as wee haue beene vnto them wee haue ouercome, ſuch will they alſo ſhew themſelues vnto vs againe: wherefore, if neither nigheſſe of blood, neither that we be all of one countrey may mooue vs,yet in reſpect of our ſelues let vs vſe mercie,that we feele not the hand of God vpon vs in like caſe. In the meane time a courtier opened a wicket vnto the young emperour,with this meſſage from his grandfather:

The pitifull ſupplication of the old emperour vnto his nephew.

For as much as God this day (my ſonne) hath giuen vnto thee the imperiall ſcepter,taken from me, I requeſt of thee this one good turne; For many which I haue euen from thy birth beſtowed vpon thee (for in this my hard eſtate I let paſſe,that I next vnto God haue been the authour of thy natiuitie and encreaſe) giue me my life, ſpare thy fathers head, and with violent weapon ſpill not that blood from which thou thy ſelfe haſt taken the fountaine of life. Man truly beholdeth heauen and earth,and heauen and earth beholdmens actions: wherefore make not the heauens and the earth beholders of ſo wicked an outrage as neuer man euer committed. If brothers blood long agoe cried out vnto the Lord againſt Cain, how much louder ſhall the fathers blood crie vnto the Lord, and declare ſo great a wickedneſſe vnto the earth,the ſunne,and ſtars,and make it abhorred of all the princes of the world? Regard my miſerable old age,which of it ſelfe promiſeth vnto me ſhortly death, but vnto thee a reſt after long cares. Reuerence the hands which haue oftentimes moſt louingly embraced thee,yet crying in thy ſwathing clouts: Reuerence thoſe lips which haue oftentimes moſt louingly kiſſed thee, and called thee my other ſoule: Haue pitie vpon a bruſed reed,caſt downe by fortune,and doe not thou againe tread vpon it. And ſeeing thou art thy ſelfe a man,be not too proud of thy preſent fortune,but conſider the vncertaintie certaintie and varietie of worldly things, taking by me example: see in me the end of long life, and maruell, how one night hauing receiued me an emperour of many yeares, leaueth me now subiect vnto another mans power for euer.

The young emperour Andronicus mooued with this speech, and taking great care of his grandfathers safetie; scarce abstaining from teares, entred the pallace, and comming to his grandfather, humbly saluted him, embraced him, and with cheerfull words comforted him. Straight way after, he went vnto the monasterie MANGANIVM, where (as is aforesaid) the Patriarch Esaias was by the old emperors commandement, kept in safe keeping, whom the yong emperor now tooke from thence, and carrying him away in one of the emperors richest chariots, restored him againe vnto his Patriarchall dignitie; wherein he afterwards spared not to reuenge himselfe to the full, and most cruelly to persecute the old emperours friends. That day from morning vnto night, a man might haue seene all the riches and wealth of such noble men as had taken part with the old emperour, carryed away, and their goodly houses ouerthrowne and made the scorne of the base common people: but especially the house and wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greatest fauour with his prince, and of all others next vnto the emperour himselfe, of greatest authoritie and credit, whose whole wealth (not that only which was found in his house, but that also which he had laid vp in trust with his friends, discouered by notes found in his studie) became most part a prey vnto the common people, and the rest confiscated vnto the prince. Thus he which earst of all others next vnto the emperour, was accounted most fortunate, was now vpon the sudden, with his wife and children, brought vnto extreame beggerie; and after many yeares felicitie, in one day cast into the bottom of dispaire and miserie, where a man might haue heard many complayning, say, All that wealth and treasure to haue beene the bloud and teares of the poore oppressed subiects, brought vnto him by them whom hee had made rulers and gouernours of the prouinces and cities of the empire; to the intent that when they had delt cruelly with the people, as with their slaues, he might stop them for comming to complaine of their griefes vnto the emperour: and that the eie of the Reuenger had not alwaies slept, but was now at length awaked, & had of him yet scarcely take sufficient punishment: which euery where to heare, increased not a little his griefe. As for himselfe, he was cõfined vnto DIDYMOTICHVM, as the place of his exile and banishment; where after he had a certaine time poorly liued, he was sent for backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE: where hauing nothing left to relieue himselfe (for his house at the comming of the young emperour, was in the furie of the people pluckt downe to the ground, and the verie pauement thereof digged vp) he went vnto the monasterie of CHORA thereby, which long before built by the emperour Iustinian and become ruinous, he in the time of his prosperitie had with great charge repaired, & therin now (hauing made shipwracke of all that he had) quietly shrouded himselfe, to the great comfort both of his bodie and afflicted mind, where he not long after died.

Niphon inciteth the yoong emperor against his grandfather.

But to returne againe vnto the old emperour, as yet in doubt what should become of himselfe: it fortuned that the same day that the citie was taken, the young emperour at night returning to the pallace, by the way met with Niphon sometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to deale with his grandfather. Whereunto the yong emperor answering, That he would deale with him honourably and emperour like; he was by him therefore blamed and reproued. For this Niphon being of a craftie subtile wit and malicious nature, besides that he secretly hated all them vpon whom fortune greatly either fauned or frowned, bare an especiall grudge against the old emperour: first, for that at such time as he was right woorthly for his shamefull couetousnesse and extortion, by the rest of the bishops and cleargie thrust out of his Patriarchship, he was not by him as he looked for defended: and secondly, for that dreaming againe after the Patriarchall dignitie, he thought it one good step thereunto to haue him (as his greatest enemie) taken out of the way. Wherefore he said now vnto the young emperour: If thou desire to raigne without feare, giue not thine honour vnto another; but taking all the ornaments of the empire from the old man, cast haire cloath vpon him, and so clap him fast in prison, or thrust him out into exile. This mischieuous counsell, this wicked man gaue against the poore old distressed emperour; not remembring how vnwoorthily he had by him beene before preferred vnto the highest degrees both of honour and wealth, if he could there haue kept himselfe: vnto which vngratious counsell, diuers others of the nobilitie also consenting, so wrought the matter amongst them,that although they could not quite draw the young emperors mind from his grandfather, yet they much changed the same: so that he could no longer endure to take him for his compa-nion in the empire. Whereupon after many meetings & consultations had,it was decreed, That the old man should still retaine the name and ornaments of an emperour, as before, but not to meddle in any matters,nor to come abroad,but to sit still quietly in his chamber, with the yearly allowance of ten thousand duckats, for the maintenance of himselfe and such as attended vpon him; to be raised of the fishing before the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: a poore pension for the maintenance of so great an emperour. Of which so shamefull a decree, Esaias the Patriarch was also a furtherer: who seeing an emperour that had raigned so long, cast downe, and shut vp as it were in prison,was so far from grieuing thereat,that foolishly rejoycing, he in token thereof ab-surdly wrested this text of Scripture, saying in his merriment; Laetabitur iustus, cum viderit vltionem, The just shall rejoyce,when he seeth the reuenge: calling himselfe just, and the emperours casting downe,reuenge. But the old emperour thus shut vp in his chamber (differing nothing but in name,from a prison) not long after,the state of his bodie ouerthrowne with greefe and corrupt humors distilling out of his head,first lost one of his eyes, and shortly after the other also: and so oppressed with eternall darkenesse,mingled (as saith the Scripture) his drinke with teares, and eat the bread of sorrow,being oftentimes (to his great greefe) most bitterly mocked and derided,not of them onely which were by his enemies set to guard him,but of his owne seruants also. Not long after,the yong emperour falling sicke, in such sort as that it was thought he would not recouer, Catacuzenus and the rest of his greatest fauorits and followers carefull of their own estate,and yet doubtfull of the old blind emperour, deuised many things against him,but all tending to one purpose for the shortening of his daies. But in the end all other deuises set apart, they put him to the choice,either to put on the habit of a religious,and so for euer to bid the world farwell,or els to take what should otherwise ensue; the best whereof was either death,exile,or perpetuall impri-sonment in the lothsome castle of forgetfulnesse: For the putting whereof in execution,Synadenus (of all others to him most hatefull) was appointed. At which hard choice,the old emperor as with a world of woes so dainly oppressed,lay a great while vpon his bed as a man speechlesse: for what could he do els, except he had an heart of steele or adamant? being then compassed about with many barbarous and mercilesse soldiors, and his domesticall seruants kept from him,and no man left,that would vouchsafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go or where to stand. But to make the matter short,would he,would he not,they made choice for him themselues,polling and shauing him,and casting a monkes habit vpon him, changed his name, after the manner of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthonie the monke. Glad was Esaias the false Patriarch of this the hard estate of the old emperour: for that now that he was professed a religious,there was left no hope for him to recouer againe the empire,either cause for himselfe to feare. Yet he thought it good to be aduised,in what sort remembrance should be made of him in the church prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Whereof to be by the old emperour himselfe re-solued,he (seeming to be very sorie for that which was done,but purposing indeed therein to de-ride him) sent vnto him two bishops, to know what his pleasure was to haue done therein. Vnto which their demaund,he oppressed with heauinesse,and fetching a great sigh euen from the bot-tome of his heart answered:

The old emperor becometh blind.

Andronicus the old emperour against his will made a Monke, and called Anthonie.

The notable answere of the old emperour to the catching question of the proud Patriarch.

As in poore Lazarus appeared a double miracle, That being dead,he rise; and being bound,walked: euen so was it to be done in me, though in quite contrarie manner: for loe, being aliue, I am dead, as ouerwhelmed with the waues of calamitie and woe; and being loose,am bound, not my hands and feet onely, but my tongue also; wherewith vnable to doe any thing els, I might yet at least bewaile my woes and wrongs vnto the aire,and such as by chance should heare me, and vnto this most wofull darkenesse wherein I must for euer sit. But shame hath closed my mouth,my brethren abhorre me,and my mothers sonnes account me for a stranger vnto them,and the very light of mine eyes is not with me, my friends and neighbours stood vp against me,and all that saw me laughed me to scorne: my feet had almost slip-ped,and my footsteps were almost ouerthrowne: for I fretted against the wicked, when I saw the peace of the vngodly. The emperours long agoe gaue great priuiledges vnto the Church, euen those which it at this day enjoyeth: and the Church gaue to them againe power, to chuse whom they would to be Pa-triarchs. Now concerning him that sent you, I not onely nominated him vnto the Patriarchship, but I my selfe made choice of him,and preferred him before many other right worthie and most famous men,

being himselfe a man growne old in a poore priuat life, neuer before preferred, or for any other thing famous: I will not say how often I haue holpen him and done him good. But now when hee should againe haue relieued me in my calamitie, he joyneth hands with mine enemies against me, more cruell vpon me than any other bloodie handed executioner; not ashamed to aske me how I would bee remembred in the church: faigning himselfe to be ignorant and sorrie for mine estate, much like vnto the Ægyptian crocodile of Nile, which hauing killed some liuing beast, lieth vpon the dead bodie and washeth the head thereof with her warme teares, which she afterwards deuoureth together with the bodie. But what to answere him vnto this his catching question, I know not: for if I shall say, As an emperor; I shall forthwith be slaine by them which for that purpose haue me in hold: but if I say, As Anthonie the monke; it shall be taken as the franke confession of mine estate, by them which haue craftely contriued mine ouerthrow; as if I had not by compulsion, but euen of mine owne free will put on this monasticall habit, which God knoweth was neuer in my thought.

Hauing thus said, he sent them away without any other answere vnto their demaund: but sitting downe vpon his bed side, said, My soule returne again into thy rest, for the Lord hath dealt well with thee: neither spoke any one word more in declaration of his greefe, his tongue there staied by his singular wisedome, or els with the greatnesse of his greefe; and so against his will, in silence passing ouer his sorow, his mind with the greatnesse of his woes ouercome, and as it were astonished, before the humors gathered into the braine could be dissolued into teares: For as the Sunne sending forth his moderat beames, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but casting the same foorth more plentifully, doth with his immoderat heat consume the same before they can be drawne vp; so the moderat affections of the mind may haue their greefes by words and teares expressed; but such as exceed all measure, and with their vehemencie as it were ouerthrow the mind, commonly make men to stand still mute & silent, or if they speak at all, to speak idly, and nothing to the purpose, as men beside themselues, or in an extasie. But for the resolution of the question by the bishops demaunded, the deuout Patriarch decreed, That in the Church prayers he should be remembred before the emperor his nephew, by the name of, The most religious and zealous monke Anthonie: which was done (God wot) for no good zeale to the poore blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if hee wearie of the world, had voluntarily taken vpon him that silly profession. Neuertheless, within foure daies after, Synadenus vnderstanding them in euery place to whisper among themselues, and secretly to mutter against the hard dealing with the old emperour, who had long raigned ouer them, and so by right was againe to doe, if his nephew should chance to die; and that the ecclesiasticall lawes enforced no man against his will to enter into religious orders: he therewith enraged, sent vnto him certaine of his owne confederacie, to exact of him an oath in writing, That he should neuer more after that time seeke after the empire, or yet accept of the same if it were offred him, neither to substitute any other: which if he should refuse to do, to put him in feare of his life. And the more to terrifie him, set a guard of insolent barbarous souldiors ouer him; for feare of whom, he yeelded to doe whatsoeuer they required: and so his oath being solemnely conceiued into writing (another man leading his hand, because he was blind) he signed the same with a red crosse aboue, and a blacke crosse beneath, after the manner of the religious. Hauing thus liued in darkenesse, disgraced, shut vp in his chamber as a man forsaken of the world, with an vnsure guard euer to attend him, by the space of two yeares, it fortuned that the twelft of Februarie towards night, (a day in the Greeke Church dedicated to the vigil of S. Anthonie, whose name they had giuen him) certaine of his friends that were suffered to haue accesse vnto him, going as their manner was, once in three or foure daies to visit him (amongst whom was his daughter, sometime the prince of Servia his wife, but as then a widdow, and Nicephorus Gregoras, author of this Historie) he entred with them, as with his friends, into a familiar discourse of many matters, wherin he so deceiued the time, that it was past midnight before they perceiued how the time passed. But the cockes crowing, he brake off the talke, and bidding them farewell, gaue them leaue to depart, pleasantly saying, That to morrow they would make an end of their discourse; who all thereupon tooke their leaue and departed, no signe of any sickneſse as then appearing vpon him. And after they were gone, called for meat and did eat: the meat he eat, was certaine shell-fish, for it was with them a fasting day, and he had not eaten any thing: after which, when as hee should haue drunke a cup of wine, for the comforting of his old stomack and disgesting of that so hard meat, he

he drunke cold water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat, to drinke the ſame immoderatly: which hurtfull manner of diet he then vſing alſo, began by and by to feele a great paine in his ſtomacke, and ſo preſently after became very ſicke, falling withall into a great looſeneſſe of bodie, ſo that in the ſpace of one quarter of an houre he was glad oftentimes to ariſe, and to go vnto an homely houſe of office in an inner chamber thereby, to diſcharge natures burden; where after many euacuations, ſitting downe vpon an homely bed faſt by, and not able to recouer his owne bed, hauing as then none to helpe him; there before it was day, died, after he had raigned 43 yeares. His death was by many ſtrange ſignes and accidents as it were foretold: firſt, a great eclipſe of the Sunne appeared, juſt ſo many daies before his death as hee had liued yeares: and after that, another eclipſe of the Moone; and with it an earthquake, the day before he died at night, being S. Anthonie his euen, whoſe name his enemies had thruſt vpon him: at which time alſo, the ſea with a great tempeſt riſing aboue the wonted bounds, made diuers breaches in the wals of the citie towards the ſea, as if it had been ſome violent enemie, and ouerflowed alſo diuers houſes in the citie. Manie croſſes and pinacles were then alſo from the tops of churches and other high buildings ouerthrowne; and with them a great pillar, ſometime one of the ornaments of the citie, ſtanding before the church, commonly called The Church of the forte martyrs: which being verie high, and below burnt and worne away with time, had put manie in feare as they paſſed by it, leaſt it ſhould haue fallen vpon them; inſomuch that the Emperour vpon a time paſsing that way, was requeſted by ſome of the nobilitie there preſent, to ride farther off from it, for feare of falling vpon him: who ſmiling at their vaine feare, by chance anſwered, O would to God I might liue ſo long as this piller will ſtand: which now falling out according to his ſpeech, gaue many of them that had heard him ſo ſay, occaſion to maruell. His dead bodie was honorablie buried in the monaſterie of LIBE, which his mother Theodora the empreſſe had not long before new built, and his obſequies there (after the maner of that time) yeerely ſolemnlie kept by the ſpace of nine daies.

Th. Turks kingdome founded by Othoman in Aſia, at ſuch time as the Greeke emperors were at variance betwixt themſelues in Europe.

Thus at length hauing paſſed through the troubled ſtate of the Greeke empire, during the long raigne of the old emperour Andronicus, the conſiderat Reader may eaſily ſee the cauſes of the declining, and ruine alſo of this famous empire; and how that the Greeke emperours, troubled with their tempeſtuous affaires neerer home in EUROPE, yea in the verie imperiall citie it ſelfe, and in their owne pallaces, were not at leaſure to looke ouer the ſtrait into ASIA, but glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weake defence of themſelues. At which time, and euen in the middeſt of the aforeſaid troubles, Othoman, on the one ſide, with great induſtrie laid the foundation of his empire in PHRIGIA and BYTHINIA, now the greateſt terrour of the world: and then did thoſe things which we now haue of him written. The other princes of the Turkes alſo, the ſucceſſours of Sultan Aladin, at the ſame time on the other ſide, alongſt the riuer MEANDER encroching on as faſt: vntill that at laſt amongſt them they had thruſt the Greeke emperours quite out of ASIA, and in fine became themſelues, together with the Greeke empire, a prey vnto the Othoman kings, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall more at large appeare.

Pruſa yeelded vnto the Turks.

But againe to returne vnto Othoman himſelfe, who all this while (that old Andronicus the Greeke emperour was thus troubled) had with his ſonne Orchanes ſought by all meanes on euerie ſide to inlarge his kingdome: the garriſons by him left in the two late built caſtles neere vnto the great citie of PRUSA, vnder the charge of the two valiant captains Actemur & Balaban Zuck (as is before declared) hauing now continued there certaine yeares, had by ſhutting vp the paſſages, and ſpoiling of the countrie, brought the citie into ſuch diſtreſſe and penurie, that many of the cittizens and other the poore Chriſtians fled into the citie, there died of famine. The reſt now out of all hope to be relieued by the Greeke emperour, not then able to relieue himſelfe, came to compoſition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then ſicke of his old diſeaſe the gout) couenanting with him, that they might in ſafetie with life and libertie depart, and ſo much of their goods as they themſelues could carie: and ſo yeelded to him the citie. Which conditions (as moſt write) were on the Turks behalfe well and faithfullie performed: yet ſome there be that report them to haue bene in moſt part by Orchanes broken. Thus was PRUSA, one of the greateſt cities of that part of ASIA, yeelded vnto the Turks, in the yeere of our Lord 1327: and was afterwards by Orchanes made the royall ſeat of the Othoman kings.

About this time, or verie ſhortly after, Othoman in the eight and twentith yeare of his raigne died, died, at the age of 69, in the yeare of our Lord 1328, and lieth buried at PRUSA, where his tombe is yet at this day to be ſeene, in a certaine chappell of an old monaſterie in the caſtle, ſtanding in the middeſt of the citie; couered with a mantle of greene chamlet, & a little Tulipant or Turkiſh hat (ſuch as he vſed to weare) lying ouer his head, far differing from thoſe which the Turks now weare, eſpeciallie the better ſort of them, ſo great that they can therwith ſcarſly come in at a doore. There is alſo another monument of him to be ſeene at SUGUTA, ſaſt by the ſepulchre of his father Ertogrull, there made by his ſonnes in remembrance of him; whereof ſome haue reported him to haue bene there buried. Howbeit the Turks themſelues generally ſuppoſe the true monument wherein he is interred to be at PRUSA, as is aforeſaid. He was wiſe, politicke, valiant, and fortunate, but full of diſſimulation, and ambitious aboue meaſure; not raſh in his attempts, and yet very reſolute; what hee tooke in hand, hee commonly brought to good effect: to all men he was bountifull and liberall, but eſpecially to his men of warre, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloath with his owne hands. Of a poore lordſhip he left a great kingdome, hauing ſubdued a great part of the leſſer ASIA: and is worthily accounted the firſt founder of the Turks great kingdome and empire. Of him, the Turkiſh kings and emperours euer ſince, haue bene called the Othoman kings and emperours, as lineally of him deſcended: and the Turks themſelues Oſmanide, as the people or ſubiects of Othoman, or Oſman, for ſo he is of the Turks commonlie called.

NOte, that in the reckoning vp of certaine of the great Chriſtian Princes and Prelates of the ſame time, at the end of euery the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors liues, the firſt and greateſt number following their names, ſheweth the yeare of our Lord, wherein ſuch an Emperour, King, or Biſhop began to raigne, or ſit: and the number following, how long he raigned or ſat. As for example: Andronicus the elder began to raigne in the Eaſt in the yeare of grace 1282, and raigned 43 yeares: and ſo of the reſt. Wherein we ſeeke not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day (as not much materiall to our Hiſtorie, or any part of our purpoſe) but onely the reaſonable view of the great princes of the forepaſſed times, as they liued in ages together.

ORCHANES.

Suſcipit Orchanes, defuncti ſceptra, parentis:
Major vt ingenio, ſic magis arte valens.
Bithynos, Phrygiamque domat, Pruſamque: ſuperbam
Et populos latè, Marte fauente premit.
Sic lætus tantis Aſiam turbaſſe ruinis:
Tranſit in Europam, Callipolimque capit.
Rident interea Græci ſua damna: ſed ecce:
Dum ſua contemnunt, in ſua fata ruunt.

RICH. KNOLLEVS.

His father dead, Orchanes takes his ſcepter vp in hand:
As one of deeper wit and reach, his foes for to withſtand.
The Phrigians, and Bithynians, he by force of armes brought low:
Proud PRVSA, with faire NICOMEDE, and many cities moe.
And glad in ASIA to haue made ſuch hauocke and ſuch ſpoile:
His forces into EVROPE ſends, the Græcians there to foile.
Who meane while laughing at their loſſe, did make thereof a game:
Not thinking what a world of woe was to enſue the ſame.

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TVRKES.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two sonnes Orchanes (whom the Turks call Vrchan) and Aladin his brother, hauing with great solemnitie enterred their father at PRVSA, immediatly summoned a Parlament, whereunto both the brethren came accompanied with the chiefe of their nobilitie. This parlament was called especially, for the establishing of the succession in this new kingdome, and for the diuision of Othomans treasure and goods, betwixt them two, his sonnes. But vpon view taken, there was no money, plate, or jewels found in the kings coffers, for that he had in his life time most bountifully bestowed it vpon his men of warre: so that all the wealth hee left vnto them his sonnes, was, the honourable remembrance of his life for them to immitate, large dominions for their possessions, store of readie horses, and armour fit for seruice, with great heards of beasts and cattell for houshold prouision. Whereupon Orchanes demaunded of his brother Aladin, what order hee thought it was best to be taken with those things by their father so left. To whom Aladin answered, That it was most requisite first to establish a king in their fathers kingdome; which like a good sheepherd might gouerne and defend his subjects, rule and maintaine his men of war, prouiding all things meet for defence of his kingdome: And that vnto him of right belonged all these other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his successour, for the common good and maintenance of his estate. As for mine owne part (said Aladin) I claime no interest therein, you being my elder brother, and so vnto me in steed of a father: by whom also you haue been these two yeares, as it were alreadie put in possession of the kingdom, all things being committed to your gouernment, during the time of his late sickenesse. This modestie of Aladin was greatly commended of all the antient counsellors; by meanes wherof, the kingdome in all peaceable maner discended to Orchanes. In regard of which courtesie, Orchanes would gladly haue made Aladin his brother President of his counsell: which honour he would in no wise accept, but requested rather that hee would giue him the lordship of FODORE in Tekences countrey; which Orchanes frankly graunted. In which lordship of FODORE, Aladin most part liued a priuat and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an abbey at PRVSA, there yet at this day to be seene.

Some Latine Historiographers otherwise report this beginning of Orchanes his raigne; as that Othoman should haue three sonnes, and that Orchanes the youngest obtained the kingdome by murthering of his other brethren. A practise of late much vsed amongst the Turkish princes, but not before the time of Bajazet the first of that name, who first of the Turkish monarchs embrued his hands with his brothers bloud: where before, they vsed all brotherly loue one to another, as the most probable histories collected out of the Turkes owne Chronicles affirme.

When that barbarous manner of murthering their brethren, first began among the Turkish Sultans.

The

The city of Nice with diuers other castles recouered from the Turks after the death of Othoman.

The Christian princes and captaines, presently vpon the death of Othoman recouered the citie of NICE with diuers other castles and forts, out of the hands of the Turks: as it commonly chanceth, that dominions lately woon with great perill, are soone againe lost, the Conquerour dying before there be a firme gouernment established. Amongst other forts by the Christians repossessed, the castle of TZUPRICHISER, situate vpon the passages of the riuer SANGARIUS, most grieued the Turks, for thereby their passage into that part of BYTHINIA was much impeached. Wherfore Orchanes desirous to recouer this castle, disguised himselfe with a few other of his best souldiors, in the apparrell of Christian marchants, and came to the castle, crauing leaue to passe as marchants: the warders of the castle verely supposing them by their attire to bee marchants, opened the gates, and let them into the castle: who presently drew their swords, slew the warders, and so by force possessed the castle, to the great benefit of the Turkes, and the hurt of the poore Christians yet left in the countrey of BYTHINIA. For they now hauing opened a way ouer the riuer SANGARIUS, and as it were broken downe the strongest defence of that side of the Greeke empire, at their pleasure forraged the countrey in such sort, as that the great citie of NICE (for want of victuals to relieue so great a multitude as for feare of the Turks was fled out of the countrey into it) was brought to great extremitie and want. For the releefe whereof, and for the repulsing againe of the Turks, Andronicus the yong emperour, who then all commaunded, with such an armie as he was then able to raise, passed himselfe in person ouer the strait of CONSTANTINOPLE into ASIA: the greatest strength of his armie consisting in two thousand choice horsemen; the rest as well horse as foot, being for the most part artificers taken vp in the citie, men altogether vnacquainted with armes (who in token of their cowardise, and that they were more mindfull of flight than of fight, carried ouer with them almost as many long boats, and such other small vessels, as they were men, to be readie to receiue them at such time as they should flie) or els abiect rascals, taken vp here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others most vnfit for so great a prince (as was the emperour) to commit the defence of his person and honour vnto. But Orchanes hearing of his comming, sent certain of his most expert captaines, to forelay the straight passages of the countrey whereby the emperor was to passe; following also himselfe after with his armie, of purpose to encounter the emperour. Who in three daies march after his landing in ASIA, being come to PHILOCRENE, a little towne in BYTHINIA, and vnderstanding, that Orchanes hauing before taken the straits, lay not far off encamped with his armie; he there at PHILOCRENE pitched his tents, and staied that night also. But the next morning, the Sunne as yet scarcely risen, he seeing diuers companies of the Turks comming downe from the mountaines fast by, put his armie into order of battell, and so set forward to meet them. Where to begin the fight, the Turks archers freely bestowed their piercing shot amongst the Christians, still keeping themselues aloose off, so to doe the more harme. Which the emperor mistaking, and supposing that their keeping off to haue proceeded of feare, encouraged therewith, commaunded certaine loose companies disorderly to march forward, & to skirmish with them: which his more expert captains not liking, would haue otherwise persuaded him, as to haue kept his strength together against the danger of the battell. Neuertheless, such was his youthfull heat, as that he could by no meanes be otherwise intreated, but that forward needs they must. But all the forenoone spent in this light and tumultuarie kind of skirmishing, and the Sunne at the highest now shining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the mountaines perceiuing the Christians well wearied with the heat of the day and long skirmishing, came downe from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a most hideous cry charged the Christians on euery side, some a farre off with their arrowes, and some hand to hand with their swords and other weapons: whose assault the Christians at the first most valiantly receiued, and a great while right worthely defended themselues, hauing wounded and slaine a number of their enemies. Which hard fight was on both sides courageously maintained, vntill the approching of the night, with great slaughter on both sides: at which time, the Christians wearie of the long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, disorderly retiring toward their trenches, and hardly pursued by the Turkes, receiued there a great losse, as well of their horsemen, as of their foot: but by the comming on of the night, the battell was at length ended with vncertaine victorie. Amongst others there hurt, the emperour himselfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night happened a wofull mishap, and a manifest token of Gods his wrath: for Orchanes hauing to his cost made proofe of the strength and valour of the Christians,

ſtians,and doubting they would the next day come on farther into the countrey, left three hundreth horſemen,as ſcouts,to attend the enemies remooving: and himſelfe with his armie retired beforehand to take the aduantage of ſuch places as the Chriſtians were to paſſe by. But the emperour in the euening leauing his campe,and going to PHILOCRENE,a little towne faſt by,the better to haue his wound dreſſed; the reſt of the armie vnderſtanding of his departure, and ſuppoſing him to haue fled for feare(as if Orchanes with a great armie would that night haue ſlaine them all) fled themſelues alſo out of the campe, euery mothers ſonne; ſome to their long boats and other little veſſels they had for that purpoſe brought ouer the ſtrait; ſome haſting towards the towne gates,were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, ouerborne, and troden to death; otherſome hanging one at anothers taile,like a chaine, got ſome part of them vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; otherſome drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling downe together by heapes,and trod vpon by others,there periſhed; ſome (as is reported)died there for very feare,no man either chaſing or hurting them; ſo weake is mans courage when God withdraweth from him his ſtrength. But in the morning the Sunne ariſing, the three hundreth Turks,left for ſcouts,perceiuing the flight of the Chriſtians, entred the forſaken campe,where they found horſes, armour, and emptie tents, yea the emperours owne furniture and his horſes readie ſadled: of all which, two hundred of theſe Turks tooke the ſpoile at their pleaſure; and the other hundred purſuing the diſperſed Chriſtians,like heartleſſe men,wandring here and there,ſlew a great number of them. The emperour himſelfe ſeeing his armie (thus as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrowne and diſperſed, tooke ſhipping alſo, and ſo returned to CONSTANTINOPLE. After whoſe departure,the Turks ſeizing vpon many ſea townes alongſt the coaſt of BYTHINIA,and there ſeating themſelues,laid heauie tributes vpon the other countrey townes and villages; for the benefit whereof,they ſpared to deſtroy them,together with the inhabitants,which they might at their pleaſure full eaſily haue done.

Now lay the great citie of NICE in the ſuds,the enemie commaunding all the country about it,liuing as ſicke men doe by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thouſand horſemen which the emperour (notwithſtanding his late diſcomfiture) had promiſed foorthwith to ſend, there to lie in garriſon for the repreſsing of the Turks. Of which aid ſo promiſed, Orchanes vnderſtanding, furniſhed eight hundred of his owne horſemen,after the manner of the Chriſtians: and fetching a great compaſſe about,came at length into the high way that leadeth from CONSTANTINOPLE TO NICE, and ſo trouped directly towards the citie, as if they had come from CONSTANTINOPLE. At the ſame time he ſent three hundred of his other horſemen, in the habit of Turks, to forrage and ſpoile the countrey,as much as they could within the view of the citie(now for want of victuals brought into great extremitie) which whileſt they were a doing; the other eight hundred horſemen in the attire of Chriſtians, following vpon them,as if it had been by chance,charged them, and in the ſight of the cittizens put them to flight: which done, theſe counterfeit horſemen returned directly againe towards NICE. The cittizens which with great pleaſure had in the meane time from the wals ſeene the moſt part of the skirmiſh;and how they had put the Turks to flight,ſuppoſing them to be the Conſtantinopolitan horſemen whom they daily expected,with great joy opened the gates of the citie to receiue them as their friends: But they being entred the gates, preſently ſet vpon the Chriſtians, fearing no ſuch matter: and being ſeconded with the other three hundred,which in diſſembling manner had fled before, and were now ſpeedily returned,bringing alſo with them other companies of Turks,before laid in ſecret ambuſh not far off, they woon the great and famous citie of NICE, which they haue euer ſince vntill this day poſſeſſed: the ſpoile wherof was giuen vnto the ſouldiors for a prey,and the citizens all led away into miſerable captiuitie and thraldome. Whileſt Orchanes was thus buſied, his other captaines did with great courage and ſucceſſe enlarge his dominions on all ſides, daily encroching vpon their weake neighbours the Chriſtians. Cunger-Alpes, one of his warlike captaines,ſubdued the country of MVDURN, or MODRIN,in PHRIGIA;and BOLLI in PAPHLAGONIA:appointing one Abdurachman,a man of great valour,to gouerne the country.And at the ſame time another of his old captains called Accecozza,brought CANDARA in PAPHLAGONIA, and ERMENIE, a country neere vnto the mountain HORMINIUS,into the Turkiſh ſubjection: placing garriſons in all the caſtles & forts which he had woon,of whom ſome part of thoſe countries was after his name called Cozza Ilni,that is to ſay,The old mans country. So that Orchanes his kingdome grew daily greater & greater,as well by the induſtrie of his chieftains,as of himſelfe.

The citie of Nice ſurpriſed by the Turks.

About this time, it fortuned the captains ſon of SCAMANDRIA (a town not far from the ruines of the antient citie of TROY, and about a daies journey from the renoumed caſtle of ABYDUS) to depart out of this world: vnto whoſe funerals being kept in the countrey, whileſt his woefull father the captaine with his friends out of SCAMANDRIA reſorted, the old craftie Turke Accecozza lying alwaies in wait, as a fox for his prey, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe heauie Chriſtians, whereof he ſlue the moſt part, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Amongſt whom he alſo tooke the captaine of SCAMANDRIA, with his caſtle and countrey: whom he afterwards led priſoner vnto the caſtle of ABYDVS, which is one of the moſt famous caſtles ſituate vpon the ſea coaſt of ASIA, ouer againſt SESTVS in EVROPE, where the ſea of HELLESPONTVS by the narrow ſtrait falleth into the ſea ÆGEVM: two caſtles much renoumed, by reaſon of their nigh ſituation, and yet placed in diuers parts of the world; eternized alſo by the euer liuing wits of Poets, for the aduenturous paſſage of Leander ouer that fret of the ſea, to his loue Hero: which caſtles are now called DARDANELLY. Accecozza hauing brought the captiue captaine of SCAMANDRIA (lately a man of great account in that country) ſo neer as he could vnto the caſtle of ABYDVS, offred to ſet him at libertie if they would ſurrender their caſtle, otherwiſe they ſhould ſee him cruelly ſlaine before their faces. Theſe Turkiſh threats nothing moued them of ABYDUS, more than to ſay, That they might if they would cut off his head, ſeeth him, and eat him, but the caſtle they intended not to deliuer. The ſame captain was afterward by the cõmandement of Orchanes profered to the emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, to be redeemed, which he refuſed. Yet at the laſt he was ranſomed by the gouernour of NICOMEDIA, and againe ſet at libertie. Accecozza of long time held the caſtle of SCAMANDRIA: yet ſo continually moleſted with the garriſon of ABYDVS, and men of war ſent from CONSTANTINOPLE, that he with his followers were glad for the moſt part to liue on horsbacke, to be alwaies in more readineſſe againſt the attempt of their enemies. The captaine of the caſtle of ABYDVS had at that time a faire young gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as ſhe ſaid) chanced to dreame (what ſhe had happily waking, for the moſt part wiſhed) That being fallen into a deepe mirie ditch, out of which ſhe could by no meanes helpe her ſelfe, a luſtie young gallant comming by, did not onely helpe her out, but alſo in friendly manner, made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coſtly attire. The danger of this dreame much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the yong gentleman was ſo well phantizied in her braine, that waking, ſhe thought ſhe ſtill ſaw him, and ſleeping longed ſore for what ſhe ſaw not. Thus whilſt this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this imaginarie man; the old gray headed Turk Accecozza came, and with a ſtrong companie beſieged her fathers caſtle of ABYDVS. During which ſiege, this gentlewoman oftentimes went vp into the high turret of the caſtle, from whence ſhee might at pleaſure ſee the marſhall deeds on both ſides, and take full view of all the enemies campe. But ſee the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage and no leſſe brauerie, approched neere to the ſiege of the caſtle, ſhe thought (vpon the firſt ſight of him) that he was the verie man whom ſhe had before dreamed of, and whoſe Idea was in her heart ſo deepely imprinted: wherefore ſhe fully reſolued to performe what ſhe had without witneſſe with her ſelfe determined. And waiting another time, when Abdurachman approched the caſtle, ſhe caſt downe to his feet a letter written in Greeke, and made faſt vnto a ſtone: which letter he taking vp, deliuered the ſame to the Generall Accecozza. Wherein after ſhe had diſcouered her paſsionat affection, ſhe promiſed to deliuer the caſtle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turkes would raiſe their ſiege, and Abdurachman himſelfe with ſome few would ſecretly returne to the caſtle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Accecozza like an old fox, which is ſeldome taken in the trap, gaue ſmall credit to theſe louing lines, for feare of treaſon: yet for ſo much as you are the man (ſaid he to Abdurachman) whom ſhe vpon ſpeciall liking hath made choice of for the purpoſe, will you aduenture your perſon? And he, armed with a manly courage, a ſurer defence than any armour of proofe, incited alſo with hope of honour, riches, and beautie, all woorthie prizes for marſhall minds; ſaid he would vndertake the atchieument of that exploit, if it were his pleaſure ſo. Whereupon Accecozza, becauſe nothing ſhould be ſuſpected by his ſudden departure, gaue a ſharpe aſſault to the caſtle, as if hee would haue taken it by fine force, yet in the end retired, and preſently brake vp his ſiege, as diſpairing of the winning thereof. The defendants of the caſtle thinking themſelues deliuered from a great danger, greatly rejoyced: and as in like caſe it oftentimes falleth out, in their great jolitie ſurcharged themſelues that night with exceſſe

exceſſe both of meat and drinke. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed, put himſelfe vpon the way, with certain ſelect ſouldiors, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the caſtle, where the yong gentlewoman was attending his cõming: & he by her means was conueyed into the caſtle, and ſo by her directed to the porters lodge: where he ſlew the porter, being faſt aſleepe, and opening the gates, let in his followers: which went directly to the captaines lodging, and there tooke him priſoner, being before their comming ouertaken with wine, and faſt aſleepe. Thus was the caſtle of ABYDUS ſurpriſed by the Turks, from whence they had a faire proſpect out of ASIA into EUROPE. The captaine with his faire daughter and the greateſt part of the rich ſpoile of the caſtle was deliuered to Abdurachman, to bee preſented to Orchanes at his court, then lying at NEAPOLIS. Who wonderfull glad of ſo good news, gaue the faire gentlewoman with the greateſt part of the prey in reward to Abdurachman. The poſteritie of this man (as they ſay) yet remaine among the Turks. Amongſt others of the warlike captains, there was alſo one Cararachman, whoſe name was ſo dreadfull to thẽ of CONSTANTINOPLE, that when their children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by ſaying Cararachman comes. Not long after the two valiant aforenamed woorthie captaines Cunger-Alpes and Accecozza died: after whoſe death, Orchanes made his ſonnes, Solyman and Amurath, lords and gouernours of thoſe countries and prouinces. And intending (by the perſuaſion of Abdurachman) to beſiege NICOMEDIA, he leuied a great armie, wherewith hee tooke diuers ſmall caſtles and forts as he marched towards the citie. NICOMEDIA was at that time gouerned by an honourable ladie, kinſwoman vnto Andronicus the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: but ſhe ſeeing her citie beſieged by the Turks, and doubting her owne forces not to be able to hold out the ſiege, by a truſtie meſſenger offred to yeeld the citie vnto Orchanes, vpon condition, That ſhe with ſo many of the citizens as would, might in ſafetie depart with their liues, libertie, and goods: which being graunted, ſhe with ſo many as would follow her, departed out of the cittie by night, taking ſhipping for CONSTANTINOPLE.

Nicomedia yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Orchanes hauing taken NICOMEDIA, made his ſonne Solyman gouernour of the ſame. The churches of the Chriſtians he conuerted into Turkiſh Meſchitas or temples. The greateſt church (being of wonderfull beautie) he conuerted into a colledge or ſchoole, for the learned profeſſours and ſtudents of Mahomets law, which is yet called in NICOMEDIA, Orchanes his ſchoole or colledge. And becauſe the countrey neere vnto NICOMEDIA, lying open vpon the ſea, was euer in danger to be ſpoiled by the gallies of CONSTANTINOPLE; he placed in thoſe countries diuers of his moſt experienced ſoldiors to defend the ſame, appointing to euery of them poſſeſſions and penſions, according to their degrees and merits. After this, Orchanes by the counſell of his brother Aladin, commaunded all his men of war to weare white caps, thereby to be knowne from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vſe at this day. The Turks alſo in Orchanes raign, & long time after, vſed not to cut or ſhaue their beards, but did weare them long: ſo that if the king would diſgrace any man, he would in his diſpleaſure commaund his beard to be cut or ſhauen. The manner of cutting and ſhauing their beards, which they now vſe, they learned of the Italians: of whom they haue alſo borrowed many other faſhions, not onely differing, but quite cõtrarie to their antient maners & cuſtomes. Orchanes about this time remoued his court to NICE, where he lay long time after. There he built a ſumptuous church, appointing a preacher to preach vnto the people euery friday: he erected in NICE alſo two faire abbeyes, in the one of which, he with owne hands ſerued the ſtrangers and poore the firſt dinner. He was the firſt that builded abbeyes or monaſteries among the Turks, whoſe example moſt of his ſucceſſours haue imitated, and is amongſt them vſed vnto this day.

Orchanes remoueth his court to Nice.

The gouernment of NICOMEDIA, Orchanes committed to his eldeſt ſonne Solyman (as is beforeſaid) a prince of great towardlineſſe, giuing him in great charge, to haue a vigilant eie vnto the townes of TARAXA, GOVINUCA, and MUDVRNE, which were nigh vnto NICOMEDIA, yet in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians: all which townes, with the countries adjoyning, Solyman in ſhort time got without force, by compoſition. This Solyman was of a princely diſpoſition, ſo tempering juſtice with clemencie in his gouernment, that many Chriſtians (allured with his vertues) became of his religion, and gladly put themſelues vnder his ſubjection: the politicke laws of the countrey he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had ben of antient time accuſtomed, whereby he greatly woon the hearts of the people. Amurath his yonger ſonne, Orchanes made lord and gouernour of PRUSA, after he had remoued his court to NICE. And the caſtle of CHARA-CHIZAR, with the ſeignorie thereto belonging, he gaue to his coſin Artemur, the ſonne of his vncle Iundus.

Orchanes inuadeth the country of Caraſina.

There was at this time in Orchanes court, a noble yong gentleman, called Turſon-beg, the ſon of Charaſis, king of CHARASIA; by whoſe perſuaſion Orchanes in perſon himſelfe with a ſtrong armie, made an expedition into that countrey: for that his fathers ſubiects after the death of the king his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, wiſhing rather to haue Turſon for their ſoueraigne. In whoſe behalfe Orchanes taking that iourney, ſurpriſed by the way many caſtles and townes to his owne vſe. Orchanes was no ſooner entred the countrey of CHARASIA, but Turſons elder brother fled to PERGAMUM, whither the Turks ſhortly purſued him: Where Turſon deſirous to ſpeake with his brother, vnwarily approching the citie, was wounded with an arrow ſhot from the wals, and there ſlaine. With whoſe death Orchanes was ſo greatly offended, that he threatened to deſtroy the whole countrey with fire and ſword, if they did not by a day prefixed generally ſubmit themſelues to his mercie. The people terrefied with this proclamation of ſo great a prince alreadie in armes, yeelded themſelues vnto his ſubiection. The kings ſonne alſo that was fled into PERGAMUM, vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded himſelfe vnto Orchanes, who ſent him to PRUSA, where after he had there liued two yeares, died of the plague: after whoſe death, Orchanes made his ſon Solyman prince of CARASINA. Neither is this taking in of the countrey of CARASINA to be accounted a ſmall conqueſt; one of the greateſt houſes of the Turks the ſucceſſors of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now thereby taking end, and their dominions, which were not ſmall (as containing almoſt all LYDIA, with ſome good parts of MISIA, TROAS, and the leſſer PHRIGIA) now vnited vnto the Othoman kingdome. Orchanes vpon his returne, for the good ſucceſſe of this iourney, built a church and monaſterie at PRUSA, placing therein religious men, with all diligence ſought for out of all his kingdome: of which religious, the Turks write many fables, better worth the ſmiling at than the ſerious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Othoman and Orchanes his ſonne, was contained within the bounds of the leſſer ASIA, which the Turks call ANATOLIA.

The countrey of Caraſina yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Now it reſteth to be ſhewed, vpon what occaſion Orchanes, or rather his ſonne Solyman Baſſa, as it were fatally, with a ſmall power firſt paſſed ouer HELLESPONTUS into EUROPE; where they and their ſucceſſors haue by little and little ſo enlarged their dominions, that they haue now long ago quite ouerthrowne the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdoms, & are at this preſent a terrour to all Chriſtian princes bordering vpon them: to the perpetuall infamie of the Greeks, who for want of courage, and buſied with ciuile diſcord, neuer ſought in time to impeach their greatneſſe.

Orchanes hauing now ſo augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts therof out of ASIA, take view of the pleaſant borders of EUROPE, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow ſea of HELLESPONTUS; and continually incited with the vnſatiable and reſtleſſe deſire of ſoueraignetie, began to deuiſe how he might poſsibly paſſe that ſtrait ſea, and ſet foot into EUROPE, another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his ſonne Solyman: who preſently anſwered his father, That if it would pleaſe him to giue him leaue, he would not doubt to paſſe the ſtrait of HELLESPONTUS, and in time to plant the Mahometane religion in thoſe countries of EUROPE, poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians. Which anſwer of Solyman, much pleaſed his father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his countrey, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought beſt, and as occaſion ſhould beſt ſerue. Solyman taking leaue of his father, tooke his iourney into CARASINA, where riding vp and downe the country, as it had bin for his pleaſure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous citie of TROY ſometime ſtood; where yet (as the Turks and ſome others ſay) are to be ſeene the woonderfull ruines of that vnfortunate citie by the ſea ſide: In this place Solyman ſtood ſtill a great while as it were in a ſtudie, forecaſting (as it ſeemed) ſome great matter; without ſpeking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chiefetains called Ezes-beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts boldly ſaid vnto him: My lord and great ſoueraigne, what ſtrange thing is this, that you are ſo deepely drowned in theſe your melancholy thoughts, vndoubtedly it is ſome great matter that you are ſtudying vpon? Truth it is, ſaid Solyman, for I was thinking how it were poſsible to paſſe ouer this ſea of HELLESPONTUS into the borders of EUROPE, and to take view of that countrey, and ſo to returne vndiſcouered. If this bee the matter, ſaid Ezes-beg (joyning vnto him one Fazil-Beg, a man of no leſſe valour than himſelfe) wee two will by the power of God performe

vnto you this enterpriſe. Then was Solyman deſirous to know of them, about what place they would paſſe ouer: which they well knowing the ſea coaſt, ſhewed him not far off. Wherfore Solyman giuing them leaue, they departed: and ſhortly after máking a little boat, or rather as ſome ſuppoſe a raffe, paſſed ouer HELLESPONTUS by night, and arriued in EUROPE ſide, neere vnto a caſtle of the Turkes, called ZEMBENIC or ZEMBENIC, but of the Greekes Coiridocaſtron, that is to ſay, The hogs caſtle, not farre from SESTUS: where going aſhore, they tooke priſoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the caſtle, whom they finding to bee a good ſenſible fellow, without delay put him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, preſented him to Solyman. This Chriſtian captiue Solyman entertained courteouſly, giuing him great gifts and rich apparrell, to diſcouer vnto him the eſtate of his countrey: and in fine, learned of him a meanes to take the caſtle of ZEMBENIC, before the Chriſtians ſhould thereof be aware. For atchieuement whereof, certaine boats were ſpeedily made readie by Solymans commaundement, and he with eightie choſen ſouldiors eaſily paſſed ouer in them by night, with their Chriſtian guide the Greeke: for in that place, the ſtrait betwixt ASIA and EUROPE is not paſt an Italian mile ouer. This guide brought Solyman directly to the aforeſaid caſtle, where was a great dunghill, ſo high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his ſouldiors eaſily got into the caſtle, which they woon without any great reſiſtance; for it was then harueſt time, and moſt part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne all night, as the vſe of thoſe countries is. Solyman thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle of ZEMBENIC, vſed no extremitie againſt the inhabitants thereof, ſeeking rather by courteſie to gaine their good wils, than by extremitie to force them to his: yet ſuch gentlemen as he tooke, with ſome others alſo of the better ſort, hee ſent by ſhipping into ASIA, and by the ſame ſhips returned ſouldiors as faſt as he could into EUROPE: ſo that he had in one day two hundred ſouldiors more brought ouer vnto him. And manning ſuch ſmall veſſels as hee had left about the caſtle, ſent Ezes-beg alongſt the coaſt on EUROPE ſide, to burne ſuch ſhipping or veſſels as he could find, leaſt the Chriſtians ſhould by them hinder his paſſage vpon the ſtrait of HELLESPONTUS. So in a few daies Solyman had tranſported into EUROPE two thouſand good ſouldiors of the Turks, whom he ſo gouerned, that they did not in any violent ſort injurie the vulgar Chriſtians, by reaſon whereof the common people began to like reaſonable well of the Turks, and to conuerſe with them without feare. This was the firſt comming ouer of the Turks into EUROPE, with purpoſe there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the Othoman kings. For albeit that ſome of that nation had at ſundrie times before come ouer, as men ſeeking after ſpoile, or otherwiſe ſent for, yea ſometimes by the Greeke emperours themſelues; yet neuer ſtayed they long, but hauing done that they came for, or els loſt themſelues, returned backe againe into ASIA: vntill that now conducted by Solyman, and poſſeſſed of the little caſtle of ZEMBENIC (as is aforeſaid) they there tooke ſo faſt footing, as that they and their poſteritie after them, were neuer thence to be ſince that time remoued: but ſtill more and more encroching vpon the Chriſtians, haue vnto their Aſian kingdome joyned a great part of EUROPE alſo, to the terrour of the reſt that yet remaineth, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall (if God will) at large appeare.

The caſtle of Maditus taken by the Turks.

About two miles from ZEMBENIC in CHERSONESVS was another caſtle called MAITO, or more truely MADITVS, which Solyman alſo tooke: ſo that now he had gotten two caſtles in EVROPE, both which he ſtongly manned. After which time, the Turkes in great numbers came out of ASIA into EVROPE ouer that narrow ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS, to dwell in CHERSONESVS: and Solyman inſtead of them, to make roome for his Turkes, ſent Chriſtians out of EVROPE to be placed amongſt the Turkes in ASIA. The report of this comming ouer of the Turkes into CHERSONESVS, and of the taking of the caſtle of ZEMBENIC carried in poſt to CONSTANTINOPLE, was ſufficient to haue ſtirred vp any prouident or carefull men, preſently to haue taken vp armes for the recouerie of the loſt caſtle, and the driuing out againe of the barbarous enemies out of EVROPE, before they had gathered any greater ſtrength, or ſetled themſelues in thoſe places: but ſuch was the careleſſe negligence and great ſecuritie of the proud Greekes, that inſtead thereof they to extenuate the greatneſſe of the loſſe, commonly ſayd, That there was but an hogſtie loſt; alluding vnto the name of the caſtle: and vainely (as ſayth a graue Father of their owne) jeaſting at that was not to be jeaſted at, and laughing at that was not to bee laughed, but lamented for; as in few yeares it prooued, their fooliſh laughter being not without good cauſe conuerted into moſt bitter teares.

Solyman his ſtrength ſo ſtill increaſing by the dayly comming ouer of the Turkes, hee proceeded farther to ſpoyle the countrey of CHERSONESVS, almoſt as farre as CALLIPOLIS, diſtant from the caſtle ZEMBENIC about two and twentie miles: after which pleaſant citie the proud Turke began now to long. Which the gouernour thereof perceiuing by the Turkes continuall encroaching vpon him, rayſed what power he was able to make, and ſo went out againſt them; all the reſt of the Greekes in the meane time lying ſtill as if they had beene aſleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them: but meeting the Turkes, he was by them (after a great conflict) ouerthrowne, and for ſauegard of his life glad to flie into his citie: after whom the Turkes following, ſpoyled the countrey round about, and in their returne by plaine force tooke the citie, together with the caſtle alſo: which hapned in the yeere of our Lord 1358. Where the madneſſe of the Greeks was againe more than before to bee wondred at; for the newes of the loſſe of CALIPOLIS being brought to CONSTANTINOPLE, the people there made ſmall account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loſſe, and much concerned the ſtate: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke thereof, in jeaſting wiſe commonly ſaid, That the Turks had but taken from them a pottell of wine: but by taking of ſuch hogſtyes and pottels of wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few yeares after had gone ſo farre in THRACIA, that Amurath (this ſame Solyman his Nephew which now tooke from the Greekes the citie of CALLIPOLIS) euen in the heart (as it were) of the Greeke empire, placed his royall ſeat at HADRIANOPLE: and immediately after him Baiazet his ſonne (hauing ſubdued all the countrey, euen to the walles of CONSTANTINOPLE) for certaine yeares layd hard ſiege vnto the imperiall citie it ſelfe; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mightie Tartar prince Tamerlaine (vnto Baiazet fatall) in the meane time hapned: whereby (God ſo appointing it) the proſperous ſucceedings of the Turkes were for a ſpace well ſtayed, that they ſhould not before the time by him prefined, deuour the reliques of the Greeke empire. And it were to be wiſhed that the Chriſtians of our time alſo (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead ſleepe: who of late haue loſt vnto the ſame enemie, not the caſtle of ZEMBENIC, or the citie of CALLIPOLIS, but whole kingdomes, as HVNGARIE, and CYPRVS: and are ſtill faire in the way; I ſay no more for greefe, and foreboding of euill fortune. But againe to our purpoſe, Solyman hauing made this proſperous entrance into EVROPE, and there got ſtrong footing, by ſpeedie meſſengers certified his father what he had done, and that it was expedient for him with all ſpeed to ſend vnto him a great ſupplie of men of warre, as well for the ſure defence and keeping of the caſtles and forts by him alreadie gotten, as for the further inuaſion of the countrey. This meſſage was woonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Sarazins, at that preſent were come into the countrey of CARASINA to poſſeſſe the dwellings and places of them, which in hope to better their eſtate were before gone ouer into EVROPE; all theſe Sarazins hee commaunded to paſſe ouer into EVROPE likewiſe: which they did accordingly, ſeating themſelus for a time in the countrey neere to CALIPOLIS. In the meane time, Solyman omitted no oportunitie to enter further into the countrie, winning ſmall forts and holds, and ſtill peopling the ſame with his Turkes: And on the other ſide, they of CARASINA paſſed ouer into EVROPE, placing thēſelues as it were in a new world. For which cauſe, and for the great deſire they had to extend the Turkiſh dominion and religion, they refuſed no paines of warre: ſo that all things at that time proſpered with the Turkes, and went backward with the Chriſtians.

In the time of theſe warres, not farre from CALLIPOLIS, was a little caſtle called CONGERE, the captaine whereof was by a Greeke name called Calo Ioannes, a valiant and painefull man: this captaine continually moleſted and troubled the Turks which lay on that ſide of CALIPOLIS, vnder the leading of Ezes-beg, many of whom he ſlew and tooke priſoners, as hee could find them at any aduantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by craftie and ſecret eſpials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his caſtle to doe ſome exploit vpon the Turks: whereupon he preſently ſo beſet the caſtle with ſouldiors, that hee could by no meanes returne thither, but hee muſt firſt fall into their hands; and for more aſſurance placed others alſo in bywaies, leaſt he ſhould by any way eſcape. The captaine ignorant of all this, proſecuted his enterpriſe, and hauing taken a Turke priſoner, thinking to returne to his caſtle, was haſtely purſued by Fazill-Beg: for which cauſe, making the more haſt, he ſuddainly fell into the danger of the Turks laid in ambuſh: where his men were all ſlaine, and he himſelfe taken and brought before his own caſtle, caſtle, and had there his head preſently ſtrucke off: whereupon the caſtle was forthwith by them that were therein (hauing now loſt their captaine) ſurrendred, and Chazi Ili Beg, a valiant captaine of the Turks, placed in the ſame: who from thence neuer ceaſed to trouble the countrey, euen to the wals of DIDYMOTICHUM, as did Solyman alſo out of CALLIPOLIS.

Thus in the ſpace of one yeare the Turks got ſtrong footing in EUROPE, poſſeſſing diuers caſtles and townes, with the countrey about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captaines and ſouldiors, as appeareth by the graues and trombes of Ezes-beg and Fazill-beg, the two which firſt came ouer into EUROPE, which are there yet well knowne.

About this time it fortuned, that as this martiall prince Solyman was for his diſport hawking in the fields of BOLAYRE, on EUROPE ſide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horſe ouerthrowne in a ditch, of which fall he being ſore bruſed, ſhortly after died. The newes of his death being brought to Orchanes his father, gaue vnto him (then being ſicke) juſt occaſion of great ſorrow: ſo that within two moneths after he died alſo, being foureſcore yeares old, when hee had thereof raigned 31 yeares; and died about the yeare of our Lord 1359. Some hiſtories report otherwiſe, both of his death, and of the time wherein he liued: as that he ſhould be ſlaine in a battell againſt the Tartars, or as others write, with an arrow at the ſiege of PRUSA, in the yeare of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunclauius in his hiſtorie collected out of the Turks owne chronicles whom we follow as moſt probable, reporteth it as before.

The death of Solyman Beſſa, Orchanes his eldeſt ſonne.

The death of Orchanes.

This Orchanes was wiſe, courteous, and bountifull, more ingenious than his father in deuiſing warlike engins. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbeies, Colledges, and Cels, and was in his ſuperſtitious religion very zealous: inſomuch, that he appointed penſions to all ſuch as could in the church ſay the booke of Mahomets law by heart: and appointed competent maintenance for all Iudges of his courts, becauſe they ſhould not take any thing in reward of his ſubiects, for the peruerting of juſtice. He greatly inlarged his kingdome in ASIA, and not content to bee incloſed with the ſeas of EVXINUM and HELLESPONTUS, ſet faſt footing in EVROPE; which ſome attribute to his ſonne Amurath. He was vnto the Chriſtians alwaies a moſt mortall enemie, and ſo died.

Whileſt Amurath in his deepe thoughts, of greatneſſe plots the ground:
The wrangling Greekes by force of arms he ſeekes how to confound.
And wholy bent for to extend his kingdome, with his power, Pierſing the confines of EVROPE, doth what he meets deuour.
As men diſmaid, the Thracians quake, to ſee their foule diſgrace:
Amiddeſt whom, the tyrant ſtout his ſcepter proud doth place.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TVRKES, AND THE GREAT AVGMENTOR OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Amurath the yonger ſonne of Orchanes ſucceeded his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, his elder brother Solyman being dead a little before his father. This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkiſh kings, aduanced the Mahometane religion, and had therein wonderfull ſucceſſe. In the beginning of his raigne, he gathered a great armie out of all parts of his kingdome, to PRUSA; purpoſing to paſſe ouer HELLESPONTUS, to inuade the Chriſtians in THRACIA. But vnderſtanding, that the other Mahometane princes in ASIA, had combined themſelues againſt him, hee was thereby enforced to leaue his former determination for EUROPE, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which wars he mightily preuailed againſt them, and returned with victorie to PRUSA. But hauing ſo ſubdued thoſe confederat princes, he the next yeare after proſecuted his warres before intended againſt the Chriſtians in EUROPE. For which purpoſe hauing leuied a ſtrong armie in ASIA, he paſſed ouer to CALLIPOLIS, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schahin: whoſe graue aduice and counſaile he moſt followed in all his waightie affaires, being at that time one of his cheefe counſellors. From CALLIPOLIS he marched to the caſtle of BENUTUM, which was by compoſition yeelded vnto him. From thence he went to TZVRVLUS, where the Chriſtians gaue him a ſharpe encounter: but in the end he wan the towne, and caried away the victorie. And ſo proceeding farther, tooke diuers other ſmall caſtles and townes in that part of THRACIA, which of the antient Romane Colonies was then called ROMANIA, and now of the Turks RUMILIA, namely MESINE, BUROOS, and others; whereof ſome he vttetly raſed, and into the reſt put ſtrong garriſons. At this time alſo, Chaſi-ilbeg, and Eurenoſes, two of his moſt valiant captaines, tooke certaine forts ſtanding vpon the riuer MERITZA, in auncient time called HEBRUS. Whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the countrey thereabouts. Wherwith the captaine of DIDYMOTICHUM offended, gathered his ſouldiors together, intending to haue intercepted the great captaine Chaſi-ilbeg: in which attempt he loſt moſt of his followers, and was himſelfe there taken priſoner. For whoſe ranſome and certain other conditions, the citizens of DIDYMOTICHUM yeelded the citie vnto the Turks.

Amurath ſucceedeth his father Orchanes in the Turkiſh kingdome.

Didymotichum yeelded vnto the Turks.

Shortly after Amurath ſent his tutor Lala Schahin to beſiege HADRIANOPLE, now called ANDRINOPLE, but in antient time ORESTIAS: of whoſe comming the Chriſtians hearing, encountred him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battaile, wherin many were on both ſides loſt: but in the end, the Chriſtians being put to the worſt, retired againe to the citie. Of this victorie Schahin ſent newes vnto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians: who thereupon ſending Chaſis and Eurenoſis before, he himſelfe with a great armie followed after to the ſiege of HADRIANOPLE: of whoſe comming, the gouernour of HADRIANOPLE vnderſtanding, fled ſecretly out of the cittie by night to ÆNUS. The citizens ſeeing themſelues ſo forſaken of their gouernour, yeelded their citie vnto Amurath, in the yeare of our Lord 1362.

Hadrianople yeelded vnto the Turks.

The taking of theſe ſtrong cities in THRACIA, eſpecially of DIDYMOTICHUM and HADRIANOPLE is (by ſome of the Turks owne Hiſtories) otherwiſe reported: which, becauſe it is neither improbable nor diſagreeing from the ſubtile dealings of the Turkes, and of themſelues alſo recei-

receiued, I haue thought good to set downe as their owne Historiographers report the same.

The Turkish king Amurath had (as they say, and as truth was) in the beginning of his raigne concluded a peace with the Christians of THRACIA: during which peace, the Gouernour of DIDYMOTICHUM intending to fortifie his citie with new and stronger fortifications against the assaults of the Turkes, entertayned all the masons, carpenters, and other workemen hee could by any meanes get: which Amurath vnderstanding, secretly caused two hundreth good and lustie workemen and labourers to come out of ASIA, to offer their seruice vnto the gouernour; who gladly entertained them, vsing their helpe in that his great and hastie worke. Which thing some of the wiser sort of the citizens disliking, wished the Gouernour to beware of those Asian workemen, as by them suspected. But he presuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and considering they were but base workemen, and no souldiers, had the lesse care of them: neuertheless (vsing their work all day) he commanded them to lodge without the wals of the citié euery night. Amurath vnderstanding that these workemen were thus by the Gouernour entertained, sent for the valiant captaine Chasis-Ilbeg, and requested him with thirtie other good souldiours disguised as poore laborers to go to DIDYMOTICHUM to seeke for worke, and in doing thereof to espie if any oportunitie might be found for the surprising of the citie. Chasis with these thirtie according to Amurath his direction, comming as poore men lacking worke, found entertainement at DIDYMOTICHVM, where they caried stones, morter, and such like things, euer shewing themselues verie diligent in their worke: Chasis with vigilant eye still awayting what might best serue his turne for the surprising of the citie. When night was come, the Turkish workemen and labourers after their accustomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour appointed, went out of the citie into the suburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chasis secretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and shewed him how one of the gates of the citie might vpon the sudden be taken, if it would please him to place a sufficient number of Turks in ambush neere vnto the citie, to joyne with him and the other Turkish labourers when occasion should serue. Which being resolued vpon, Amurath sent him backe againe to put this his deuise in execution: so Chasis returning to DIDYMOTICHVM brake the matter to so many of the Asian workemen as hee thought conuenient, fully instructing them what was to be done. The next day (according to his appointment) the Christians being then at dinner, these Turkish workmen and labourers fell at wordes among themselues, and from wordes to fayned blowes: in which counterfait brawle & tumult, they suddenly ran to one of the gates of the citie fast by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands vppon the warders weapons, as if it had beene to defend themselues against their fellowes, suddenly set vpon those warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner also, and so presently slew them: which done, they opened the gate of the citie, and let in the other Turkes which lay in wait not farre off: who with great celeritie entring the citie, presently took the same, and there put the cheefest of the citizens to the sword, sparing the rest of the meaner sort.

Rhodestum surprised by the Turke.

The citie of RHODESTUM (of the old writers called RHŒDESTUM) was by Amurath his commaundement, in this time of peace, by sudden assault giuen in the night by the lord Eurenoses, taken also.

With this foule dealing and breach of league, yet in force, the Christians hardly charged Amurath; who turned it ouer to the vntrulinesse of his captaines and men of warre, whom he threatned with great seueritie to punish: and to giue the better colour that it was done without his priuitie, he had fained himselfe sicke all the while these things were in doing. But being requested to restore these cities so wrongfully taken frō the Christians, he vtterly refused so to do, saying, That it was against the law of his great prophet Mahomet, to deliuer againe vnto the Christians, any towne or citie wherin the Mahometan religion had ben once openly taught. Wherevpon warres began againe to arise on fresh betwixt the Christians and him, wherein somtime the one preuayled, and sometime the other: in such sort as that those warres at length became vnto them both verie tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Christians of HADRIANOPLE, SELYBRIA, and CONSTANTINOPLE: yet desiring nothing more in heart, than to take the citie of HADRIANOPLE: which the better to bring to passe, he caused Chasis-Ilbeg as a discontented captaine to flye to HADRIANOPLE, pretending himselfe to haue been hardly vsed by the tyrant his master: where hauing in his companie other such dissembling fugitiues as was himselfe, he oftentimes issued out of the citie and valiantly skirmished with the Turks; which so greatly greatly pleaſed the gouernour of HADRIANOPLE, that he thereby grew into his great fauour. Many other Turkes alſo vnder pretence of like diſcontentment, reſorted vnto Chaſis: wherewith finding himſelfe well ſtrengthened, he writ letters ſecretly vnto Amurath, That he would deliuer one of the gates of HADRIANOPLE vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if he would againſt the ſame time be readie to ſend him preſent ſuccors. All things being agreed vpon, Chaſis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the citie, accompanied but with ten of his followers, as if he would haue gone forth to hunt, as he had before accuſtomed. But ſo ſoone as the gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpoſe, furiouſly ſet vpon the warders, whom they ſlew; and being aided by the reſt of the fugitiue Turks (which with all ſpeed by appointment before made, reſorted vnto them) they poſſeſſed the gate; vntill a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambuſh neere vnto the citie, hauing knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarme, ſpeedily came on, and by that gate entred the cittie: where was fought a cruell fight all that day, euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turks preuailing, tooke the citie, which they haue euer ſince poſſeſſed vnto this day.

Theſe great cities of THRACIA thus takē, or otherwiſe as aforeſaid (for that I leaue for the Reader to thinke of as he pleaſeth) Amurath appointed the ſeat of his royall Court at HADRIANOPLE, as a place of all others moſt fit for the further inuaſion of the Chriſtians, and enlarging of his kingdom in EVROPE: from whence ſuch a world of miſchiefs & woe hath ſince that time ouerflowed a great part of Chriſtendome & drowned ſo many goodly kingdoms in EUROPE, as that both they, and moſt part of the reſt that yet remaine (dayly in dread of like deſtruction) might iuſtly accurſe and deteſt the wofull careleſneſſe and degenerate cowardiſe of the Greekes, were not they themſelues together with the glorie of their church and empire, ſwallowed vp in the ſame gulfe of calamitie and woe, and ſo become of all others moſt miſerable: but what auaile vaine complaints, but to encreaſe old griefes? wherefore againe to that we haue in hand.

The prowd Sultan Amurath (hauing to his great content thus ſeated himſelfe at HADRIANOPLE, in the middeſt of THRACIA) preſently ſent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a great power to inuade the countrey about PHILIPPOPOLIS with the countrey of ZAGORA, which lyeth towards the great mountain HŒMUS, where the beſt Turkiſh Scimitars were made; giuing like charge vnto Eurenoſes, for the ſubduing of the territorie of IPSALA: who both notably performed what hee had commaunded, and in ſhort time brought all thoſe countreys vnder his ſubiection, wherein hee ſhortly after placed diuers ſanzacks or gouernours, for the better aſſurance thereof being ſo lately gayned.

About this time (by the ſuggeſtion of Cara Ruſtemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadileſher or chiefe Iuſtice amongſt the Turks, but afterwards better knowne by the name of Catradin Baſſa, by the commaundement of Amurath, tooke order that euerie fifth captiue of the Chriſtians, being aboue fifteen yeeres old, ſhould bee taken vp for the king, as by law due vnto him: and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay vnto the king for euerie head 25 aſpers, by way of tribute: appointing officers for collecting both of ſuch captiues and tribute mony, of whom the aforeſaid Cara Ruſtemes himſelfe was chiefe, as firſt deuiſer of the matter. By which meanes great numbers of Chriſtian youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues, which by the counſel of the ſame Zinderlu Chelil, were diſtributed amongſt the Turkiſh husbandmen in ASIA, there to learne the Turkiſh language, religion, and manners: where after they had been brought vp in all painefull labour and trauaile by the ſpace of two or three yeeres, they were called vnto the court, and choice made of the better ſort of them to attend vpon the perſon of the prince, or to ſerue him in his warres: where they dayly practiſing all feats of actiuitie, are called by the name of Ianizars (that is to ſay, new ſouldiers.) This was the firſt beginning of the Ianizars vnder this Sultan Amurath the firſt, but had great encreaſe vnder Amurath the ſecond, in ſo much that Iouius with ſome other Hiſtoriographers, attribute the beginning of this order vnto him: which neuertheleſſe (as appeareth by the Turks owne hiſtories) had the beginning as is aforeſaid: and hath euer ſince been continued by the Turkiſh kings and emperors, by the ſame and ſome other greater meanes; ſo that in proceſſe of time they be grown to that greatnes as that they are oftentimes right dreadfull vnto the great Turke himſelfe: after whoſe death, they haue ſometimes preferred to the empire ſuch of the emperours ſonnes as they beſt liked, without reſpect of prerogatiue of age, contrarie to the will of the great Sultan himſelfe: and are at this day the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire, and not vnlike in time to be the greateſt cauſe of the ruine thereof: the finger of the higheſt oftentimes (as wee haue before ſaid) turning euen thoſe helps which were by mans wiſedome prouided for the eſtabliſhing of kingdoms, vnto their more ſpeedie deſtruction; and eſpecially theſe continuall gariſons of martiall men, no leſſe to be feared than truſted, as in the courſe of this hiſtorie may appeare. G

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at HADRIANOPLE, determining now to returne vnto ASIA, he made Schahin his tutor Beg-Lerbeg or viceroy of ROMANIA; and Eurenoſes lord gouernour of the marches; Zinderlu Chelil hee made Vezir Azemes or lord preſident of his counſell, and changing his name called him Cairadin Baſſa, that is to ſay, The Baſſa that had well deſerued, his name witneſsing his good deſert. After this hee returned into ASIA, H where he ſpent that winter at PRVSA. Theſe two great men Cairadin Baſſa & Cara Ruſtemes before named, ſometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkiſh hiſtories report) the firſt that corrupted the Turkiſh court with couetouſneſſe and briberie, and are therefore of them euen yet much blamed.

Boga taken by Amurath, and recouered again and raſed by the Chriſtians.

Boga new built by the Turks.

Whilſt Amurath thus wintered in ASIA, news was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of SERVIA and BULGARIA had gathered a great armie for the beſieging of HADRIANOPLE: which cauſed him to prepare great forces in ASIA, to aid his captaines in EUROPE. But in returning out of ASIA, hee by the way tooke the towne of BOGA; where hee put to ſword all the Chriſtians that were therein able to beare armes, leading the reſt into captiuitie, and with the ſpoile rewarded his ſouldiours. This ſtrong towne was not long after againe recouered by the Chriſtians, who requited the Turkes with like meaſure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raſed it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this preſent to be ſeene: which was done in the yeare of our Lord 1365. I

In the meane time, the Chriſtian armie of SERVIA and BULGARIA, in number betwixt fortie and fiftie thouſand, marching towards HADRIANOPLE, and now come very neere the ſame, fell in mutinie among themſelues. Whereof the Turks by their eſpials hauing intelligence, ſuddainely in the night ſet vpon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no leſſe fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to joyne their forces againſt them, but were readie to turn their weapons one vpon another; and ſo by their owne diſcord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey vnto the Turks, by whō they were put to flight, & ſlain, with ſo great a ſlaughter, that the place wherin they fell, not far frō GERMIA, is thereof at this day called Zirf Zindugi, that is to ſay, the place wherein the Seruians were ouerthrowne. The news of this ſo notable a victorie, with the fift part of the ſpoile, & a great number of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) ſent to Amurath into ASIA, being now readie with a great power to haue come ouer CALLIPOLIS: who joyfull therof, & glad to ſee ſuch a preſent, the aſſured witneſſe of the victorie, returned againe to PRUSA. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare alſo Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumciſed his two ſonnes, Baiazet, and Iacup. At which time he alſo built a temple, with a monaſterie, and a colledge, at BILEZUGA: and another faire church at NEAPOLIS: at PRUSA he alſo built a ſtately pallace in the caſtle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which citie he alſo founded an abbey and a colledge. K L

Germean Ogli, a great Mahometane prince in ASIA (whoſe territorie for the moſt part lay in the greater PHRYGIA, and the countries thereabout, bordering vpon the Othoman kingdome) hauing alwaies enuied at the riſing of the Othoman kings (as did all the reſt of the Mahometane princes of the Selzuccian familie) and fearing that their greatneſſe might after his death grow dangerous vnto his ſonne Iacup, being now himſelfe very aged; thought good for the more ſafetie of his ſtate, to joyne in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpoſe ſent Iſaach (a learned doctor of the Mahometane law) embaſſador vnto him, with many rich preſents, and to offer his daughter, the ladie Hatun, in marriage vnto his ſonne Baiazet: promiſing with her in dowrie diuers great cities and townes, with their territories in PHRYGIA and BITHYNIA, adjoyning vpon the Othoman kingdome; namely CUTAIE, SIMAU, EGREGIOS, TAUSANLE, and others. Neither M was this a ſmall dowrie, but well beſeeming ſo great a prince: the citie of CUTAIE being at this day the place whereat the Turkiſh emperours great lieutenant or viceroy in ASIA, is alwaies reſiant, as in the heart of his kingdome in the leſſer ASIA. Of which match ſo offered, Amurath liking well, contracted his ſonne Baiazet vnto the ſaid ladie: and for ſolemnization of the mariage, prepared all things with great magnificence, ſending his embaſſadours to moſt of the Mahometane

A tane kings and princes, both farre and neere, to inuite them thereunto: commaunding alſo moſt of the nobilitie of his kingdome, to honour the ſame with their preſence. The time of this mariage drawing neere, embaſſadours came to Amurath his court, from all the princes before inuited: amongſt whom the embaſſadour from the Ægyptian Sultan had the higheſt place. Theſe embaſſadors brought with them many great and rich gifts, ſuch as well beſeemed the great princes their maſters, which they with all reuerence preſented vnto Amurath. At length amongſt the reſt of his owne nobilitie came the lord Eurenoſes, whom he had before left gouernour of the frontiers of his kingdome in EUROPE: who beſides many other rich gifts, not eaſily to be valued, preſented vnto Amurath an hundred goodly boyes, with as many beautifull yong maidens,
B all Chriſtian captiues, ſitably attired in garments richly embrodered with gold and ſiluer, euerie one of them carrying a cup of gold in the one hand, and a cup of ſiluer in the other; the cups of gold hauing in them diuers precious ſtones of great value, and the cups of ſiluer being filled with gold. The richneſſe of this preſent was ſo great, that all the embaſſadours of the forraine princes much wondered thereat. All which rich gift, Amurath moſt bountifully beſtowed vpon the ſtrange embaſſadours: and the preſents which were ſent vnto him from other princes, he liberally gaue to Eurenoſes. The learned and religious which came to that mariage, hee ſo bountifully rewarded alſo, that none came to the ſame poore, but he went away rich. He had before ſent diuers of his nobilitie, with an hundred ladies and gentlemen, and a guard of three thouſand horſemen, to attend the comming of the bride. On the other ſide, the old prince Germean-Ogli meeting
C this honourable companie vpon the way, ſaluted euery man of account, according to his degree: and bringing them to one of his cities, in moſt royall manner feaſted them, beſtowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts: all which things with great ſolemnitie performed, he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the moſt antient ladies, whereof the one had beene Baiazet his nurſe; and ſo taking leaue of his daughter, ſent her away, accompanied with his wife Ienſes, and other of his courtiers: who conueying her to PRUSA, ſhe was there in moſt roiall manner married to Baiazet. The cities and townes promiſed in dowrie, were accordingly deliuered into the poſſeſsion of Amurath, who ſhortly after tooke poſſeſsion of the ſame, and furniſhed them with his owne garriſons.

At this marriage Chuſen Beg, prince of AMISUM in GALATIA, by his embaſſadour ſold his D territorie of AMISUM vnto Amurath, with many faire cities and townes: doubting as it was thought, how to be able to keep them, now that Amurath was come ſo neere him, whom he ſaw not to let ſlip any occaſion offered vnto him for the enlarging of his kingdome. When Amurath had in this ſort ſpent great time in ASIA, hee gathered a ſtrong armie to returne into EUROPE: but before his departure, he committed the gouernment of his kingdome in ASIA (which the Turks call ANATOLIA) vnto his ſonne Baiazet, joyning with him Temurtaſes, a valiant man of great experience: and hauing ſet all things in order in ASIA, paſſed ouer HELIESPONTUS to CALLIPOLIS, from whence hee marched towards HADRIANOPLE; and becauſe hee would take ſome thing in his way, he beſieged MAGALGARA, which hee in ſhort time woon: where Lala Schahin and Eurenoſes with all their forces came to him: which two captaines he ſent to be-
E ſiege the citie PHERÆ, which was by them after a few dayes ſiege taken. But he himſelfe to bee reuenged vpon Lazarus the Deſpot, led his armie into SERVIA: where after hee had without reſiſtance forraged the countrey foureteene daies, vnderſtanding by his captaines, that the ſtrong citie of NISSA, being the metropoliticall citie of SERVIA, was as it were the key of that kingdome, he preſently marched thither, and laid ſiege to the ſame, and by the aduice of Iaxis Beg, the ſonne of Temurtaſes, in ſhort time woon it. Which thing ſo daunted Lazarus, Deſpot or lord of SERVIA, that he deſpairing in his owne forces, hauing ſo ſoone loſt one of his ſtrongeſt cities, foorthwith ſent embaſſadours to Amurath, to entreat a peace: offering to pay him a yearely tribute of fiftie thouſand pounds, and to aid him with a thouſand men in his wars, whenſoeuer he ſhould require: vpon which conditions Amurath graunted him peace, and ſo departed out of F SERVIA. In this expedition he alſo with much ado woon the great citie of APPOLONIA, neere vnto the mount ATHOS, and gaue leaue vnto moſt of the Chriſtians with their wiues and children to depart, and ſuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof ſpoiled by the ſouldiors. This done, he returned backe to HADRIANOPLE, leauing Eurenoſes vpon the marches, who ſhortly after tooke BERRHEA, with diuers other townes. At which time alſo, Lala Schahin woon ZICHNE and SERES, in the confines of MACEDONIA, with many other ſtrong townes vpon the frontiers of THESSALIA and THRACE. In the citie SERES Eurenoſes made his abode G as in a cheefe frontier towne: and becauſe the Chriſtians for feare of the Turks were all fled out of the country about SERES, great numbers of people were ſent for out of ASIA, to inhabit that countrey by the Chriſtians forſaken in the confines of MACEDONIA. Amurath had not long continued at HADRIANOPLE, but that he was aduertiſed out of ASIA, that Aladin his ſonne in law, king of CARAMANIA, did with fire and ſword inuade his dominions in ASIA: with which newes he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cauſe ſending for his counſailors and nobilitie to the court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and ali-ance, with all hoſtilitie inuaded his prouinces in ASIA, whileſt he with the great danger of his perſon, and greater terror of his enemies, ſought with honour the encreaſe of the Mahometane H ſincere religion (as he tearmed it) in EUROPE: from which godly warres (ſaid hee) I am againſt my will enforced to turne my ſword, in juſt defence of my ſelfe, againſt men joyned with vs both in religion & alliance. And hauing thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Baſſa his lieutenant generall in EVROPE, and alſo made his ſonne Alis Baſſa, one of his counſaile, although he were by ſome thought too yong for ſo great a place. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order according to his mind in EUROPE, tooke paſſage from CALLIPOLIS into ASIA, and ſo to his court at PRUSA, where he ſpent that winter. In which time embaſſadors came vnto him frō the Sultan of ÆGYPT, for the renewing of their former amitie and friendſhip, which Amurath tooke very thankefully, and ſent them backe againe loden with kind letters and princely rewards.

Amurath and Aladin prepare themſelues for warre.

When the Spring was come in the year 1387, he leuied a mightie armie to make war vpon the I Caramanian king, his ſonne in law. Whereof Aladin certainely informed, prepared no leſſe power to meet him, aſſociating vnto him all the other leſſe Mahometane princes of ASIA, which were not vnder Amurath his obeiſance, to whom the Othoman kings were now growne terrible;
which princes brought with them great ſupplies to joyne with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himſelfe now ſtrong ynough for Amurath his father in law, ſent an embaſſadour vnto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in power inferiour to him, and therefore did nothing feare him: yet if it pleaſed him to haue peace, that hee could for his part be content to hearken vnto the ſame vpon reaſonable conditions: but if hee had rather haue warre, he ſhould find him readie to dare him battaile in the field, whenſoeuer hee ſhould come. For anſwere of which embaſſage, Amurath willed the embaſſadour to tell the perjured K king his maſter, That he had of late contrarie to his faith before giuen, in moſt cruell manner in-uaded his dominions, whileſt he was buſied in moſt godly warres (as hee tearmed it) againſt the misbeleeuing Chriſtians: from proſecuting whereof, hee was by his violence (as hee ſaid) with-drawne, contrarie to the law of their great prophet: for which outrages and wrongs, hee would ſhortly come and take of him ſharpe reuenge; and that therefore hee was to expect nothing at his hands but warre, for which he willed him ſo to prouide, as that at his comming he might not find him wanting to himſelfe. Aladin by his embaſſadour hauing receiued this anſwere from Amurath, aſſembled all the confederate princes, his allies, with great perſuaſions and greater promiſes encouraging them to this warre: and they againe kiſsing the ground at his feet, as the manner of that nation is before great princes, promiſed with ſolemne oaths neuer to forſake him, but to L to doe all things which princes deſirous of honour and fame, ought by their oath to do for their ſoueraigne, to whom they ought homage and dutie.

The death of Chairadin Baſſa.

In this great preparation for wars in ASIA, Chairadin Baſſa, generall gouernor in EUROPE died: which Amurath vnderſtanding, appointed Alis Baſſa his ſonne to goe into EUROPE, there to be gouernour in his fathers ſtead. But he was ſtaied in his journey by vrgent occaſions, which Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent for him backe againe in poſt.

Aladin forecaſting the great dangers like to enſue of this warre, ſent another embaſſadour to Amurath, with reaſonable conditions of peace: to whom Amurath anſwered, That if Aladin had made that offer one moneth before, hee would perhaps haue accepted thereof: but for ſo much as he had done him great wrong, and that hee had now to his infinite charge drawne him M into the field ſo farre from home, hee would not make any other end, than ſuch as the chance of warre ſhould appoint: And whereas he in diſgrace had called me a heardſman or ſhepheard (ſaid
he) if he be not ſuch a one himſelfe, as he ſaith me to be, let him meet me in the field, and there trie his valour. Hereunto the embaſſadour replied, ſaying, That the king his maſter made this offer of peace not for any feare, but to ſaue the effuſion of innocent blood; which conſideration ſet apart,

A apart, he ſhould find him not inferiour to himſelfe, either in number of moſt expert ſouldiours, or other warlike prouiſion: and that therefore, if he rejected this offer of peace, hee needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would beate themſelues ſo valiantly in the field againſt his Turks, as that he ſhould haue no great cauſe to rejoice of his comming thether. Which words of the embaſſador ſo netled Amurath, that in great rage he commaunded him to depart, and to will his maiſter, if hee were a man of ſuch courage and valour as he ſaid, to ſhew himſelfe in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where hee doubted not but in ſhort time to chaſtice him according to his due deſerts. So after the embaſſadour was departed, marching forward three daies, Alis Beg came vnto him, of whoſe comming he not a lit-
B tle rejoyced: for why, he loued him deerelie, and although he was yet of yeares but yoong, relied much vpon his counſaile.

The Embaſſadour returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had ſaid, not omitting his hard ſpeeches and proud threats, and how that hee hoped ſhortly to take from him ICONIVM and LARENDA (the principall cities of CARAMANIA) with many things more, leauing nothing vntold. Which Aladin hearing, ſaid vnto the confederate princes that were with him, Vetilie Amurath threatneth to take from vs our cities of ICONIUM and LARENDA, but let him take heed that we take not from him his faire citie of PRVSA. Then demaunding of the embaſſadour, of what ſtrength Amurath might be? it was anſwered by him, that he deemed him to bee about ſeuentie thouſand ſtrong. Whereat Aladin not a little rejoycing ſaid: Aſſuredly when he
C ſhall ſee our armie, he will not dare to giue vs battaile; or if he do, he ſhall fight vpon great diſaduantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and ſore wearied with long and painefull trauaile.

In the meane time Amurath held on his way towards CARAMANIA, daily encouraging his ſouldiours with perſuaſions and gifts bountifully beſtowed vpon them, filling their heads with promiſes of greater, the warres once happily ended. At length he came to the great plaines in CARAMANIA called the French plains, becauſe in former time the Chriſtians (whom the Turks for moſt part call Frankes) in thoſe places encamped their great armies, as they went to the winning of IERVSALEM (as in the former part of this hiſtorie is declared:) into theſe plaines alſo came Aladin with his armie, and was now encamped within one daies march of Amurath, and D ſo reſted that night.

The next morning Amurath put his armie in order of battaile, appointing the leading of the right wing, to his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, with whom he joyned Gutluzes Beg, Eine Beg Subbaſſa, Egridum Subbaſſa, Seraze, and Cuſtendil, two Chriſtian princes; all captaines of great experience: the left wing was led by Baiazet his eldeſt ſonne, with Ferize and Hozze, both valiant captaines: in which wings were alſo placed the Chriſtian ſouldiors ſent by Lazarus out of SERVIA, according to the late conuention of peace: in the maine battell he ſtood himſelfe: the vauntgard was conducted by Temurtaſes: and the reareward by the Subbaſſa of OXYLLITHUS (called alſo Temurtaſes) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other ſide, with no leſſe care and diligence ſet his men likewiſe in order of battaile, placing himſelfe in the maine battaile as did Amurath; and the prin-
E ces his Allies, with his other expert captaines, ſome in the right wing and ſome in the left, as he thought moſt conuenient: in ſuch ſort, as that in all mens iudgement he was in force nothing inferiour to his father in law.

The great battaile in the plaines of Caramania betwixt Amurath and Aladin.

Theſe great enemies thus ranged, with enſignes diſplaid came on couragiouſly, one directly vpon the other: where approaching together, the confuſed noiſe of trumpets, drummes, fifes, with other inſtruments of warre, the neighing of horſes, and clattering of armour, was ſo great, that whilſt warlike minds thereat rejoyced, cowards thought heauen fell. But the ſigne of battaile on both ſides giuen, Samagazes, one of the confederate princes, with exceeding courage firſt charged Temurtaſes in the vauntguard, and broke his rankes: at which time Teberruſes, a Tartar prince, and Varſacides, another of the confederats, deliuered their arrowes alſo vpon the vaunt-
F guard, as if it had been a ſhower of haile. Which Baiazet ſeeing, and how hardly Temurtaſes was charged, hauing before obtained leaue of his father, brake in vpon the enemie with ſuch violence, as if it had been the lightening: whereof he was euer after ſurnamed Gilderun, which is to ſay, the Lightening. Ferizes and Hozza, with the other valiant captaines in that wing, following Baiazet, with inuincible courage entred the battaile; where for a great ſpace was made a moſt dreadfull and doubtfull fight. A man would haue thought two wrought ſeas had met together, swaying one against the other, doubtfull which way the current would at length fall. In this conflict many thousands were on both sides slain, so that the field lay couered with the dead bodies of worthie men and valiant souldiors: yet at length these confederate princes, finding themselues ouermatched by Baiazet and his souldiors, reseruing themselues to their better fortunes, turned their backes and fled: when Aladin seeing a great part of his armie thus ouerthrowne, and himselfe now readie to be charged with Amurath his whole power, despairing of victorie, sped himselfe in all haste to ICONIUM, his strong citie. The spoile which Amurath got in this battell was great, most part whereof he gaue in reward to Temortases and his souldiors, which had endured the greatest furie of that battaile. Amurath after this victorie with all speed marched to ICONIUM, and there besieged Aladin the Caramanian king, in his strongest cittie, giuing out proclamation in the mean time, That none of his souldiours vpon paine of death should vse any violence to any of the countrey people, or take any thing from them: to the intent it might appeare vnto the world, that he made that warre against that Mahometan king, rather to propulse injurie and wrong, than for desire of soueraignte or spoile. Which his so straight a proclamation, the Christians sent by Lazarus, amongst others, transgressed; and therefore by his commandement suffred (many of them) exemplarie punishment; which was the cause of the Seruian war which not long after ensued, fatall both vnto Amurath and Lazarus the Despot, as hereafter shall appeare.

Aladin flyeth to Iconium.

Iconium besieged by Amurath.

Aladin now on euerie side besieged in ICONIUM, and without all hope of escape, sent vnto the queene his wife, Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his desperat estate, and requesting her by all the loue that so honourable a minded ladie might beare to her miserable husband, to aduenture her selfe to goe to her angrie father, and to craue pardon for his great trespasse and offence. The queene forthwith attiring her selfe, as was fittest for her husbands present estate, came vnto her father: where falling downe at his feet vpon her knees, with wordes wisely placed, and teares distilling downe her faire cheeks from her fairer eies, as if it had been from two fountaines; in most sorrowfull manner, craued her husbands pardon, imputing vnto the heat of youth whatsoeuer he had done: and would not be comforted or taken vp, vntill she had obtained grace.

Amurath most entirely loued this his daughter; and therefore for her sake not onely graunted vnto her, her husbands life (which in short time was like to haue been in his power to haue spilt) but also his kingdome, which he as a victorious conquerour might by law of armes haue of right detained. She now assured of her fathers promise, sent vnto her husband Aladin, willing him the next day without feare to come out of the citie, and in humble sort to acknowledge his fault before her father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and prostrating himselfe before Amurath, acknowledged his vndutifulnes: of whom (for his wiues sake) he obtained pardon, and restitution to his kingdome, with many other great gifts, contrarie to his euil desert. The Latine histories mistaking the man, report that this Caramanian warre, to haue been fought against the king of CARAMANIA, Amurath his owne grandfather by the mothers side; and that he was by Amurath then spoiled of a great part of his kingdom: but it agreeth not with the Turkish histories, which make Amurath to be the sonne of Orchanes and Lulufer, the daughter of the gouernour of the castle of IARCHISER, as is before declared in the life of Othoman; which Lulufer lieth buried by her husband Orchanes, in PRUSA.

This great victorie gotten by Amurath against the Caramanian king, and the other confederat princes, was the true beginning of the greatnesse of the Othoman kingdome in ASIA: wherewith the other Mahometan princes of the Selzuccian family were so discouraged, that they were glad to submit themselues thus first vnto Amurath, and after that vnto his sonne Baiazet: vntill that Tamerlan the great Tartarian prince, some few yeares after, taking Baiazet prisoner in a great battaile at mount STELLA, abated the Othomon pride, and restored the other oppressed Mahometan princes to their old possessions and kingdomes.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way tooke the citie of DESPOTOPOLIS, and comming to CUTAIE brake vp his armie, and so in triumph returned to his court at PRUSA.

Lazarus, Despot of SERVIA (in old time called MYSIA) had sent a thousand armed men to Amurath in this the late Caramanian warre, according to the conuention of the peace not long before made betwixt them: some of which souldiours, were with great seueritie (to the terrour of others) executed in CARAMANIA, for transgressing Amurath his commandement. This great warre being ended, and the armie broken vp at CUTAIE, they with others were licensed to depart into

A into their own countrey. Whoſe Generall (whom they call the Vayuod) returning home, reported vnto Lazarus the Deſpot, the ſucceſſe of that war, and withall in what cruell and tirannicall manner the men he had ſent were in that ſeruice vſed by the commandement of Amurath. With whom (ſaid this Generall) you without cauſe haue made a moſt diſhonourable peace: firſt by giuing your faith to ſuch a miſcreant, and then in ſending your loyall ſubiects in recompence of their good ſeruice, to be ſo butchered at his pleaſure; beſide the ſhamefull tribute which you yearely pay vnto him. Whereas if it would pleaſe you in the depth of your wiſedome, but to know your owne ſtrength, you ſhould find your ſelfe in warlike force and power, nothing infe-riour to the tirant: for wee your ſeruants being in number but a handfull, were in theſe his late
B wars a terrour vnto his enemies, and by our valour and not his owne, hee got the victorie ouer them. What cauſe is there then, that you ſhould ſubject your ſelfe vnto your inferiour? I know he cannot of himſelfe bring into the field aboue fiftie thouſand fighting men: but admit he were able to bring a hundreth thouſand, are not you (if you ſo pleaſe) able to leuie a farre greater power? and for all other warlike prouiſion, you are ten fold better prouided than hee. Beſides that, the mightie Chriſtian princes will ſend you ſuch aid againſt this hatefull and common enemie, that being vnited with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in compariſon of thoſe which you ſhall then be able to bring into the field againſt him: which no doubt the Chriſtian princes will the rather doe, as men deſirous to quench this deuouring fire, in another mans houſe rather than in their owne.

C Theſe words of the Vayuod ſo much mooued Lazarus, that he determined in him ſelfe, to breake that ſeruile league which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cauſe ſent his embaſſadour with ſecret inſtructions to the king of BOSNA (in time paſt called ILLYRIA) his neighbour: whereof the cheeſe point was, to craue his aid againſt the Turke their common ene-mie. By whom the king of BOSNA returned anſwere, That it had been much better ſuch conſi-deration had been thought vpon, before the foule contract (full of diſgrace both to himſelfe, and all other Chriſtian princes) was vpon a vaine feare, by him raſhly made with the Turkiſh tirant:
Yet for ſo much as things done, could not bee vndone, letting that paſſe which was remedileſſe, he promiſed to joyne with him his whole forces, againſt ſo dangerous an enemie. And therevp-pon appointing a place for an enteruiew, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the arti-D cles of their confederation.

Lazarus the Deſpot by his embaſſadour craueth aid of the king of Bozna.

There was in the confines of BOSNA a caſtle called ALEXANDRIA, the captaine whereof being a Chriſtian, was yet tributarie vnto the Turke; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good, as men op-preſſed vſe to doe to them by whom they are ſo wronged. This captaine vnder the colour of friendſhip went to Amurath, and in great ſecrecie opened vnto him the whole ſtate of the kingdome of BOSNA; and withall, that the king thereof intended ſome great matter againſt him:
for preuenting whereof, he offered his owne ſeruice, and ſhewed ſome probable means, how that kingdome might be brought into his ſubjection, if hee would but ſend ſome worthie Generall with a conuenient power for the vndertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleaſed the ambitious old tyrant, who therefore commaunded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the captaine (which a-E mongſt the Turks is taken for a ſure token of the kings great fauour) and foorthwith appointed his tutor Lala Schahin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdome of BOSNA.
Who joyning himſelfe with this deceitfull captaine of ALEXANDRIA, with an armie of twen-tie thouſand men entred into BOSNA; where ouerrunning a ſide of the countrey, he without reſiſtance tooke great booties: and ſeeing no apparent cauſe of feare, to doe the more harme, by the aduice of the ſame captaine, deuided his armie, which he ſent into diuers parts of the country, the more to burne and ſpoile the ſame. Of all whoſe proceedings, the king of BOSNA by ſecret meſſengers from the captaine aduertiſed, had in conuenient places laied ſtrong ambuſhes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich bootie, hauing then with him but a thouſand men, ſuddenly appeared in his way thirtie thouſand Chriſti-F ans well armed: which Schahin ſeeing, thinking it follie to oppoſe ſo few againſt ſo many, would haue preſently fled; but the reſt of the gallants that were with him, preſuming of their good fortune, and loth to looſe their rich prey, would needs firſt skirmiſh with the Chriſtians: in which deſperate conflict they were almoſt all ſlaine, and the ſpoile they had taken, all recouered by the Chriſtians. As for Schahin, he was glad by ſhamefull flight to ſaue himſelfe. The like miſhap befell the other Turks in the other parts of BOSNA, who for the moſt part were likewiſe intercepted and slaine: so that of twentie thousand scarce fiue thousand returned home. G

Amurath maried the emperour of Constantinople his daughter.

Whilest these things were doing in EUROPE, Amurath with great triumph at NEAPOLIS married the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE his daughter: whose two sisters were also giuen in marriage to his two sonnes: at which time he with great solemnitie circumcised three of Baiazet his sonnes. At this time also returned Iazigi Ogli, whom he had before sent embassadour to the Sultan of ÆGIPT, in requitall of the honourable embassage before to him sent from the said Sultan. Now Amurath vnderstanding of the losse of his men in BOSNA, with the reuolt of Lazarus Despot of SERVIA, was therewith much disquieted. Wherefore he commanded Alis Bassa his cheefe counsellour, with all speed to send foorth commissions into all parts of his kingdome, for the leuying of a royall armie: which was done in such post hast, that it was thought H he would haue taken the field before the beginning of the Spring. At which time also the other Mahometane kings and princes of ASIA, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli, and the rest, bound vnto him by homage, with diuers others of smaller power, were sent for, to aid him in this war: who partly for feare, and partly mooued with the zeale of their Mahometane superstition, brought their forces with great deuotion. Vnto this war against the Christians, came also great numbers of the Mahometanes from far countries, as voluntarie souldiors. Baiazet his sonne also, then gouernor of CUTAIE, with a great part of GALATIA, gathering all his forces, came to aid his father in this religious war (as it was by thē tearmed.) The Christian tributarie princes were not then forgotten: of whom two came, namely, Custendyll and Seratzill: other two forsaking Amurath, came not, which was Sasmenos prince of BULGARIA, and the prince of VARNA and DOBRITZA: with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this so great a preparation, old Lala Schahin, Amurath his tutor and faithfull seruitor, died, being a man of great yeares: and Temurtases was appointed gouernour in his place.

The reuolting of the two Christian princes, Sasmenos and the prince of VARNA, much grieued Amurath: wherefore hee commaunded Alis Bassa, with an armie of thirtie thousand, to inuade and spoile Sasmenos his countrey, now called BULGARIA, and in antient time the lower MYSIA. Alis Bassa according to that was giuen him in charge, calling vnto him Iaxis Beg, the sonne of Temurtases, Vlu Beg, Suratze Bassa, with other captaines and commaunders of the Turks prouinces in EUROPE, assembled an armie of thirtie thousand, for the inuasion of BULGARIA. With this armie the Bassa tooke many strong townes and castles in BULGARIA, as K PIRAVADE, VENVZINA, MADRA, SVNI, with others.

In the meane time, whilest Alis Bassa had thus begun the wars against the Christians in BVLGARIA, Amurath hauing gathered a great armie in ASIA, determined in the beginning of the Spring, to passe ouer with the same into EUROPE: commending the gouernment of his countries in ASIA to Temurtases Bassa, Ferices Beg, Temurtaces Subbassa, Cutlu Beg, and Haza Beg: and so all things set in order in ASIA, he drew down his Asian forces towards HELLESPONTVS, where he was a while staied with cōtrary winds, but was afterwards transported to CALLIPOLIS by Ienitze Beg, Sanzacke there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his armie out of ASIA into EUROPE. But whilest he staied at CALLIPOLIS, Baiazet his sonne with a great power came unto him thither: Alis Bassa also vnderstanding of Amurath his arriuall in EUROPE, L retired out of BVLGARIA and came to him at CALCIDE, recounting vnto him the whole successe of his expedition into BVLGARIA.

Sasmenos prince of BVLGARIA, seeing his couutrey spoiled, his strong cities and castles taken by the Turks, and withall hearing of their great preparations for warre; by the aduice of his nobilitie, thought it best betimes againe to submit himselfe vnto Amurath: wherefore tying a winding sheet about his necke, in token that he had deserued death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at CALCIDE, where falling flat vpon the ground, at the horses feet whereon Amurath sat, he in most humble wise craued pardon: offering by a certaine day to deliuer SILISTRIA the chiefe citie of his dominion into Amurath his possession, as a pledge of his fidelitie: who thereupon graunted him pardon, and to assure him of his fauour, commaunded a M rich garment to be cast vpon him, after the manner of the Turks, sending Alis Bassa at the time appointed to take possession of SILISTRIA. But Sasmenos repenting himselfe of that hee had so largely promised, would not deliuer his citie, but in strongest manner he could presently fortified the same. Wherewith Amurath more offended than before, commaunded the Bassa with fire and sword againe to spoile and wast his countrey: who according to his commaundement

A entred againe into BULGARIA, and ſtrucke ſuch a terrour of his comming into the hearts of the people, that many ſtrong places were voluntarily yeelded into his power, namely, DIRITZE, COSSOVA, with the cittie TERNOVA, the ſeat of the princes court; TZERNEVI, NOVAKESTRI, ZISTOVA, with diuers others: and proceeding farther, he laid ſiege to NICOPOLIS, the ſtrongeſt citie of BULGARIA, vpon the ſide of the great riuer DANVBIUS, whither Saſmenos was for feare himſelfe fled. Who finding himſelfe vnable to hold out the ſiege, once again (with ſhame ynough) tying a winding ſheet about his necke, as he had done before, and taking his ſonne with him, went out of the citie, and in moſt abject manner falling downe at the Baſſa his feet, craued pardon: which the Baſſa, mooued with compaſsion to ſee the miſerie of ſo great a man, and
B hauing alreadie taken from him the greateſt part of his dominion, and now out of feare of further reſiſtance, eaſily graunted. And hauing thus ended the Bulgarian war, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right joyfully receiued.

Amurath had now made great preparation for the inuading of SERVIA, for which putpoſe he had drawne ouer into EUROPE the greateſt forces he poſsibly could out of ASIA: ſending alſo for his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, gouernour of CARASIA, who vnderſtanding his fathers pleaſure, repaired vnto him with all the power hee could make. This armie by Amurath thus aſſembled, was the greateſt that euer was before that brought by the Turks into EVROPE. Lazarus not ignorant of this great preparation made by Amurath, had drawn into the ſocietie of this war, the king of BOSNA (as is aforeſaid) with Vulcus prince of MACEDONIA, his ſonne in law,
C who both brought vnto him great aid: hee had alſo by his embaſſadors procured great ſupplies from other Chriſtian kings and princes, out of VALACHIA, HVNGARIA, CROATIA, SCLAVONIA, ALBANIA, BVLGARIA, and ITALIE, beſides great numbers of other voluntarie deuout Chriſtians, which all aſſembled and met together, did in number far exceed the great armie of the Turks.

With this armie Lazarus the Deſpot encamped vpon the ſide of the riuer Moroua the greater, not far from whence ſtood the ſtrong caſtle of SARKIVE, which Alis Baſſa had of late taken from Saſmenos the Bulgarian prince, ſtanding as it were betwixt BVLGARIA and SERVIA: this caſtle being now poſſeſſed of the Turks, was thought by Lazarus dangerous to his countrie, who therefore ſent one Demetrius, a right valiant captaine, with certain companies of ſelect men
D to take in the ſame. The name of this captaine Demetrius, was a generall terrour vnto the Turks, for the harme he had done them: ſo that they in the caſtle hearing that he was come, without further reſiſtance yeelded the ſame vnto him. Whereof Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent Eine and Sarutze Baſſa to recouer the ſame: but Lazarus doubting that the caſtle would hardly be kept in that dangerous war, ſent Vulcus his ſonne in law with twentie thouſand men, to bring away all that was therein, and in the citie neere vnto it, leaſt it ſhould become a prey vnto the greedie Turks; which he accordingly did, and at the ſame time raſed both the caſtle and the citie, before the comming of Iaxis Beg, ſent from Amurath to haue done the ſame exploit; which hee comming thither, found alreadie done to his hand by Vulcus.

The caſtle of Sarkine with the citie ioining vnto it, taken by the Chriſtians, and raſed.

As Amurath was marching towards SERVIA, Seratze and Cuſtendyl, two Chriſtian princes
E his tributaries, met him with their forces, whome hee cauſed to march before him as his guides: and paſsing through Cuſtendyl his countrey, was there refreſhed with plentie of all things neceſſarie: vntil at length paſsing the riuer of Moroua the leſſe, he drew ſo neere to the plains of COSSOVA (where the Chriſtian armie lay) that he with his ſonne Baiazet from a little hill tooke full view of the Chriſtian campe; which was ſo great, that it couered all thoſe large plains from ſide to ſide, and ſo daunted Amurath, as that returning to his armie he preſently entered into a great conſultation with his greateſt captains and commaunders, What courſe to take againſt ſuch a puiſſant enemie.

Theſe great armies being now come ſo nigh together, as that they might the one well deſcrie the other, Amurath had purpoſed the ſame day to haue giuen the Chriſtians battaile: but be-F ing diſſuaded by Eurenoſes, both for that it was extreame hot, and his ſoldiours wearied with trauell, he reſted that night. The next morning as ſoone as it was day, he put his armie in order of battaile, placing his ſonne Baiazet with Eurenoſes and Eine Beg Subbaſſa, in the right wing; his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, with Sarutze Baſſa in the left wing; the maine battell he led himſelfe. Lazarus in the meane time had alſo ſet his armie in good order: giuing the charge of the right wing to Vulcus his ſonne in law; the left wing was led by the king of BOSNA, and his ſonne; in the maine battell ſtood Lazarus himſelfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater armies than theſe two had ſildome before met in EUROPE, Lazarus as the Turkiſh hiſtories report (but how truly I know not) hauing in his armie fiue hundred thouſand men; and Amurath ſcarce halfe ſo many. G

To begin the battaile, Amurath had drawne a thouſand of his beſt archers, vnder the leading of Malcozzeus, out of the right wing of his armie; and the like number of archers out of the left, vnder the conduct of one Muſtapha: which ſo placed on both ſides of the armie, as he thought beſt, Eurenoſes a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Chriſtians were for the moſt part well and ſtrongly armed, and ſhouldering cloſe together in their charge, would be like a rock of yron, vnable to be pierced: but if in joyning the battaile, hee would a little retire, the Chriſtians following vpon good hope, would ſo looſe their cloſe ſtanding (the cheefe part of their ſtrength) and leaue an entrance for his men. Vpon which reſolution, Amurath commaunded the archers to giue the firſt charge: which they courageouſly performed. At which time, the Turks armie gaue ground a little: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, with great force aſſailed the left wing of their armie, and after a hard and cruell fight put the ſame to flight: which Baiazet ſeeing, with ſuch furie renewed the battaile, that the Turks which before as men diſcouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turne againe vpon their enemies; and the Chriſtians hauing as they thought alreadie got the victorie, were to begin a new battell. In which bloodie fight many thouſands fell on both ſides: the brightneſſe of the armour and weapons, was as it had been the lightning: the multitude of launces and other horſemens ſtaues ſhadowed the light of the ſunne: arrowes and darts fell ſo faſt, that a man would haue thought they had powred downe from heauen, the noiſe of the inſtruments of warre, with the neighing of horſes, and outcries of men was ſo terrible and great, that the wild beaſts in the mountaines ſtood aſtonied therewith: and the Turkiſh hiſtories, to expreſſe the terrour of the day (vainly ſay) that the Angels in heauen amaſed with that hidious noiſe, for that time forgot the heauenly hymnes wherewith they alwaies glorifie God. About noone time of the day, the fortune of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians began to giue ground, and at length betooke themſelues to plaine flight; whom the Turks with all their force purſued and ſlew them downe right, without number or mercie. In which battell H I

Howbeit ſome hiſtories report otherwiſe, as that he with his ſon were taken priſoner, and by and by afterwards (in reuenge of Amurath his death) cruelly ſlaine: otherſome alſo reporting that he died in priſon. Amurath after this great victorie, with ſome few of his cheefe captaines taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heapes in the field like mountaines; a Chriſtian ſouldiour, ſore wounded and all bloodie, ſeeing him, in ſtaggering manner aroſe (as if it had been from death) out of a heape of ſlaine men, and making towards him, for want of ſtrength fell downe diuers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man: at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they which guarded the kings perſon would haue ſtayed him, hee was by Amurath himſelfe commaunded to come neerer: ſuppoſing, that he would haue craued his life of him. Thus this halfe dead Chriſtian preſsing neere vnto him, as if he would for honour ſake haue kiſſed his feet, ſuddenly ſtabbed him in the K

Amurath ſlain. bottome of his bellie with a ſhort dagger, which he had vnder his ſoldiors coat: of which wound that great king and conquerour preſently died. The name of this man (for his courage worthie of eternall memorie) was Miles Cobelitz: who before ſore wounded, was ſhortly after in the preſence of Baiazet cut into ſmall peeces. The Turks in their Annales ſomewhat otherwiſe report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelitz, one of the Deſpot his ſeruants, in time of the battaile, comming to Amurath as a fugitiue, offering him his ſeruice, and admitted to his preſence, in humbling himſelfe to haue kiſſed his feet (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) ſtabbed him into the bellie and ſo ſlew him: being himſelfe therefore ſhortly after (as is aforeſaid) in the preſence of Baiazet moſt cruelly hewen into ſmall peeces. Whereupon euer ſince that time, the manner of the Turks hath been, and yet is, that when any embaſſadour or ſtranger is to come to kiſſe the Sultan his hand, or otherwiſe to approach his perſon, hee is as it were for honours ſake, lead by the armes vnto his preſence, betwixt two of the great courtiers: but indeed by ſo entangling him, to be ſure that he ſhall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelitz vnto Amurath. L M

The dead bodie of Amurath was preſently with all ſecrecie conueied into his tent by the Baſſaes and captaines preſent at his death: whether Baiazet was alſo brought with an enſigne before before him, as the ſucceſsour in his fathers kingdome. His younger brother Iacup ſurnamed Zelebi (or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baſſaes ſent for, as from his father: who caſting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there preſently by them ſtrangled, by the commaundement of Baiazet, as moſt hiſtories report: howbeit the Turkes annales charge him not therwith. This was the beginning of the moſt vnnaturall and inhumane cuſtome, euer ſince holden for a moſt wholeſome and good policie amongſt the Turkiſh kings and emperours, in the beginning of their raigne moſt cruelly to maſſacre their brethren and neereſt kinſmen, ſo at once to rid themſelues of all feare of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his ſuperſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh kings; a man of great courage, and in all his attempts fortunat: he made greater ſlaughter of his enemies, than both his father and grandfather: his kingdome in ASIA hee greatly enlarged by the ſword, mariage, and purchaſe: and vſing the diſcord and cowardiſe of the Grecian princes, to his profit, ſubdued a great part of THRACIA, called ROMANIA, with the territories thereto adjoyning, leauing vnto the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, little or nothing more in THRACIA than the imperiall citie it ſelfe, with the bare name of an emperour, almoſt without an empire: he wan a great part of BULGARIA, and entred into SERVIA, BOSNA, and MACEDONIA: he was liberall, and withall ſeuere: of his ſubjects both beloued & feared: a man of verie few words, and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlaine when hee was threeſcore eight yeares old, and had thereof raigned thirtie one, in the yeare of our Lord 1390. His dead bodie was by Baiazet conuaied into ASIA, and there royally buried at PRUSA, in a faire chappell at the Weſt end of the citie, neere vnto the Bathes there: where, vpon his tombe lieth his ſouldiours cloake, with a little Turkiſh tulipant, much differing from thoſe great turbants which the Turkes now weare. Neere vnto the ſame tombe are placed three launces, with three horſe tailes faſtened at the vpper end of them, which he vſed as guidons in his wars: a thing in antient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a caſtle with a tombe, made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of COSSOVA, where he was ſlaine and his entrailes buried: which giueth occaſion for ſome to report that hee was there alſo himſelfe enterred.

BAIAZET.

Phi. Lonicer. Hiſt. Tur. li. 1.

Fulminis in morem celeri rapit agmina motu
Baizethes, fidei pacis & impatiens.
Regni Hadrianopolim ſedes ſibi legit vt eſſet, Poſſet vt Europæ iungere regna ſuis.
Conſtantinopolim gemina obſidione fatigat:

Prowd Baiazet moſt falſe of faith, and loathing bleſſed peace:
His warlike troupes like lightening, to ſhake he doth not ceaſe.
Of HADRIANOPLE he makes choice, for his imperiall ſeat,
That EVROPS kingdomes he might joyne vnto his empire great.
CONSTANTINOPLE he diſtreſt, twice with ſtraight ſiege and long:
And vainly thought to haue poſſeſt the Græcians wealth by wrong.
But ouercome by Tamberlane, faſt bound in fetters ſure, Trod vnder foot, and cloas'd in cage, great ſhame did there indure.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOVRTH AND MOST VNFORTVNAT KING OF THE TVRKES.

Aiazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiasit, of his violent and fierce nature surnamed Gilderun, or lightening; succeeded his father Amurath in the Turkish kingdome, his younger brother Iacup being strangled immediatly after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the first yeare of his raign inuaded SERVIA, and there besieged CRATOVA, a citie of the Despots: whereunto the siluer mines of SERVIA (not the least cause of that warre) belonged. Which citie was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That the Christian inhabitants might with life and libertie depart. Who were no sooner gone out of the cittie, but that by his commaundement they were all most cruelly slaine by his men of warre, for that purpose sent out after them. At this time hee also woon VSCUPIA, with diuers other castles in the countrey neere vnto CRATOVA.

Baiazet inuadeth Seruia.

Sigismund at the same time king of HUNGARIE (a yong prince of great hope, and brother to Wenceslaus, then emperour of the West) aduertised from the Setuians his allies and confederats, of these proud proceedings of Baiazet: by his embassadours sent of purpose, requested him, That as he was a just prince, and wished to liue in quiet with his owne, to desist from doing of such open wrong, and from inuading of such countries of his friends and confederats, as he had no right in. Which embassadours so sent, Baiazet detained without answere, vntill such time as he had ouerrun a great part of the Despot his country, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the said embassadours vnto him into one of the strong townes, which hee had in euerie corner filled with his owne souldiours, told them that they might there see, that his right both vnto that towne and the rest by him taken, was good inough, for as much as the vetie wals acknowledged the same: and so giuing them leaue to depart, willed them so to tell their master. Which his proud answere, by the same embassadors reported vnto the yong king, no lesse troubled him, than if open warre had by them been denounced vnto him, seeing the tyrant (as should seeme) pretending right vnto whatsoeuer hee could by force get: neuertheless, being himselfe not yet well setled in his kingdome, and in doubt of the contrarie faction (that altogether liked not of his election into HUNGARIE for their king) he was glad at that time to put it vp, and so to hold himselfe content.

Seruia the second time inuaded by Baiazet.

The next yeare, Baiazet by Ferises Beg, tooke the citie of VIDINA, with many other strong townes and castles in SERVIA, and afterwards returned to HADRIANOPLE. But whilest that hee thus raged in EUROPE, the Caramanian king inuaded and spoiled the frontiers of his countries in ASIA: which although he was not then at leisure, hee forgot not afterwards to reuenge to the full. At the same time Eurenoses, lord gouernour of the marches of his kingdome in EUROPE towards GRECIA, departing from SERRES (where he then lay) tooke the citie of SITROS in THESSALIA. And Ferises Beg, not content to haue taken VIDINA (as is aforesaid) passed ouer the great riuer of DANVBIUS, and greeuously spoiled VALACHIA: from whence he returned loaden with a great prey. This was the first time (that I read of) that the Turks euer passed

ouer the riuer DANVBIVS. At this time also Iegides Bassa entred the kingdome of BOSNA, from whence he carried a great number of captiues to HADRIANOPLE, where Baiazet spent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring Baiazet passed ouer HELLESPONTVS to PRVSA, where he built a faire Mahometane temple, with a colledge, and an almes-house: which works finished, he returned againe into EVROPE, and built a monasterie at HADRIANOPLE: and so returned again into ASIA, leauing Temurtases, Begler-Beg (or his vice-roy) in HADRIANOPLE. After he was come into ASIA, he laied siege to the strong citie of PHILADELPHIA in LYDIA, which was at that time the onely cittie in the lesser ASIA, yet holden by the Christians in the middest of the Mahometane princes: for now was the Greeke emperour by the Othoman kings and the other Turkes quite driuen out of the lesser ASIA. In the beginning of this siege, Baiazet gaue straight commaundement to his souldiors, That they should not spoile or hurt any thing in the countrey belonging to the citizens: hoping by such faigned courtesie to make them the more willing to yeeld themselues vnto his obedience. But disappointed of his expectation, and finding them resolued to hold it out vnto the last, he forthwith gaue out contrarie commaundement not to spare any thing they could wast or destroy: which was accordingly by his greedie souldiours performed. After long siege, the citizens seeing the countrey about them vtterly wasted, & themselues vnable longer to indure, and out of all hope of releefe, yeelded their citie vnto the pleasure of Baiazet. It is written by some, that this famous citie was not besieged without the consent of the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: and that the Greekes themselues, mooued with enuie to see that citie so long hold out, did helpe the Turks in the winning thereof.

Philadelphia besieged by Baiazet.

In time of this siege Aiden Ogli prince of CARIA, a Mahometane, came to Baiazet, and yeelded himselfe into his power as his vassale: vnto whom Baiazet restored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him: yet vpon such condition, as that hee should not from that time coine any money in his owne name, either be remembred in publicke prayers as a prince in their Mahometane temples, as he had before been: but that all such things should be done in the name of Baiazet, as his dread lord and soueraigne. With which disgrace the poore prince was glad to content himselfe, and to liue as his vassale. From PHILADELPHIA he led his armie into the countrey of SARVCHANIA, in antient time called IONIA MARITIMA, which he subdued vnto himselfe vpon like conditions. After that he passed farther, to MENTESIA, or MENTZ, sometime called MYNDOS in CARIA; the prince whereof for feare fled to Cutrun Baiazet, prince of CASTAMONA and part of PONTVS, leauing his countrey to the pleasure of the tyrant. And for as much as the young king of CARAMANIA had inuaded his countries whilest he was busied in EVROPE, Baiazet in reuenge thereof entred with his armie into CARAMANIA, and tooke CESARIA, with diuers other places there: so that the yong king discouraged with the losse of his towns, and fearing Baiazet his greatnesse, was glad to hold himselfe content with his losse, and to make peace with him as it pleased him to graunt it. As Baiazet was making this expedition into CARAMANIA, another yong Mahometane prince, the sonne of prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his cheefe counsellors, and were both by him sent prisoners ouer the strait to the castle of IPSALA, where they lay in durance many yeares after. Thus Baiazet hauing oppressed and wronged most of the Mahometane princes, the successours of Sultan Aladin in the lesser ASIA, at last returned againe himselfe in triumph to PRVSA.

The prince of MENTESIA, who for feare of Baiazet was fled out of his countrey, as is aforesaid, had now incited Cutrun Baiazet, prince of CASTAMONA, with a great power to inuade that side of Baiazet his kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Baiazet vnderstanding, gathered a great armie to goe against this Mahometane prince. At which very time the Vayuod of VALACHIA, hearing of Baiazet his troubles in ASIA, with a strong armie passed ouer DANVBIVS into those parts of SERVIA and BVLGARIA that were by the Turks as then possessed; where he spoiled the countrey, and slew great numbers of the Turkes, making Mahometane saints and martyrs by heapes: for so the Turks account all them whom the Christians kill in their warre: which done, hee retired backe againe into VALACHIA, carrying with him also many of the Turks prisoners. Baiazet thus at once inuaded both in ASIA and EVROPE, deferred his warres purposed against the prince of PONTVS, vntill a more conuenient time, conuerting his forces against the Valachians. Wherfore passing ouer the strait to HADRIANOPLE, he sent his armie from thence to NICOPOLIS, and there passing the riuer of Danubius, entered into VALACHIA, burning and ſpoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayuod to repreſſe his furie, met him in the field, and gaue him battaile, but was therein ouerthrowne and many of his people ſlaine; ſo that at laſt he was glad to ſue for peace, which he obtained, by ſubmitting himſelfe to Baiazet, and yeelding to pay him a yearely tribute.

Theſſalia inuaded by Baiazet.

Whilſt Baiazet was thus buſied in VALACHIA, newes was brought vnto him that the Chriſtians of the Weſt with a fleet of gallies did great harm alongſt the coaſts of his dominions in ASIA. In reuenge whereof he entred with his armie into THESALIE, deſtroying all the countrey vnto THESSALONICA: in which expedition he took the citie of NEAPOLIS in GREECE, and IOANNINA in Ætolia, and after that returned into ASIA where he ſpent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring, hee with a great power paſſed the ſtrait of CALLIPOLIS to HADRIANOPLE, intending to haue inuaded HUNGARIE. But as he was vpon the waie, it chanced that a Conſtantinopolitan ſpie was by the Turkes intercepted, with letters from the Greeke emperour to the king of HUNGARIE, giuing him warning both of the Turks preparation and comming. By which ſpie Baiazet alſo vnderſtood of another meſſenger before ſent into HUNGARIE, for like purpoſe. Whereupon Temurtaſes (then his great lieutenant in EUROPE) perſuaded him to deſiſt from his intended warres in HUNGARIE, and to beſiege the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, as a thing of more honour and leſſe danger; the cittie being alreadie (as he ſaid, and as in truth it was) ſurrounded with the Turkiſh prouinces: bringing in PHILADELPHIA (but a few years before woon) for example of the like exploit. Of whoſe counſaile Baiazet liking well, returned with his armie, and ſhortly after came and ſat downe therewith before CONSANTINOPLE: laying hard ſiege thereunto, firſt by land and after by ſea, with his gallies ſent from CALLIPOLIS. Which hard ſiege continued (as moſt hiſtories report) the ſpace of eight yeares: in which long time, hee draue the emperour Emanuell Paleologus to that ſtraight, that he was glad to leaue his citie, and himſelfe in perſon to craue aid of Wenceſlaus the Germane emperour, and Charles the ſixt the French king, and other Chriſtian princes alſo. At which time the cittizens were at length brought to ſuch extremitie, that they were euen at the point to haue yeelded vp the cittie: and happily had ſo done, had not Sigiſmund king of HUNGARIE (aſſiſted with a great armie of the French and other voluntarie Chriſtians, almoſt out of euery part of Chriſtendome, to the number of an hundreth and thirtie thouſand, vnder the leading of Iohn, countie of NIVERS, & after duke of BVRGUNDIE) for the releeſe of the beſieged emperour, paſſed ouer Danubius into the Turkiſh dominions; and there hauing recouered VIDINA, with certaine other ſtrong holds in BULGARIA, laied ſiege to NICOPOLIS: out of which citie the Turks oftentimes ſallied, and gaue him many an hot skirmiſh. It is reported that the young king Sigiſmund beholding the greatneſſe of his armie, in his great jolitie hearing of the comming of the Turke, ſhould proudly ſay: What need wee to feare the Turke, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens; which if they ſhould fall, yet were we able with our ſpeares and halberts to hold them vp for falling vpon vs. But Baiazet vnderſtanding what ſpoile the Hungarian king had made in his late gained countries, and of the ſiege of NICOPOLIS; commaunded the ladders and other great prouiſion now in readineſſe for the skaling and aſſaulting of the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE to be burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians: and ſo raiſing his ſiege, marched with a right puiſſant armie to NICOPOLIS, ſending Eurenoſes before of purpoſe to intercept ſome of the Chriſtians, thereby to learne the ſtate of their campe and armie. But they hearing of his comming, ſo well looked to themſelues, that he with ſhame returned to his maſter as he came, without any one priſoner taken. Which thing much troubled Baiazet, as fearing he ſhould haue to doe with a warie enemie. Sigiſmund vnderſtanding of the approch of Baiazet, leauing a ſufficient power for the continuing of the ſiege, roſe himſelfe, and with the reſt of his armie went to meet his proud enemie. Of whoſe comming and approch Baiazet vnderſtanding, diuided his armie into two parts: & being now come within the ſight of the Chriſtian armie, made ſhew but of the one halfe, keeping himſelfe cloſe in ſecret ambuſh not farre off with the other. The Chriſtians deeming themſelues (as they were) farre moe in number than the Turks which they ſaw, deuided their armie alſo into two parts, purpoſing betwixt them to haue incloſed the Turks. Of all the Chriſtians that were there preſent, the French deſired to haue the honour of the firſt charge to be giuen vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope ſet forward (the Hungarians with a great part of the armie, not yet ſet in order) and ſo began the battaile: where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruell fight, and in a little time many thouſands ſlaine. But this fight had not long endured, when Baiazet with the other halfe of his armie ſuddenly ariſing, came on with ſuch violence, as wel became his ſurname of Gilderun or lightning; and ſo hardly charged the French, that they amazed at the ſuddeneſſe of the danger, and oppreſſed with the furie and multitude of the vnexpected enemie, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmaid: but ſeeing no remedie, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out vntill they were almoſt all either ſlaine or taken priſoners; ſtill in hope to haue been releeued by the Hungarians and the reſt. In this hard conflict diuers of the French horſemen hauing forſaken their horſes, fought on foot as their manner was: which horſes running backe without their riders, vpon the Hungarians, cauſed them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrown; wherewith diſmaied, they without further comming on all turned their backes and fled, in ſo great haſt as that it booted not the king or any other great commander to goe about to ſtaie their flight. The French thus by their too much haſt ouerthrowne, the Turks purſuing the Hungarians and the reſt of the Chriſtians, made of them a great ſlaughter: of whom alſo many were drowned in the great riuer DANUBIUS. At which time alſo the Turkes tooke ſo many priſoners, that it was thought euerie ſeuerall Turke had his priſoner. King Sigiſmund himſelfe, who but a little before had deſpiſed euen the falling of the heauens, had then alſo vndoubtedly fallen into the enemies hands, had hee not in a little boat by good hap got ouer DANVBIUS: not vnlike another Xerxes, who hauing couered the ſeas with his ſhips, and with a world of men paſſed ouer into GRECIA, was afterwards by the ſtrange change of fortune, himſelfe alone in a ſmall fiſher boat glad to get backe againe into ASIA. Sigiſmund being thus got ouer Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the loſſe of the battaile, fled by ſea into THRACIA vnto CONSTANTINOPLE; from whence he ſailed vnto the Iſland of the RHODES, and from thence ſailing through the Ægean and Ionian ſea, landed at length in DALMATIA: and ſo hauing wandered from place to place, toſſed with many fortunes, after eighteene moneths long and painefull trauaile, returned againe into HUNGARIE. Where hee found the ſtate of his kingdome in his abſence much troubled, the contrarie faction in the meane time hauing made choice of Ladiſlaus king of NAPLES for their king; who was euen thē with a great armie going to haue taken poſſeſsion of the kingdome, had not Sigiſmund in good time by the helpe of certaine of the cheefe of the Hungarian nobilitie preuented him. In this battaile, called the battaile of NICOPOLIS, were of the Chriſtians twentie thouſand ſlaine, and of the Turkes threeſcore thouſand. The countie of NIVIERS, the French kings neere kinſman, was there taken priſoner, with three hundred great commaunders more: where after he had indured great contumelie and reproch in the preſence of Baiazet, hee was commaunded to make choice of fiue other of the captiues, ſuch as he liked beſt, all the reſt being preſently cut in peeces before his face, and he with the other fiue left aliue, ſent priſoners to PRUSA: from whence they were afterwards ranſomed for two hundred thouſand duckats. This bloodie battaile of NICOPOLIS was fought in the yeere of our lord 1396.

Conſtantinople the ſecond time beſieged by Baiazet.

Baiazet after this great victorie, hauing worthily releeued his beſieged citie, returned againe to the ſiege of CONSTANTINOPLE, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks againſt it on the one ſide towards the land: and paſsing ouer the ſtrait of BOSPHORUS, built a ſtrong caſtle vpon that ſtrait ouer againſt CONSTANTINOPLE, to impeach ſo much as was poſsible all paſſage thereunto by ſea. This ſtraight ſiege (as moſt write) continued alſo two years, which I ſuppoſe by the circumſtance of the hiſtorie to haue been part of the aforeſaid eight yeares. Emanuell the beſieged emperor wearied with theſe long wars, ſent an embaſſador to Baiazet to entreat with him a peace: which Baiazet was the more willing to hearkē vnto, for that he heard news that Tamerlane the great Tartarian prince intended ſhortly to war vpon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition that the emperour ſhould graunt free libertie for the Turks to dwell together in one ſtreet of CONSTANTINOPLE, with free exerciſe of their owne religion, and laws, vnder a judge of their owne nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkiſh king a yearely tribute of ten thouſand duckats. Which diſhonourable conditions the diſtreſſed emperour was glad to accept of. So was this long ſiege broken vp, and preſently a great ſort of Turks with their families were ſent out of BITHYNIA to dwell in CONSTANTINOPLE, and a church there built for them: which not long after was by the emperour pulled downe to the ground, and the Turks again driuen out of the citie, at ſuch time as Baiazet was by the mightie Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken priſoner.

A Baiazet in the beginning of his raigne, preſently after the death of Lazarus the Deſpot ſlaine in the battaile of COSSOVA, wan part of SERVIA (as is aforeſaid) the other part being ſtill holden by Lazarus his ſonne, called Stephen the Deſpot; who about this time ſent an honourable embaſſadour to Baiazet with louing letters, and royall preſents: by which embaſſadour alſo the old princeſſe, Lazarus his widdow, offred her faire daughter Deſpina (Stephen his ſiſter) a ladie of incomparable beautie, in mariage to him, if it ſhould pleaſe him to vouchſafe his handmaid (as ſhee termed her) ſo high a place. This ladie was long before promiſed vnto him, whilſt his father Amurath yet liued. Of this embaſſadour Baiazet was verie glad, but eſpecially for the faire ladies ſake: which being knowne vnto the princeſſe her mother, and the Deſpot her brother, B ſhe was forthwith honourably ſent to Baiazet, and ſo to him with great ſolemnitie and triumph ſhortly after maried. Of all his wiues, he held her deereſt, and for her ſake reſtored vnto her brother Stephen the citie and caſtle of SEMENDRE (otherwiſe called S. ANDREVV) and COLUMBARIUM in SERVIA: ſhe allured him to drinke wine, forbidden the Turks by their law; and cauſed him to delight in ſumptuous banquets, which his predeceſſours Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath neuer vſed.

Baiazet married Deſpina the faire daughter of Lazarus the Deſpot.

As the Turkiſh kingdome grew in greatneſſe, ſo corruption the canker of great ſtates and common weales increaſed likewiſe: but eſpecially in the men of law and iudges of his courts. Wherewith Baiazet greeuouſlie offended, commaunded diuers of the ſame iudges to be apprehended, determining (to the terrour of others) to haue executed them; whoſe dangerous eſtate C was much pitied, and alſo fauoured of Alis Baſſa, and other the king his great counſellours: yet for ſo much as Baiazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to bee ſpoken vnto, none of them durſt aduenture to intreat him in their behalfe; no not Alis Baſſa, Charadyn Baſſa his ſonne, ſometime iudge of PRVSA, although he was a man in ſuch ſpeciall fauour with him that he was therfore of the cõmon people not only reuerenced, but as the king himſelfe honored.

There was at that time in the court an Æthiopion jeaſter, who vnder ſome couert pleaſant jeaſt, would many times bolt out that to the king in his greateſt heat, which his graueſt counſellours durſt not once ſpeake to him of in ſecret: this jeaſter, Alis Baſſa requeſted to deuiſe ſome means to intreat with the angrie king in the behalfe of theſe Iudges, promiſing to giue him what he would reaſonably deſire, if he could appeaſe the kings diſpleaſure. The Æthiopian without D feare vndertooke the matter: and preſently putting vppon his head a rich hat all wrought ouer with gold after the manner of the Turks embaſſadours, and fitting himſelfe with other appparell better beſeeming an embaſſadour than a jeaſter; thus attired preſented himſelfe before the king with a great counterfait grauitie. Whereat Baiazet marualling, asked him the cauſe why he was ſo gaie. I haue a requeſt vnto your maieſtie, (ſaid he) and wiſh to find fauour in your ſight. Baiazet more deſirous than before to know the matter, asked what his requeſt was. If it ſtand with your pleaſure (ſaid the jeaſter) I would faine goe as your embaſſadour to the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, in hope wherof, I haue put my ſelfe in this readineſſe. To what purpoſe wouldeſt thou goe, ſaid Baiazet? To craue of the emperor (ſaid he) ſome ſortie or fiftie of his old graue monkes and friers, to bring with me hether to the court. And what ſhould they doe here, ſaid Ba- E iazet? I would haue them placed (ſaid the jeaſter) in the roomes of the old doting judges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (ſaid Baiazet) I can place others of my own people in their roomes. True (ſaid the Æthiopian) for grauitie of looke and countenance, and ſo would the old monkes and friers ſerue as well; but not ſo learned in your lawes and cuſtomes of your kingdome, as are thoſe in your diſpleaſure. If they be learned (ſaid Baiazet) why doe they then contrarie to their learning peruert juſtice and take bribes? There is a good reaſon for that too, ſaid the jeaſter. What reaſon ſaid the king? That can hee that there ſtandeth by tell better than I (ſaid the jeaſter) pointing to Alis Baſſa: who forthwith commanded by Baiazet to giue the reaſon, with great reuerence before done, ſhewed that thoſe judges ſo in diſpleaſure, were not conueniently prouided for, and were therefore enforced many times for their neceſſarie maintenance F to take rewards, to the ſtaying of the due courſe of juſtice. Which Baiazet vnderſtanding to be true, commaunded Alis Baſſa to appoint them conuenient ſtipends for their maintenance, and forthwith graunted their pardon. Wherevpon the Baſſa ſet downe order, That of euerie matter in ſuit exceeding one thouſand aſpers, the judge ſhould haue twentie aſpers fee for judgement; and for euerie writing and inſtrument out of the court, twelue aſpers: which fees they yet take in thoſe courts at this day.

Not long after, Baiazet in his furie ſent for certaine of his captaines and commaunders of his men of warre, with whom he was for ſome ſmall occaſion greeuouſly offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death; which was with him no great matter. Theſe captaines being brought before him, the councellors ſeeing him all in choler, ſat looking vpon the ground, hanging downe their heads (as the manner of the Turks is) not daring to looke him in the face, nor to ſpeake a good word for them. When ſuddenly the aforeſaid Æthiopian jeaſter ſtept foorth, earneſtly requeſting the king, not to ſhew them any fauour, but to execute them preſently as villaines and traitours; rayling vpon them, as if he had knowne ſome great fault by them. Baiazet (thinking he could haue accuſed them of ſome great crime, becauſe of his earneſtnes) asked what reaſon hee had ſo to exclaime againſt them. Reaſon (quoth the jeaſter) becauſe the knaues bee good for nothing, and they ſay that Tamerlan is with a great armie comming againſt vs: if you will but take vp an enſigne in your hand, and I goe before you with a drum, I will ſtrike vp ſuch a terrible march, and you make ſuch a dreadfull ſhew, that wee ſhall neede none of theſe bad fellowes or their ſouldiours in the field to get the victorie ouer our enemies. This conceit of the jeaſter ſtrucke ſuch a melancholie imagination into Baiazet his head, that hee ſtood muſing a great while as it were in a deepe ſtudie: at laſt hauing well conſidered the drift of the jeaſters ſpeech, and his furie now ſomewhat aſſuaged, graunted them pardon which they looked not for.

This Æthiopian jeaſter, Baiazet vpon a time ſent vnto the old queene his mother to bring her news of the good ſucceſſe of his wars againſt the Chriſtians, for that ſhe had ſo deſired: who comming vnto her, and by her commaunded to ſit downe, ſhe began to demaund of him, how the king her ſonne did, and of the ſucceſſe of his wars. Whereunto he anſwered, that he did verie well, and had won from the Chriſtians a great countrey, and greatly enriched his ſouldiours. But after a little more talke, the queene mother deſirous to heare againe the good newes (or elſe after the manner of ſome which thinke nothing ſufficiently told except it bee told an hundreth times) asked him againe how the king her ſonne did, and how he ſped in his wars. Whereunto he anſwered euerie word as before: but asking him the third time the verie ſame queſtion, how her ſonne did? Doeſt thou aske me ſo often (ſaid the Æthiopian) how hee doth? Bre Cachpe (O whoore, ſaid he) thou haſt brought forth a ſonne like a diuell, who roaming vp and downe doth nothing but burne and deſtroie the world where he commeth. Whereat the queene crying out; vp ſtart the Æthiopian, and betaking himſelfe to his heeles was neuer more afterwards ſeene.

Temurtaſes, Baiazet his great lieutenant in Aſia taken priſoner by Aladin the young king of Caramania

In the wars which Baiazet had againſt Sigiſmund, the Vayuod of VALACHIA had giuen aid vnto the Hungarian king; wherewith Baiazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged: and therefore intending to make warre vpon the Valachian prince, left Temurtaſes his great lieutenant at ANCYRA in ASIA, & ſo paſſed ouer HELLESPONTUS himſelfe againſt the Valachian. Vpon whoſe departure, Aladin his ſiſters ſonne, the yong king of CARAMANIA, with a great power came ſuddenly in the night to ANCYRA, and tooke Temurtaſes priſoner: who then feared nothing leſſe, than in time of peace to haue been ſo ſurpriſed, and caried away in bonds into CARAMANIA. But when he vnderſtood that Baiazet had ended his wars in VALACHIA, and was with victorie returned to PRUSA, he fearing his heauie indignation for ſo great an outrage, preſently releaſed Temurtaſes out of priſon, apparelled him richly after the maner of that nation, craued pardon for the wrong he had done him, and ſet him at libertie to goe whither he would, and withall ſent one of his noblemen with great gifts and preſents to Baiazet to make his excuſe in beſt maner he could: vnto which embaſſador Baiazet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or ſuffer him to come in his ſight: but at the ſame time leuied a great armie to inuade CARAMANIA. Which Aladin vnderſtanding, and now out of all hope to appeaſe this mightie enemie, leuied all the forces he could in his owne kingdome, and withall entertained all the mercenarie ſoldiors he could get, intending to trie his fortune in the filed, as a man of valour, rather than to be thruſt out of his kingdome like a coward: & ſo in readineſſe, hearing of the cõming of Baiazet, met him vpõ the way, & at a place called ACZAC gaue him battell: but being too weak, he was ouercome & put to flight; in which flight his horſe ſtumbling, & he ſo falling to the groũd, was there before he could recouer himſelf, takẽ by his enemies which had him in chaſe, & ſo brought boũd to Baiazet: his two ſons, Muhamet Beg & Alis Beg, being takẽ in that battell alſo, were ſent priſoners to PRUSA. Aladin himſelfe was by Baiazet his cõmandement deliuered to his enemy Temurtaſes: who in reuẽge of the wrong he had before done him, preſently cauſed him to

A be hanged: which when Baiazet vnderstood, hee seemed very sorrie that he had so put him to death, for that he was his owne sisters sonne. Baiazet following the course of his victorie, won ICONIVM, LARENDA, NIGDE, with all the rest of Aladin his kingdome. About this time also, AMASIA the great metropoliticall citie of CAPADOCIA was by the prince thereof deliuered vnto Baiazet, being too weake himselfe to defend the same against the force of Casi-Burchanidin, prince of the great and strong citie of SEBASTIA, his enemie; now growne to be a man of great power in that part of ASIA, and had solicited the Sultan of ÆGYPT to aid him against Baiazet. Whereupon Baiazet returning from the conquest of CARAMANIA, led his armie towards SEBASTIA, where the cittizens had a little before depriued Casi-Burchanidin of his gouernment, B for his crueltie, and placed his sonne in his stead: but in short time no lesse wearie of the sonne than before of the father, they with like inconstancie sent word to Baiazet, that if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the citie: vpon whose approch, Casis (his son) for feare fled out of the citie to prince Nasradin, his brother in law. After whose departure, the cittizens according to their promise deliuered the citie vnto Baiazet at his comming, wherein hee left Solyman his eldest sonne gouernour. And so hauing in this notable expedition conquered the kingdome of CARAMANIA, and taken the great citties of AMASIA and SEBASTIA, with most part of CAPPADOCIA, and all that part of ASIA which the Turks call RUMILIA ASIATICA, he returned to PRUSA, and there wintered.

Amasia yeelded vnto Baiazet.

Sebastia deliuered to Baiazet.

The next Spring BaiaZet (hearing that his old enemie Cutrun BaiaZet prince of CASTAMO- C NA and PONTUS, was dead) came to CASTAMONA with a great armie: of whose comming, Isfendiar (Cutrun Baiazet his sonne, and then prince of that country) hearing, fled out of the citie to SYNOPE, a little citie vpon the coast of the Euxine: from whence he sent an embassador vnto BaiaZet, humbly requesting him, to suffer him to haue that little citie, as his seruant to liue in, (which he was sure he would otherwise bestow vpon some other of his seruants) & not to seeke the innocent blood of the sonne for the fathers offence. Which his request, BaiaZet moued with pitie, graunted: yet neuertheless tooke from him CASTAMONA, with the greatest part of his dominion in PONTUS, which he gaue to his sonne Solyman. At the same time he violently oppressed the prince Germean, and tooke from him the cities of DESPOTOPOLIS and HIERAPOLIS, with all the rest of his dominion.

Baiazet inuadeth Isfendiar, prince of Castamona.

D The prince of MENTESIA long before driuen out of his countrey by BaiaZet (as is before declared) and hauing all this while made his abode at CASTAMONA, doubting now of his own safetie after the death of his good friend Cutrun BaiaZet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian prince Tamerlane.

BaiaZet returning to PRUSA, there built a magnificent Mahometane temple; during which worke, hee with great superstition forbore drinking of wine, reposing himselfe with the companie of graue and learned men, and the administration of justice: whereby hee greatly woon the hearts of his subjects, and had now so enlarged his kingdome, that all kings and princes bordering vpon him stood in great feare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes king of BAGDAT (or new BABILON) & EIRACVM, E with Iosephus Niger king of CHOLCHIS, enforced with the violent incursions of Tamerlane and his Tartars, for safegard of their liues were glad to flie into SYRIA: where they being discouered, were both cast in prison by the commaundement of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commaunded ouer SYRIA: from whence they afterwards hardly escaping, fled to BaiaZet his court. Where after Achmetes had stayed two moneths, he by the aid of BaiaZet recouered the possession of EIRACVM, part of his own inheritance. Iosephus the other Mahometane king, hauing tarried in BaiaZet his court eight moneths, at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan, in which expedition hee mightily preuailed: and hauing slaine the Ægyptian Sultans generall, and discomfited his forces, took the citie of MALATIE or MELETINE in ARMENIA, with DIORIGE, DERENDE, and BEXENE, taken from the Turcomans, and spoiled F all the countrey thereabouts. From thence marching with his armie towards ERZNITZANE, the prince thereof, called Tachretin, met him vpon the way, yeelding his citie and country into his power; which BaiaZet presently gaue to Iosephus Niger: who after he had six daies enjoyed this new gouernment, finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a stranger, surrendred the same again into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the citizens of ERZNITZANE humbly requested of Baiazet, That they might be again gouerned by their old prince Tachretin, now his vassale. Which thing he at their earnest request graunted: but taking his wife and children as G a pledge of his loyaltie, sent the away to PRUSA, where they were all not long after made away.

The Mahometan princes of Asia oppressed by Baiazet, disguised flye vnto Tamerlane for aid.

When Baiazet had now many yeares thus mightily preuailed against the Christian princes in ROMANIA, BULGARIA, BOZNA, THESALIA, VALACHIA, and other places of EUROPE, as is before declared; and inflamed with insatiable ambition, had in worse manner oppressed the Mahometan kings and princes of ASIA, of whom some were by him slaine, some driuen out of their dominions into exile, some imprisoned, and othersome brought into such subjection that they liued as it were but at his deuotion; and was now growne to that greatnesse, that in the pride of his heart he stood in feare of no man, but was (as he thought) a terrour vnto the world, hauing vnder his obeisance great and large dominions in EUROPE, but farre greater in ASIA: H
It fortuned diuers of these miserable oppressed and discontented Mahometan princes, by great fortune as if it had been by appointment, to meet together at the court of the great Tartarian prince Tamerlane, whether they were fled for releese and succour. The prince Germian Ogli, after long imprisonment in the castle of IPSALA in EUROPE, brake prison, and with Hissar-bey his great councellour and prison-fellow, consorted themselues with a companie of loytering companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the country people with their apish toies: in which companie hee passed HELLESPONTUS, as a beareward, and at length with much adoe came to Tamerlane his court: whether the prince of MENTESIA was come before, in the habit of an Hermit (as is aforesaid) with his head and beard shauen: Aidin Ogli passing through the country as a pedler, with a packe at his backe, came thether also: The prince Tachretin as a I seruingman, came attending vpon the prince Isfendiar: who came also (but in some better sort than the rest) as an embassadour from some other prince. All these poore princes, with diuers others in like miserie, in short time arriued at SAMARCAND (great Tamerlane his court;) euerie one perticularly complaining of his owne priuat greefe, and all together earnestly requesting that mightie prince, to take vpon him their defence, and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkish tirant Baiazet. Whose pitifull complaints much mooued the noble Tartarian: but especially the long and wrongfull imprisonment of Germian Ogli: and the pitifull complaint and moane of Tachretin, who had of late lost his wife and children, by the crueltie of Baiazet. Yet in this matter of so great and important consequence, Tamerlane made no great shew of his forwardnesse (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the releeuing of K the distressed, and chastising of the proud) but coldly answered those princes, That he could not tell, whether all were so as they had reported of Baiazet, or not, but that he well knew him to be a verie zealous king in setting forth of the Mahometane religion; and that hee had therefore made great warres vpon the Christians, in which godly cause (he said) perhaps they had refused to assist him, or else had giuen him some other greater occasion of offence, to him vnknowne: For I can hardly beleeue (said he) that so great and religious a prince as he, would without just and sufficient cause, offer such violence as you complaine of, especially vnto you his neighbour princes, and of the same religion with himselfe: neuertheless, whatsoeuer I intend concerning your request (said Tamerlane) I will send first an embassadour vnto him, to vnderstand more of him and his proceedings before I resolue vpon any thing: with which answere hee willed L them vntill then to hold themselues contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue dispatched his embassadour to Baiazet, he was aduertised that Achmetes late king of new BABILON, and Iosephus king of COLCHIS, both by him driuen out of their kingdomes, hauing broken out of prison from the Sultan of EGIPT, were now come to Baiazet his court, to craue his aid and assistance: wherefore he deferred to send his embassador, suspecting that Baiazet, incited by these two exiled kings, would first in their quarrell begin to make warre vpon him. But not long after vnderstanding, that they were both againe departed from his court (as is before declared) hee then dispatched his embassadour to Baiazet, with many rich gifts and presents, courteously requesting him, the rather for his sake, to deale kindly with these poore Mahometane princes, his friends; as also with the Greeke emperour Emanuel his allie, for whom he was now become an M intercessour vnto him. Some report also, that he besides this, requested to haue the two aforesaid Mahometan kings of BAGDAT and COLCHIS deliuered vnto him; and withall seemed not a little to dislike of Baiazet his proceeding against the Turcomans his friends. But Baiazet being a prince of a great and haughtie spirit, and vnaccustomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embassage, in great scorne reiected the presents by Tamerlane

A lane ſent vnto him, and eſpecially certaine garments which Tamerlane after the manner of thoſe Eaſterne nations, had in kindneſſe amongſt other things ſent him: willing the embaſſadour to bid his maiſter meddle with his owne matters, and to preſcribe laws vnto his owne ſubjects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to doe; and to ſend his ragges for preſents vnto his inferiours, and not vnto princes of greater power and ſtate than himſelfe. Adding therevnto many other words full of deſpight and diſdaine, affoording him no better ſtile than the plaine name of Tamerlane: calling him the husband of an whore, if he met him not in the field; and wiſhing vnto himſelfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice diuorced wife, after ſhe had been polluted by another man (as the greateſt diſhonour that might be) if he failed to meet him whereſoeuer he durſt
B to dare him battaile. Which proud anſwere of the Turkes, by the embaſſadour reported vnto Tamerlane, and agrauated by Axalla (a Chriſtian of the race of the Genowaies, borne at CAPHA, and then one of the greateſt counſellors about him, and the Greeke emperors great friend) was ſo euill taken by him, that all other things ſet apart, hee reſolued to goe againſt the Turke, and to take in hand that war, as of all other the fitteſt for the encreaſe of his honour and glorie. Beſides that, he thought it not in reaſon fit for the greatneſſe of the Tartarian empire, to ſuffer ſuch an vnquiet neighbor to grow great; as ſtill encroching vpon other the weake princes confining vnto him, and adding conqueſts vnto conqueſts; and yet neuer the more contented, might in the C end proue dangerous vnto his owne eſtate and ſoueraigntie: a common care to ſuch as be themſelues great, and mounted vp vnto the higheſt degrees of worldly honor, to haue in jealouſie and diſtruſt the ſuddaine riſing of others neere or farther off, as perillous or diſgracefull to themſelues, or their eſtate: whoſe growing greatneſſe they therefore ſeeke by all means to hinder; as did now the mightie Tamerlane the proceedings and encreaſing of the great Othoman king, Baiazet: & the rather being continually prickt forward ſo to do, by the ſolicitation of the Greeke emperor Emanuel, the other oppreſſed Mahometane princes, and by the great captaine Axalla, (as is aforeſaid) a Chriſtian: of whom for all that Tamerlane himſelfe, a Mahometane, for the great fidelitie, valour, and vertue he found in him, made no ſmall reckoning, but was contented euen in his greateſt and moſt waighty affaires to be by him aduiſed; diſliking of no man for his religion whatſoeuer, ſo as D he did worſhip but one only God, creator of heauen & earth, and of all that therein is. Being himſelfe of opinion, That God in eſſence one, & in himſelfe immutable, without change or diuerſitie: yet for the manifeſting of his omnipotencie & power, as he had created in the world ſundry kinds of people, much differing both in nature, manners, and condition, and yet all framed to the image of himſelfe: ſo was he alſo contented to be of them diuerſly ſerued, according to the diuerſitie of their natures and manners; ſo that they worſhipped none other ſtrange gods, but him alone, the maker and creator of all things. Which was the cauſe that he permitted the vſe of all religions within the countries ſubject to his obedience, were they not meere Atheiſts, idolaters, or worſhippers of ſtrange and vaine gods.

Tamerlane his opinion concerning the diuerſitie of religions.

Neither was proud Baiazet as one ignorant of the power or purpoſe of Tamerlane, in the mean time idle, but ſtill proſecuted his good fortune for the enlarging of his empire, & increaſing of his
E ſtrength: wiſely deeming (as the truth was) whatſoeuer meſſages were ſent vnto him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meere threatenings and forewarnings of his more dangerous purpoſes and deſignes againſt him and his ſtate: which he was ſo far from fearing, as that to prouoke him the more, he ſpared no intemperat ſpeech, which might moue him to wrath; wiſhing (as ſhould ſeeme) for nothing more than to meet him in the field, there to trie the fortune of a battell with him. So weake is our foreſight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our vnderſtanding for the apprehenſion or declining of the fatall doome euen preſently hanging ouer our heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance moſt deſirouſly wiſh for thoſe things which are vnto vs the cheefe occaſions of our vtter ruin and deſtruction.

But here before we enter into farther diſcourſe of the mortall warre betwixt theſe two ſo puiſſant princes, it ſhall not bee much from our purpoſe to ſtep a little out of the way, to ſee what
F this mightie Tamerlane (of whom ſo many princes craued aid) was: who liuing, held the Eaſt in ſuch awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terrour of the World; which he then filled with the glorie of his name. Moſt Hiſtoriographers report him to haue ben poorly borne, of baſe and obſcure parents: and ſo himſelfe alſo in his youth to haue liued as a poore ſhepheard or heardſman in the mountaines; where conſorting himſelfe with other ſturdie companions of like qualitie and diſpoſition, ſuch as there liued by robbing of marchants and other paſſengers,

The baſe opinion ſome haue, concerning the birth and riſing of Tamerlane.

passengers, hee became a masterfull theefe amongst them: vnto whom other such leaud mates daily still more and more resorting, hee in short time grew (as they say) to that greatnesse, that he is reported to haue beene of such power, as neuer man but hee euer yet came vnto. A matter almost incredible. For albeit, that the Romane empire, yea and this great empire of the Turks also, with some others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus, and the other vnder Othoman: yet grew they not as vpon the suddaine, in their times, to any great lustre (neither was it possible for them of so small beginnings so to doe) but by many degrees, and that in long time; euery of the succeeding princes, according to their fortunes, adding something to their state, before it could be made great: whereas he (by their report) contrarie to the course of things both naturall and ciuile (which from their small beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatnesse, but by degrees, and that in the long reuolution of time) taking his beginning of nothing, grew vpon the suddaine to be a burthen & terror vnto the world. Wherin our late Historiographers seeme too much to haue followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their kingdome almost in one battell subuerted, report nothing simply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthie praises, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage onely, but euen in the course of his whole life also: making him (as they would haue the world to beleeue) first to haue beene a very abject amongst men; and then for his inhumane crueltie a very monster in nature, or (as it was long before, but more truly said of another great one much like himselfe) a lumpe of earth tempered with blood. Which incredible reports concerning so great a monarch, I list not to follow, as too full of dishonour: especially whereas others of no lesse credit than they, with farre more modestie and greater probabilitie report of him the greatest honour that may be. Hee was (as they and the others also say) borne at SAMERCAND, the cheefe citie of the Zagataian Tartars, pleasantly situated vpon the riuer IAXARTES: his father was called Zain-Cham, or as some others will, Og, prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the countrey of SACHETAY (sometime part of the famous kingdome of PARTHIA) third in descent from Zingis, the great and fortunate leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this historie remembred. Which Og, as a prince of a peaceable nature (accounting it no lesse honour quietly to keepe the countries left him by his father, than with much trouble and no lesse danger to seeke how to enlarge the same) long liued in most happie rest with his subjects, no lesse happie than himselfe: not so much seeking after the hoording vp of gold and siluer (things of that nation not regarded) as contenting himselfe with the encrease and profit of his flocks of sheepe, and heards of cattell; then, and yet also, the principall reuenues of the Tartar kings and princes: which happily gaue occasion vnto some, ignorant of the manner and custome of those Northerne nations and countries, to account them all for shepheards and heardsmen; and so also to haue reported of this mighrie prince, as of a shepheards sonne, or heardsman himselfe: vainely measuring his nobilitie by the homely manner of his people and subjects, and not by the honor of his house, & heroicall vertues, such as were hardly to be found greater in any prince of that or other former ages. His peaceable father now well stricken in yeares, and wearie of the world, deliuered vp vnto him (not yet past fifteene yeares old) the gouernment of his kingdome, joining vnto him two of his most faithfull counsellours, Odmar and Aly, to assist him in the gouernment of his state (retiring himselfe vnto a solitarie life, the more at quiet to serue God, and so to end his daies in peace:) which two his trustie seruants and graue counsellors he dearely loued whilest they liued, and much honoured the remembrance of them, being dead. The first proofe of his fortune and valour, was against the Moscouit, for spoiling of a citie which had put it selfe vnder his protection; and for entering of his countrey; and for proclaiming of warre against him: whom he in a great battaile ouerthrew, hauing slaine fiue and twentie thousand of the Moscouits footmen, and betweene fifteene and sixteen thousand horsemen, with the losse of scarce eight thousand horsemen and foure thousand footmen of his own. After which battell he beholding so many thousands of men there dead vpon the ground, was so farre from rejoicing thereat, that turning himselfe vnto one of his familiars, he lamented the condition of such as commaunded ouer great armies, commending his fathers quiet course of life, accounting him happie in seeking for rest, and the other most vnhappie, which by the destruction of their owne kind, sought to procure their owne glorie; protesting himselfe euen from his heart to be grieued to see such sorrowfull tokens of his victorie. With this ouerthrow the Moscouit discouraged, sent embassadours to him for peace, which vpon such honourable conditions as pleased

Tamerlane honorably discended.

The cause why some haue reported him to haue been a shepheard or heardsman.

A pleaſed him to ſet downe, was by him graunted, and ſo the peace concluded. Now the Great Cham of TARTARIA (his fathers brother) being growne old, and out of hope of any mo children, moued with the fame of his nephew, after this victorie ſent vnto him diuers preſents, and withall offering him his onely daughter in marriage, and with her to proclaime him heire apparant vnto his empire; as in right hee was, being his brothers ſonne, and the daughters not at all ſucceeding in thoſe empires. Which ſo great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and ſo the mariage was afterwards with great triumph at the old emperors court ſolemnized; and he proclaimed heire apparant vnto that great empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being euer after this marriage by the old emperour his vncle, and now his father in law, ſo long as hee liued, notably ſupported, and after his death ſucceeding him alſo in that ſo mightie an empire. Yet in the meane time wanted not this worthie prince the enuious competitours of theſe his ſo great honours: inſomuch, that whileſt by the aduiſe and perſuaſion of the old emperour, he was taking in hand to make warre againſt the great king of CHINA (who had as then gone far beyond his bounds) and ſo was now well onwards on his way, he was by the conſpiracie of Calix (a man of greateſt power and authoritie in the Great Cham his court) almoſt thruſt out of his new empire: Calix with a right puiſſant armie hauing alreadie ceized vpon the great citie of CAMBALU, and the citizens alſo generally fauouring thoſe his traiterous proceedings, as diſdaining to bee gouerned by the Zagataian Tartar. For redreſſe whereof, Tamerlane was enforced with the greateſt part of his armie to returne, and meeting with the rebell (who then had in his armie foureſcore C thouſand horſe, and an hundred thouſand foot) in a great and mortall battell (wherein of the one ſide and of the other were more than fiftie thouſand men ſlaine) ouerthrew him (though not without the great danger of his own perſon, as being there himſelfe beaten down to the ground) tooke him priſoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which ſo dangerous a rebellion, with the death of the traitour, and the cheefe of the conſpiratours repreſſed, and his ſtate in the newneſſe thereof by this victorie well confirmed, he proceeded in his intended war againſt the great king of CHINA; brake downe the ſtrong wall, which the Chinoies had made foure hundred leagues long betwixt the mountaines, for the repreſsing of the incurſions of the Tartars, entered their countrey; and meeting with the king, leading after him three hundred and fiftie thouſand men (whereof there were an hundred and fiftie thouſand horſemen, and the reſt on foot) in a great D and dreadfull battaile, with the ſlaughter of 60000 of his men, ouercame him, and tooke him priſoner: whom for all that he (in the courſe of ſo great a victorie wiſely moderating his fortune) ſhortly after ſet againe at libertie; yet ſo, as that hauing before taken from him the one halfe of his kingdome, and therein left Odmar his truſtie lieutenant, with a ſufficient power for the reſtraining of the proud king, if he ſhould againe begin to raiſe any new ſtirres; and withall, impoſed ſuch other conditions as pleaſed himſelfe, with the yearely tribute of three hundred thouſand crownes, he well prouided for the aſſuring of thoſe his new conqueſts: and ſo in triumph returned with victorie vnto the old emperour his father in law at CAMBALU, not a little glad to ſee both him and his daughter, who had in all thoſe warres ſtill accompanied him. But leauing him, now thus by birth great, by his fortune greater, but by his vertue greateſt of all (as able now to E draw after him almoſt the whole power of the Eaſt) let vs againe return thither from whence we haue for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digreſſed.

Tamerlane marrieth the daughter and heire of the great Cham of Tartarie.

The warre againſt the Turkiſh Sultan Baiazet (as is aforeſaid) by Tamerlane reſolued vpon, he ſent Axalla the great captaine to his countrey of SACHETAY (called of ſome ZAGATAI) to giue beginning to the aſſembling of his forces from all parts; to the end, that with the firſt of the Spring hee might ſet forward for the releeſe of ſo many diſtreſſed princes, and the abating of the pride of ſo great and mightie a tyrant as was Baiazet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian emperour, his vncle and father in law, an hundred thouſand footmen, and foureſcore thouſand horſemen; hoping to haue as many moe from SACHETAY his owne countrey, beſides the lords that for honours ſake would accompanie him in that F his ſo honourable an expedition, from whome hee made account alſo of fiftie thouſand men more which they would bring vnto him, and diuers other great ſupplies which hee expected from other places alſo: wherewith he doubted not well to performe what he had ſo honourably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Othoman pride: for which and other ſuch like, he was (as hee would often times ſay) by God himſelfe appointed. So taking his leaue of the old emperour his father in law, and of the princeſſe his wife (then left behind him for the comfort of her aged father, he departed from CAMBALU towards SAMARCAND, the place of his birth and seat of his empire; leauing behind him the forces brought from the great emperour his vncle, to come after him to OZARA, where hee had appointed the generall meeting of his armie. At which time amongst other princes that thither brought or sent their supplies, the great Muscouite beeing requested so to doe, promised to send him fifteene thousand horse, with a certaine summe of money, and leaue for his armie to passe through so much of his territories as should be necessarie: all which hee afterwards performed vnto Tamerlane, being glad that hee did set vpon others, rather than on himselfe; and that so great a preparation, should fall vpon them, whose greatnesse was as dreadfull and dangerous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almost at that time being astonished at the sudden greatnesse of this Othoman king, and the happie successe he had in all his warres; not the least cause that mooued Tamerlane to oppose himselfe against him, deeming it much better to goe and set vpon him in his new conquests, than to stay vntill he therein setled, were come neerer vnto him, and so should debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his dammage. A good and sound resolution: first in that it tended to the destruction of the enemies countrey; and then, that if any thing should fall out otherwise with him than well, his countrey should not thereby receiue any such astonishment as if the danger were neerer or within the bowels of the same. Now in the mean time that Tamerlane lay at SAMARCAND, Axalla the great captaine and Tamerlane his lieutenant generall, had assembled all the armie at OZARA. Whereof Tamerlane vnderstanding, sent for him to SAMARCAND to conferre with him about the setting forward of his armie. For although he were still accompanied with great renowned princes, yet were they no body in comparison of Axalla, whose sound counsel had won him such credit with his lord & master, as by his aduice he did all things, and without him nothing: which his so great authoritie and fauour with his prince, wanted not the enuie of the court; but that his great vertues, and rare found courtesie (in so great fortune) together with so many worthie seruices as he had done, supported him against the malice of the same. He by the commaundement of Tamerlane, leauing the charge of the armie at OZARA, with the prince of THANAIS, another of Tamerlane his great captaines, came himselfe to SAMARCAND, and there at large discoursed with him, about the estate and order of his armie. And shortly after, departing with Axalla and the rest from SAMARCAND, for to goe to OZAZA the place where all his armie met: being come thether, entred into a great consultation with his most expert captaines, about the taking of his journey, and conducting of his armie; as whether it were better to lead the same by the coasts of the Muscouite directly towards CAPHA, or else on the other side of the Caspian sea by the skirts of PERSIA. Where after long discourse and sundry opinions with their reasons deliuered, it was in the end resolued (although the way were the longer) to passe by the Muscouit, so to come vnto the Georgians, and to TREBIZONDA, and from thence to enter into the Othoman king his countrey. And so setting forward from OZARA, hee came at length to MARANIS, where he staid three daies looking for the forces which prince Odmar should send him from CHINA, not long before by him conquered: whereof he there receiued news, and there caused his armie to be paid, and a generall muster thereof to be taken. He had there also newes of the aid the Muscouite did send him: and caused an infinite quantitie of victuals, and most part of his furniture to be conuaied by the Caspian sea; being a great commoditie and ease vnto his armie, which marching by land, was of necessitie to passe some twentie leagues through places destitute both of victuals and water. Tamerlane all the way coasting alongst the sea shoare, passed the time in hunting, his armie not comming neere him by ten leagues; which was so great, that it extended it selfe full twentie leagues. Comming to the riuer of EDEL, he staied at ZARAZICH whilest his armie passed the riuer at MECHET, and two other bridges which he had caused to be made for that purpose. Now the Circassians, and Georgians, hearing of the approach of Tamerlane with his huge armie, by their embassadours offred him all the helpe and assistance they could, in his journey as he passed that way. These Georgians were (and yet are) Christians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greeke emperours: and afterwards sometimes tributaries, and sometimes confederats vnto the Persians: but alwaies enemies vnto the Turks, by whom (of late and in our remembrance) but especially by Amurath the third, they together with some part of the Persian kingdome, haue been greeuously oppressed, as in the processe of this historie may appeare. Of these warlike people glad of Tamerlane his comming, for the repressing of the Turke, Axalla drew great numbers vnto the seruice of his prince: who not a little esteemed of them, being all tall men, verie beautifull, of great strength and

A and courage, and withall moſt expert ſouldiours; as hauing oftentimes reſiſted the power of the Othoman kings, by reaſon of the aduantage their countrey affordeth them, being verie rough and hard to come into. By theſe kind people, Tamerlane was in euerie place honourably entertained, and his great armie with all neceſſaries plentifully releeued. In paſsing through which countrey and the reſt as he marched, he tooke ſuch order with his ſouldiours, that none of the people whereby he paſſed, were any thing by them injured; inſomuch that if a ſouldiour had taken but an apple, or other thing of like valour from any man, he died therefore, ſo ſeuere were his commaunds. It is reported that one of his ſouldiors, hauing taken a little milke from a countrey woman, and ſhe thereof complaining, he cauſed the ſaid ſouldior to be preſently killed, and his ſto-
B macke to be ript; where the milke that he had of late drunke being found, he contented the woman & ſo ſent her away, who had otherwiſe vndoubtedly died for her falſe accuſation had it not ſo appeared. Which his ſo great ſeueritie, and in other like caſes, was of many accounted for extreame crueltie: yet was it indeed the wholſome preſeruation of his armie, being ſo great, as that it was thought almoſt impoſsible to haue found ſufficient victuals for the releefe thereof; whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing elſe neceſſarie for the vſe of man, his campe being ſtill as a moſt populous and well gouerned citie, ſtored with all manner of things: wherevnto both artificers and marchants, from farre countreys reſorted with their commodities and marchandiſe, as vnto ſome famous mart; and the countrey people, without feare from euerie place brought in their countrey commodities, for which they receiued preſent money, and ſo in C ſafetie againe departed. So marching on, he at length came to BACHICHICH, where hee ſtaid to refreſh his armie eight daies, and there againe tooke a generall muſter thereof, wherein were found (as moſt write) foure hundreth thouſand horſe, and ſixe hundreth thouſand foot; or as ſome others that were there preſent affirme, three hundreth thouſand horſemen, and fiue hundreth thouſand foot, of all nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall paie, and as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of ſuch orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obſerue the ſame: with much other militarie diſcipline, whereof hee was verie curious with his captains. At which time alſo, it was lawfull for euerie common ſouldiour to behold him with more boldnes than on other daies, foraſmuch as he did for that time, and ſuch like, lay aſide his emperiall majeſtie, and ſhew himſelfe more familiar vnto them.

The number of Tamerlane his great armie.

D Now could he hardly be perſuaded, that Baiazet hauing ſubdued the moſt part of GRECIA, diſtreſſed the Greeke emperour, and ſo great meanes to recouer whatſoeuer hee ſhould looſe in ASIA, would bee ſo aduenturous as to come ouer the ſtraits out of EUROPE, to trie the fortune of a battaile with him; but rather warily protract the time, to wearie him at length with wants, that in a ſtrange countrey drew ſuch a world of people after him: wherein hee found himſelfe much deceiued, for hauing paſſed the Georgian countrey, and being come to BUYSABUICH, Axalla (whom he had not ſeen in eight daies before, becauſe he led the head of the armie) came vnto him with ſuch news as he knew would be right welcome vnto him: which was, that Baiazet had raiſed his ſiege of CONSTANTINOPLE (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new conqueſts in ASIA; and that hee was certainly reſolued, to come to a day of battaile, not ſo much truſting vnto the multitude of his armie as to the valour and experience of his ſoldiors, being all men of long well trained vp in the wars. At which vnexpected newes Tamerlane greatly rejoiced: yet without inſolencie or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of ſuch an one as judged the euents of battailes to be (as they are) alwaies doubtfull: ſaying ſometimes, That a ſmall [illegible]ell conducted, did oftentimes carie away the victorie, from the confuſed multitude. Three daies he ſtaid at BUYSABUICH, and cauſed his ſouldiours continually to march forward, which at GARGA and CHIUSERIG paſſed ouer the riuer EUPHRATES: which he did the rather to maintain his armie vpon the ſpoile of the enemie, in attending his comming, than vpon himſelfe, or his allies. All the cities that yeelded vnto him by the way as he marched, he fauourably receiued; the other that refuſed to ſubmit themſelues to his obedience, he vſed with F all extremitie: eſpecially the great and ſtrong citie of SEBASTIA, where certain of the forerunners of his armie were by the Turks there in garriſon cut off, and ſlaine, and the gates of the citie as it were in contempt of him, ſet wide open. Wherewith Tamerlane offended, ſent out certaine of his Tartarian horſemen, commaunding them vpon paine of his diſpleaſure ſo to beare themſelues againſt their enemies, as that he might at his comming either find the cittie taken, or the gates thereof ſhut againſt him: for he had his men at ſo great commaund, that no danger was

vnto them more dreadfull than his displeasure, neither did he punish any thing so seuerely, as cowardise: insomuch, that if in his disport of hunting the wild beast, any did for feare giue way to the Lyon or Beare, and slew him not, was sure to die therefore himselfe: and to turne his backe vpon the enemie, was no lesse danger than to run vpon his owne death. Now the Turks in garrison at SEBASTIA, seeing these Tartarian horsemen marching towards the citie, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, issued out for to meet them; where they were so furiously charged by these few horsemen, that they were glad to retire, and for hast to shut part of their owne men out of the cittie, least the enemie following them at their heeles, should haue entered the gates together with them. Which Turkes so shut out, were by the Tartarians slaine at the gates of the cittie. Shortly after came Tamerlane with all his armie, and sat downe before the citie, where he lay still seuen dayes, not making shew of any violence at all, the defendants because the cittie was of great strength, all that while thinking that he had intended by long siege to distresse the same, and the more because of his long lying still. But about the eight day, the wals and towers of the cittie in many places vndermined, were suddainely ouerthrowne, leauing large breaches for the enemie to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the cittie dismayed, foorthwith yeelded the cittie to Tamerlane, in hope so to haue saued their liues: but hee (as the Turkes report) being entered the cittie, commaunded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the cittie, without respect of age, sex, or condition, to be throwne into the same, and there buried quicke. Which done, the citie was by his commaundement vtterly rased also. After that, calling vnto him Malcozzius, the gouernour of the cittie, whom he had for that purpose onely spared, he commaunded him to goe and tell his master what was happened to his strong cittie of SEBASTIA, and what hee had there himselfe seene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Baiazet, was by him demanded, whether of the two armies he thought bigger or stronger: for now Baiazet had assembled a mightie armie of three hundred thousand men, or as some report of three hundred thousand horsemen, and two hundred thousand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius hauing before craued pardon, answered, That it could not bee, but that Tamerlane might in reason haue the greater number, for that hee was a commaunder of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Baiazet offended, in great choller replied: Out of doubt, the sight of the Tartarian hath made this coward so afraid, that he thinketh euery enemie to be two.

Sebastia besieged by Tamerlane.

Sebastia yeelded to Tamerlane.

Most of the Latine histories report, that when Tamerlane had taken SEBASTIA, he put all the men to the sword, and bringing the women and chidren into the fields without the citie there ouer-ran them with his horsemen, excepting some few which were reserued for prisoners. As also that Baiazet there lost his eldest sonne Erthogrul (of some called Orthobules) whose death with the losse of the citie, so much greeued him (as is reported) that marching with his great armie against Tamerlane, and by the way hearing a countrey shepheard merrily reposing himselfe with his homely pipe, as he sat vpon the side of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; standing still a great while listening vnto him, to the great admiration of many, at last fetching a deepe sigh, brake foorth into these words: O happie sheepeheard, which haddest neither Orthobules nor SEBASTIA to loose: bewraying therein his owne discontentment, and yet withall shewing, That worldly blisse consisteth not so much in possessing of much, subject vnto danger, as in joying in a little contentment, deuoid of feare. Howbeit the Turkes themselues reporting the taking of SEBASTIA, speake not [redacted] at all, but giue him lost six yeares before in the warres against Casi Burchaniden, and lieth buried by his father at PRUSA. In this cittie of SEBASTIA was lost twelue thousand Turkes, men, women, and children, as their histories report. The rest of the cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the destruction of SEBASTIA, yeelded themselues for feare of like danger: the cittizens whereof he courteously vsed, especially the Christians, whom he set at libertie, in respect of Emanuel the Greeke emperour, whom hee seemed wholly therein to gratifie. But he had not gone farre into the Turkes dominion, but that hee was certainely aduertised, how that Baiazet, with a great armie was comming against him, and now within thirtie leagues of him: which caused him after that time, to march with his armie more closely. Axalla leading the vantgard sent forth Chiansor prince of CIARCAN, with foure thousand Parthian horsemen, to get knowledge of the Turkes armie, and where Baiazet lay, as also what countrey that was beyond SENNAS; and if he could learne any thing thereof, to make relation of it vnto him. This prince of CIARCAN was Tamerlane his kinſman, a man of great reputation, and next vnto Axalla, in whoſe abſence he had the cõmanding of the avantgard, his charge; who alſo ſent before him another Parthian captain with 500 horſemen. So he had not ridden ten leagues, but that he heard news of Baiazet his comming, & hauing ſurpriſed SENNAS, vnderſtood there the certaine eſtate of the Turks armie, which was then at TATAIA, & ſo marching forward. Wherof Tamerlane certified, cõmanded him not to retire frõ that place, vntill he did ſee the arriuall of the enemie, and thereof to giue him aduertiſement euery hower; being himſelfe reſolued to paſſe on no farther, as come to a faire large plaine, and a countrey of aduantage for the order of his battaile: for he knew that his armie was farre greater than Baiazets, and therefore made choice of thoſe great plaines. Yet for that his armie conſiſted of diuers nations, and withall conſidering that hee was not to fight againſt the Chinois, a ſoft effeminate people (as of late) but againſt the Turks, a moſt warlike nation, and well acquainted with all manner of fights and martiall ſtratagemes, hee thought it good to be well aduiſed how he proceeded againſt them. Wherefore hee preſently ſent for Axalla, with him to view the ſaid place, and to haue his opinion, Whether it would be for his aduantage or not, there to ſtay? who not miſliking of the choice of the place, yet adtuiſed him alſo to keepe SENNAS ſo long as he poſsibly could: and ſo ſent word vnto them that were therein, vpon the approch of the enemie to ſet fire vpon the ſame, and ſo to withdraw themſelues from thence, to the end, that the enemie ſhould not haue any deſire to encampe there, but come ſtill forward neere vnto thoſe plains where Tamerlane deſired to fight, eſpecially for that he was ſtronger in horſe than Baiazet. Thus the Turks ſtill marching on, thought to haue ſurpriſed ſome of their enemies in SENNAS, who as ſoone as they drew neere, retired all, excepting ſome hundred, left of purpoſe to fire the towne: who hauing performed the ſame, retired of purpoſe in great diſorder. Now the prince of CIARCAN had diuided his forces into two parts, and giuen commaundement to the firſt, that as ſoone as they perceiued the enemies to purſue the hundred horſe, that ſo diſorderly of purpoſe fled, they ſhould receiue them, and ſo retire all altogether. He in the meane time with the reſt of his power ſtood cloſe in a valley, neere vnto a wood ſide, vnſeene at all. Where hauing ſuffered two thouſand of the enemies horſe (the avauntcourriers of the Turks armie) to paſſe by him, he following them in the taile, charged them home; the other which before retired, now turning vpon them alſo: ſo that the Turks ſeeing themſelues thus beſet, and hardly laied vnto both before and behind, as men diſcouraged fled: in which flight moſt of them were ſlaine, and the reſt taken priſoners. This was the firſt encounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians: all the priſoners there taken, were by the prince as a preſent ſent to Tamerlane, and amongſt the reſt the Baſſa of NATOLIA, who led theſe troopes: of whom Tamerlane earneſtly demaunded, what cauſed Baiazet ſo little to eſteeme of him, as to ſhew ſo great contempt of his armie, which he ſhould find ſtrong ynough to abate his pride. Whereunto the Baſſa anſwered, That his lord was the Sunne vpon earth, which could not endure any equall: and that he rather was aſtonied to ſee, how he from ſo farre, had enterpriſed ſo dangerous a journey, to hinder the fortune of his lord, in whoſe fauor the heauens (as he ſaid) did bend themſelues, to further his greatneſſe, and vnto whom all the world ſubjected it ſelfe; and that he committed great follie in going about to reſiſt the ſame. Vnto which ſo proud a ſpeech Tamerlane replied, That hee was ſent from heauen to puniſh his raſhneſſe, and to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whoſe promiſe is to plucke downe the mightie, and raiſe vp the lowly. As for thy ſelfe (ſaid he) thou haſt alreadie felt (although I pitie thy miſhap) what the valour of my Parthian horſe is againſt thy Turkiſh: and thy maſter I haue alreadie cauſed to raiſe his ſiege of CONSTANTINOPLE, and to looke to his owne things here in ASIA. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his ſpeech, demaunded of him, If his maſter did come reſolued to bid him battaile? Aſſure your ſelfe (ſaid he) there is nothing he more deſireth: and would to God I might acknowledge your greatneſſe, in giuing me leaue to aſsiſt my lord at that battaile. Good leaue haue thou, ſaid Tamerlane, goe thy waies, and tell thy lord, that thou haſt ſeene me; and that he ſhall in the battaile find mee on horſebacke, where he ſhall ſee a greene enſigne diſplaied. The Baſſa thanking him, ſwore that next vnto his lord, he vowed vnto him his ſeruice. And ſo returning, declared vnto Baiazet, how that he had ſeene Tamerlane: and truly reported vnto him all that he had willed him to ſay; not forgetting ouer all to publiſh his courteſie and bountie: who beſides that he had frankely ſet him at libertie, had alſo giuen him a very faire horſe well furniſhed, although he well knew hee was to ſerue againſt himſelfe. Whereunto Baiazet anſwered no more, but that hee would ſhortly make triall of him, and that he well hoped, before the match were ended, to make him acknowledge his owne follie. The next day the two armies drew neere together, and encamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard ſuch noiſe of horſes, as that it ſeemed the heauens were full of voices, the aire did ſo reſound, & euery man thought the night long, to come to the triall of his valour, and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians (a people no leſſe greedie than needie) talked of nothing but the ſpoile, the prowd Parthians of their honour, and the poore Chriſtians of their deliuerance, all to be gained by the next dayes victorie: euery man during the night time ſpeaking according to his owne humor. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp and down in his campe, heard, and much rejoyced to ſee the hope that his ſoldiors had alreadie in generall conceiued of the victorie. Who after the ſecond watch returned vnto his pauillion, and there caſting himſelfe vpon a carpet, had thought to haue ſlept a while. But his cares not ſuffering him ſo to doe, he then (as his manner was) called for a booke, wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and auncеſtors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he vſed ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therewith vainely to deceiue the time, but to make vſe thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of ſuch dangers, as they by their raſhneſſe or ouerſight fell into. And afterwards hauing a little ſlumbered, he commaunded Axalla to be ſent for, who forthwith came vnto him with diuers other great lords and captaines, the cheefe commaunders of his armie: with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the battaile, he mounted on horſebacke himſelfe, and ſent euery one of them vnto their owne charges, to put the ſame in readineſſe. At the which very inſtant he receiued newes, that the enemie marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battaile: whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee, that ſo accordingly he might marſhall his owne. And hauing cauſed three thouſand horſemen to aduaunce forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in ſuch places, as he had foreſeene to be fitteſt for his aduantage. Now ſeeing the Ianizaries march in a ſquare battell in the middeſt, and vpon the two fronts, two great ſquadrons of horſemen, which ſeemed to bee thirtie thouſand horſe; and another which aduanced and couered the battailion of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himſelfe vnto Axalla, who was neere vnto him, ſaid: I had thought this day to haue fought on foot, but I ſee that it behoueth me now to fight on horſebacke, to giue courage vnto my ſouldiors to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnto me as ſoone as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thouſand footmen, fiftie thouſand vpon each of my two wings, and in the middeſt of them fortie thouſand of my beſt horſemen. My pleaſure is, that after they haue tried the force of theſe men, that they come vnto my auauntguard, of whom I will diſpoſe, and fiftie thouſand horſe more, in three bodies, whom thou ſhalt commaund: which I will aſsiſt with foureſcore thouſand horſe, wherein ſhall be mine owne perſon; hauing an hundred thouſand footmen behind me, who ſhall march in two ſquadrons: & for my arereward I appoint 40000 horſe, & 50000 footmen, who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of 10000 of my beſt horſe, whom I will ſend into euery place where I ſhall thinke needfull within mine armie, for to impart my commaunds. Ouer the firſt fortie thouſand horſe the prince Ciarcan commaunded: ouer the formoſt footmen was the lord Synopes a Genouois, kinſman to Axalla, and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captaine of great eſtimation: the prince Axalla his owne charge conſiſted of fiue ſquadrons of horſemen. Baiazet his armie being alſo both faire, and great, came brauely ſtill on forward towards their enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battaile: except certaine light horſemen Scythians, Parthians, and Muſcouits, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an eſpie aduertiſed, that Baiazet, hauing before giuen order for the diſpoſing of his armie, was on foot in the middeſt of thirtie thouſand Ianizaries, his principall men of warre and greateſt ſtrength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His battaile of horſe was verie faire, amounting to the number of an hundreth and fortie thouſand horſe, all old ſouldiours. The Sultan of Egypt hauing alſo ſent vnto his aid thirtie thouſand Mamalukes, all verie good horſemen, with thirtie thouſand foot. So that his armie marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe Moone (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe ſquadrons directly followed one another) ſeemed ſeemed almoſt as great as his. And ſo with infinite numbers of moſt horrible outcries, ſtill aduanced forward: Tamerlane his ſouldiours all the while ſtanding faſt, with great ſilence.

There was not poſsible to be ſeen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpon the prince of CIARCAN, who had commandement not to fight before the enemie came vnto him: neither could haue been choſen a fairer plaine, and where the skilfull choice of the place, was of leſſe aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the riuer on the left hand of his armie, ſeruing him to ſome ſmall aduantage. Now this yong prince of CIARCAN with his fortie thouſand horſe, was in this firſt encounter almoſt wholie ouerthrowne: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entred euen into the middeſt of the Ianizaries (where the perſon of Baiazet was) putting them in diſorder, was himſelfe there ſlaine. About which time, Axalla ſet vpon them with the auauntgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, and cut it all to peeces, and his footmen comming to joyne with him as they had been commaunded, he faced the battalion of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themſelues for the ſafetie of their prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue ſeene any ſcattered, but the one ſtill reſolutely fighting againſt the other. You might there haue ſeene the horſemen like mountaines ruſh together, and infinite numbers of men die, crie, lament, and threaten all at one inſtant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to ſee the euent of this ſo mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he ſent ten thouſand of his horſe to joyne againe with the ten thouſand appointed for the areareward, and commaunded them to aſsiſt him at ſuch time as he ſhould haue need of them: and at the verie ſame time, charged himſelfe, and made them giue him roome; cauſing the footmen to charge alſo, ouer whom the prince of THANAIS commaunded, who gaue a furious onſet vpon the battalion of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the perſon of Baiazet, who had ſuſtained a great burthen. Now Baiazet had in his armie, a great number of mercinarie Tartarians, called Deſtenſes, with many thouſands of other ſoldiors taken vp in the countries of the poor exiled Mahometan princes; in whoſe juſt quarell, and the Greeke emperours, Tamerlane had chiefely vndertaken that war: theſe Tartarians and other ſouldiours, ſeeing ſome their friends, and otherſome their naturall and louing princes in the armie of Tamerlane; ſtroken with the terrour of diſloyaltie, and abhorring the crueltie of the proud tirant, in the heat of the battaile reuolted from Baiazet to their owne princes: which their reuolt, much weakened Baiazet his forces. Who neuertheleſſe with his owne men of warre, eſpecially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Chriſtian ſouldiours brought to his aid from SERUIA, and other places of EUROPE, with great courage maintained the fight; but the multitude, and not true valor, preuailed: for, as much as might be done by valiant and couragious men, was by the Ianizaries and the reſt perfourmed, both for the preſeruation of the perſon of their prince, and the gaining of the victorie. But in the end, the horſemen with whom Tamerlane himſelfe was giuing a freſh charge, and his auauntgard wholy knit againe vnto him, reenforcing the charge, he with much adoe obtained the victorie. Baiazet himſelfe wounded, and now mounted on horſebacke thinking to haue ſcaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla. Vnto whom he yeelded himſelfe (thinking it had been Tamerlane) who for a ſpace knew him not, but tooke him for ſome other great commaunder of the Turks. Muſa (ſurnamed Zelebi or, The noble) one of Baiazet his ſonnes, with diuers other of Baiazet his great captaines, were there taken alſo: and amongſt the reſt, George the Deſpot of SERUIA, who notwithſtanding this misfortune had that day gained vnto himſelfe the reputation of a great and worthie captaine; inſomuch that Tamerlane euen in the heat of the battaile, maruailing to ſee him, and the Seruians with the other Chriſtians which he had brought to the aid of Baiazet, ſo valiantly to fight, ſaid vnto ſome of the captaines that were neere vnto him, See how couragiouſly yonder religious fight: ſuppoſing them by their ſtrange attire, to haue been ſome of the Turks ſuperſtitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, hee was by him courteouſly welcomed: but yet withall reproued, for that he had fought for Baiazet againſt him, who was come in fauour of the Chriſtian emperour, and the other poore oppreſſed princes, ſuch as the Deſpot himſelfe was. Who thereunto boldly anſwered, That indeed it was not according to his dutie, but according to the proſperitie of Baiazet, vnto whom it ſeemed that all the world did bend: and that his owne ſafetie had cauſed him, though againſt his will, to take part with him. Wherevpon Tamerlane held him excuſed: and ſo without more adoe gaue him leaue at his owne pleaſure to depart.

Baiazet also himselfe, being afterwardes brought vnto Tamerlane as a prisoner, and by him courteously entertained, neuer shewed any token of submission at all, but according to his proud nature, without respect of his present state, presumptuously answered him vnto whatsoeuer he demaunded. Wherewith Tamerlane mooued, told him, that it was now in his power to make him to loose his life. Wherevnto he answered no more, but, Doe it: for that, that losse should bee his greatest happinesse. Tamerlane afterwards demaunding of him, what made him so proud as to enterprise to bring into his subjection so noble a prince as was the Greeke emperour? he answered, Euen the same thing that hath mooued thee to inuade me, namely the desire of glory and soueraigntie. But wherfore then (said Tamerlane) doest thou vse so great cruelty towards them thou hast ouercome, without respect of age or sex? That did I (said he) to giue the greater terrour vnto mine enemies. And what wouldest thou haue done with me (said Tamerlane) if it had been my fortune to haue fallen into thy hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (said Baiazet) haue enclosed thee in a cage of iron, and so in triumph haue caried thee vp and downe my kingdome. Euen so (said Tamerlane) shalt thou bee serued. And so causing him to bee taken out of his presence, turning vnto his followers said: Behold a proud and cruell man, he deserueth to be chastised accordingly, and to bee made an example vnto all the proud and cruell of the world, of the just wrath of God against them. I acknowledge that God hath this day deliuered into my hands, a great enemie, to whom we must therefore giue thanks: which he performed the same day. For the battaile was won at foure of the clocke, and there was yet fiue houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commaunded the dead to be buried, where amongst the rest, they found the bodie of the prince of CIARCAN dead, in the middest of the Ianizaries, where he lay enclosed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreuenged: whose vntimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented; for he was his kinsman, and like inough one day to haue done him great seruice. Whose dead bodie Tamerlane caused to be embalmed, and with two thousand horse, (and diuers of the Turks prisoners, chained and tied together) to be conuaied to SAMERCAND, vntill his comming thether. All the other dead bodies were with all honor that might be, buried at SENNAS.

This great bloodie battaile fought in the yeare of our lord 1397 not farre from the mount STELLA (where sometime the great king Mithrydates, was by Pompey the Great, in a great battaile ouerthrown) was fought from seuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the after noone: victorie all that while as it were with doubtfull wings, houering ouer both armies, as vncertaine where to light; vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane preuailed. Whose wisdome (next vnto God) gaue that daies victorie vnto his souldiours: for that the politique tiring of the strong forces of Baiazet, was the safegard of his owne; whereas if hee had gone vnto the battaile in one front, assuredly the multitude finding such strong resistance, had put it selfe into confusion: whereas this successiue manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battaile slaine is of diuers, diuersly reported: the Turks themselues reporting that Baiazet there lost the noble Mustapha his sonne, with two hundreth thousand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer: and some other speaking of a farre lesse number, as that there should be slaine of the Turkes about threescore thousand, and of Tamerlane his armie not past twentie thousand. But leauing the certaintie of the number vnto the credit of the reporters, like inough it is that the slaughter was exceeding great in so long a fight, betwixt two such armies, as neuer before (as I suppose) met in field together.

By this one daies euent, is plainly to be seen the vncertaintie of worldly things, and what small assurance euen the greatest haue in them. Behold Baiazet the terrour of the world, and as hee thought, superiour to fortune, in an instant with his state in one battaile ouerthrowne into the bottome of miserie and dispaire: and that at such time as he thought least, euen in the middest of his greatest strength. It was three daies (as they report) before he could be pacified, but as a desperate man, still seeking after death, and calling for it: neither did Tamerlane after he had once spoken with him, at all afterwards courteously vse him, but as of a proud man caused small account to be made of him. And to manifest that he knew how to punish the haughtie, made him to bee shackled in fetters and chaines of gold, and so to bee shut vp in an iron cage made like a grate, in such sort, as that he might on euerie side be seen; and so caried him vp and downe as hee passed through ASIA, to be of his owne people scorned and derided. And to his farther disgrace, vpon festiuall daies vsed him for a footstoole to tread vpon, when he mounted to horse: and at other times

Baiazet like a beast shut vp in an iron cage.

A times ſcornefully fed him like a dogge with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the vncertaintie of worldly honour, that he vnto whoſe ambitious mind, ASIA, and EUROPE, two great parts of the world were to little, ſhould be now caried vp and downe cooped vp in a little iron cage, like ſome perillous wild beaſt. All which Tamerlane did, not ſo much for the hatred to the man, as to manifeſt the juſt judgement of God againſt the arrogant follie of the proud. It is reported that Tamerlane being requeſted by one of his noble men that might be bold to ſpeake vnto him, to remit ſome part of his ſeueritie againſt the perſon of ſo great a prince; anſwered, That he did not vſe that rigour againſt him as a king, but rather did puniſh him as a proud ambitious tirant; polluted with the blood of his owne brother.

B Now this ſo great an ouerthrow, brought ſuch a feare vpon all the countreys poſſeſſed by Baiazet in ASIA, that Axalla ſent before by Tamerlane with fortie thouſand horſe, and an hundreth thouſand foot, without cariages, to proſecute the victorie, came without reſiſtance to PRUSA; whether all the remainder of Baiazet his armie was retired, with the Baſſa Muſtapha: the countrey as he went, ſtill yeelding vnto him. Yea the great Baſſa, with the reſt, hearing of his comming, and thinking themſelues not now in any ſafetie in ASIA, fled ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTUS to CALLIPOLIS, & ſo to HADRIANOPLE; carying with them out of the battaile Solyman, Baiazet his eldeſt ſonne, whom they ſet vp in his fathers place; Mahomet his younger brother preſently vpon the ouerthrow being fled to AMASIA: of whom, and the reſt of Baiazet his children, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Axalla comming to PRUSA, had the citie without C reſiſtance yeelded vnto him, which he rifled: and there with other of Baiazet his wiues & concubines, tooke priſoner the faire Deſpina, Baiazet his beſt beloued wife, to the doubling of his greefe.

Solyman ſet vp in his fathers ſtead.

Pruſa taken by Axalla.

Emanuell the Greeke emperour now hearing of Tamerlane his comming to PRUSA, ſent his embaſſadours (the moſt honourable of his court) thether before to Axalla: by whom they were there ſtayed, vntill the comming of Tamerlane; who receiued them with all the honour that might be, ſhewing vnto them all his magnificence, and the order of his campe, to their great admiration. For it reſembled a moſt populous and well gouerned citie, for the order that was therein, which brought vnto it plentie of all kind of victuals, and other marchandiſe, aſwell for pleaſure as for vſe. By theſe embaſſadours, the Greeke emperour ſubmitted all his empire together with his perſon, vnto Tamerlane the great conquerour, as his moſt faithfull ſubject and vaſ-
D ſaile: which he was bound (as he ſaid) to doe, for that hee was by him deliuered from the moſt cruell tirant in the world: as alſo for that the long journey he had paſſed, and the diſcommodities he had endured, with the loſſe of his people, and the danger of his perſon, could not bee recompenced, but by the offer of his owne life, and his ſubjects; which hee did for euer dedicate to his ſeruice, with all the fidelitie and loyaltie that ſo great a benefit might deſerue: beſides that his ſo many vertues, and rare accompliſhments, which made him famous throughout the world, did bind him ſo to doe. And that therefore he would attend him in his cheefe citie, to deliuer it into his hands as his owne, with all the empire of GREECE. Now the Greeke embaſſadours looked for no leſſe than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane, thinking that which they offred to be ſo great and delicate a morſell, as that it would not be refuſed, eſpecially of ſuch a conquering prince as E was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindneſſe, and friendſhip, was the beſt bargaine they could make therein. But they receiued anſwere from this worthie prince, farre beyond their expectatation. For he with a mild countenance beholding them, anſwered them, That he was not come from ſo farre a countrey, or vndertaken ſo much paines for the enlargement of his dominions alreadie large inough, (too baſe a thing for him to put himſelfe into ſo great danger and trauaile for) but rather to winne honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all poſteritie for euer: And that therefore it ſhould well appeare vnto the world, that hee was come to aid him, being requeſted as his friend and allie: And that his vpright meaning therein, was the greateſt cauſe, That God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby bruſed the head of the greateſt and fierceſt enemie of mankind that was vnder heauen: And now to get him an immor-
F tall name, would make free ſo great and flouriſhing a citie as was CONSTANTINOPLE, gouerned by ſo noble and ancient an houſe as the emperours: That vnto his courage, hee had alwaies faith joyned, ſuch as ſhould neuer ſuffer him to make ſo great a breach in his reputation, as that it ſhould be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend, he came to inuade the dominions of his allies: That he deſired no more, but that the ſeruice he had done for the Greeke emperour, might for euer be ingrauen in the memorie of his poſte-ritie, to the end they might for euer wish well vnto him and his succeſſours, by remembring the good he had done them; That long might the noble emperor liue, happily to gouern his eſtate. And that before his returne he would ſo well conſider for the eſtabliſhing of the ſame, as that he ſhould not lightly fall againe into the like jeopardie, alwaies aſſuring himſelfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Eaſie it is to judge, what joy theſe Greeke embaſſadours receiued, to heare this ſo kind an anſwere from the mouth of Tamerlane himſelfe: who rather than he would ſeeme to breake his faith, refuſed an empire offered vnto him, with one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent cities of the world. Few princes (I ſuppoſe) would performe ſuch a part: but ſo there be likewiſe but few Tamerlanes in the world. Theſe embaſſadours by the commaundement of Tamerlane, were by Axalla royally feaſted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of them being ſent backe to carrie theſe vnexpected newes vnto the Greeke emperour, filled both him and all the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE with exceeding joy and gladneſſe, which both he and his ſubjects in generall ſpared not with bonfires and all other ſignes of joy and pleaſure to manifeſt. And the more to ſhew his thankefulneſſe, ſhortly after by the aduice of his graue counſailours, paſſed ouer the ſtrait into ASIA to ſee Tamerlane at PRUSA, and in perſon himſelfe to giue him thankes: who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, preſently vpon the firſt dayes journey ſent the prince Axalla to meet him, and to certefie him of the joy that he conceiued, to haue the good hap for to ſee him, as alſo to conduct him to PRUSA: where thoſe two great princes, with the greateſt magnificence that might be, met, and ſo ſpent one whole day together. The Greeke emperour the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much honour conducted out of the cittie. Now had Tamerlane himſelfe conceiued a ſecret deſire to ſee this ſo famous a citie as was CONSTANTINOPLE, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thither as a conquerour, but as a priuat perſon: which by the meanes of Axalla was accompliſhed, and he thereinto by the Greeke emperour priuatly receiued, and with all familiaritie poſsible, entertained: the emperour ſhewing vnto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be ſeene: and the other Greeke princes deuiſing all the meanes they could to do him pleaſure, and them which did accompanie him; who were in a manner all apparrelled after the Greeke faſhion. At which time the Greeke emperour himſelfe was curious to ſhew vnto him all the faire gardens alongſt the ſea coaſt, a league or two from CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſo priuatly conducting him, ſpent fiue or ſix daies, with all the mirth that might be poſsible: Tamerlane by the way oftentimes ſaying, That he had neuer ſeene a fairer citie: and that it was indeed the citie (conſidering the faire and rich ſituation thereof) of right, worthie to commaund all the world. He wondered at the coſtly buildings of the temples, the faire ingrauen pillars, the high pyramides, and the making of the faire gardens, and oftentimes afterwards ſaid, That he nothing repented him of his ſo long and dangerous a voyage, if it had been onely but to haue preſerued from fire and ſword ſo noble a citie as that was. In the Greeke emperour he commended greatly his mild nature and courteſie: who knowing him aboue all things to take pleaſure in faire ſeruiceable horſes, gaue vnto him thirtie of the faireſt, ſtrongeſt, and readieſt, that were poſsible to be gotten, all moſt richly furniſhed; and ſent likewiſe faire preſents vnto all the princes and great commaunders of the armie, and bountifully cauſed to bee deliuered vnto them all things which he thought to be neceſſarie for the armie. So after many great kindneſſes in ſhort time paſſed, and a ſtrait bond of friendſhip made, and by ſolemne oath confirmed betwixt the two great princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leaue of the emperour, and returned againe to his armie at PRUSA. Wherewith he now at his pleaſure without reſiſtance waſted and ſpoiled all Baiazet his dominion in ASIA, no man daring to make head againſt him.

Tamerlane goeth to Conſtantinople.

Tamerlan much delighted with the pleaſures of Conſtantinople.

The yeare being now well ſpent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane diſperſed his armie into diuers of the prouinces of the leſſer ASIA, expecting ſtill when ſome of Baiazet his ſonnes or other friends ſhould make ſute or meanes vnto him for his deliuerance, but none came: ſome fearing Tamerlane his heauie indignation, and others no leſſe dreading the fierce nature of Baiazet himſelfe, who if hee had beene deliuered, was like ynough (as was thought) to haue taken ſharpe reuenge vpon all them which forſooke him in the late battaile, and therefore neuer made interceſsion for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day paſsing by him, ſaid vnto him: I maruell that none of thy ſonnes or friends either come to ſee thee or to entreat for thee, it muſt needs be that thou haſt euill deſerued of them, as thou haſt of others: yet how thinkeſt thou, If I ſhould ſet thee at libertie, would they againe receiue thee as their lord and ſoueraigne, or not? To whom

Baiazet

Baiazet boldly answered: Were I at libertie, thou shouldest well see, how that I want neither courage nor meanes to reuenge all my wrongs, and to make those disobedient & forgetfull, to know their duties better. Which his proud answere made Tamerlane to keepe a straighter hand ouer him.

In this great and bloodie warre, wherein the Othoman empire had almost taken end, the Sultan of Ægypt had (as is aforesaid) giuen aid vnto Baiazet: which Tamerlane tooke in so euill part, as that he resolued to be thereof reuenged. For as he was vnto his friends of all others most kind and courteous, so was he to his enemies no lesse terrible and dreadfull. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the lesser Asia, to take some good order with these his new conquests: and finding nothing more honourable to resolue vpon, he restored vnto the poore Mahometane princes (Tachretin, Isfendiar, Germian, and the rest before fled vnto him for refuge) all their auncient inheritance, with something more; as he did also diuers cities and countries of Natolia vnto the Greeke emperour, for the yearely tribute of foure hundred thousand duckats of gold, and eight hundred thousand franks of siluer, which the emperour promised to pay vnto him yearely. And so hauing enriched his armie with the spoiles of the Othoman empire in Asia, he turned his forces against the Ægyptian Sultan, and so passing through Caramania, entred into Syria, then part of the Sultans kingdome: where neere vnto Alleppo (being before yeelded vnto him) was fought betwixt them a great and mortall battaile, the Sultan hauing in his armie an hundred thousand foot, and seuentie foure thousand horse: whereof there were thirtie thousand Mamelukes, accounted the best horsemen of the world. In which battaile, Axalla the great captaine, with the avauntguard of Tamerlane his armie, was hardly distressed, and Axalla himselfe taken: but foorthwith againe rescued by Tamerlane: who had hee not by his comming on with new forces, speedily restored the battaile, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like ynough to haue made an end of his good fortune. But the victorie after a long and cruell fight (wherein were fourescore thousand men on both sides slaine) enclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane pursuing him by the space of three leagues. After which victorie, Tamerlane deuiding his armie, sent Axalla with fortie thousand horse and fiftie thousand foot, to pursue the Sultan alongst the coast of Arabia: who oftentimes shewed himselfe, with some foure thousand horse to haue hindred Axalla, who hauing the smallest forces, followed him the neerest. Tamerlane himselfe in the meane time with threescore thousand horse, & an hundred thousand foot, marching alongst the sea coast, had all the cities as he went yeelded vnto him, as Magata, Aman, otherwise called Apamea, Tortosa, Barruto, & Nephthalin: only the strong citie of Damasco refused to receiue him, whereinto the Sultan had put the prince Zamadzen, with a strong garrison, who did what hee might to haue defended the same. But all in vaine, for Tamerlane hauing by batterie ouerthrowne a great part of the wall, by assault woon the cittie, only the castle yet remaining, as being of a wonderfull strength, and almost impregnable: whereinto such a multitude had at the taking of the citie retired themselues, as was not possible therein long to liue: who in short time pinched with hunger, and many of them dead, the rest vpon safeguard of their liues offered to yeeld: whom for all that Tamerlane would not receiue to mercie, to make them feele what it was to hold out against him: so that most of them dying of famine, the rest yeelded without condition, and were for their obstinacie almost all slaine. Which his seueritie towards them of Damasco, caused, that thirtie leagues off they brought the keyes of their cities vnto him, in token of their submission: whom he no way molested, more than in contributing vnto the charge of his armie. From Damasco he turned directly towards Ierusalem, at which time they of the citie had driuen out the Sultans garrison, as had almost all they of Iudea, submitting themselues vnto Tamerlane. At Chorazni the Sultan had left six thousand men in garrison for the defence of the place, who at the first seemed to stand vpon their guard: but afterward dismaied to see so great an armie before it, and that Tamerlane hauing approched the wals, was set downe to haue it, they submitted themselues and found mercie. In which citie Tamerlane left certaine of his men in garrison, for the better represing of the Mamalukes, who with often incursions troubled his armie. So marching on, he himselfe with certaine horsemen for his guard, rode to Ierusalem to visit the sepulchre so much reuerenced of all nations, and there to make his oblations: where hee was of the inhabitants joyfully receiued, and hauing sought out all the antiquities of that auncient citie, would be conducted vnto all the places thereabouts, where Iesus Christ had preached, euen as the pilgrimes doe: and comming to

to the ſepulchre, gaue thereunto, and the deuout there, many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to ſee him honour thoſe holy places) but of the Iews only, who greatly blamed him for ſo doing: of whom of all others Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accurſed of God. There had he newes that the Sultan had gathered all his forces, and being come into ÆGYPT, was there fortifying of his cities, eſpecially the great cities of ALEXANDRIA and CAIER. Tamerlane his armie in the meane time by his commaundement came towards ÆGYPT to DAMIATA: which ſtrong citie hee thought not good to leaue behind him, although he was by ſome perſuaded ſo to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in reſpect of the caſtle, as of the ſtrong garriſon that the Sultan had put thereinto. But he whoſe fortune nothing could hinder, would needs goe thither; and ſo hauing commaunded Axalla to ſet vpon it, followed himſelfe after with the reſt of his armie. Now Axalla hauing ſummoned the citie, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were moſt of them Chriſtians) the mildneſſe and courteſie of Tamerlane, as alſo who himſelfe was, and what religion he held: cauſing many of the Grecke captaines to ſpeake vnto them, and to tell them of the miſerie they endured vnder the Moores and Mamalukes: ſo farre preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduenture their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the cittie, with all them that fauoured the Sultan. And ſo in the night taking vp armes, made themſelues maſters of one quarter of the cittie, and deliuered one of the gates to Axalla: whereby he entering, put all the Mamalukes to the ſword, or tooke them priſoners, and ſo gained the citie. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet vpon his marche, was in good hope of ſo proſperous a beginning, to find an happie end alſo of his deſignes in EGYPT. For beſides the good fortune thereof, hee knew that this hauen of DAMIATA, might ſerue him with victuals out of all the parts of GREECE, as the emperour Emanuel had promiſed him, and wherein hee nothing failed him. Into which port Tamerlane hauing made his entrie, left there in garriſon two thouſand of the emperour Emanuell his ſouldiours, with a gouernour, of whom he tooke an oath for their obedience. So hauing ſtayed a ſpace at DAMIATA, he cauſed his vauntgard to march towards ALEXANDRIA: and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer, euen in an inſtant turned directly vnto CAIER: to the great aſtoniſhment of the Sultan, who made prouiſion for the defence of ALEXANDRIA, as the neereſt vnto danger. But vnderſtanding of theſe newes, vſed ſuch diligence, that he entred into the citie with fortie thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot, euen as Tamerlane his armie aproached, purpoſing in perſon himſelfe to defend it. By whoſe comming, the great citie readie before to haue reuolted, was againe in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires: for to remaine long before it, was impoſsible, for want of victuals for ſo great an armie in the enemies countrey. Yet notwithſtanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbeare to draw neere vnto it, and with all his armie to encampe neere vnto the ſame, hauing cauſed a great trench to bee made for to couer his horſemen, and thereby to lodge his armie more ſafely: during which time he cauſed diuers onſets to be giuen, as well to trie what confidence the enemie had in himſelfe, as to ſee how the people of the cittie, eſpecially the ſlaues (which in that populous cittie are infinite) were affected towards him: who certainely enformed him of the ſtate of the cittie, and the armie; as glad to ſee the ſame by him ſhut vp, and the proud Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt. But thus lying ſtill at the ſiege, one day he thought it good to ſhew his armie before the citie, for to trie whether the enemie had a deſire to come to a daie of battaile or not: as alſo to view what forces he had, and ſo indeed to ſeeke occaſion to fight: In hope alſo, that if the Sultan did come foorth with all his armie into the field, ſome reuolt might happen within the cittie, as well by the ſlaues (vnto whom libertie was by him promiſed) as by the cittizens themſelues (diſcontented with the inſolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the cittie with the Sultan) vnto whom he had made it knowne by certaine ſlaues (for that purpoſe fled as fugitiues out of his armie into the cittie) how that hee was not come to hurt them, but onely for the deſtruction of the Mamalukes, both his and their enemies. But betimes ſtanding ſo in battaile array, no man came foorth, neither was there any tumult or ſturre raiſed in the cittie, as hee had expected. For the Sultan in ſo great a cittie well prouided of all things, was reſolued to wearie him out with lying ſtill, and not to put all to the hazard of a battaile. Which Tamerlane perceiuing, and ſet downe not to depart thence, but victorious, reſolued likewiſe to force him euen in his greateſt ſtrength, in the heart of his greateſt citie; although it were not to be done, but with great aduen-

aduenture: ſuch confidence he had in the ſtrength and multitude of his armie. Now his purpoſe was, firſt to take one of the cities (for CAIRE is diuided into three) & therin encamping himſelf, by litle & litle to aduance forward as he might, ſtil fighting with the enemy. Vpon which reſolution, he commaunded an aſſault to be giuen, and hauing brought his footmen vnto the place where he would haue them to giue the onſet (for the citie was not walled, but onely fortified with ditches and trenches) he commaunded the prince of THANAIS with fiftie thouſand footmen, to begin the aſſault, euen in the face of the enemie: which hee moſt valiantly perfourmed, and there began a moſt terrible and cruell fight. Axalla in the meane time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greateſt forces vnto the place where the prince of THANAIS ſought to enter, as vnto a place of greateſt danger; fet a compaſſe about, and vpon another quarter of the citie, with ſmall reſiſtance paſſed the trenches; where he preſently left thirtie thouſand men to fill vp the ditches, and to make way for the horſemen to enter: aduancing forward himſelfe, againſt twentie thouſand ſent by the Sultan to haue ſtopped his further paſſage: the prince of THANAIS being at the ſame time almoſt beaten backe by the Mamelukes. But the way being made plaine, by them that were for that purpoſe left by Axalla, and ten thouſand horſe entred, which charged vpon the backs of the Mamelukes, where the Sultan himſelfe was; and they ſeconded by ten thouſand moe ſent in by Tamerlane, following himſelfe after, with all his power: the Sultan retired vnto a ſecond ſtrength, which he had made in the next citie. The fight endured full the ſpace of ſeauen houres, wherein were ſlaine of the Sultan his men aboue ſixteene thouſand: and of Tamerlanes betwixt ſeauen and eight thouſand. Who contented to haue diſlodged the enemie, and gained a third part of the citie, cauſed a retrait to be founded, in hope the next daie to winne all the reſt, as indeed he did. For the prince of THANAIS the next daie forcing the enemies trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himſelfe hardly preſſed by the obſtinate enemie, and too weake long to hold out, retired, and ſo forthwith abandoned the citie, and encamped himſelfe along the ſide of the riuer NILUS, with purpoſe to paſſe the ſame, and to flye to ALEXANDRIA his ſecond ſtrength and refuge. Which Tamerlane ſuſpecting, followed after him with his horſemen (who onely were in order) and ſome few foot, hardly drawne from the citie, which their fellowes were in ſpoiling; ſo as hee was glad to promiſe them eſpecially, to regard and reward their good ſeruice. Againſt whom the Sultan vpon a narrow cawſey, had oppoſed twelue or fifteen thouſand men, whom he called his ſlaues (to fauour his paſſage) but were indeed his beſt ſouldiours, and ſtood faſt, the place ſeruing greatly for their aduantage: who for all that at length forced by their enemies, ſtill increaſing vpon them, (though not without great loſſe) caſt themſelues into the great riuer, and made a moſt honourable retrait: euerie man hauing his weapon in the one hand, and ſwimming with the other to the farther banke. The Sultan flying with ſome eighteene thouſand horſe (for the reſt were ſundrie waies fled or elſe drowned) is reported in his flight, to haue comforted his men, by telling of them, That they were not men that had vanquiſhed them, but gods, there appeared in them ſo great wiſedome, force, and valour: diuers of the Mamelukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteouſly vſed, were of him demaunded, if they could be content to ſerue him, now that their maiſter was fled and gone? which they all vtterly refuſed. Whom notwithſtanding, for their fidelitie, Tamerlane ſet at libertie to goe againe vnto the Sultan: as no leſſe deſirous to be admired of his enemies for his bountie and courteſie, than feared for his force and valour. The wonderfull wealth of this ſo great and famous a citie became a preie vnto his ſouldiours: who for the ſpace of foure and twentie houres had the ſpoile therof, being then by open proclamation commaunded euerie man to repaire to his quarter. The citizens he ſet all at libertie, not ſuffering any of them to be taken priſoners. And ſo leauing ten thouſand good ſouldiours with a great number of others (whereof he caried a great multitude in his armie, planting euerie where as he paſſed as it were new colonies) and carying away with him ſuch of the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things neceſſarie for the keeping of ſuch a citie, he cauſed his armie to paſſe ouer the riuer for to follow the Sultan vnto ALEXANDRIA, to the end not to leaue his victorie vnperfect: Axalla haſting before with the avauntgard, for to hinder the Sultan for joyning his forces againe together; and the reſt of his armie conducted by the prince of THANAIS. He himſelfe with an infinite number of boats, and ſouldiors to attend vpon him, going by water, taking great pleaſure to behold the faire riuer, and his ſwift courſe ſometimes, and in an inſtant to become ſo calme as if it ſcarce mooued.

Caier aſſaulted by Tamerlane.

The

The cittizens of ALEXANDRIA hearing of his comming, and fearing what might betide them, besought the Sultan to haue compasion of their estate, and to withdraw himselfe into LIBIA, whether Tamerlane for the barrennesse of the countrey could not with any great power follow him; resolued for their parts to giue place vnto fortune, and to doe as the time required, and no more to resist so great a force, whereof they had alreadie made sufficient triall: promising yet to remaine in heart still his, and vpon the first occasion offered, to make the same to him appeare.

The Sultan flieth from Alexandria.

Whereupon the Sultan seeing all things desperate, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring some change: as also that Tamerlane his populous armie would not long remaine there. And so departing out of ALEXANDRIA with teares standing in his eyes, often times said, That God was angrie with him and his people, and that hee must of necessitie suffer the fatall ouerthrow of his estate, himselfe hauing done as much as in him lay, according to his charge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yet that he hoped at length to returne againe, and deliuer his people from the bondage, whereunto they must now needs submit themselues. Tamerlane comming to ALEXANDRIA (before yeelded to Axalla) there staied a great while, sending Axalla to pursue the Sultan, exceedingly grieued that he could not get him into his hands: and therefore still fearing some innouation to be by him raised, which caused him to deale the more hardly with them whom he suspected to fauour him. Now the bruit of these victories hauing with Axalla passed beyond ALEXANDRIA into LYBIA, had brought such a feare, not onely vpon the people adjoyning vnto these conquests, but also vpon all AFRICA (they supposing that Tamerlane did follow,) that two and twentie of the Moore kings sent their embassadours vnto him, to offer vnto him their obedience: the Sultan as a man forsaken of fortune, still flying before him. Of the neerest of which kings, Tamerlane tooke hostages: as for the other farther off, he contented himselfe with their faith giuen, and with the other outward signes of their good wils.

Tamerlane desirous to returne into his country.

Now after this long trauaile and paines taken, was Tamerlane more desirous than hee had before vsed, to see the pleasures of his owne natiue countrey: the rather thereunto moued by the request of his wife, then longing for his returne; and the newes hee heard of the sickenesse of the old Tartarian emperour his father in law; besides that, age it selfe began to bring vnto him a desire of rest: with whom also, the desires of his souldiors well agreed, as men now wearie to haue run so many and diuers fortunes. The onely stay was, that hee expected the comming of Calibes, an old and faithfull seruant of his, whom he for his good deserts had of his owne accord appointed gouernour of all his new conquests in ÆGYPT and SYRIA: A great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had so well deserued. So mindfull was he of the good deserts of his faithfull seruants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, were they neuer so farre off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his armie making way for him along the great riuer EUPHRATES, for the conquest of MESOPOTAMIA and PERSIA: whose comming was now with great deuotion looked for of the whole armie, desirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delayed not, but being sent for, came to ALEXANDRIA, whither the whole armie was now by the commaundement of Tamerlane againe assembled. Vpon whose comming, Tamerlane departed from ALEXANDRIA, hauing there left the prince Zamalkan (a man of great reputation) with six thousand horsemen and ten thousand foot, as gouernour of that place, and lieutenant generall vnder Calibes: whom Tamerlane (as I haue said) had now appointed to commaund ouer all ÆGYPT and SYRIA, together with the countries newly conquered in LYBIA and BARBARIE: and now conducting him vnto the great citie of CAIRE, and there taking the best order he could for the preseruation of his new conquest, left him with fortie thousand horse and fiftie thousand foot. And so hauing sufficiently instructed him, how he would haue those kingdomes gouerned, dismissed him, not like a master, but as a companion, seeming very sorrie to leaue him destitute of his presence. So setting forward with his armie, conducted by the prince of THANAIS, Tamerlane himselfe, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aside vnto IERUSALEM: where he remained eleuen dayes, daily visiting the Sepulchre of Christ Iesus (whom hee called the God of the Christians) and the ruines of Salomon his temple: much wondering thereat, and at IERUSALEM, the seat of Dauids kingdome, and of that great Salomon; but grieued that he could not see them fully in their former beautie. He only despised the Iews, which had committed so cruell a murder against him that came to saue them. And to shew his deuotion towards wards the holy citie, commaunded it to be free from all ſubſidies and garriſons of men of warre: and gaue great gifts vnto the monaſteries, and honoured them ſo long as he remained there. Departing from IERUSALEM, he came to DAMASCO: which great citie, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Iezides (accounted an arch hereticke among the Mahometanes) as alſo euill affected to his proceedings, he cauſed to be raſed, and the bones of Iezides the falſe prophet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue before much honoured, in deſpight to bee filled with dung. So marching on, and blaſting the world before him as he went (for long it were, and from our purpoſe to recount all his victories) he paſſed ouer the riuer EUPHRATES, and hauing conquered MESOPOTAMIA, with the great cittie of BABILON, and all the kingdome of PERSIA, loaded with the ſpoile of the world, and eternized for euer, he returned at length to SAMERCAND, the famous place of his birth, and glorious ſeat of his empire.

The miſerable death of Baiazet.

Now had Baiazet (but a little before one of the greateſt princes on earth, and now the ſcorne of fortune, and a byword to the world) with great impatiencie laine two yeares in moſt miſerable thraldome, for moſt part ſhut vp in an yron cage, as ſome dangerous wild beaſt: and hauing no better meanes to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines againſt the barres of the yron grate wherein he was incloſed, and ſo died about the yeare of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are diuers other reports: ſome ſaying, That hee died of an ague, proceeding of ſorrow and greefe: others, that he poyſoned himſelfe: and the Turks affirming, that he was ſet at libertie by Tamerlane, being by him beforehand poyſoned, whereof hee died three dayes after hee was enlarged (a report not like to be true:) but howſoeuer it was, his end appeareth to haue ben right miſerable. His dead bodie at the requeſt of his ſonne Mahomet, was by Tamerlane ſent to ASPRAPOLIS, from whence it was afterwards conueyed to PRUSA, and there lieth buried in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometane temple without the citie Eaſtward: where alſo lieth his beloued wife Deſpina, with his eldeſt ſonne Erthogrul. And faſt by in a little chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his raigne murthered.

A compariſon betwixt Baiazet and Tamerlane.

These two great and mightie princes, Tamerlane and Baiazet (both of them whileſt they liued, a burthen vnto the world) as they tooke their beginning from the Scythes or Tartars, ſo were they of like honourable progenitors deſcended: Baiazet being the fourth in diſcent from the warlike Othoman, the raiſer of his familie; and Tamerlane in like degree from the great Zingis, the firſt and moſt fortunat leader of the Tartars (his countreymen) vnto the pleaſures of the Eaſt: both princes of great power and like ſpirit, wiſe, hardie, painefull, reſolute, and moſt skilfull in martiall affaires; but ambitious aboue meaſure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raiſed, to the aſtoniſhment of the world. Howbeit, the great vertues and other the honourable qualities of Baiazet, were in him by his chollericke and waiward nature much obſcured: which made him to exceed both in crueltie and pride: being alſo much more handfaſt than were his honourable predeceſſors. For which cauſes he was much feared and leſſe beloued of his ſouldiors and men of warre in generall, and of them at his moſt need forſaken. He vſed commonly to ſay, That his treaſures were his childrens meat, and not his ſouldiors pay: which by way of reproch was by a common ſouldior caſt in his teeth, when hee raged to ſee himſelfe by them forſaken in the great battell againſt Tamerlane, telling him as he fled, That he ran not away, but went to ſeek his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforeſaid vertues in Tamerlane were graced with diuers others of like nature, no man being vnto his friends more courteous or kind, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The good ſeruice of his ſeruants hee neuer forgot, either left the ſame long vnrewarded: being thereof ſo mindfull, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalfe, to be put in remembrance thereof, hauing alwaies by him a catalogue both of their names and good deſerts, which he daily peruſed. Oftentimes ſaying that day to be loſt, wherein he had not giuen them ſomething: and yet neuer beſtowing his preferments vpon ſuch as ambitiouſly ſought the ſame (as deeming them in ſo doing, vnwoorthie thereof) but vpon ſuch, as whoſe modeſtie or deſert he thought worthie thoſe his great fauours; ſo tempering the ſeueritie of his commaunds with the greatneſſe of his bountie, as that it is hard to ſay, whether he was of his nobilitie and men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued; both, the great ſtaies of princes ſtates: feare keeping the obſtinat in their obedience, and loue, the dutifull in their deuotion. But with Baiazet it was not ſo, who deeming all done for him, but dutie, and by nature chollericke and proud (after the manner of tyrants) deſired aboue all to be of his ſubjects feared, not much regarding how little hee was of them beloued: not the leaſt

Baiazet in his posteritie more fortunat than Tamerlane.

cauſe of his great fall and miſerie, and that therein he was of his owne ſo ſmally regarded: wher- G in for all that he is to be accounted more fortunat than the other great conquerour his enemie, hauing euer ſince in the lineall deſcent of himſelfe, had one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world to ſucceed ſtill in his kingdome and empire: as hee hath euen at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great majeſtie raigneth in CONSTANTINOPLE: Whereas the glorie of Tamerlane his empire, euen in his owne time growne to the height ther- of, and labouring with the greatneſſe of it ſelfe, and by him deuided amongſt his ſonnes, ſhortly after his death decayed, rent in ſunder by ambition and ciuile diſcord; and not long after, toge- ther with his poſteritie, rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian king, to the worlds woonder tooke end: nothing of the huge greatneſſe thereof now or ſince then remaining, more than the fame thereof: as doth alſo the miſerie of the other ſo brought low. But leauing this mirrour of H miſhap (Baiazet) vnto his reſt, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in SAMERCAND; let vs now proceed in the courſe of our Hiſtorie, yet not forgetting by the way to remember ſuch Chriſtian princes as then liued together with theſe two great Monarchs.

Vindicibus Mahomet patrium ſibi vendicat armis Imperium, & fractas feruidus auget opes.
Quod patri abſtulerat violentia Tamberlani, Imperio reddit Marte fauente ſuo.
Ille ſagittiferoſq; Dacas, validoſq; Triballos
Contudit, & populos Iſter amœne tuos.
Turcica ſic rurſus ſublata potentia, ſtragem
Attulit imperio Romule magne tuo.

By force of armes ſtout Mahomet his fathers kingdome gaines,
And doth the broken ſtate thereof repaire with reſtleſſe paines.
What ſo the force of Tamerlane had from his father tane,
He by his fortune and his force reſtor'd the ſame againe.
The Dacians he vanquiſhed, and Seruians in field,
And forc'd the people neere to thee faire ISTER, for to yeeld.
So once againe the Turkiſh ſtate (by him rais'd vp on hie)
Hath to thine empire, Romulus, brought great calamitie.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, FIFTH KING OF THE TVRKS, AND RESTORER OF THEIR SORE SHAKEN KINGDOME.

HOw wonderfully the Turkiſh kingdome was by the violence of Tamerlane ſhaken, and the majeſtie thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Hiſtories of that time, as well thoſe of the Greekes, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the ſucceſſors of Baiazet, their late vnfortunat king. Some writing, that hee had two ſons, Orchanes, (otherwiſe called Calepinus) and Mahomet: and that Calepinus in the ſecond yeare of his raigne was ſlaine, and his kingdome poſſeſſed by Mahomet his brother. Others reporting, That Baiazet had two ſons, namely, Calepinus and Muſtapha: and that Calepinus ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, when hee had raigned ſix yeares, died, leauing behind him two ſonnes, Orchanes and Mahomet: and that Orchanes being young, was ſlaine by his vncle: whom Mahomet in reuenge of his brothers death, afterwards ſlew, & poſſeſſed the kingdome himſelfe. Others reckon vp ſeuen ſonnes of Baiazet: Ioſua, Muſulmanes, Moſes, Calepinus, Ioſua the yonger, Muſtapha, and Halis; with an vncertaine ſucceſsion amongſt them alſo. This diuerſitie of opinions, full of no leſſe vncertainetie; as I meane not to follow in report of this hiſtorie, ſo will I not ſpend any time in refuting the ſame (although much might be ſaid in the matter) but leaue theſe reports, together with the hiſtorie following, to ſuch credit, as they ſhall hap to find with the conſiderat readers.

Diuers opinions concerning the ſucceſſours of Baiazet.

The Greeke Hiſtoriographers (beſt like to know the Turkiſh ſucceſsion, as well by reaſon of their neereneſſe, as in that they were by them as their bad neighbours, ſo much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Hiſtoriæ Muſulmanæ Turcorum, diligently gathered out of the Turks owne hiſtories by Io. Leunclauius (a learned phyſician, and himſelfe a great trauailer amongſt them, and therefore deſeruing the more credit) do not ſo much as name the ſucceſsion of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captiuitie of Baiazet, but reiecteth them both as counterfeits. But in mine opinion (without prejudice to any, that vpon better reaſon may deeme otherwiſe) the great confuſion of the Turkiſh kingdome, in ſhort time wrought by the mightie Tamerlane and his Tartarians, with the ciuile diſcord and warre afterwards ariſing among the ſonnes of Baiazet, ſtriuing (all as it were at once) for the reſtleſſe roome of ſoueraignetie, which ſuffereth no parteners; and euery one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand vpon ſome one part or other thereof, and bearing himſelfe therein for a time as a king, in countries ſo far diſtant; neuer leauing, vntill they had like the earth-borne brethren, wrought one anothers deſtruction; might giue juſt occaſion of ſuch diuerſitie of reports as is before ſpoken of, concerning the ſucceſsion of that time, in that troubled and rent kingdome: ſome reckoning one, ſome another: and ſome, ſuch as neuer were, to haue ſucceeded in the gouernment, and ſo vntruly augmenting the number of the Turkiſh kings. Wherefore leauing Calepinus & Orchanes vnto them that firſt found them, with that little, which without any good ground and leſſe probabilitie is written of their ſuppoſed raigne; I (following the authoritie of the Turkiſh hiſtorie) reckon this Mahomet, one of the youngeſt ſonnes of Baiazet (of whom we are now to intreat) fifth king of the Turkes: who after great and dangerous wars, as well against his own brethren, as his forraine enemies, was at length solely inuested in the Turkish kingdome, about ten yeares after the captiuitie of his father Baiazet, as shall hereafter be declared.

The true posteritie of Baiazet.

Baiazet after the manner of the Turkish kings, hauing laied vp the hope of his posteritie in the common treasure house of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubines seuen sonnes, Erthogrul, otherwise called Orthobules, Emer-Soliman, Mustapha-Zelebi (that is to say, the noble) Isa-Zelebi, Musa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Casan-Zelebi. Of whom, Erthogrul the eldest was lost in the wars against Casi Burchaniden, as is beforesaid in the life of Baiazet. Mustapha was slaine in the great battaile against Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Casan the yongest was a child in Baiazet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his sister Fatime deliuered as hostages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emanuel the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, where they both happely became Christians, and so shortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Bassa president of Baiazet his counsell, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battaile against Tamerlane, into EVROPE: and so by them at HADRIANOPLE saluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the same battaile to AMASIA in CAPADOCIA, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Isa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departure of Tamerlane with his Tartars, seized vpon PRUSA, a citie of BITHYNIA, the antient seat of the Turkish kings, with the countrey adioyning, and there raigned as king. Musa-Zelebi was taken prisoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards set at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more shall be said in this historie following.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeares old, when his father Baiazet in the vnfortunate battaile at mount STELLA was taken prisoner, and was at the same time by his appointment gouernour of AMASIA, with a great part of CAPADOCIA adioyning: which places became so troublesome after the great victorie of Tamerlane, that the Turks in that countrey were glad day and night for the safegard of themselues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: insomuch, that many of them, wearied with those troubles, and despairing of better times, went into voluntarie exile, because they would not see so great miseries: which thing much greeued young Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his most faithfull counsellors, to consult what course to take in the middest of so many dangers, it was by generall consent thought best (for so much as they could not without apparent danger continue neere vnto Tamerlane his forces) to get themselues farther off into places of more strength: and from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themselues with such aduauntages as occasion and chance of war might minister; cutting them short by policie, whom they were not able to meet in the plaine field: and so by little and little to weaken or wearie their mightie straggling enemies: For albeit that Tamerlane himselfe was not neere him, as then lying in CARIA; yet did the captaines of his great and victorious armie, at their pleasure spoile and forrage the countries farre and neere all ouer the lesser ASIA. Vpon this resolution, hee with all his forces departed from AMASIA, to DERBY in PAPHLAGONIA: where by the way he encountered with Cara Iahia, a nigh kinsman to the prince Isfendiar of CASTAMONA, his enemie; whom he put to flight, with great slaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomet his good fortune. From thence he went to KEREDEN, and there staying certaine daies, sent a spie into Tamerlane his campe, to see how all things went there: and afterwards entered againe into counsell with his captains concerning his farther proceedings. In which consultation, some were of opinion, That it was best for him to withdraw himselfe into the mountaines of the lesser ASIA, as a place of good safetie, vntill the departure of Tamerlan, which was shortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought that Tamerlane would with his huge armie pursue him in that mountaine countrey, flying from hill to hill, and as it were from strength to strength. Others better aduised, thought those mountaines to be no places to trust vnto, and therefore that it were more honourable and as free from danger, for him to returne againe to AMASIA, and there to liue amongst his subiects, protecting them in such sort as he might, and not to leaue them for a prey to euery straggling company of the rude Tartarians. Which counsell he followed, as most reasonable: & being ready to set forward, the spie before by him sent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him, That he had seen his father Baiazet in good health in the Tartars campe, but could not by any means speake with him by reason of the straight guard set ouer him: and that all that part of ASIA was by Tamerlane pos-

Mahomet sendeth spies into Tamerlane his campe.

A poſſeſſed, who then with his armie wintred in CARIA and LYSIA: whereupon Mahomet returned backe againe to AMASIA: where he had not long ſtaied, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunat blacke king) was with an armie of twentie thouſand comming to ſpoile his countrey, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled. Wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his forces, for the ſafegard of his countrey, he ſent before a ſpie to diſcouer the enemies doings. This diligent ſpie returning in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of ÆGIOLVS in GALATIA, in great ſecuritie, hauing about him but a ſmall power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his armie, to ſeeke after pillage abroad in the coun-
B trey. Mahomet taking hold of this oportunitie, marched thither with great celeritie, and ſuddenly ſetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himſelfe was ſhot through the head with an arrow and ſlaine, and his armie vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to AMASIA with victorie, refreſhed and rewarded his ſouldiors, yet no leſſe carefull for the ſafetie of his kingdome than before. Cara Dulet ſlaine.

Shortly after, he was aduertiſed that Cubad Ogli with a great armie laied hard ſiege to the citie of CÆSARIA in CAPADOCIA, and was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily releeued. By taking of which citie, that Tartar prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazarding of the whole countrey. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his armie alwaies in readineſſe, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to CÆSARIA, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before he
C was aware of his comming, and there ſlew moſt of his ſouldiours, and put him with the reſt to flight. After that, hee entred into Cubad Ogli his countrey in PONTVS, and greeuouſly ſpoiled and deſtroied the ſame: at which time, he alſo by force wan the ſtrong caſtle PELTÆ in the confines of PHRIGIA.

Imediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlanes captaines (which at their pleaſure without let, forraged all the countreys of the leſſer ASIA, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks dominions) vpon the ſuddaine entred into CAPADOCIA with an armie of twentie thouſand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and ſpoiling the countrey before him: ſo that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines to hide themſelues from his furie. Whereof Mahomet, hearing, was therewith exceedingly greeued, and
D wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Mahomet his letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar prince.

Whereas without any juſt or lawfull cauſe, or any war proclaimed, you haue inuaded our kingdome, and ceaſe not cruelly to kill our ſubjects, by God committed to our protection; and to ſpoile their wealth and labours, to the great diſturbance of the Mahometan common weale; and make no end of your malice and crueltie: you doe therein quite digreſſe from the manners and lawes of the true Mahometans or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldeſt not onely bee accounted, but indeed bee a true Muſul-man, thou ſhouldeſt forthwith depart out of my kingdome with thine armie; thou ſhouldeſt not thus ſhed the in-
E *nocent blood, or without cauſe thus wrong my people: but foraſmuch as thou knoweſt not what beſeemeth thee, neither wilt liſten vnto good counſaile, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpoſe, falſely perſuading thy ſelfe, this my kingdome to bee deſtitute of a lawfull inheritour; and therefore doeſt ſo great wrong and injurie vnto the defendours of the true Mahometan religion: I would thou ſhouldeſt know, that I with my ſo often victorious armie, will ſhortly by the power of God come againſt thee, and in plaine field according to thy deſerts chaſtice thee. Therfore whileſt thou yet mayeſt, reclaim thy ſelfe, and proceed not too farre in thine obſtinacie: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Inall Ogli his anſwere to Mahomet.

Why doeſt thou Mahomet with ſuch letters prouoke me? why doeſt thou ſo vnciuilly taunt me? be- to intreat) fifth king of the Turkes: who after great and dangerous wars, as well against his own brethren, as his forraine enemies, was at length solely inuested in the Turkish kingdome, about ten yeares after the captiuitie of his father Baiazet, as shall hereafter be declared.

The true posteritie of Baiazet.

Baiazet after the manner of the Turkish kings, hauing laied vp the hope of his posteritie in the common treasure house of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubines seuen sonnes, Erthogrul, otherwise called Orthobules, Emer-Soliman, Mustapha-Zelebi (that is to say, the noble) Isa-Zelebi, Musa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Casan-Zelebi. Of whom, Erthogrul the eldest was lost in the wars against Casi Burchaniden, as is before said in the life of Baiazet. Mustapha was slaine in the great battaile against Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Casan the yongest was a child in Baiazet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his sister Fatime deliuered as hostages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emanuel the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, where they both happely became Christians, and so shortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Bassa president of Baiazet his counsell, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battaile against Tamerlane, into EVROPE: and so by them at HADRIANOPLE saluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the same battaile to AMASIA in CAPADOCIA, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Isa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departure of Tamerlane with his Tartars, seized vpon PRUSA, a citie of BITHYNIA, the antient seat of the Turkish kings, with the countrey adjoyning, and there raigned as king. Musa-Zelebi was taken prisoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards set at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more shall be said in this historie following.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeares old, when his father Baiazet in the vnfortunate battaile at mount STELLA was taken prisoner, and was at the same time by his appointment gouernour of AMASIA, with a great part of CAPADOCIA adjoyning: which places became so troublesome after the great victorie of Tamerlane, that the Turks in that countrey were glad day and night for the safegard of themselues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: insomuch, that many of them, wearied with those troubles, and despairing of better times, went into voluntarie exile, because they would not see so great miseries: which thing much greeued young Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his most faithfull counsellors, to consult what course to take in the middest of so many dangers, it was by generall consent thought best (for so much as they could not without apparent danger continue neere vnto Tamerlane his forces) to get themselues farther off into places of more strength: and from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themselues with such aduauntages as occasion and chance of war might minister; cutting them short by policie, whom they were not able to meet in the plaine field: and so by little and little to weaken or wearie their mightie stragling enemies: For albeit that Tamerlane himselfe was not neere him, as then lying in CARIA; yet did the captaines of his great and victorious armie, at their pleasure spoile and forrage the countries farre and neere all ouer the lesser ASIA. Vpon this resolution, hee with all his forces departed from AMASIA, to DERBY in PAPHLAGONIA: where by the way he encountered with Cara Iahia, a nigh kinsman to the prince Isfendiar of CASTAMONA, his enemie; whom he put to flight, with great slaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomet his good fortune. From thence he went to KEREDEN, and there staying certaine daies, sent a spie into Tamerlane his campe, to see how all things went there: and afterwards entered againe into counsell with his captains concerning his farther proceedings. In which consultation, some were of opinion, That it was best for him to withdraw himselfe into the mountaines of the lesser ASIA, as a place of good safetie, vntill the departure of Tamerlan, which was shortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought that Tamerlane would with his huge armie pursue him in that mountaine countrey, flying from hill to hill, and as it were from strength to strength. Others better aduised, thought those mountaines to be no places to trust vnto, and therefore that it were more honourable and as free from danger, for him to returne againe to AMASIA, and there to liue amongst his subjects, protecting them in such sort as he might, and not to leaue them for a prey to euery stragling company of the rude Tartarians. Which counsell he followed, as most reasonable: & being ready to set forward, the spie before by him sent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him, That he had seen his father Baiazet in good health in the Tartars campe, but could not by any means speake with him by reason of the straight guard set ouer him: and that all that part of ASIA was by Tamerlane pos-

Mahomet sendeth spies into Tamerlane his campe.

A poſſeſſed, who then with his armie wintred in CARIA and LYSIA: wherupon Mahomet returned backe againe to AMASIA: where he had not long ſtaied, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian princes called Cara Dulet ſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunat blacke king) was with an armie of twentie thouſand comming to ſpoile his countrey, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled. Wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his forces, for the ſafegard of his countrey, he ſent before a ſpie to diſcouer the enemies doings. This diligent ſpie returning in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of ÆGIOLVS in GALATIA, in great ſecuritie, hauing about him but a ſmall power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his armie, to ſeeke after pillage abroad in the countrey. Mahomet taking hold of this oportunitie, marched thither with great celeritie, and ſuddenly
B ſetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himſelfe was ſhot through the head with an arrow and ſlaine, and his armie vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to AMASIA with victorie, refreſhed and rewarded his ſouldiors, yet no leſſe carefull for the ſafetie of his kingdome than before. Cara Dulet ſlaine.

Shortly after, he was aduertiſed that Cubad Ogli with a great armie laied hard ſiege to the citie of CÆSARIA in CAPADOCIA, and was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily releeued. By taking of which citie, that Tartar prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazarding of the whole countrey. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his armie alwaies in readineſſe, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to CÆSARIA, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before he
C was aware of his comming, and there ſlew moſt of his ſouldiours, and put him with the reſt to flight. After that, hee entred into Cubad Ogli his countrey in PONTVS, and greeuouſly ſpoiled and deſtroied the ſame: at which time, he alſo by force wan the ſtrong caſtle PELTÆ in the confines of PHRIGIA.

Imediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlanes captaines (which at their pleaſure without let, forraged all the countreys of the leſſer ASIA, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks dominions) vpon the ſuddaine entred into CAPADOCIA with an armie of twentie thouſand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and ſpoiling the countrey before him: ſo that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines to hide themſelues from his furie. Whereof Mahomet, hearing, was therewith exceedingly greeued, and
D wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Mahomet his letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar prince.

Prince Inall Ogli to Mahomet.

Inall Ogli his anſwere to Mahomet.

Why doeſt thou Mahomet with ſuch letters prouoke me? why doeſt thou ſo vnciuilly taunt me? being

ing thy ſelfe but a boy, and in truth a verie child. It beſeemeth thee not to haue entred into theſe countreys, or to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thy ſelfe with the title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cauſe, why thou ſhouldeſt complaine that I ſhould lie in waight or ſeek after thy life, thy kingdome, or any thing that thine is. I challenge vnto my ſelfe this kingdome, but none of thine: out of which it is reaſon for thee, as a wrongfull intruder of thy ſelfe, to depart; whom otherwiſe I will forthwith thruſt out, and ioyne the ſame vnto the reſt of my territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and ceaſe to oppoſe thy ſelfe againſt my deſignes. I denounce vnto thee all the calamities of warre: and wiſh thee with ſpeede to prepare thy ſelfe to battaile, for that I meane ſhortly to meet with thee. This yeare of our great Prophet, 806.

Inall Ogli ouerthrowne by Mahomet.

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promiſe meeting with this Tartar prince, by plaine force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victorie.

The like good hap he had alſo not long after, againſt Coſter Ogli, and Kiupeck Ogli, two other Tartarian captaines, at the caſtle of CHARACHIZAR and the plaine of ARTVCK OVA. And hearing that one Meſites, a Turk, had fortified himſelfe in the ruines of SEBASTIA, and from thence ſpoiled the countrey round about, he ſent Baiazet one of his Baſſaes againſt him; who in ſhort time tooke him and brought him bound vnto him: by whom he was adjudged to die. But ſeeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death, at ſuch time as he ſhould haue been executed; mooued therewith, he gaue him his pardon: for which he euer after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great ſeruice.

Mahomet hauing many times thus vanquiſhed the ſtragling Tartarian princes, which had ſought the ſpoile of his countrey, became thereby famous amongſt the great commaunders of Tamerlane his armie: in ſo much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes eare, yet lying in the leſſer ASIA: who as he thought it not worth his greatneſſe and labour, himſelfe in perſon to goe againſt ſo weake an enemie; ſo he thought it not good or conuenient quite to neglect him, but by ſome other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpoſe he began to ſpeake many times verie honourably of him, highly commending his great valour and forwardneſſe in ſo tender yeares. And calling for Baiazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his ſonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore verie deſirous to ſee him: where if he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, he would beſtow one of his daughters vpon him in mariage, with many other great preferments: and therefore willed Baiazet to write vnto him, Not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himſelfe, and his father. Which thing Baiazet at the firſt doubting the worſt, requeſted Tamerlane not to beleeue of his ſonne, being yet verie young and not worthie of ſo great a fauour. Neuertheleſſe partly perſuaded by Tamerlane his proteſtations, and importuned by him that might now command him: hee with an euill will wrote to his ſonne Mahomet to ſuch effect as Tamerlane required. With which letters, and others of like purport from himſelfe, with many rich preſents, Tamerlane ſent Hozza Mahomet, (one of his ſecret councellours) embaſſadour to Mahomet, of whom he was right honourably receiued, and likewiſe entertained. But hauing read the aforeſaid letters, and thereby vnderſtood the cauſe of his comming; hee entred into counſaile with the great Baſſaes about him, whether he were beſt to goe to Tamerlane or not. Where his councellours were all cleere of one opinion, That it was not good for him to aduenture his perſon to the danger of ſuch a journey, or the mercie of ſo mightie an enemie, of whoſe faith he had no aſſurance. And if ſo be (ſaid they) he therwith offended, will by force ſeek to haue you, we at his comming will take the refuge of the woods and mountaines, and there ſhroud our ſelues vntill he be departed againe: for that he with his huge armie cannot here long ſtay in this bare countrey, for want of neceſſaries. Neuertheleſſe Mahomet hoping his journey might be both for the good of his father, and his owne aduancement; contrarie to the mind of all his councellours, reſolued to goe: and ſo hauing prepared all things needfull for the honour and ſafetie of his journey, ſet forforward. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of PONTVS, Cara Iahia whom he had before ouerthrowne, vnderſtanding of his comming that way, thinking now to bee reuenged; and hauing got vnto him ſome of the prince Iſfendiars forces, ſet vpon him by the way: but with as euill ſucceſſe as before, moſt of his men being there by Mahomet ſlaine, and himſelfe glad ſhamefully to flie. So trauailing on further, hee vnderſtood that Alis Beg, a great lord in thoſe countreys, went about to intercept him alſo: which cauſed him in ſuch haſt to goe on, that hee was vpon Alis, before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: ſo that for feare he was glad to betake himſelfe to flight. Mahomet conſidering the danger he had eſcaped in that journey, and that the neerer he came to Tamerlane, the more like hee was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge: by the aduice of his graue and faithfull councellours, reſolued to go no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlanes embaſſadour hee thus ſpake vnto him:

Mahomet his ſpeech to Tamerlans embaſſadors.

You ſee the dangers and injuries I endure in this my journey, and my mind forbodeth greater to enſue: for which cauſes I may not goe any further, but here returne. Commend me therefore I pray you vnto the moſt mightie Tamerlane, with my father: and tell them what dangers haue happened vnto me vpon the way. Which conſidered, I hope they will haue me excuſed. For which purpoſe I will alſo ſend in your companie an embaſſadour of mine owne.

Mahomet at that time had with him a graue, wiſe, and learned man, called Sophis Baiazet, ſometime his ſchoolemaiſter: whom he ſent embaſſadour to Tamerlane and his father, to haue him vnto them both excuſed: and ſo departed, he homewards, leauing the way he came (for feare of further danger;) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably receiued Mahomets embaſſadours and letters. But taking pleaſure in the man ſent vnto him, gaue him honourable entertainment, but would neuer after ſuffer him to returne againe vnto his maiſter.

It was not long after, but that old Baiazet died of impatiencie (as is aforeſaid:) whoſe dead bodie Tamerlane left at APROPOLIS with the prince Germean, to be deliuered vnto his ſonne Mahomet; with Muſa his elder brother (who all this while had ben kept priſoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet ſhould require them. And ſo the mightie prince Tamerlane, after he had long time waſted PHRIGIA, CARIA, LYDIA, with the moſt part of the leſſer ASIA; and conquered all SIRIA, IUDEA, ÆGYPT, and PERSIA, with many other great countreys and prouinces; returned at laſt into his owne kingdome, vnto the great citie of SAMARCAND, which hee woonderfully enlarged, and beautified with the ſpoiles of a great part of the world, before by him waſted: where he afterwards in great peace and glorie raigned, no leſſe honoured than feared of all the princes of the Eaſt. To the terrour of whom, and for the aſſuring of his eſtate, he kept alwaies a ſtanding armie of fortie thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot readie at all aſſaies: beſide other his great garriſons which he kept in SIRIA, ÆGYPT, CHINA, and CAMBALV; as alſo againſt the Muſcouit, and Turks; being commonly in euerie place threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, though not ſtill in field, but as occaſion required. Vntill that at length hearing of the riſing againe of the Turkiſh kingdome, vnder the Othoman princes, the ſonnes of Baiazet; with whom the oppreſſed Mamalukes of ÆGYPT, and the Greeke emperour (as doubtfull of his eſtate) had now alſo for feare of him combined themſelues: he by the perſuaſion of Axalla (then Generall of his imperiall armie) made great preparation for a ſecond expedition to be made for the vtter rooting out of the Othoman familie, and the conqueſt of the Greeke empire. But hauing now all things in readineſſe, and alſo giuen a good beginning vnto theſe his intended conqueſts, (one of the Turks great Baſſaes being by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battaile ouerthrowne, and thirtie thouſand of the Turks ſlaine) hee in the middeſt of theſe his great hopes, as alſo of his greateſt power, died of an Ague the 27 daie of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our lord 1402. A little before whoſe death, appeared a great and terrible blaſing ſtarre, portending as it were vnto the world the death of ſo great a prince. Hee was a man of the middle ſtature, ſomewhat narrow in the ſhoulders, otherwiſe well limmed, and of a great ſtrength. In his eies ſat ſuch a rare majeſtie, as a man could hardly endure to behold them without cloſing of his owne: and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him became dumbe; which cauſed him oftentimes with a comely modeſtie to abſtain from looking too earneſtly vpon ſuch as ſpake vnto him, or diſcourſed with him. All the reſt of his viſage was amiable and well proportioned: he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrarie to the manner of the Tartars, who ſhaue their heads, hauing the ſame alwaies couered: whereas he contrariewiſe was for the moſt part bareheaded, commanding his ſonne alſo to be ſo by his tutors brought vp: his haire was of a dark colour, ſomewhat drawing toward a violet right beautifull to behold: which his mother comming of the race of Sampſon (as he gaue it out) willed him to nouriſh, in token of his diſcent: the cauſe that made him to be the more reſpected of his men of war; moſt part of them beleeuing that in thoſe haires was ſome rare vertue, or rather ſome fatall deſtinie: an old practiſe of many great commaunders of former ages, to fill the heads of their ſouldiours with Paulus Iouius Illust. virorum, Elog. lib. 1. pag. 97.

Ille nouus Xerxes, orientis victor, & ingens Quacunque permearet, horror gentium:
Compleuit totos Scythico qui milite campos,
Hoc se ferebat ore trux Tamerlanes.
Cuius in aduentum tutæ altis mœnibus vrbes
Ipsumque terræ contremiscebat solum;
Ipsi adeo montes, ipsæ per deuia valles,
Vim Barbarorum non ferebant agminum.
Quare ab caucaseis Asiam conuallibus omnem,
Ad vsque Nili flumina armis subdidit;
Eufratem, & Tigrim, & rapidum tranauit Orontem,
Vi, vastitate, cæde, cuncta proterens.
Vtque olim fœda cum tempestate coorta
Erumpit atra nube fulmen igneum:
Obuia quæque cadens perrumpit, & alta sonanti
Templa atque solidas strage turres disjecit.
Subsidit vasto Tellus labefacta fragori,
Humilisque mentes sternit humanas pauor:

Haud ſecus ille viam ferro molitus, & igni,
Euertit arces, opida æquauit ſolo.
Regem Aſiæ horribili captum impete Baiazetem Caueaque clauſum ferrea circuntulit.
Hæc agitantem illum, & ſpirantem immania iuſſa
Quæ cunctus vndique orbis expaueſceret;

In Engliſh thus,

Of Tamerlane a Xerxes new, which did the Eaſt ſubdew,
And in all places where he came, the nations ouerthrew;
That fild the fields with Scythian troupes, brought from thoſe climates cold,
This was the feature and the ſhape which thou doeſt here behold.
At whoſe approch, the ſtrongeſt townes could ſmall reſiſtance make,
The earth it ſelfe vnder his feet ſeeming for feare to quake.
The mountaines high, mating the skie, and vncouth valleyes low,
Vnable were the force to beare, where he did come or goe.
All ASIA from mount CAVCASVS, vnto the bankes of NILE,
With valiant hand he vanquiſhed and made his force to feele.
EVPHRATES, TIGRIS, and the ſwift ORONTES gaue him way,
With force, waſt, and deſtruction great, on what he liſt to prey.
And as in tempeſts great oft times, when all things goe to wracke,
The fierie lightning flaſhing forth, out of the clouds ſo blacke, Doth breake downe what it lights vpon, and with a dreadfull fall Ouerthrowes the temples, with their towers, and ſtately buildings all,
So that the earth diſmayd therewith, doth lower downe deſcend,
And fearefull wights wrapt vp in woe, are brought to their wits end:
In like ſort he with fire and ſword ſeeking all to confound,
The ſtrongeſt caſtles, towers, and townes, laid equall with the ground.
And like an whirlewind taking vp great Baiazet away,
Coupt vp in cage, ſo carried him, for his diſport and play.
But whileſt he rageth thus about, and plotteth in his head
Such hard commaunds and heauie doomes, as all the world ſhould dread:
A little feauer in three fits, oppreſſed him with woe,
And cloaſing vp his vitall ſpirits, did lay his head full low.
So that for all the world of wealth and kingdomes he poſſeſt,
The ſmall remainder of himſelfe in ſimple graue doth reſt.

Mahomet goeth againſt his brother Iſa.

His great empire by himſelfe deuided betwixt his ſonnes, was by their diſcord, and the ambition of ſome of their diſloyall ſubjects, in ſhort time after brought to great confuſion, and his poſteritie vtterly rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes, the Armenian prince, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie may appeare. But to returne againe vnto our purpoſe, Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the departure of Tamerlane out of thoſe countries, determined to goe to PRVSA in BYTHINIA, where his brother Iſa as then raigned: But vnderſtanding that Iſa had before taken the ſtraits whereby he ſhould paſſe the mount HORMINIVS, he tooke another way about, & came to PALÆO-CASTRON, where the valiant captaine Eine-beg Sub-baſſa then remained: who with all honor and gladneſſe receiued him, and there for certain daies refreſhed both him and his armie. Afterwards greater forces ſtill repairing vnto him, he marched thence to VLABAD, called in antient time LOPADIVM. Of whoſe comming Iſa before vnderſtanding, and hauing aſſembled his armie, marched thither alſo, and encamped on the other ſide of the town towards PRVSA, readie to giue him battaile. But Mahomet ſeeing his brother ſo forward, conſulted with his captaines, captaines what were beſt to bee done: where Eine Sub-baſſa a man of great experience, and of late one of Baiazet his great councellours and captaines, told him, That it was not for their honours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others blood; but to aſſaie if the quarrell might by ſome other good meanes be compoſed, and they made friends. For which purpoſe Mahomet preſently ſent letters vnto his brother Iſa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in ASIA betwixt them: offering vnto him the prouinces of AIDINIA, SARVCHANIA, GERMEANIA, CHARASIA, CHARAMANIA, with other countreys to them belonging: ſo that he might haue PRVSA with all the other prouinces about the ſame. Which letters, when Iſa had read, and ſaw that Mahomet offered him but titles for kingdomes, and ſuch countreys as were rather ſometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiazet, than any part of his kingdome, and now of late by Tamerlane againe reſtored vnto their ancient libertie and gouernours; ſharing out the beſt, and ſtrongeſt part thereof vnto himſelfe, he brake forth into choler and ſaid:

The anſwere of Iſa to Mahomet his offers.

What? doth not my fathers kingdome of right belong vnto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is yet but a youth, and ſcarce crept out of the ſhell: by what right then can hee claime my fathers kingdome as his inheritance? If he can by the ſword win it, let him take it, and ſo hold it.

Mahomet hauing receiued this anſwere, prepared himſelfe to the field, where his brother as readie as himſelfe, ſtood expecting his comming: and hauing ſet his armie in order of battaile, gaue the firſt charge: which was the beginning of a moſt cruell and bloodie fight, wherein as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battailes, many were on both ſides ſlaine. At laſt the fortune of Mahomet preuailing, Iſa his armie began to retire: which he ſeeing, left nothing vndone for the encouraging of his fainting ſouldiours, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant ſouldiour to doe; but preſsing into the thickeſt of his enemies, there with his own hand ſlew the antient and valiant captaine Eine Subbaſſa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Baiazet his warres. But what preuaileth courage againſt euill fortune? Iſa muſt either flie or die. And therefore hauing done what he could in ſo deſperate a caſe, being himſelfe on euerie ſide forſaken, in the end was glad himſelfe to flie to the ſea ſide: where finding a ſhippe readie bound for CONSTANTINOPLE, he paſſed ouer thether in ſaftie, and there yeelded himſelfe vnto the protection of the Greeke emperour Emanuel. In this chaſe Mahomet his ſouldiors tooke the valiant captaine Temurtaſes priſoner, another of Baiazet his great commanders, and brought him to Mahomet: who in reuenge of the death of Eine, commaunded his head preſently to be ſmitten off, and his bodie to be hanged vpon a tree by the hie way ſide. Of this victorie, Mahomet certified his brother Solyman at HADRIANOPLE, and in token thereof ſent him Temurtaſes his head. This battaile was much ſpoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two brethren; and alſo for the death of the two famous old captains Eine and Temurtaſes, who both together as louing friends, had fortunatly fought many great battels vnder Baiazet his enſignes; and now as it were by deſtinie, and againſt their wils, without any priuat grudge, were both drawne into contrarie factions and ſlaine: both whilſt they liued wiſhing a good peace betwixt the ambitious brethren. But as the Turks vſe to ſay, What is by God written in a mans forehead before his birth, cannot in his life be auoided.

After this victorie, Mahomet thinking himſelfe now in ſure poſſeſsion of all his fathers dominions in ASIA, led his armie to PRVSA, where he was of the citizens joyfully receiued as their Sultan: and for his great bountie, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to NICE, and ſo to NEAPOLIS and there in both places was likewiſe receiued. Thether reſorted vnto him all the garriſons of CARASINA, SARVCHANIA, and AIDINIA, with other the inhabitants of thoſe countries, with all loyaltie ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, with ſuch honour and reuerence as belonged to their king.

The bodie of Baiazet honourably buried at Prusa.

All things thus ſorting according to his deſire in ASIA, he ſent to the prince Germean for the bodie of his father Baiazet, and for his brother Muſa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This dead bodie was by the ſame prince at the requeſt of Mahomet, with great ſolemnitie ſent to PRVSA, and there ſumptuouſly buried, with all the Turkiſh obſequies and ceremonies: the Turkiſh Alcoran or booke of their law, being read ſeauen daies vpon his tombe. All which time great cheere was kept for all cominers, and much giuen to the poore (vpon the Turkiſh deuotion) for Baiazet his ſoule: but aboue all others, exceeding bountie was extended to the poſteritie of their prophet Mahomet; which are knowne from others amongſt the Mahometans, by the colour of their apparell, which is all greene, and not lawfull to be worne of any but but of them: ſo that they were by the bountie of Mahomet at that time greatly enriched. He alſo endowed the Abbey which his father had there lately built, with great lands and poſſeſsions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the ſolemnitie paſt, he went in progreſſe to all parts of his kingdome, and was in euerie place joyfully receiued, and ſo afterward returned to AMASIA: and there in great pleaſure ſpent that ſummer. Where we will for a while leaue him to ſee what Solyman his eldeſt brother in the meane time doth at HADRIANOPLE: whoſe liuely countenance is by the skilfull workemans hand thus expreſſed.

Non malus es niſi te eneruet male ſuada voluptas
Quæque minus bello conuenit ingluuies.
Hoſpitio Mirxi fruitur iam Muſa Valachi:
Ille tuum vigilat pronus in exitium.

IAC. BOISARDVS.

Euill art thou not, except leaud luſt doe haſten on thy fall:
Or riot, which beſeemeth not a martiall man at all.
Thy brother Muſa entertaind by Marke to thine annoy, Doth take no reſt, but waiteth ſtill how he may thee deſtroy.

Solyman

Soliman the eldeſt ſonne of Baiazet (who kept his court at HADRIANOPLE, there peaceably raigning all this while ouer the countries which his father Baiazet ſometime poſſeſſed in EVROPE) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently againſt all right hee had driuen Iſa out of PRUSA, and made him glad to flie to CONSTANTINOPLE: was with this his outrageous dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Baſſaes & faithfull counſellors, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet againſt his brother Iſa. Wherein (ſaid he) he doth me alſo great wrong in taking vpon him the ſoueraignetie ouer thoſe great dominions and countries in ASIA, which of right belong to me his eldeſt brother, and not to him the yongeſt of ſix. In reuenge of which injurie and wrong, I intend in mine owne right, to paſſe ouer into ASIA with a ſtrong armie, and by force of armes to recouer mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwiſe come by it. Vnto which ſpeech one of his graue counſellors replied: That in his opinion it was not the beſt courſe for himſelfe to goe in perſon into thoſe wars. For although (ſaid he) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therfore by your greatneſſe leſſe accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience aboue his yeares. None haue yet had to doe with him, but they haue had ynough of him: yea, it is worth the noting, how politickly he hath borne himſelfe for his owne ſafetie, and the ſafegard of the countries which he gouerned all the while that the great and mightie Tamerlane with his innumerable forces couered the face of the countries faſt by him: moſt part whereof, Mahomet hath now ſince his departure, againe recouered. Wherefore it were beſt for you to ſend for your angrie brother Iſa, to CONSTANTINOPLE, and to make him generall of the armie you intend to ſend into ASIA againſt Mahomet. In which warres, it is not vnlike, but that one of your brethren will be loſt, whereby you ſhall haue one competitor of your kingdome the leſſe. So ſhall you afterwards with leſſe trouble ſubdue him that is left, or at leaſtwiſe pleaſe him with ſome part of that which they haue ſo mightely ſtriuen for.

Good counſell.

This counſell was of Soliman and all the reſt well liked of, and approued. So was Iſa preſently ſent for vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, and a great armie leuied. Who being come to HADRIANOPLE, was by Soliman courteouſly welcommed, and made generall of his armie: and therewith ſhipped ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS into ASIA. Where at his firſt comming, hee poſſeſſed the whole countrey of CARASIA or LYDIA: and paſsing further, in all places where he came, was receiued of the people with great reuerence, they all promiſing him their obedience, if it were his fortune to preuaile againſt his younger brother Mahomet: wherewith he held himſelfe well contented. So comming to the cittie of BEG-BAZER, otherwiſe called DESPOPOLIS, he there wintered with his armie. In which time, hee with many kind and louing letters ſtill directed to Mahomet as his younger brother, ſeemed to be glad that he was ſo well obeyed and liked of by his ſubjects: and that preſuming of his loue and fauour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemie come into ASIA, to entreat with him of ſuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diſſimulation anſwered, That hee was right glad of his comming, for which he needed not (as he ſaid) to make any excuſe, for that he was entred into a kingdome, in part his owne, and the reſt open before him: in token wherof, he commaunded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the meſſenger as a fauor, ſending alſo diuers rich preſents vnto his brother, with great prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries for his ſouldiors.

Iſa with a great armie ſent by his brother Solyman into Aſia againſt Mahomet.

But Winter paſt, and the Spring come, Iſa marched with his armie to PRUSA, and there ſhewed vnto the cittizens the louing letters he had at ſundry times before receiued from Mahomet: and telling them that hee was in good hope that they ſhould in ſhort time right well agree; requeſted to haue the caſtle deliuered vnto him, ſometime their ſoueraigne: whereinto the better ſort of the cittizens had retired themſelues, and made faſt the gates againſt him: but when he ſaw that he could by no faire words or pollicie gaine the poſſeſſion of the caſtle, enraged with that repulſe, he ſet fire vpon that goodly citie, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother Iſa romed vp and downe his kingdome, vſing all kindneſſe to ſuch as yeelded vnto him; and exerciſing no leſſe crueltie vpon ſuch as refuſed his obedience: and how that hee had raſed the royall cittie of PRVSA: hauing gathered a ſtrong armie, marched in ten daies from AMASIA to PRVSA, and by the way meeting with his brother Iſa, in a great battaile ouerthrew him with all his forces. Iſa himſelfe, accompanied with no more but ten perſons, fled vnto CASTAMONA, prince Iſfendiar his cittie: who hearing of his arriuall there, entertained him with all the honour he could, in recompence of the great friendſhip he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble ſuter in his father Baiazets his court.

Pruſa burnt by Iſa.

Mi-

Mahomet comming to PRUSA, greeued exceedingly to see that faire citie so destroied: yet to comfort the poore citizens, he gaue exceeding summes of money to bee bestowed amongst them, and tooke order for the new building of the citie, and there continued certaine daies himselfe to see the worke begun.

Isa in the meane time, hauing incited the prince Isfendiar in his quarrell to inuade his brother Mahomet, and going thether himselfe in person, was by him now the third time ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neuertheless he with some small forces, twice afterwards entred into Mahomets dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his euill fortune, was glad at last to flie to the prince of SMIRNA, by whom he was both honourably entertained and comforted.

This prince of SMIRNA mooued with Isa his pitifull complaints, in so manifest a wrong, did not onely promise him what helpe he could of himselfe, but also by his embassadours solicited the princes of AIDINIA, SARUCHANIA, and MENTESIA, to giue him aid in so just a quarrell, for the releese of Isa against his vsurping brother: These princes pitying the case of the distressed prince, and moued with the request of the prince of SMIRNA, and fearing also the ambitious spirit of Mahomet; amongst them sent such aid, that being all assembled together, Isa had now twentie thousand men in armes. Mahomet vnderstanding of this great preparation made against him, and hauing raised a strong armie, thought it not best to expect his brothers comming into his countrey (where perhaps many might joyne themselues vnto him, being so strong in field) but entred the prince of SMIRNA his country, with such speed, that he was vpon him and the rest of his enemies before he was looked for; where after a great & bloodie fight, he obtained of them a notable victorie. Isa hauing lost the battaile, and therewith his hope also, fled into CARAMANIA, and there in such obscuritie ended his daies, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble prince, alwaies of greater courage than fortune. The prince of SMIRNA the chiefe authour of this warre, humbling himselfe to Mahomet, obtained his fauour. The other confederate princes which gaue aid to Isa, were shortly after by Mahomet for most part spoiled of their dominions. Which done he returned with victorie to the building of PRUSA, hoping now to liue at more quiet.

Isa flieth into Caramania, and there dieth in obscuritie.

But whilst Mahomet after this victorie, dreading no danger, was in the middest of his pleasures at PRUSA, he was certainly aduertised, That his eldest brother Solyman had raised a great armie in EUROPE, to inuade him in ASIA. Vpon which aduertisement, hee furnished the castle of PRUSA with a strong garrison, and all things needfull for the induring of a long siege, and placed Iacup-Beg (the sonne of Firoses) captaine therein; and afterwards departed himselfe, because that citie lately before burnt by Isa, was not as yet to be defended, much lesse to be accounted of as a place to retire vnto, if need should so require. From PRUSA he came to ANCYRA, & from thence directed commissions for the taking vp of souldiors in all parts of his kingdome. At which time hee writ letters also to Doioran a Tartar prince (whom hee had many times greatly pleasured) for aid: who presently came vnto him with certaine troupes of braue horse, promising him his faithfull seruice.

Not long after, hearing that his brother Solyman was with a puissant armie now come ouer HELLESPONTUS, he consulted with his best leaders, what course first to take; being himselfe of opinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field, deeming it great shame not to offer him present battaile. But he was by his more expert captaines aduised, to consider that he was to fight against his eldest brother, of whose good or bad fortune hee had as yet no experience: and that many secretly fauoured his quarrell, and claime, as the eldest sonne and right heire of his father Baiazet: and that therefore it were better for him to retire farther off into the strength of his kingdome, and so temporizing, to await all good oportunities which might chaunce, as it doth in nothing more than in martiall affaires; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one battell, wherein if fortune failed him, all were then vtterly lost. Vpon which resolution he retired from ANCYRA towards AMASIA. At which time Doioran the false Tartarian, marching out at the other side of the citie, fell to robbing and spoiling of Mahomets subjects as an enemie, burning the countrey villages as they went: which thing when Mahomet vnderstood, he with his horsemen pursued him; and ouertaking him before he was looked for, slue most part of his men, and recouered all the spoile which hee had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his souldiours. Doioran himselfe hardly escaping by flight. And so Mahomet hauing reuenged himselfe vpon his dissembling friend, held on his way towards AMASIA.

The caſtle of Prusa beſieged by Solyman.

Solyman being come into ASIA, led his armie towards PRUSA: where the citizens vnderſtanding of his comming, went out of the citie to meet him, and hauing done vnto him ſuch honour and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the citie. But Iacup-Beg ſtood vpon his guard, and would by no meanes deliuer vnto him the caſtle which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge: for which cauſe Solyman laid hard ſiege vnto it, and gaue therevnto diuers ſharpe aſſaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakned, many of them being ſlaine, and the reſt for the moſt part wounded. Whereupon Iacup by letters ſent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things ſtood, and that the caſtle could not long bee holden againſt the furious aſſaults of Solyman, except it were with ſpeed releeued: vpon which newes, he in all haſt made towards PRUSA, returning the ſame meſſenger before him with letters to the captaine of the caſtle, if happily he could find meanes to deliuer the ſame: Wherein he highly commended him for his faithfull ſeruice, and promiſed him ſpeedie releeſe. This meſſenger with his letters, chaunced by Solyman his ſouldiours to bee intercepted, and brought to Alis Baſſa, Solyman his chiefe councellour (a man of a ſharpe conceit) who of nothing could make ſomething, but hauing any thing to worke vpon, could doe wonders: He hauing ſtraightly examined the meſſenger, and peruſed the letters, ſuppreſſed the ſame, and preſently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the captaine for that hee had alreadie done in his ſeruice; but yet for as much as he could not poſsibly in time releeue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the caſtle, and to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and his garriſon, by ſuch conditions as he could beſt obtaine. Theſe counterfeit letters Alis Baſſa found meanes to bee as cunningly deliuered vnto the captaine, as they were craftely endited: who hauing read the ſame, and now out of all hope of releeſe, expecting alſo euery houre to be aſſaulted by the furious enemie; vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded the caſtle to Solyman. The newes whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within one dayes march of PRUSA, exceedingly grieued him: but ſeeing no remedie, he returned backe againe to AMASIA; whither Solyman (now poſſeſſed of the cittie and caſtle of PRUSA, and hauing thereby got a great name in ASIA) ſhortly after came with his armie, and hardly beſieged his brother in AMASIA: but ſeeing no hope to win the cittie, he retired backe againe to PRUSA, and there after his wonted manner ſpent his time in riot and exceſſe, whereunto he was exeeedingly giuen. Iacup Beg for yeelding of the caſtle, was afterward by Mahomet ſtraightly impriſoned, and in danger to haue beene put to death, had not the great Baſſaes become earneſt interceſſours for him.

Mahomet lying at AMASIA, was by his ſecret eſpials aduertiſed, That his brother Solyman hauing diſperſed his armie, lay in great ſecuritie at PRUSA, guarded but with a ſmall power, paſſing his time in all voluptuous pleaſure, his common exerciſe. Wherupon he in all haſt marched with his armie thitherwards, to haue ſurpriſed him, before hee ſhould bee able to call together his diſperſed forces. But when he was come to the riuer SANGARIUS, hee was diſcouered by Solyman Subbaſſa, a great captaine, whom Sultan Solyman had ſent, for the taking vp of men in that ſide of the countrey. Who returning in all haſt, gaue Solyman knowledge of his brothers comming: with which ſuddaine newes he was ſo diſmayed, being now of ſmall ſtrength, that for the auoiding of the imminent danger, he would preſently haue fled into EUROPE, had not Alis Baſſa otherwiſe perſuaded him: telling him, That if he ſhould ſo cowardly flie away, it would not onely blemiſh and defame his honour, but diſcourage his friends alſo in ASIA, and encourage his enemies to purſue him perhaps vnto the gates of HADRIANOPLE: and that therefore it were better, with ſuch forces as hee had, to take the ſtraits about NEAPOLIS, and ſo to ſtay his brothers further paſſage into that countrey, vntill ſuch time as hee might aſſemble the reſt of his armie. According to which good counſell, he firſt tooke the beforenamed ſtraits and paſſages, whereby Mahomet was of neceſsitie to paſſe, and there ſtrongly fortified himſelfe. Mahomet comming thither, with great force entered thoſe ſtraits, but was ſtill valiantly by Solyman repulſed. The like attempt hee many times valiantly gaue, for that he knew himſelfe to be at that time too ſtrong for his brother: but Solyman hauing the aduauntage of the place, with little danger or loſſe fruſtrated thoſe his brothers braue attempts, although hee were then a great deale the weaker. Alis Baſſa, whoſe wilie head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters, in the meane time was not idle, but (making Solyman before acquainted with his doings) ſent a ſecret meſſenger (one of his owne truſtie ſeruants) to Mahomet with letters, certifying him, That moſt of his nobilitie and great capcaptaines had ſecretly conſpired to betray him into the hands of his elder brother Solyman, as the vndoubted heire of his father Baiazet; and ſo with the price of his head, to make their owne peace and attonement with him: and that for the performance thereof, they had bound themſelues firſt vnto Solyman, and afterwards one to another, by ſolemne oath. Which treaſon hee diſcouered vnto him, with great proteſtation of his loue and good will, as hee that had of long time eaten bread and ſalt (as the Turkes vſe to ſay) in his fathers court; and therefore could not but wiſh well vnto him, being one of his lord and maiſters ſonnes. Theſe letters ſomething troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit: for all that, he ceaſed not for ſix or ſeauen daies ſpace, to giue many a hot skirmiſh for the gaining of thoſe ſtraight paſſages, but all in vaine. In which time, it chaunced one of his ſeruants neere about his perſon, to flie vnto the enemie; which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect all that to be true, whereof Alis Baſſa had forewarned him. Which conſidered, and that by lying there he preuailed nothing, but loſt and wearied his men (for it was all that while exceding foule weather) and withall doubting to be betraied, returned as he came, to AMASIA. And Solyman glad alſo of his departure retired to PRUSA, giuing order into all parts of his kingdome, for the aſſembling of a great armie: but vnderſtanding that the king of CARAMANIA had made a league with his brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to joyne their forces againſt him for the driuing of him out of ASIA, he forthwith drew all his forces to ANCYRA, as a place of more ſafetie.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at ANCYRA, it fortuned that Muſa (which had all this while remained with his brother Mahomet, ſince he was ſet at libertie by Tamerlane) though not altogether well pleaſed with his owne eſtate, one daie by way of talke, thus ſpake vnto his brother: You ſee (ſaid he) how our elder brother Solyman ceaſeth not to vex and moleſt vs daily, and is not vnlike in the end to preuaile againſt vs, to our vtter deſtruction: Now if it might pleaſe you to giue me leaue, I would goe to Iſfendiar prince of CASTAMONA and PONTUS, our brothers enemie, and of him procure ſhipping to paſſe ouer the Euxine ſea into EUROPE: where I doubt not to find oportunitie to make ſome great innouation in that kingdome, now in my brothers abſence: by reaſon whereof, Solyman ſhall of neceſsitie be driuen to leaue ASIA, to be again by you ſolie poſſeſſed: or elſe be brought in danger, there to loſe his kingdome in EUROPE. Which if it ſhall be my good hap to gaine out of his hands by your ſupportation, I promiſe you faithfully to hold the ſame of you, as of my lord and ſoueraigne. This greatly pleaſed Mahomet, and therevpon not long after they concluded betwixt themſelues, one to ſtand faſt vnto another, and the one to help the other in what they could, during life; confirming the ſame with great ſolemnitie of their Turkiſh faith giuen, and taken. Wherevpon Mahomet furniſhed his brother Muſa with great ſummes of money and other needfull things, for the taking in hand of ſo great an enterpriſe.

Muſa thus furniſhed, taking his leaue of his brother, ſet forwards towards the prince Iſfendiar: who hearing of his comming met him on the way, and entertained him as a great prince. But after that Muſa had made him acquainted with his purpoſe for paſsing into EUROPE, and had obtained graunt of his helpe therein, he tooke his leaue of him for a time, and went to viſit the king of CARAMANIA; who alſo moſt honourably entertained him, and the rather in deſpight of Solyman. But whileſt Muſa was thus paſsing the time in CARAMANIA, it fortuned that Marke (of ſome called Mirxes) prince of VALACHIA, hauing his countrey much ſpoiled by Solyman his garriſons; and hearing that Muſa one of Baiazet his ſonnes, was with the prince Iſfendiar; he writ vnto him, promiſing to beſtow his daughter and heire in mariage vpon Muſa, if he would come ouer into EUROPE, and reuenge the wrong done vnto him by Solyman: whereof Muſa aduertiſed by the prince Iſfendiar, gladly returned out of CARAMANIA, and was by him tranſported ouer the EUXINE or blacke ſea, into EUROPE: where the prince of VALACHIA glad of his comming, receiued him with great honour, and according to his promiſe gaue him his daughter in mariage.

Muſa marieth the prince of Valachia his daughter.

The fame of Muſa his comming into EUROPE, and of his mariage, was in ſhort time bruted through all Solyman his kingdome in EUROPE, and wrought ſuch effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (alwaies deſirous of noueltie) that they all as it were with one conſent, ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, as vnto their lord and ſoueraigne. In ſo much that comming to the royall citie of HADRIANOPLE, in the abſence of his brother Solyman, hee was there receiued as their king.

Muſa in the abſence of Solyman receiued at Hadrianople as king

Solyman now lying at ANCYRA in ASIA, vnderſtanding of theſe proceedinges of Muſa in EUROPE, and that he was poſſeſſed of a great part of his kingdome there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherfore leauing his deputie in ANCYRA, he with all his army came to the ſtrait of BOSPHORUS, and there of Emanuel the Greeke emperour obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore vnto him certaine places before taken from him in ASIA: for Muſa had ſo prouided, that he could haue no helpe of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his commaundement all before brought ouer vnto EUROPE ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his ariuall in EUROPE, made towards him with a great power: but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now readie to joyne baitaile, many of Muſa his captaines forſooke him and fled to Solyman the elder brother and their vndoubted king: which Muſa beholding, was glad to flie, and to take the ſafegard of the woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victorie, Solyman returning to HADRIANOPLE, tooke againe poſſeſion of his kingdome, and there without meaſure gaue himſelfe to riot and exceſſe, according to his woonted manner.

After the departure of Solyman out of ASIA, Iacup-Beg (but lately before againe receiued into Mahomet his fauour, and now left as Solyman his deputie) deliuered ANCYRA with the caſtle of PRUSA, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in ASIA, to Mahomet; who ſhortly after led his armie through the countries of CARASIA, AYDINIA, SARUCANIA, TEKENSIS, and GERMEANIA, reducing them once again vnto his obeiſance: and afterwards returned to PRUSA, where he now the ſecond time tooke poſſeſsion of his fathers kingdome in ASIA.

Muſa ſtill aided by the Valachian prince his father in law, gaue many great attempts againſt his brother Solyman: but was ſtill put to the worſe. At length hauing gathered ſome good ſtrength, and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solyman lay, who at that time was (as his manner was) banqueting with great pleaſure in his campe, and full of wine. In ſo much that when newes was brought vnto him, That his brother Muſa was at hand with a great power; he in his drunkenneſſe cauſed the meſſenger that brought the newes to be beaten: and when he with greater earneſtneſſe than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true, he commaunded him to be ſlaine for troubling his mirth. But not long after, Muſa was come ſo neere, that the vauntcourrours of his armie did skirmiſh with ſome of Solyman his ſouldiours: when as Chaſis Eurenoſes one of his fathers old captaines, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had skirmiſhed with part of his armie. Whereof Solyman (now farre in wine) had no regard, but ſaid: Good tutor doe not trouble me no more, my brother Muſa dare not come ſo nigh me, if I doe but hold vp my cappe, he is gone. With which anſwere the old captain going out diſcontented, ſent in Chaſan, Aga of the Ianizaries: who boldly comming vnto him, told him plainly of the imenent danger, and ſharply reproued him for his intemperance and ſecuritie. With whoſe free ſpeech, Solyman mooued, in great rage commanded his beard to be cut off (then no ſmal diſgrace amongſt the Turks.) Chaſan preſently comming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without: This is the honour wherewith Sultan Solyman in his exceſſe, rewardeth his moſt faithfull ſeruants. Wherefore bee it knowne to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerue Muſa, a prince of greater temperance and diſcretion: who ſo will follow me, come and welcome, So mounting to horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Ianizaries, of whom hee was greatly beloued, went ouer to Muſa: as did many other great captaines alſo with their companies, mooued by his example ſo to doe. But when Solyman vnderſtood that Chaſan with moſt part of the Ianizaries, and many other worthy captaines with the greateſt ſtrength of his armie, were reuolted to Muſa, then faſt by, and readie to ſet vpon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute folly: and finding no other remedy now to eſcape, hid himſelfe vntill it was darke night; then taking horſe, accompanied onely with Caratze Beg and Cara Muchill, two of his noblemen, and one countrey Turke (whom they had retained for their guide) thought to haue fled to CONSTANTINOPLE. This malicious clowne, hauing of purpoſe led them by vnknowne waies all that night too and fro, as it were in a maze, oftentimes miſnaming vnto them the places they paſſed by, as if they had been in the right way; brought them in the morning to a village not farre from the place from whence they departed the euening before: and there riding a little before them, of purpoſe, gaue warning to a ſturdie peaſant or two of his acquaintance, That Solyman was comming after: willing them to make ſtay of him. Theſe rude countrey churles, with ſome others of like breed, running out with bats and ſtaues, and ſuch other homely tooles as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratze, and Cara Muchill, which would would not yeeld vnto them but ſtood vpon their guard, and tooke Solyman aliue: where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples furie, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the warres; ſome likewiſe to burne him; and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſaue him: euerie one as his rude affection lead him. In the heat of this countrey vprore came Muſa, who glad to ſee his brother Solyman ſo hardly beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when hee had raigned in HADRIANOPLE ſix yeares and ten moneths.

Solyman ſtrangled by his brother Muſa.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt ſonne that Baiazet left aliue. A man much giuen to exceſſe, otherwiſe endued with many great vertues, being both of great valour and exceeding bountifull. In his time liued the learned doctor Achmetes which wrote the hiſtorie of Alexander the Great, in Turkiſh verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelfe: for which he was by him bounteouſlie rewarded. The dead bodie of Solyman himſelfe, was by the commaundement of Muſa conuaied to PRUSA, and there lieth buried faſt by the bodie of his grandfather Amurath. So now of theſe Cadmeian brethren, remained none but Mahomet and Muſa, the one raigning in ASIA, and the other in EUROPE, diuers parts of world, and well bounded with the ſureſt bounds of nature: yet not ſufficient to content or containe their ambitious minds, vntill that the younger had moſt vnnaturally deuoured the elder: whoſe liuely counterfait, as it is by the skilfull workeman expreſſed, you may here behold.

This Solyman it that ſame whom ſome call Celebinus, and others ſome Calepinus, and reckon him for the fift king of the Turks.

Quid properas inſane tuum peſſundare fratrem?
Nam ſceleris tanti, Præmia digna feres.
Quicquid enim fratri malefeceris, hoc tibi frater.
Mox referet, nimis hæc in tua fata ruis. RICH. KNOLLEVS.

What haſteſt thou mad foole, thy brother to confound?
The guerdon of ſuch villanie, ſhall to thy ſelfe redound.
For looke what miſchiefe thou haſt wrought ſhall turne to thee againe:
Why doſt thou therefore fooliſh man ſo haſten on thy paine?

Musa presently after the death of his brother Solyman, tooke vpon him the Turkish kingdome in EUROPE: who in the beginning of his raigne displaced most of them which had born great offices before in the time of his brother Solyman, and had now of late reuolted to him; fearing to be by them betrayed or forsaken, as his brother was: and in their roomes placed other his owne creatures. And not so content, proceeded farther, vpon small causes most vnkindly to imprison and put to death many of them that had of him well deserued. Which cruell dealing so alienated the minds of his nobilitie, that many of them kept themselues out of the way, doubtfully expecting the euent of such his tyrannicall gouernment: Chasis Eurenoses, that old and renowned captaine, to escape his hands, was glad to feigne himselfe blind, so to absent himselfe from court. At this time hee also by his embassadours demaunded of diuers Christian princes his neighbours, such tribute as they had in times past either paied or promised to pay vnto his father Bauazet: and in that quartell inuaded diuers of them, namely, the princes of SERVIA and BULGARIA. Amongst others he sent Ibrahim Bassa, a learned man of great experience, and sometimes one of his fathers graue counsellours, vnto Emanuell Paleologus, the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, to demaund the like tribute of him. Who so soone as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, from thence by letters aduertised Mahomet of the vndiscreet gouernment of his brother Musa in his new gotten kingdome; and what vntimely stirres he began to make, before he was therein well setled, loosing the loue both of his subjects and neighbour princes: with much other matter concerning his misgouernment. Which things when Mahomet vnderstood, he sent a messenger with letters backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, requesting the Bassa to come ouer vnto him into ASIA, and in token of his great fauour sent him diuers rich garments, with many great and princely promises: wherewith the Bassa mooued, and detesting the cruell gouernment of Musa, went ouer vnto him to PRUSA, and there was of him honourably entertained, and sworne one of his priuie counsell: in which place of honour he long time afterwards serued him faithfully, and after him his sonne Amurath also.

Mahomet thinking, vpon the aduantage of his brothers euill gouernment, to find meanes to thrust him out of his kingdome, and so to draw the whole gouernment of the Turkish empire vnto himselfe, as well in EUROPE as in ASIA; assembled an armie of fifteene thousand choice souldiors to inuade his brother in EUROPE, before hee were there well established in his kingdome. And so shocking downe towards the straits of BOSPHORUS, by his embassador concluded a league with Emanuel the Greeke emperour, That one of them should neuer wrong or damnifie the other: and that if Mahomet should hap to obtaine the Turkish kingdome in EUROPE, he should alwaies honour and reuerence the emperour as his especiall good friend: but if it should chance him to be distressed or ouerthrowne by his brother Musa, that then the emperour should presently transport him and his armie backe agains into ASIA. This league was with great solemnitie of words on both parts confirmed. And shortly after Mahomet with all his armie was by the emperours shipping at the strait of BOSPHORUS neere vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, transported ouer into EUROPE: for Musa possessed of GALLIPOLIS, had stopped all the other passages.

The battaile betwixt the two brethren, Mahomet and Musa.

Musa hauing before knowledge of his brothers comming, was foorthwith in readinesse to meet him with a strong armie. So that Mahomet had not marched farre from the sea side, but that the vaunteourriers of his armie met with his brothers, at a place called INTZUGE, and there began a light skirmish: wherin Musa his forerunners were by Mahomets put to flight, and chased vnto Musa his campe. Whereof such a suddaine feare arose in the armie, that they were almost readie to flie, thinking Mahomet had beene vpon them with all his power: but vnderstanding the truth of the matter, both armies rested that night, which as then drew fast on. The next day these two brethren, armed with equall hope, brought their armies into the field, & gaue the signall of battaile, whereupon began a mortall and bloodie fight: in the furie whereof, Michaell Ogli, Bassa of ROMANIA, and certaine other of Musa his great captaines, vpon secret discontentment reuolted to Mahomet: wherewith many of Musa his souldiors discouraged, fled. Which Mahomet his souldiors seeing, pursued the chace with such earnestnesse and furie, that few were left with himselfe: yet with such as were left, in hope of good hap, he set vpon his brother: who although hee was halfe discomfited with the flight of the greater part of his armie, whom the enemies had yet in chace, yet stood he fast himselfe with seuen thousand Ianizaries, his best souldiors; so taking the vnexpected good hap, presented vnto him by his brothers forwardnesse, neſſe, valiantly receiued his charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ſtrength than hee had before ſuppoſed, and himſelfe too weake to withſtand the furie of the Ianizaries, becauſe moſt of his men alſo were following the chace, was now for ſafegard of his life glad to flie himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE: whether hee came accompanied ſcarcely with two hundred men: and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the emperour, ſpeedily ſhipped ouer into ASIA. Muſa hauing thus put his brother to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men, preſently tooke his tents with all that was therein, and there encamped himſelfe. They of Mahomets armie, which followed the chace of ſuch as had fled in the beginning of the battaile, not knowing what had happened to Mahomet, returning to the campe, doubting no perill, and finding it at their returne poſſeſſed by their enemies, ſtood as men amaſed and vtterly diſcouraged: at which time Muſa would not ſuffer his ſouldiours to put them to the ſword, as they would faine haue done, but commaunded them to bee deſpoiled of their armes and ſuch other things as they had, and ſo with life ſuffered them to depart.

After this ouerthrow, whileſt Mahomet lay ſtill at PRUSA, the prince of SMYRNA forcibly entred into AIDINIA, purpoſing to paſſe through into SARUCANIA: which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great armie, and entering into the princes countrey, made ſuch ſpoile as hee went, and ſo diſtreſſed the prince himſelfe, that he was glad to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and from thenceforth to hold his dominion of him, as of his lord and ſoueraigne, and ſo returned vnto AMASIA.

Mahomet could not well diſgeſt the loſſe he had ſo lately receiued in EUROPE, and therefore leuied an armie of choice ſouldiors out of all parts of his kingdome, once againe to trie his fortune againſt his elder brother Muſa. For the better ſucceſſe wherein, he by his letters craued aid of the prince Duldager Ogli, written to this effect:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the prince Dulgader Ogli, his father in law.

My purpoſe is to lead mine armie into ROMANIA in EUROPE, and there againe to trie my quarrell with my brother Muſa. My hope is, that you will not with your aid be wanting vnto me your ſonne in law, in my ſo great affaires, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpoſe. Fare you well, in the yeare of our great Prophet Mahomet 814. From AMASIA.

Mahomet his letters vnto the prince Dulgader Ogli, his father in law.

Whereunto the prince returned this kind anſwere:

Prince Dulgader Ogli vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

I doubt not moſt mightie Monarch, but that whither ſo euer your deſires ſhall draw you for the vndertaking of any great exploit, he that ruleth aboue in heauen, will be alwaies your aid, proſper your attempts, miniſter vnto you fit occaſions, and bring all your actions vnto moſt happie end, with moſt aſſured victorie. Wherefore ſeeing (God ſo diſpoſing our affaires) I cannot my ſelfe in perſon come vnto you with my power, and giue you my truſtie helpe in this your intended warre: yet will I in no caſe faile with all ſpeed to ſend my ſonne your ſeruant, to aid you with our forces, in this warre. Fare you well this ſame yeare of our Prophet 814.

The anſwere of prince Dulgader Ogli to Mahomet.

And ſo ſhortly after, the prince ſent vnto him his ſonne, according to his promiſe, with a companie of braue ſouldiors, excellently furniſhed: for the welcomming of whom, Mahomet his brother in law made a great and royall feaſt: and there in his mirth gaue vnto the young prince the rich apparrell hee wore himſelfe, with the horſe hee rode vpon, and all the rich plate of gold and ſiluer wherein they were ſerued at that feaſt, a matter of great value. And to euery one of his noblemen he gaue a rich garment, made for that purpoſe, with ſome other gift, as a fauour: and afterwards gaue them all to vnderſtand, That he intended forthwith to paſſe ouer into EUROPE, and there to recouer all his fathers kingdome, or els there to end his daies: As for the ſpoile and prey (ſaid hee) ſhall bee theirs that can win it: one horſe, one ſword, one horſemans mace ſhall content my ſelfe. So hauing furniſhed his armie with all things needfull for ſo great an enterpriſe, hee ſet forward, and came to the ſtrait of BOSPHORUS; and from thence gaue knowledge of his

his comming to the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: who glad thereof (for the displeasure he bare to Musa) transported him and all his armie ouer that strait into EUROPE, and there in one of his countrey pallaces royally feasted him. At which time Mahomet requested the emperour to joine with him in that warre against their common enemie: but hee excused himselfe by reason of his great age; yet neuertheless, assisted him with certaine companies of valiant Christians, whose seruice afterward stood the Turke in great stead.

So Mahomet taking his leaue of the emperour, marched with his armie to the riuer WYZEN in THRACIA, where by the way he receiued letters from the antient captaine Chasis Eurenoses, aduising him to be very circumspect in his marching, and not to make too much hast to joine battaile with his brother: counselling him also (if he could by any means) to allure Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forsake his brother, and to follow his ensignes; for that in those men consisted Musa his greatest strength: and promised in good time to come vnto him himselfe also, if he were not too hastie. This messenger that brought this newes, Mahomet bountifully rewarded, and so sent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching towards HADRIANOPLE, part of the enemies armie, began to shew it selfe vnder the leading of Cara Calile, and was presently charged by Michaell Ogli, and put to flight. So holding on his way to HADRIANOPLE, hee laied siege to the cittie: where the cittizens sent out vnto him certaine of their grauest and most substantiall burgesses, to certefie him, That by reason of the garrison there left by Musa, they could not as then deliuer the cittie vnto him; but if it should please him to goe and trie his fortune in the field against his brother, who should be the commaunder thereof, he should find them readie to follow his good fortune, and to yeeld themselues, the cittie, and all therein, to his pleasure, if it were his good hap to carrie away the victorie. With which answere Mahomet contenting himselfe, raised his siege, and tooke the way towards ZAGORA. In that place Musa is reported to haue come secretly disguised into Mahomet his campe, and to haue taken full view thereof, but perceiuing himselfe too weake to encounter his brother, withdrew his armie into the safegard of the great woods and strong places: and so from thence retired with his armie towards PHILIPPOPOLIS, and so marched along the riuer MERITZE, called in antient time HEBRUS: Where Iegides Bassa, with Hamza Beg, and Ismir Ogli (three of Musa his great captaines) set vpon the rereward of Mahomets armie, and were by Michael Ogli repulsed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to SOPHIA: where as he went, Musa diuers times from the mountaines made shew of his armie, but durst not come downe into the plaine to giue him battaile. Mahomet hauing refreshed his armie at SOPHIA, marched to SARKIVE, where he receiued letters from Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all secretly persuaded by old Eurenoses to reuolt vnto him: the tenor whereof in breefe was this.

Hadrianople besieged by Mahomet.

Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

We are three young men (most mightie Monarch) and haue with vs three thousand choice soldiors, men of incomparable valor, such as the world hath scarce the like: draw your forces neare vnto vs with as much speed as you can, and you shall find vs readie to come ouer vnto you. Fare you well.

Musa his cheefe captaines reuolt to Mahomet.

Whereupon he marched all the next night after, vntill he came to the riuer MORAVA, and there encamped: where the three aforenamed captains, according to their promise joined themselues vnto him with all their souldiors. Thither came also old Eurenoses, of all others the most famous captaine amongst the Turks, and now no longer blind, bringing with him a great companie of most expert souldiours. Marke the Despot of SERVIA (for the displeasure he bare vnto Musa) sent him aid thether also. By which supplies, Mahomets armie was greatly encreased: who after he had courteously welcomed all these new come captains, he began againe to march farther vntill he came to COSSOVA, the vnfortunate plaine; where Hamza Beg the prince of SMYRNA his sonne, hauing forsaken Musa, came vnto him with fiue hundreth horse, certifying him that all the nobilitie had forsaken his father: so, as he marched from place to place, his forces still encreased by the reuolt of his brothers. Musa seeing his souldiours thus daily fall from him, insomuch that he had almost none now left, but the souldious of the court (which were indeed his best men of warre, and alwaies vnto him faithfull, because he had been euer vnto them exceeding ding bountifull) thought it beſt to attempt ſomething, before he were left himſelfe alone. Wherfore hauing yet with him ſeuen thouſand of thoſe expert ſouldiors, he drew neerer vnto his brother, ſeeking to haue taken him at ſome aduantage. But Mahomet hauing knowledge of his purpoſe, and contented to be aduiſed by his old expert captaines, had euer a vigilant eye vnto him. Yet at laſt, whether it were vpon good hope, or els prickt forward with deſpaire, Muſa vpon the ſuddaine, valiantly ſet vpon his brothers armie: but his ſouldiors oppreſſed with multitude, rather than ouercome with true valour, after a hard and bloodie fight were put to the worſt: which he ſeeing, deſperatly brake into the middeſt of his enemies, ſeeking there for death amongſt the thickeſt of them. But being knowne by Baiazet Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant generall, deſirous to take him aliue, he was beſet on euery ſide: where ſeeing himſelfe in more danger to be taken than ſlaine, hee with great courage brake from amongſt the middeſt of them, and fled. In which flight his horſe falling into a deepe muddie ditch (or as ſome others ſay, hoxed by Sarutzes his owne ſeruant, and himſelfe wounded) ouerthrew him, and there before he could againe recouer himſelfe was taken by Baiazet Baſſa (the great lieutenant) Michael Ogli, and Barac Beg, which had hardly purſued him out of the battaile: and ſo was with his handes bound, by them brought through the middeſt of the armie. Which pitifull ſight, greeued not a little the hearts of many; to ſee him but euen now ſo great a king, and one of the ſonnes of great Baiazet, by the ſtrange change of fortune, bound like a captiue ſlaue led forth to execution: yet were moſt part glad thereof, hoping this long ciuile wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came vnto him a noble man called Balta Ogly, ſent (as was thought) from Mahomet himſelfe; who after he had in few words bitterly reprooued him, for the crueltie by him before ſhewed vnto his brother Solyman in like caſe, cauſed him preſently to be ſtrangled with a bow ſtring. His dead body was by and by after, preſented to his brother Mahomet: who ſeeing it, ſhed a few Crocadils teares ouer it. He raigned three yeares and ſeauen moneths, and was afterwards conuaied to PRUSA, and there lieth buried by the bodie of his brother Solyman, in the ſame chappell with his grandfather Amurath.

Muſa ſtrangled.

Mahomet after the death of Muſa, now free from all competetours, tooke vpon him the ſole gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdome, as well in EUROPE as in ASIA. And here the Turkiſh hiſtories begin the raigne of this Mahomet fifth king of the Turks: accounting the troubleſome time from the captiuitie of Baiazet, vnto the death of Muſa, as a time of vacancie or Anarchi, wherein the Turkiſh kingdome was not at any time wholie poſſeſſed by any one of Baiazet his ſonnes. Iſa poſſeſsing one part, whereof hee was by Mahomet diſpoſſeſſed: who afterwardes vſurped all that part of the Turkiſh kingdome in ASIA, being the right of his eldeſt brother Solyman: Who at that time raigning in EUROPE, was depoſed and ſtrangled by his brother Muſa: who was in like manner ſerued by his youngeſt brother Mahomet, the onely ſonne of Baiazet then left, as is before at large declared. Which diuers mutations, and interrupted ſucceſsions, was the cauſe that the Hiſtoriographers doe ſo greatly diſcent vpon the ſucceſſour of Baiazet: ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome more, ſome fewer; and ſome, ſuch as neuer were. But foraſmuch as Mahomet held all or moſt part of the Turkiſh kingdome in ASIA, during this troubleſome time; and in the end poſſeſſed the other part thereof in EUROPE alſo; I reckon him for the fifth king of the Turks, and ſucceſſour to his father Baiazet: including alſo in this Hiſtorie of his life, all that inteſtine and ſerpentine-like tragedie, wherin he himſelfe was the principall actor.

Whileſt Mahomet was (as is aforeſaid) thus buſied in his wars in EUROPE, againſt his brother Muſa: the king of CARAMANIA taking the aduantage of his troubles there, with a great armie inuaded his kingdome joyning vpon him in ASIA, burning and ſpoiling all before him as he went: Eiuaſes Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant, then lying at PRUSA, not able to withſtand him; and fearing his comming thether, becauſe it was the ſeat of the Othoman kings in ASIA, cauſed the citizens to bring the greateſt part of their wealth into the caſtle: whereinto he alſo receiued ſo many of the citizens as he conueniently could, willing the reſt to ſhift for themſelues as they might, in ſuch caſe of extremitie. Shortly after, the king of CARAMANIA (according to his expectation) came to PRUSA, and without reſiſtance tooke the citie, not as yet fully fortified; which he without delaie cauſed the ſecond time to be burnt downe to the ground: and afterwards laid ſiege to the caſtle, giuing many great aſſaults thereto by the ſpace of thirtie daies; but was alwaies valiantly repulſed by Eiuaſes the Baſſa, who ceaſed not continually to encourage his ſouldiours, ſtill putting them in comfort, That Mahomet hauing now ouercome his enemies in EUROPE,

Prusa burnt by the Caramanian king.

EUROPE, would in few daies vndoubtedly come to their releefe. It chaunced at the same time, that the dead bodie of Musa, sent to PRUSA to be buried, was honourably conuaied vpon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian king hearing of the comming of such a multitude, and fearing it to haue been Mahomet with his power, raised his siege and with speed departed: whereat the Turks long time after jeasted, saying, If the Caramanian king runne away for feare of the dead bodie of the Othoman king; what would he doe if hee had come against him aliue? but the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the sonne of Solyman (yet a boy) hauing liued at CONSTANTINOPLE euer since the death of his father, about this time departed thence, because of the league but lately made between the emperour and his vncle Mahomet, purposing to haue gone into VALACHIA: but by the way as hee was trauelling, the Turkish voluntarie souldiours vnderstanding that hee was the sonne of their late king Solyman, resorted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to spend their liues. Of which insurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thether in all hast, with a great power to suppresse the same: of whose coming the souldiors with Orchanes vnderstanding, dispierced themselues and fled. As for Orchanes himselfe, he was by his vnfaithfull tutor Zaganos betraied vnto his vncle Mahomet: who presently caused his eies to be put out, and so sent him to PRUSA: allowing him great reuenewes to liue vpon, and euer after vsed him with great honour. The sister of this Orchanes he gaue in marriage to one of his noblemen, with a great dowrie. This is that Orchanes, whom some historiographers reckon vp among the Turkish kings, as one of the successours of Baiazet; and that hee was betrayed to his vncle Moses: erring as I suppose, both in the succession and the name, mistaking Moses for Mahomet.

1416 Mahomet inuadeth the Caramanian king.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the injurie which the Caramanian king had done to him in his absence, returning to PRUSA, assembled a great armie to reuenge himselfe of that wrong. At which time, he sent to the prince Isfendiar for aid, who sent him his sonne Cassumes. He commanded also the prince Germian Ogli, to make prouision for the victualing of his campe, as he should passe by his countrey: which was accordingly done. And so prouided of all things necessarie, he with his armie entred into the Caramanian countrey: Where he tooke the cities ASPROPOLIS, DESPOTOPOLIS, HIEROPOLIS, and besieged ICONIUM: but by reason of the imoderate raine which at that time fell, he was glad to make peace with the Caramanian king, called also Mahomet. And so raising his siege, departed towards PONTUS, where hee had not long staied, but that newes was brought vnto him, That the Caramanian king renouncing his league, was againe vp in armes. Wherefore returning into CARAMANIA, and so to ICONIUM, he there ouerthrew the king in battaile, and tooke both him and his son Mustapha prisoners: who redeemed themselues by deliuering diuers of their strong cities and castles into his hands: and afterward concluded a peace, they receiuing from him an ensigne (as the Turkish maner is) in token they were now become his vassales.

The Caramanian warre thus happily ended, he went ouer into EUROPE, and passing ouer DANUBIUS, foraged the countrey of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, making there great spoile: for redresse whereof, the Valachian prince by his embassadours sent him such tribute as hee demaunded, and his son also to serue him in his court. About which time happened a great earthquake in PRUSA, and other places of ASIA, wherby many houses & towers were ouerthrown; after which ensued great troubles in most parts of ASIA: howbeit Mahomet going thether, by his presence kept all his dominions in peace and quietnesse.

Isfendiar prince of CASTAMONA and part of PONTUS, reseruing vnto himselfe CASTAMONA, with a little part more of his dominion, gaue the rest vnto Mahomet, vpon condition that he should restore no part thereof againe vnto his sonne Cassumes: who hauing long time serued in Mahomet his court and warres, could not be perswaded to returne againe vnto his father; and therefore was by him thus disinherited. Which great gift, Mahomet thankefully accepted, and in lieu thereof assigned vnto Cassumes other great and large possessions within his owne kingdome.

Mahomet after the death of his brother Musa, had sent Scheiches Bedredin (his brothers Cadelescher) to NICE in ASIA, as vnto a place of exile, allowing him neuertheless a great pension wheron to liue. This Bedredin had in his house one Burgluzes, Mustapha his steward: these two laid their heads together, how to raise some tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable gouernment of Mahomet. For which purpose, Burgluzes (according to the plot by them laid) tooke his way way into AYDINIA (ſometime called CARIA) & there pretending a great zeale of reformed religion, with a wonderfull grauitie began to broach diuers new and ſtrange opinions, farre differing from the Turkiſh antient ſuperſtition, yet very plauſible and well fitting the humour of the vulgar people. By which meanes he was in ſhort time reputed for a famous learned deuout man, and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin ſome great innouation. Bedredin glad of his mans ſucceſſe, fled from NICE into the prince Iſfendiar his countrey, from whence he tooke ſhipping ouer the Euxine into VALACHIA, and there withdrawing himſelfe into a great forreſt, as if hee had beene ſome deuout and religious man, alluted vnto him a great number of outlawes and theeues which there liued. Whom when he had ſufficiently inſtructed and framed to his purpoſe, he ſent them in the habit of religious men into the countrey of ZAGORA, and other places in the frontiers of Mahomet his dominions, neere vnto him, as his diſciples: who with great boldneſſe and confidencie, publiſhed Bedredin his doctrine and authoritie; and how that he was by God appointed to be the king of juſtice, and commaunder of all the world: whoſe doctrine and manner of gouernment was (as they ſaid) alreadie receiued (as they gaue it out) in ASIA, being ſet forth but by one of his ſchollers, Burgluzes; whoſe fame was now diſperſed throughout all the Turks dominion: and that therefore, if any were deſirous of preferment, they ſhould repaire to Bedredin, who would in ſhort time ſhew himſelfe vnto the world, and promote his followers according to their deſerts. Many of the country people deluded with this phantaſie and practiſe of theſe ſeditious ſeed-men, reſorted to Bedredin in hope of preferment, and with them ſome of good calling alſo. At laſt, out of the forreſt commeth this great prophet, with banner diſplaied, attended vpon with a great multitude of the ſeditious vulgar people, which daily reſorted vnto him more and more. Mahomet for the repreſsing of theſe dangerous tumults, ſent his ſonne Amurath, and Baiazet the great Baſſa, with two thouſand men to apprehend Burgluzes in AYDINIA: but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thouſand men well appointed, readie to aduenture their liues in defence of their fooliſh prophet. Neuertheleſſe, Amurath and Baiazet not diſmayed with the multitude of thoſe vplandiſh people, ſet vpon them: where was fought a right bloodie battaile, for the number, and many ſlaine on both ſides: yet at laſt the rebels fled; in which flight Burgluzes himſelfe was ſlaine, and hewen all to peeces. After which victorie Baiazet from thence haſted to MAGNESIA, and there executed Torlac Kemal, another ſeditious Turkiſh monke, which with two thouſand, by him ſeduced, did much harme in the countrey thereabout. At the ſame time alſo Mahomet ſent another power againſt Bedredin: but moſt of his followers ſeeing in him no ſuch matter, as was by his diſciples and himſelfe promiſed, and as they hoped for, were alreadie fallen from him; ſo that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him, whereby he was eaſily apprehended by them that Mahomet had ſent againſt him: and ſo being brought to Mahomet to SERRAS, was there in the market place before a tauerne dore, faire hanged, without any farther harme.

Mahomet in the ſhort time of his raigne finiſhed the great Mahometane temple at HADRIANOPLE, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Muſa. Where he alſo built a princely pallace, the ſeat of the Turkiſh kings in EUROPE, vntill the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE. Hee alſo built another temple, with a moſt ſumptuous abbey, and a publicke ſchoole thereto adjoyning, endowing the ſame with great reuenewes, ſuch as had by him and thoſe his brethren of late been taken from the Chriſtians. He gaue alſo great ſummes of money, yearely to be paid at MEDINA and MECHA, for the releeſe of poore pilgrims trauelling from far to the ſepulchre of their great prophet Mahomet, at MEDINA, or his temple at MECHA.

Shortly after Mahomet fell ſicke at HADRIANOPLE, and perceiuing himſelfe in danger of death, by his laſt will appointed his eldeſt ſonne Amurath to ſucceed him in his kingdome; and ſent Eluan-beg (a man in great fauour with him) in poſt to AMASIA, to will him with all ſpeed to repaire to the court at HADRIANOPLE. But feeling death to approch, and that hee could not poſsibly liue vntill the comming of his ſonne, he ſtraightly charged his Baſſaes with all ſecrecie to conceale his death, vntill his comming, for feare leaſt any trouble ſhould ariſe vpon the bruit thereof, before his comming thither. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, he departed out of this world vnto his prophet Mahomet, about the yeare of our Sauiour Chriſt 1422, when hee had raigned ſeuenteene yeares: accounting in his raigne that troubleſome ten yeares next after the captiuitie of Bataʒet, in which time the Turkes kingdome was by his ambitious ſonnes rent in ſunſunder(as is aforeſaid) vntill it was at length againe by this Mahomet reſtored vnto the former integritie,about 7 yeares before his death,which the Turks account for the whole time of his raign: and the other troubleſome 10 yeares as a vacancie or Anarchie of their kingdome,as is aforeſaid.

The death of Mahomet cunningly concealed from the Ianizaries, by the three great Baſſaes.

Mahomet being dead,the three great Baſſaes,Eiuaſes,Baiazet,and Ibrahim (to rid themſelues of the feare they had of the Ianizaries,and other ſouldiors of the court) called a Diuano or counſell for the warres,as if the king had been aliue: wherein it was pretended,That Mahomet had determined to make warre vpon the prince of SMYRNA: and that for that ſeruice it was his pleaſure, That the Ianizaries ſhould forthwith paſſe ouer into ASIA, to the caſtle of BAGA. Whereupon preſſe money was preſently giuen them,and they ſent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of ANATOLIA,for the aſſembling of an armie for BAGA. In the meane time,the great Baſſaes of the court ſat daily in counſell, placing and diſplacing, promoting and diſgracing whome they thought good,as if the king had ſo commaunded: The kings phyſicians alſo,to countenance the matter,were commanded continually to go too and fro with their potions and receits,after their wonted manner, as if they had had the king ſtill in cure: And letters were ſent in poſt to Eluan Beg, for ſpeedie diſpatch of the buſineſſe for which he was ſent into ASIA. Yet for all this cunning diſsimulation,the pentioners,and other ſouldiours of the court, wont to be neere vnto the kings perſon,and ſome of them alwaies of the priuie chamber, began to ſuſpect the matter: and comming to the Baſſaes, ſaid they maruailed that the king in ſo long time did neuer ſhew himſelfe as he had alwaies before done. Whereunto the Baſſaes anſwered, That he had been dangerouſly ſicke,and was as yet but a little recouered,and that therefore the phyſicians would not ſuffer him to looke abroad,or take the aire,for feare of caſting him downe againe. Then will wee our ſelues ſaid the pentioners goe in and ſee his majeſtie, and with that were readie to force in vpon the Baſſaes. Eiuaſes ſeeing their importunitie,deſired them to hold themſelues contented, and not as then to trouble the king, for that hee had that day, as hee ſaid,taken phyſicke; but to morrow(ſaid he)we will requeſt his majeſtie, if he ſo pleaſe to ſhew himſelfe, that you may ſee him: wherewith they for that time held themſelues content. Now amongſt the kings phyſicians there was one Geordiron,a Perſian,a man of a quicke ſpirit and ſubtill deuiſe, which found means to deceiue the pentioners: he deuiſed, that the dead bodie of the king being apparrelled in royall large robes,ſhould be brought betwixt two,as if he had been led into an high open gallerie; and being there ſet,to haue a boy ſo neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes,as that he vnperceiued,might moue the kings hand vp to his head, as if he ſhould ſtroke his face or beard, as his manner was. The next day the dead king being accordingly brought foorth by the Baſſaes in his rich robes,and wrapped with clothes about his head,as if it had been for feare of the aire,or of taking cold, and ſo placed in an high open gallerie,as was before deuiſed: ſuddainely the phyſician came running in fuming and raging,as if he had been halfe mad,readie to teare his clothes for anger; and in great choller caſting his cap againſt the ground,asked the Baſſaes,if they meant to kill the king,by bringing him into the open aire? We (ſaid he) haue with great pains, in long time,a little recouered him,and will you thus fooliſhly caſt him downe againe? Pardon vs good doctor (ſaid Eiuaſes) for theſe gentlemen (pointing to the pentioners) were ſo importunat to ſee his majeſtie,that to ſatisfie their deſires,he was content to be led forth of his chamber: whereof we hope ſhall enſue no harme. The pentioners ſeeing the king many times moouing his hand to his face, and as it were ſtroking his beard,held themſelues well contented, ſuppoſing him to haue beene aliue,although but weake,and therefore not willing to ſpeake vnto them. The phyſicians taking him vp amongſt them, carried him into his lodging againe, which was but faſt by,making as if they had carried an extreame ſicke man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and fortie daies,vntill the comming of Amurath his ſonne.

This Mahomet was both wiſe and valiant, and withall exceeding bountifull,but ambitious aboue meaſure: and may of right be accounted the reſtorer of the Turkes kingdome; for he recouered againe all thoſe countries in ASIA which Tamerlane had taken away and giuen vnto other Mahometane princes,after the ouerthrow of Baiazet. And when as the kingdome of the Turkes was rent in peeces and almoſt brought to naught by ciuile wars,and the ambition of himſelfe and his brethren; he at length got poſſeſsion of the whole,and ſo left it to his ſonne Amurath an entire kingdome,in the former greatneſſe,althogh not much by him augmented. His bodie lieth buried in a faire tombe made of artificiall ſtone,very beautifull to behold,in a chappell at the Eaſt ſide of PRUSA,where we leaue him at his reſt.

Europam luctu & funeſtis cladibus implens
Sæuus Amurathes totus in arma ruit.
Maior at Huniades virtute & fortibus auſis,
Cogit eum trepida vertere terga fuga.
Conſilia Eugenij bellum furialia ſuadent, Sacrorum antiſtes Martia ad arma ruit:
(Arma viri tractent, curet ſua templa ſacerdos)
Europæ exitium res tulit iſta graue.

Fierce Amurath doth EUROPE fill with blood and wofull cries:
And wholie giuen to martiall deeds, doth whole in armes ariſe.
But yet Huniades (than he, of greater ſtrength and might) Enforced him right fearefully to turne his backe in flight.
Eugenius his infernall ſpels, ſtirs vp a fatall jarre:
Who hauing charge of ſacred rites, runs headlong into warre.
(Leaue martiall deeds to martiall men, and let the prieſt goe praie)
Such diueliſh councell, worſe receiu'd, wrought EUROPS great decaie.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TVRKES, AND THE GREAT ESTABLISHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

AFter that the death of Mahomet had been politiquely concealed one and fortie daies by the three great Baſſaes, Baiazet, Etuaſes, and Ibrahim: Amurath or Murat (as the Turkes call him) his eldeſt ſonne, at that time comming to PRUSA, was by them placed in his fathers ſeat, and the death of Mahomet at the ſame time publiſhed: whereupon great troubles began on euerie ſide to ariſe.

Murat is the ſame that we call Deſiderius.

The princes of SMYRNA and MENTESIA roſe vp in armes: and at THESSALONICA an obſcure fellow, crept as it were out of a chimneys corner, tooke vpon him the name and perſon of Muſtapha, the ſonne of Baiazet, which was ſlaine many yeares before, in the great battaile againſt Tamerlane at mount STELLA, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Baiazet. This counterfait Muſtapha animated by the Grecian princes, and going from THESSALONICA to VARDARIUM, ſet ſo good a countenance vpon the matter, with ſuch a grace and majeſtie, that not onely the countrey people (apt to beleeue any thing) but men of greater place and calling alſo, as Tzunites Beg, the prince of SMYRNA his ſonne, with the ſonnes of old Eurenoſes Baſſa, perſuaded that he was the verie ſon of the great Baiazet, repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall prince and ſoueraigne. From VARDARIUM he went to SERRÆ, and from thence to HADRIANOPLE, (Amurath being as then at PRUSA) where he was receiued as if it had been that noble prince Muſtapha, whom hee feigned himſelfe to be: ſo that in ſhort time he was honoured as a king in all parts of the Turkiſh kingdome in EUROPE.

Muſtapha the ſuppoſed ſonne of Baiazet raiſeth rebellion againſt Amurath.

Amurath to repreſſe this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion, ſent Baiazet Baſſa, a man of great authoritie in his court, with a ſtrong armie into EUROPE. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer HELLESPONTUS, found all the countrey reuolted vnto their new found king Muſtapha: but marching on towards HADRIANOPLE, with purpoſe to haue giuen him battaile, he was firſt forſaken of the Europeian ſouldiours, which he brought out of ASIA, and afterwards of all the reſt alſo: and ſo being left poſt alone, with his brother Hamze Beg, was for ſafegard of his life glad to yeeld himſelfe to Muſtapha; of whom he was gratiouſly entertained, and vpon promiſe of his loialtie, ſworne one of his priuie counſaile.

Muſtapha thus now poſſeſſed of the Turkiſh kingdome in EUROPE, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintaine his credit, leauied a great armie to make war vpon Amurath in ASIA. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call SASLIDERE, or the place of Willows, his other counſailors repining at the great honor he gaue to Baiazet Baſſa, aduiſed him to beware that he truſted him not too farre, of whoſe ſmall faith he had ſufficient triall alreadie, and was like ynough when occaſion ſhould ſerue, to reuolt from him to Amurath, and to draw after him ſome great part of his armie, to the great perill both of himſelfe and all them his faithfull ſeruants and followers. Vpon which jealous conceit, this great Baſſa Baiazet was there forthwith as a traitour apprehended, and without further triall executed: at which time his brother Hamze was with much adoe ſpared. This done, Muſtapha proceeded on his journey, and paſſed ouer with his armie at CALLIPOLIS into ASIA. Amurath vnderstanding of the proceedings of Mustapha in EUROPE, and of his preparation made for his inuasion of ASIA, created three new Bassaes, Omer, Vruge, and Alis, all three the sonnes of Temurtases; these he joyned with his old Bassaes, Ibrahim and Etuases. All these fiue he vsed as councellours for the wars, by whose aduice he sent for Mahomet Beg, surnamed Michaell Ogli, who in the time that Musa raigned, was vice-roy in EUROPE, and therefore a man well knowne to most principall men in Mustapha his armie, but had been kept prisoner in the castle of AMASIA, from the time that Musa was deposed and put to death by his brother Mahomet, vntill now that hee was after eight yeares imprisonment, for this speciall purpose inlarged and receiued into fauour.

About the same time that Mustapha set footing in ASIA, Amurath hauing gathered his armie, set forward from PRUSA to meet him; yet with such distrust in his forces, which were thought to be much inferiour to the Europian souldiours which followed Mustapha, that hee was glad vpon a superstitious opinion or zeale, to prostrate himselfe at the feet of an Emir (one of the false prophet Mahomets posteritie) to receiue at his hipocritall hands a graceless blessing for his better speed: by whom he was made to beleeue, that after two repulses, he had with much adoe, at the third time, obtained graunt of the great prophet Mahomet, that he should preuaile in that war: and thereupon had his sword girt vnto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vaine and superstitious ceremonies. Yet for all these charmes, hee marched on with his armie in feare enough, vntill he came to the riuer of VLIBAD, (otherwise called RINDACUS:) where hauing intelligence of the approch of Mustapha, he for feare caused the bridge ouer the riuer there to be broken downe, and encamped himselfe on that side the riuer. Not long after came Mustapha, and finding the bridge broken, encamped at the foot therof on the other side: so that nothing parted the two armies but the breadth of the riuer onely. Whilest they lay thus neere encamped together, that the souldiours might on both sides take the full view one of another, and also talke together: Mahomet-beg surnamed Michael Ogli, but lately deliuered out of his long imprisonment (as is aforesaid) came to the riuer side, and with a loud voice called by name vpon the great captaines, and old souldiours that were in Mustapha his armie; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance: many of them being there present, rejoycing to see that honourable man (whom they supposed to haue been dead in prison many yeares before) came gladly to the side of the riuer to heare what he could say.

Then with a loud voice he began to persuade them, that the man whom they followed was not the honourable Mustapha, but some base high minded fellow, set vp by the Grecians, abusing the obscuritie of his birth, as the vaile vnder the couert whereof, hee went craftily about to intrude himselfe into the honourable discent of Baiazet; and so masking in the counterfait titles of stolen honor, had misled them from their dutie to their naturall king and soueraigne, to follow him a meere deceiuer. And further assured them, that Mustapha, Baiazet his sonne, was dead and buried in the bed of fame, two and twentie yeares before; honourably ending his daies in defence of his countrey, in the great battaile of mount STELLA, against Tamerlane: Wherefore they should doe well, to forsake that supposed Mustapha, and againe to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vndoubted soueraigne Amurath. These words deliuered vnto them by Mahomet, whom they generally both reuerenced, and trusted; wrought such effect in their minds, that some presently aduentured to swimme ouer the riuer, and joyned themselues vnto him: and many others that staied still, began now to doubt, least they had worshipped a wrong saint. At the same time also, Eiuases Bassa, to terrifie Mustapha, sent vnto him letters as in great secret, aduertising him, That Amurath had the next night purposed with his armie to passe ouer the riuer aboue the broken bridge; at which time the chiefe captaines of his armie being (as hee said) corrupted, had promised to deliuer Mustapha into his hands, and with his head to pay the ransome of them all. This he coloured with such faire glosses, that Mustapha partly beleeued the same. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eiuases with certain troupes of horsemen, passed ouer the riuer, at the verie same place hee had in his letters named; and that with such a noise and tumult, as Amurath with his whole armie had been comming. Mustapha seeing things begin thus to worke, according as Eiuases Bassa had before written: and with this, doubting also to be presently betraied, and carying about him a guiltie conscience, the mother of feare and distrust, tooke horse (slenderly accompanied, but with ten persons of his whole armie) and fled in haste, no man pursuing them, vntill he came to the riuer of BOGA, and there with a great summe of money obtained paſſage, by corrupting the captaine that dwelt in the caſtle vpon the paſſage of the riuer: and the third day after paſsing ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTUS, landed at CALLIPOLIS. The flight of Muſtapha once knowne in his armie, they all yeelded themſelues to Eiuaſes Baſſa: who taking poſſeſsion of Muſtapha his tent, cauſed the broken bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath paſsing with his armie, joyned himſelfe with Eiuaſes. The other Baſſa (Ibrahim) counſailed Amurath to put to ſword all thoſe rebels that had followed Muſtapha: but by the mediation of Eiuaſes, to whome they had yeelded themſelues, they were generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from VLIBAD or LOPADIUM, came to BOGA, and there hanged vp the captaine that had giuen Muſtapha paſſage. From thence he held on his way to LAMPSACUM, intending to purſue Muſtapha into EUROPE: but being come to the ſea ſide, hee could find no paſſage, for that Muſtapha had cauſed all the ſhipping on that ſide, to bee brought ouer into EUROE. Yet at laſt Amurath by good fortune chaunced vpon a great Genoway ſhip, which hee hired for foure thouſand duckats to tranſport his armie, and ſo with much adoe, at length landed in EUROPE. Muſtapha ſeeing that Amurath was now come ouer, fled to HADRIANOPLE, where he found ſuch cold welcome, that fearing to bee betraied hee was glad to ſpeed himſelfe thence, thinking all the world to little to hide himſelfe in: and ſo came to an obſcure place in the countrey of the Turks called KISUL-AGATZ-GENITZE: where, the ſouldiours ſent to purſue him, ouertook him, and brought him bound to Amurath then being at HADRIANOPLE: by whoſe commaundement he was ſhamefully hanged, from the battlements of one of the higheſt towers of the citie, and there left to the worlds wonder. Muſtapha hanged.

This Muſtapha, is of ſome writers reported to haue been indeed the ſonne of the great Sultan Baiazet, and that he was kept in priſon all that long time, and thus at length ſet vp by the Greeks to trouble the ſtate of the Turkiſh kingdome: but the Turkiſh hiſtories report as before, calling him Duſme or counterfait Muſtapha. And it is verie likely, that if he had been one of the ſonnes of Baiazet, he would haue found ſome meanes to haue made ſome great ſtirre long before that, as all the reſt of the vnquiet brood of Baiazet did, which neuer reſted vntil they had like the earth borne brethren one deſtroied the other: beſides that, their bloodie natures conſidered, it is verie like that Mahomet his younger brother, who raigned in HADRIANOPLE almoſt eight yeares, and was in league all that time with the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, would for his more ſafetie haue got him into his owne power, if hee had been in priſon with the emperour; or elſe haue diſpatched him, if he had been in priſon with himſelfe. All which I am the rather perſuaded to thinke, for that Orchanes (a child, the ſon of Solyman) could find no ſafe place of abode at CONSTANTINOPLE in the raigne of Mahomet; but flying, was apprehended and his eies put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet: much leſſe is it like that Muſtapha, being a warlike prince, and his elder brother, could haue been ſo long preſerued and kept in priſon from his furie.

It fortuned in theſe late broiles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like caſe) diuers of the rebels Aſapi, or common ſouldiors (whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled and armed like the Ianizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull guard; whoſe liues indeed they ſpared, but vſing them with all the deſpight and indignities poſsible. Amongſt the reſt, one of the Ianizaries being an hungred, brought two of theſe Aſapi his priſoners vnto a cookes ſhop, offering to ſell them vnto him for a little victuall: which the cooke refuſed to giue him, as hauing no vſe for ſuch vnneceſſarie ſeruants. Wherewith the proud Ianizarie enraged, ſwore many a great oath, preſently to cut off their heads, & to giue them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeeme them. And like ynough he was to haue ſo done, had not the cooke, moued with pitie, offered him for them both a ſheepes head: which the Ianizarie tooke for them, ſwearing, That the cooke had giuen for thē more than indeed they were worth. Which diſgrace, ſo long ſince done vnto theſe Aſapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the matterfull and inſolent Ianizaries, obiected vnto the whole bodie of the Aſapi (the greateſt part of the Turks huge armies) of whom for all that the proud Ianizaries make ſmall reckoning, accounting them ſcarcely for men, & in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a ſodden ſheepes head. Two Aſapi ſold by a Ianizarie for a ſheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raiſed by the counterfeit Muſtapha, both in EUROPE and ASIA; was yet not a little grieued, to thinke how the ſame had to the great hazard of his eſtate, beene firſt plotted by the Greekes, and afterwards Conſtantinople in vain beſieged by Amurath.

ouer with his armie at CALLIPOLIS into ASIA. Amurath vnderstanding of the proceedings of Mustapha in EUROPE, and of his preparation made for his inuasion of ASIA, created three new Bassaes, Omer, Vruge, and Alis, all three the sonnes of Temurtases; these he joyned with his old Bassaes, Ibrahim and Eiuases. Amurath departing from VLIBAD or LOPADIUM, came to BOGA, and there hanged vp the captaine that had giuen Muſtapha paſſage. From thence he held on his way to LAMPSACUM, intending to purſue Muſtapha into EUROPE: but being come to the ſea ſide, hee could find no paſſage, for that Muſtapha had cauſed all the ſhipping on that ſide, to bee brought ouer into EUROPE. Yet at laſt Amurath by good fortune chaunced vpon a great Genoway ſhip, which hee hired for foure thouſand duckats to tranſport his armie, and ſo with much adoe, at length landed in EUROPE. Muſtapha ſeeing that Amurath was now come ouer, fled to HADRIANOPLE, where he found ſuch cold welcome, that fearing to bee betraied hee was glad to ſpeed himſelfe thence, thinking all the world to little to hide himſelfe in: and ſo came to an obſcure place in the countrey of the Turks called KISUL-AGATZ-GENITZE: where, the ſouldiours ſent to purſue him, ouertook him, and brought him bound to Amurath then being at HADRIANOPLE: by whoſe commaundement he was ſhamefully hanged, from the battlements of one of the higheſt towers of the citie, and there left to the worlds wonder. Muſtapha hanged.

This Muſtapha, is of ſome writers reported to haue been indeed the ſonne of the great Sultan Baiazet, and that he was kept in priſon all that long time, and thus at length ſet vp by the Greeks to trouble the ſtate of the Turkiſh kingdome: but the Turkiſh hiſtories report as before, calling him Duſme or counterfait Muſtapha. And it is verie likely, that if he had been one of the ſonnes of Baiazet, he would haue found ſome meanes to haue made ſome great ſtirre long before that, as all the reſt of the vnquiet brood of Baiazet did, which neuer reſted vntil they had like the earth borne brethren one deſtroied the other: beſides that, their bloodie natures conſidered, it is verie like that Mahomet his younger brother, who raigned in HADRIANOPLE almoſt eight yeares, and was in league all that time with the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, would for his more ſafetie haue got him into his owne power, if hee had been in priſon with the emperour; or elſe haue diſpatched him, if he had been in priſon with himſelfe. All which I am the rather perſuaded to thinke, for that Orchanes (a child, the ſon of Solyman) could find no ſafe place of abode at CONSTANTINOPLE in the raigne of Mahomet; but flying, was apprehended and his eies put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet: much leſſe is it like that Muſtapha, being a warlike prince, and his elder brother, could haue been ſo long preſerued and kept in priſon from his furie.

It fortuned in theſe late broiles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like caſe) diuers of the rebels Aſapi, or common ſouldiors (whom he for his greater countenance had apparrelled and armed like the Ianizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull guard; whoſe liues indeed they ſpared, but vſing them with all the deſpight and indignities poſsible. Amongſt the reſt, one of the Ianizaries being an hungred, brought two of theſe Aſapi his priſoners vnto a cookes ſhop, offering to ſell them vnto him for a little victuall: which the cooke refuſed to giue him, as hauing no vſe for ſuch vnneceſſarie ſeruants. Wherewith the proud Ianizarie enraged, ſwore many a great oath, preſently to cut off their heads, & to giue them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeeme them. And like ynough he was to haue ſo done, had not the cooke, moued with pitie, offered him for them both a ſheepes head: which the Ianizarie tooke for them, ſwearing, That the cooke had giuen for thē more than indeed they were worth. Which diſgrace, ſo long ſince done vnto theſe Aſapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the matterfull and inſolent Ianizaries, objected vnto the whole bodie of the Aſapi (the greateſt part of the Turks huge armies) of whom for all that the proud Ianizaries make ſmall reckoning, accounting them ſcarcely for men, & in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a ſodden ſheepes head. Two Aſapi ſold by a Ianizarie for a ſheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raiſed by the counterfeit Muſtapha, both in EUROPE and ASIA; was yet not a little grieued, to thinke how the ſame had to the great hazard of his eſtate, beene firſt plotted by the Greekes, and afterwards Conſtantinople in vain beſieged by Amurath.

wards countenanced by the Greeke emperour, of whom he thought now to be reuenged. And therefore sending before him Michael Ogli, his lieutenant generall in EUROPE, with his European souldiors to inuade the countrey about CONSTANTINOPLE, followed himselfe after with the Ianizaries and his Asian forces: and encamping before the cittie, filled all that necke of land which lieth before it, from sea to sea. And so encamped, began right furiously to batter the wals, in hope so to haue made a breach, and by the same to haue entered the cittie: but finding the wals of greater strength than hee had before supposed, and the defendants still repairing whatsoeuer the furie of his artillerie had beaten downe or shaken, hee ceased his batterie, and comming on with all his forces, desperately attempted by assault to haue gained the citie: wherein his fortune was not answerable to his desire. For approching the cittie, with arrowes, as showers falling vpon the defendants, and scaling ladders in the mean time clapt vp to the wals, and the Ianizaries with others of his best souldiors courageously mounting the same; they were by the defendants notably repulsed and beaten downe, loosing some their hands, some their armes, some their heads, but most their liues, no shot falling in vaine from the wals. Which Amurath beholding, and grieued to see (though vnwilling) commaunded a retreat to be sounded, and the assault to cease: and shortly after seeing no hope to preuaile, in great rage raised his siege and departed. Vnto whom for all that the Greeke emperour not long after sent his embassadours, to entreat with him for peace; whereof he would by no meanes heare, but proudly threatened to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged. Which caused the Greeke emperour to deuise what he might for the troubling of his estate, so to keepe him otherwise busied: as he did shortly after with the Caramanian king, by countenancing another Mustapha (surnamed Cutzug or the little) Amurath his younger brother, against him, to the raising of new stirres, and Amurath his no small trouble.

Mahomet the late king had fiue sonnes and seuen daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldest, and succeeded in his fathers kingdome; Mustapha the second, surnamed the little; Achmetes the third, who died before his father: the other two, Iosephus & Machmutes, both died of the plague, being but children, after the death of their father. Three of their sisters were married to the three sonnes of the king of CARAMANIA, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Isa: other two were bestowed vpon the sonnes of the prince Isfendiar, Ibrahim, and Casimes: the sixt was giuen in mariage to Cozza-Beg, viceroy in ANATOLIA; and the seuenth to the sonne of Ibrahim Bassa, who died at MECHA, whither she went vpon superstitious deuotion on pilgrimage.

At such time as Amurath was busied in his warres in EUROPE against Mustapha, the supposed sonne of Baiazet: the younger sonne of Mahomet (called also Mustapha) being but thirteene years old, and Amurath his brother indeed, was set vp to raise new troubles, by the king of CARAMANIA, and other princes, as well Mahometans, as the Christian princes of GRECIA; who thought it good pollicie, by that meanes to impeach the greatnesse of Amurath. This young prince Mustapha, strengthened with the forces of his friends, entered into his brothers dominions in ASIA, and besieged NICE, which was at length yeelded vnto him. Amurath aduertised of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promises corrupted Ilias Beg, the young princes tutor, to betray the prince into his hands. Whereupon Amurath with great celeritie set forward with his armie from HADRIANOPLE, and in nine daies came to NICE, where he entered the cittie with small resistance, as was to him before promised, where Mustapha was by his false tutor to him presented: who because he would not spill one drop of the sacred Othoman blood (as the Turks call it) commaunded the executioner presently to strangle him with a bow string; which was done accordingly, and his bodie afterwards buried by his father at PRUSA.

Mustapha betraied & strangled.

Amurath hauing suppressed these two rebellions, and now out of all feare of any competitor, thought his fiue counsellers too many by three, and therefore remoued the three Bassaes, Omur, Vrutzi, and Alis (the sonnes of Temurtases) into honorable places; retaining of his counsell, onely the two old Bassaes, Ibrahim and Eiuases. But shortly after, Eiuases was secretly accused to Amurath, That he sought by his fauorits, the souldiors of the court, to aspire vnto the kingdome himselfe, and to depose the king; and that intending some such matter, hee did vsually weare a priuie coat. This suspicious report troubled the jealous tyrant: wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eiuases, he cast his arme about him, as if it had beene in kindnesse: but finding him secretly armed, would needes know the cause thereof: whereunto Eiuases answered, That it was for feare of some enemies hee had in the court: but this excuse could by no meanes serue his turne: wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the commaundement of Amurath, and both his eyes eyes burnt out with a hot ſteele glaſſe.

Whileſt Amurath was thus buſied in ſubduing rebellions at home, Muhamethes the Caramanian king beſieged ATTALIA, a great cittie in PAMPHILIA, by the ſpace of ſix moneths, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-beg, Amurath his lieutenant there: at which ſiege the vnfortunat king himſelfe, as he was taking view of the citie, was ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the citie: whereupon Ibrahim, which ſucceeded him in the kingdome, brake vp the ſiege, & returned home to burie his father. At this time alſo, Dracula prince of VALACAIA, paſsing ouer DANUBIUS, did the Turks much harme about SILISTRA, but was afterwards enforced to ſubmit himſelfe to Amurath, and become his tributarie. The king of Caramania ſlaine.

About this time alſo Tzunites, the prince of SMYRNA, which had before aided the rebell Muſtapha, did by all meanes he could vex and moleſt Iaxis-beg, (Amurath his lieutenant in AIDINIA) & hauing by chance taken his brother priſoner, put him to death. This prince of SMYRNA was deſcended of the antient princes of AIDINIA, and therefore pretended an intereſt in that ſiegnorie: which his claime the people of the countrey ſecretly fauoured, ſo farre as they durſt for feare of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harmes that this prince of SMYRNA did, commaunded Hamze-beg, viceroy of ANATOLIA, with all his power to make warre vpon him. The viceroy without delay aſſembled a great armie, and inuaded the princes countrey: and the prince being well prouided for his comming, meeting him vpon the way, gaue him battaile: wherein Haſan the princes ſonne, leading a great part of his fathers armie, had put one part of the Turkes armie to flight: and purſuing them with too much furie, left his father at the ſame time ſo hardly beſet by the viceroy, that he was glad to flie to his caſtle of HIPSILY faſt by. Haſan returning from the chace of the enemie, not knowing what had happened to his father, was by the Turkes in his returne ouercome and taken priſoner. After which victorie the viceroy preſently laid ſiege to the caſtle wherein the prince was. This ſiege continued a great while: at length, the prince brought to extremitie, was content to yeeld himſelfe vnto the viceroy, vpon condition he ſhould vſe no violence againſt the perſon of himſelfe or his ſonne, but to ſend them priſoners vnto Amurath: which thing the viceroy by ſolemne oath promiſed, whereupon the prince came out of the caſtle, and yeelded himſelfe priſoner to the viceroy. Iaxis-beg, whoſe brother the prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the viceroy to his tent, where finding Haſan the princes ſonne ſitting vpon the ground, as the manner of the Turkes is, tooke him by the choller with great furie, and drawing him along to the feet of the prince his father, there moſt cruelly ſtrucke off his head: and in the ſame rage laying his bloodie hands vpon the aged prince, ſtrucke off his head alſo; to the great diſhonour of the viceroy, who had before giuen his faith for their ſafetie. The heads of the prince and his ſonne were ſet vpon two launces, within the ſight of the caſtle; which the defendants ſeeing, and now deſpairing of all reſcue, yeelded themſelues, with the caſtle. This infortunat Tzunites was the laſt prince of SMYRNA, after whoſe death all his territorie was vnited to the Othoman kingdome. After all theſe troubles, Amurath with great triumph married the daughter of the prince Iſfendiar.

Amurath hauing laied vp in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian princes had done, in giuing aid to the rebels aforeſaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong: and for that purpoſe gathered a great armie, wherewith he ranged at his pleaſure through MACEDONIA, vntill he came to THESSALONICA, ſurpriſing by the way diuers cities and caſtles, at that time belonging to the Conſtantinopolitane empire. This famous cittie of THESSALONICA, now called SALONICHI, for beautie and wealth ſometime not inferiour to any of the greateſt and moſt renowned cities of GRECIA, is ſituate vpon the borders of MACEDONIA, cloſe vnto a bay of the ARCHIPELAGO or the ſea ÆGEUM: which bay was in auntient time called THERMAICUS-SINUS, and now the bay of SALONICHI. To the Chriſtian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrote two Epiſtles, in the latter whereof, hee forewarneth them of a great defection to come before the latter day. Before this Chriſtian cittie, then in the protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great armie of misbeleeuing Turkes; and laied hard ſiege to it, with moſt terrible batterie: at which time hee by ſecret meanes corrupted certaine of the wicked cittizens, to haue betrayed the cittie by a ſecret mine, and to haue let him in: which treaſon was by the Venetian gouernors perceiued, and the plotters therof for ſafegard of their liues glad to leape ouer the wals, and to flie into the Turks campe. Theſſalonica beſieged.

Amurath hauing greatly battered the wals of the cittie, the more to encourage his ſouldiors, promiſed

promiſed to giue them all the ſpoile thereof, if they could by force winne it. The greedie deſire of this rich prey, wherein euerie common ſouldior promiſed vnto himſelfe whatſoeuer his fooliſh fancie or vnbrideled affection could deſire, ſo inflamed the minds of theſe barbarous ſouldiors, and eſpecially of the Ianizaries, that giuing a moſt terrible aſſault to the citie, they by force entred the ſame, and wan it. The Venetian ſouldiors fled to their gallies, lying at anchor in the hauen, and ſo got to ſea: but the infinite miſeries which the poore Chriſtian citizens indured in the furie of that barbarous nation, no tongue is able to expreſſe, or pen diſcribe: Death was leſſe paine than the ignominious outrages and vnſpeakeable villanies which many good Chriſtians there ſuffered, heartily wiſhing to die, and could not; and yet the furious enemies ſword deuoured all the people without reſpect of age or ſex, except ſuch as for ſtength of bodie, or comelineſſe of perſon, were reſerued for painefull labour or beaſtly luſt; which poore ſoules were afterwards diſperſed into moſt miſerable ſeruitude and ſlauerie, through all parts of the Turkiſh kingdome. The infinite riches of that famous cittie, became a ſpoile vnto the barbarous ſouldiours; the goodly houſes were left deſolate, void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull citie of THESSALONICA, ſometime one of the moſt glorious ornaments of GRÆCIA, the late pleaſant dwelling place of many rich Chriſtians, was by the tyrant giuen for an habitation to ſuch baſe Turkes, as at their pleaſure repaired thether to ſeat themſelues, and ſo is by them at this day poſſeſſed. This calamitie happened to THESALONICA in the yeare of our Lord 1432.

Theſſalonica take by Amurath.

THESALONICA being thus taken, Amurath returned to HADRIANOPLE himſelfe, and at the ſame time ſent Caratze with the greateſt part of his armie into ÆTOLIA. Charles prince of that countrey, dying a little before the comming of Amurath to THESALONICA, and hauing no lawfull iſſue, had diuided the countrey of ACHARNANIA amongſt his three baſe ſons, Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules, leauing all the reſt of his dominion to his brothers ſonne, called alſo Charles. But ſhortly after, ſuch diſcord fell among theſe brethren, that Amurath ſending his Turks to aid one of them againſt the other, as he was by them requeſted, in fine brought all that countrey of ÆTOLIA into ſubjection to himſelfe, leauing nothing for the fooliſh brethren to ſtriue for, more than the bare titles of imaginatiue honour. The other Græcian princes of ATHENS, PHOCIS, BOETIA, and all the reſt of GRÆCIA, vnto the ſtrait of CORINTH, terrified by their neighbours harmes, were glad to ſubmit themſelues to the barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkiſh tirant; vnder which ſlauerie they of long time moſt miſerably liued, if intollerable ſlauerie joyned with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians loſt their libertie, (which their aunceſtors had many times before, to their immortall praiſe, worthily defended againſt the greateſt monarchs of the world) and are now ſo degenerate, by the meanes of the Turkiſh oppreſsion, that in all GRÆCIA is hardly to be found any ſmall remembrance of the ancient glory thereof: inſomuch that wheras they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in compariſon of themſelues, they are now become no leſſe barbarous than thoſe rude nations whom they before ſcorned. Which miſerie with a thouſand more, they may juſtly impute to their owne ambition and diſcord.

At this time amongſt the diſtreſſed princes of MACEDONIA, and GRÆCIA, one Iohn Caſtriot raigned in EPIRUS: who ſeeing how mightily the Turke preuailed againſt the princes his neighbours, and conſidering that hee was not able by any meanes to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie; to obtaine peace, he was glad to deliuer into Amurath his poſſeſsion, his foure ſonnes, Staniſius, Repoſius, Conſtantine, and George, for hoſtages: whom Amurath faithfully promiſed, well and honourably to intreat. But aſſoone as he had got them within his reach, he falſified his faith, and cauſed them to be circumciſed after the Turkiſh manner, and to bee inſtructed in the Turkiſh ſuperſtition, to the great griefe of their Chriſtian parents: and afterwards, when he vnderſtood of the death of Iohn Caſtriot their father, hee poiſoned all the three elder brethren: And by Sebalie (one of his great captaines) ceized vpon CROIA, his cheefe citie, and all the reſt of his territories, as if they had by good right deuolued vnto him. But George the youngeſt, whom the Turks named Scander-beg or lord Alexander, for his excellent feature, and pregnant wit, he alwaies entirely loued, and as ſome thought, more paſsionatly than he ſhould haue loued a boy. Him he cauſed to be diligently inſtructed in all kind of actiuitie, and feats of warre, wherin he excelled al other his equals in Amurath his court; and riſing by many degrees of honor, came at laſt (being yet but verie yong) to be a great Sanzack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times

appointed by Amurath to be generall of his armies; in which ſeruice hee ſo behaued himſelfe, that he got the loue of all that knew him, and increaſed his credit with Amurath: vntill at laſt he found oportunitie by great policie and courage, to deliuer both himſelfe and his natiue countrie, from the horrible ſlauerie of the Turkiſh tyrannie, as ſhall be afterwards declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus daunted the princes of GRECIA, he turned his forces into SERVIA: but the prince of SERVIA vnable to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie, to procure his fauour, ſent embaſſadours, offering to pay him a yeerely tribute, and to doe further what he ſhould reaſonably demaund. Amurath beſide the yeerely tribute, required to haue Marie (this princes faire daughter) in mariage; and that he ſhould not ſuffer the Hungarians to paſſe through his countrey to inuade him; and further, not at any time to denie paſſage vnto the Turkiſh armie, when he ſhould ſend forth the ſame for the inuaſion of the kingdome of BOSNA. All which vnreaſonable conditions the prince was glad to agree vnto, and ſent his faire daughter by Saratze, who was afterwards maried to Amurath.

About this time, Ioſephus and Machmutes, Amurath his brethren, and Orchanes the ſonne of Solyman, who had his eies put out by his vncle Mahomet, with many other men of great account among the Turks, died of the plague at PRUSA. Plague among the Turks.

Whileſt Amurath was thus buſied in his wars in EUROPE, the king of CARAMANIA his brother in law, inuaded his dominions in ASIA: for ſo it was agreed betweene the Chriſtian princes of EUROPE, and the Mahometan princes of ASIA, to whom the greatneſſe of the Othoman kingdome was now become dreadfull, That whenſoeuer hee inuaded the Chriſtians in EUROPE, the Mahometan princes ſhould inuade his countries in ASIA; and that whenſoeuer hee ſhould turne his forces into ASIA, the Chriſtian princes ſhould ſpoile his countries in EUROPE. Againſt this Caramanian king, Amurath tranſported his armie into ASIA: and as he went, ſeazed vpon the countries of SARUCHANIA, MENTESIA, and other prouinces, which were before but tributaries vnto him, driuing out the poore princes before him: and ſo entred into CARAMANIA, and inforced the king ſo farre, that he was glad to agree to ſuch conditions of peace as it pleaſed him to propound vnto him, and to ſend his ſonne to wait at his court. And at the ſame time picking a quarrell with Iſfendiar prince of CASTAMONA, cauſed him to become his tributarie, and to ſend his ſonne to his court alſo. By which meanes the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in ASIA, he returned to HADRIANOPLE: and vnderſtanding that the Hungarians paſsing ouer DANUBIUS, had in his abſence made diuers incurſions into his dominions, hee was therewith greatly offended, and in reuenge thereof firſt ſent Alis Baſſa the ſonne of Eurenoſis, with an armie to inuade HUNGARIA; which he performed accordingly by the ſpace of a moneth, and returned from thence with rich bootie. Not long after, he himſelfe in perſon made another road into HUNGARIE, commanding the prince of SERVIA his father in law, to giue his armie free paſſage through his countrey, and charging Dracula prince of VALACHIA to aid him with his forces in that expedition: which his commandement both the Chriſtian princes (more for feare, than of good will) diligently performed. So Amurath hauing inriched his ſouldiors with the ſpoile taken in HUNGARIE, returned home and wintered at his court at HADRIANOPLE. Hungarie ſpoiled by Amurath.

The ſecret confederation betweene the Hungarians and the Mahometan king of CARAMANIA, was not vnſuſpected of Amurath; which he was the rather induced to beleeue, for that whēſoeuer he inuaded the one he was preſently ſet vpon by the other, either in EUROPE or in ASIA: of which plot he doubted not but that George prince of SERVIA (his father in law) was chiefe authour, although in ſhew he was therein the leaſt actor. Wherfore Amurath intending to ſpill the play, ſent for the prince his father in law to come to the court at HADRIANOPLE: but he doubting ſome Turkiſh tragedie, pretended great occaſions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fell out, fortified and manned all his ſtrong cities and caſtles by all meanes he could poſsibly, eſpecially his chiefe citie SEMENDRE (otherwiſe called SPENDEROVIA) and left therein his ſonne Gregorie (or as ſome call him, George) as gouernour; for his other ſonne Stephan was long before in Amurath his court, with the queene his ſiſter. The prince of SERVIA himſelfe went into HUNGARIE to procure from thence ſome aid, hauing there alſo himſelfe certaine territories, which he had in exchange of Sigiſmundus (late emperour and king of HUNGARIE) for the citie of BELGRADE. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the the affinitie and league hee had with the prince his father in law, entered with a great armie into SERVIA, deſtroying all before him, and hardly beſieged SEMENDRE: where, after long ſiege, the young gouernour (the princes ſonne) doubting to fall into his enemies hands by ſuddaine aſſault, yeelded himſelfe, with the citie. Which thing ſo diſcouraged the reſt of the Seruians, that in ſhort time SOPHIA, NOVOMONT, with all the reſt of the cities of SERVIA were yeelded into the power of Amurath. After which conqueſt he returned to HADRIANOPLE, and hearing that the prince of SERVIA with the Hungarians, were making head againſt him; and that the two yong Seruian princes, Gregorie and Stephen his wiues brethren, had intelligence with their father, he commaunded them both to be caſt in priſon at DIDYMOTICHVM, and their eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a braſen baſon made red hot, a cõmon vnmercifull practiſe among the Turks.

Amurath contrary to his faith inuadeth Seruia and ſubdueth it.

About this time Albertus duke of AVSTRIA hauing before maried Elizabeth the only daughter of Sigismund the emperor, and ſucceeding his father in law both in the empire and kingdome of HVNGARIE (vnto which type of higheſt honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigismund;) in the ſecond yeare of his raigne, before hee was well ſetled in thoſe new atchieued honours, died of the flix, as he was making great preparation againſt Amurath the Turkiſh king: who hauing lately driuen George prince of SERVIA and RASCIA out of his dominions, had now extended the Turkiſh kingdome euen vnto the borders of HVNGARIE. This Albertus dying, left his wife great with child. The Hungarians, in whoſe minds the remembrance of Sigismund was yet freſh, could haue beene contented to haue liued vnder the gouernment of the queene his daughter, the widdow of Albertus (then great with child;) but that the Turkiſh king was now growne ſo great, and come ſo nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by Iohn Huniades, and other of the Hungarian nobilitie, for the defence of that kingdome, not wholly to reſt vpon the deuotion of the people toward the queene, and the expectation of her iſſue, whereby they ſhould be nothing ſtrengthened: but to make choice of ſome great prince, by whoſe power they might the better defend themſelues and the kingdome againſt their dangerous enemies. Whereupon with conſent of the queene it was reſolued vpon, to make choice of Vladiſlaus, the yong king of POLONIA, then a prince of great power, but of farre greater fame and expectation: and by embaſſadors to offer vnto him the matiage of the queene, & with her the kingdome alſo. This embaſſage being ſent vnto Vladiſlaus, the matter was too and fro debated in the Polonian court, Whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to ſpeake of the inequalitie of the match, conſidering that the king was but in the prime of his youth, and the queene well ſtept into yeares; vrging farther, that nothing was offered in that match but wars; and that the Hungarians therein ſought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themſelues againſt the Turks. Others of contrarie opinion, ſaid, That the vniting of thoſe two mightie kingdoms would be to the great good of them both, and to the great honour of the king, whoſe very name would thereby become terrible vnto the Turkes: and that it were greater pollicie, by the forces of both the kingdomes, to keepe the Turkiſh king from entring into HVNGARIE, than to leaue that kingdome to him for a prey, and afterward be inforced to fight with the ſame enemie in the heart of POLONIA: and as for inequalitie of yeares betwixt the king and the queene, it was not ſo great a matter, that in regard thereof ſo honourable and commodious alliance ſhould be rejected; for as much as princes doe more regard the vertues of their choice, with the increaſe of their honour, and wealth of their kingdomes, than the Summer fruit of youth and beautie, which of it ſelfe in ſhort time doth rot and periſh, although it be neuer ſo carefully kept and preſerued: and that for as much as there can be but one king in a kingdome, ſuch choice was to be preferred of kings as had not therein the greateſt hope of many children. After long deliberation, Vladiſlaus gaue anſwere vnto the embaſſadors, That he would accept of the offers by thẽ made: whereupon ſome of them returned to make relation thereof vnto the queene, and ſome of them ſtaied behind to haſten the king forward. But whileſt theſe things was a doing, the queen in the mean time was deliuered of a faire ſon, whom ſhe cauſed to be baptized and named Ladiſlaus. After the birth of this child, the queene mooued with a motherly affection, began to repent her ſelfe, that ſhe had giuen her conſent for the calling in of the Polonian king, to the prejudice of her ſonne. And being animated by ſome of the Hungarian nobilitie (who preſuming of the good grace they were in with the queene, hoped to grow great themſelues, if they might firſt draw the gouernment of that kingdome to the queene and her young ſonne) determined now by all poſsible means to exclude the Polonian king: but the greater part of the nobilitie better conſidering what was moſt expedient Vladiſlaus accepteth of the kingdome offered.

for the preſent eſtate,and that they could neither with honor nor ſafetie flie from that which was before (for the common good) by the embaſſadours concluded; continued firme in their former reſolution,for the bringing in of Vladiſlaus: ſo that by this meanes, ſome taking part with the queene and her young ſonne,and others ſtanding faſt for Vladiſlaus, the kingdome of HUNGARIE was deuided into two factions,and as it were rent in peeces,and ſo grew to ciuile wars. The queene with ſuch as fauoured her claime, the more to gaine the minds of the common people (which are many times no leſſe carried away with ſhewes than matter) cauſed her ſonne Ladiſlaus being then but three moneths old,to be ſolemnely crowned king at ALBA-REGALIS,the vſuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. But after that the Polonian king had entred into HUNGARIE with a goodly armie,and joined his forces with his friends, moſt part of them which before followed the queene and her ſonne,reuolted vnto Vladiſlaus. So that when ſhe had done what ſhe could,ſhe was glad at laſt to commit the tuition of her ſonne, together with the crowne of HUNGARIE,vnto Fredericke the third, then emperour: neuer ceaſing for all that, to the vttermoſt of her power,to trouble the gouernment of Vladiſlaus,continually ſtirring vp great wars againſt him both at home and abroad, vntill that at the laſt by her death her quarrell tooke end,together with her life.

In the middeſt of theſe ciuile warres, Amurath thought a faire oportunitie preſented vnto him,to make an entrance vnto the conqueſt of HUNGARIE,which kingdome he had in his ambitious mind alreadie deuoured. And therefore gathering a great armie, he marched along the riuer DANVBIUS,vntill he came to the ſtrong cittie of BELGRADE, called in antient time TAVRVNVM,and of ſome ALBA GRÆCA,but now commonly GREICS WEISENBURG. This cittie is enuironed on the Eaſt ſide with the famous riuer DANVBIUS, and on the South with the great riuer of SAVS or SAWE, which there falleth into DANVBIUS; and on the other two ſides is defended with ſtrong wals,with deepe and large ditches;and was then accounted the gate or entrance into HUNGARIE. Vnto this cittie Amurath at his firſt comming gaue two terrible aſſaults,& was in good hope ſo to haue woon the ſame,but yet was both times valiantly repulſed, with great ſlaughter of his men. Wherfore finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was by him at the firſt ſuppoſed,he began to raiſe mounts againſt the citie, and high towers of wood to annoy the defendants,and furiouſly battered the wals. At this time alſo he cauſed great numbers of gallies and ſmall pinnaces to be brought into both the riuers of DANVBIUS and SAWE to aſſault the cittie on thoſe parts where was leaſt feared, and by that meanes alſo to keepe them of the cittie from all ſuccours to be ſent that way out of HUNGARIE. Yet for all he could doe or deuiſe,the citie was ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtian ſoldiors,which vnder the leading and conduct of Ioannes Vranus,a Florentine,gouernor thereof, with often ſallies and continuall ſhot ſlew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this ſiege, Vladiſlaus, king of POLONIA, and lately elect king of HUNGARIE, was ſore troubled by the queene and her faction in HUNGARIE: which thing the Turkiſh king knew right well,and thereupon continued his ſiege,although famine began greatly to encreaſe in his campe;hoping in nothing more,than that the defendants deſpairing of helpe from the king,would in ſhort time yeeld vp the cittie. Vladiſlaus being ſo entangled with ciuile wars,as is aforeſaid,that he could not poſsibly prepare ſuch force as might relieue the beſieged citie:yet for as much as the Turkiſh king had not long before by his embaſſador required to joine with him in league & amitie,he thought good now to aſſay if he could raiſe the ſiege,by ſending vnto him the like embaſſage. Whereupon he ſent Dobrogoſius,Oſtrorogeus,and Lucas Gorſenſis,three of the Polonian nobilitie,embaſſadors vnto Amurath:declaring vnto him, That for ſo much as he had firſt offered by his embaſſadours, to joine with him in league before he came out of POLONIA, the remembrance thereof had taken ſuch deepe impreſsion in his mind, that hee would not take vp armes againſt him,although it were in his owne juſt defence, before hee had offered vnto him reaſonable conditions of peace: wherefore if hee would deſiſt from inuading of HUNGARIE,whereof Vladiſlaus was now by God his permiſsion,and conſent of the people,choſen king,and ſo raiſe his ſiege,that then they ſhould afterwards eaſily agree vpon the deſired peace: in concluding whereof,he ſhould not find Vladiſlaus inferiour to himſelfe in any manner of princely courteſie: but if he had rather to proceed in armes,& to make proofe of his ſtrength,he would then doe the beſt that he could,to make him know, that he was of ſufficient power,in ſo juſt a quarrell,to withſtand his greateſt forces, and to reuenge the wrongs to him done. When Amurath had receiued this embaſſage,he appointed the embaſſadors to withdraw Belgrade beſieged of the Turks.

Belgrade in vain aſſaulted.

draw themselues for a while to SYNDEROVIA (a cittie of SERVIA, not farre off) vntill he might better consider of their demaunds: pretending, that he did it for their safetie; but as appeared afterward, secretly resoluing with himselfe, presently to do his vttermost deuoire for the gaining of the cittie, and vpon the successe thereof to shape them answere accordingly. Wherfore so soone as the embassadours were departed to SINDEROVIA, hee first by his messengers assaied the minds of the cittizens and souldiors with magnificall promises of large liberties, and infinit rewards and preferments, if they would yeeld vp the cittie: and many arrowes with letters made fast vnto them, full of like promises, were at the same time shot into the cittie. But when he saw no hope to preuaile by that meanes, hee called together the captaines and commaunders of his armie, and there in the presence of them all spake vnto them as followeth:

The notable speech of Amurath to encourage his souldiors to the assault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine owne power, to graunt, or not to graunt, the peace whereof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleasure (worthie souldiors) to know your minds also. For so much as we haue that warre in hand, wherein with worldly felicitie, (whereof amongst you I hold the cheefe place) is also indangered our religion, and puritie of life; the defence and care whereof equally belongeth vnto vs all: for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our vocation and liuing here, yet after death we all hope for one and the selfesame felicitie. And therefore I would haue you to vnderstand, all that I shall say, as proceeding not of any regard of mine owne priuate, but vpon the consideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning mine owne estate, I possesse so large countries in ASIA, such great dominions in EUROPE, that either part thereof (in good time bee it said) might seeme a sufficient kingdome: so that perhaps it might better stand with my estate, to take more care for keeping of that I haue, than to trauell for the gaining of more: but you are to consider with your selues, whether you haue euery man sufficient to suffice himselfe or not, and how long you thinke your selues assured of the same; and moreouer, that together with these worldly things we shall be driuen at length to forsake our profession and religion, if we shall now lay downe armes. For our enemies require, that we should first cease from warre, and then afterwards they thinke it meet to talke of peace. I will not speake of the indignitie, that men besieged, and in euill plight, should propound conditions of peace to them that besiege them, and are well furnished of all things; that feeble and cowardly men should promise peace vnto courageous and expert souldiors: I omit what labour and paines we haue taken in laying our siege, in raising of mounts, in making of shipping; all which our enemies commaund vs to forsake, as if they had vs alreadie bound or couped vp in hold, as we haue them. All BULGARIA, and the greater part of RASCIA is now by vs conquered, and most part of SERVIA is at our commaund: all which places are either by vs to be kept, or els all the rest of that we possesse in EUROPE, is with them to be quite lost and forsaken. Whosoeuer shall haue in their power this cittie which we besiege (and that our enemies know right well) shall haue not onely as it were a fortresse and bulwarke of defence for his owne, but also a castle and entrance for the subduing of others. The kingdome of HUNGARIE is now deuided in it selfe, and full of domesticall sedition: neither is it so much strengthened by the vniting of the kingdome of POLONIA, as it is by ciuile dissention weakened: and in this motion of peace nothing is sought for, but to gaine time for the pacifying of their priuate quarrels, that they may afterwards with their doubled forces set vpon vs. For if we shall breake vp our siege before we haue woon the cittie, they will easily find delaies so long to protract the conclusion of peace, vntill that either Vladislaus his good fortune, or els the Hungarians being of themselues better aduised, shall make an end of their ciuile wars. What manner and conditions of peace will they then require of vs, when they are at vnitie amongst themselues, and in armes against vs; seeing that now being in danger with mutuall discord, and almost by vs vanquished, doe thinke it reasonable (as if they had woon the field) that we should first raise our siege, and then entreat of peace? Their proud demaunds for the restitution of BULGARIA and RASCIA, with other countries and cities woon by our trauell and danger; alreadie sound in mine eares: Which if wee shall refuse to graunt, not onely the Hungarians being then at vnitie among themselues, but also the Polonians, joined vnto them, will bring those wars home to our dores which we now at great aduantage make vpon them, troubled with discord and ciuile broiles. And if for desire of peace we could be content to yeeld vnto such shamefull and miserable conditions, and restore vnto them all they should or in reason could desire; do you thinke the prince of SERVIA would rest contented with his owne? whose haughtie mind (I am sure) being inflate with the combining of two such mightie kingdomes, thinketh not onely of the recouerie of that hee hath lost, but euen now gapeth at all that is ours in EUROPE. He will not thinke himselfe satisfied, before he (hauing uing brought the Hungarian and Polonian forces against vs) shall see the same hauocke and spoile made in our kingdome with fire and sword, which he hath before seene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune should answere his desiignes (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) beside all the miserable and intollerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angrie conquerour, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious worke, to vse all cruell and vnspeakeable villanies against our nation, except wee will forsake the faith and religion deliuered vnto vs by our ancestors, and follow their new and incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more easily and effectually procure the fauor of God with any other kind of sacrifice or seruice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our temples, by scoffing at our most sacred and secret rites and ceremonies, by scorning our religion, and priests: and that you may know all the furie wherewith they rage against vs and our religion, they account all them for holy saints which die in fight against vs. There is no cause (valiant souldiors) that vpon the vaine hope of peace, we should expect whilest the enemie doth gather and vnite his forces and armes against vs, especially such an enemie as propoundeth not spoile and worldly honours, but immortalitie it selfe, as a reward of his victorie. We haue alreadie taken much more labour than we haue to take, we haue filled the ditches with restlesse labour, we haue cast vp bulwarkes equall with the wals, and part of the wals we haue beaten euen with the ground, so that you see the towne halfe opened: and that towne, by gaining whereof, all that ours is, may be made safe and quiet, and that which our enemie possesseth, subiect to our spoile and prey. If you will but a little inforce your selues as men mindfull of our good fortune and forwardnesse, you shall find our temples, our sacrifices, our religion, all worldly and heauenly felicitie to bee then assured vnto vs, when as you shall to morrow ouerthrow the very foundation of the enemies wall. Then (courageous souldiors) we may crie victorie, not for the present, but for euer. If this warre should bring vnto vs nothing els but an assured securitie of our estate, it were sufficient reward: for which we ought cheerefully to aduenture our selues to all dangers, and to challenge in combat euen death it selfe. But as this victorie doth defend all our things as with a deep trench or sure wall, so doth it lay open and expose all our enemies dominions vnto danger & spoile. Hitherto we haue striuen with nature her selfe in the rough and abrupt mountains of BVLGARIA & RASCIA, where we were to striue with hunger, thirst, labor, & desperation: all them we haue ouercome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine vnto the wealth of fruitfull HVNGARIE, from whence we must fetch the guerdon of our victorie, and the ground of our glorie. We are come to the gates, which being laid open, we are not to passe ouer inaccessible rocks, or vncouth desarts, but we shal go through most pleasant places, decked both by nature her selfe, and the industrie of man, where the temperatnesse of the aire, and liuely springs, with the fruitfulnesse of the soile, doth euery where yeeld plentie of all manner of food both for man and beast, not only to serue for natures necessitie, but euen to glut our wanton desires. What thing soeuer curious indeuor hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertilitie of this soile yeeldeth plentifully of it selfe: so that it is to be thought, that nature adorned HVNGARIE with a certain extraordinary care, when as she would set forth a pattern of good husbandrie, for other countries to imitate. Neither hath she in any place ben more bountifull in bestowing her rich gifts: for gold, which other men most painfully dig vp, & that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their ease, as if it were a growing plant. It is in your power (worthie soldiors) whether you will to morrow open a way to all these good things for your selues for euer, or els leaue the way open for your enemies vnto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you goe vnto the breach, that all the store of happie fortune is laid open vnto you for a prey, without any other defence, without any other garrison, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wiues, children, your houses, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories: ouer whom (except you win this citie) the furie and insolencie of the victorious enemie, will most cruelly and shamefully insult. I, according as I shall see you fight at the breach to morrow, shall easily perceiue how you are set downe to commaund as conquerors, or els as slaues to be commaunded; and also what to answere to the most insolent demaunds of the proud embassadours. In the meane time make much of your selues, and together with your armour haue all things in readinesse, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may assault the breach.

The Turkish captaines for that time joyfully departed, as if they had been alreadie assured of the victorie, and of all those good things which Amurath had so liuely set before their eies. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the assault to be giuen vnto a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall batterie: the souldiours with great courage assailed the breach, especially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly-Bassa valiantly woon the same, and were entring the citie with assured hope of victorie. The Christians seeing all in danger to be lost, running to the breach from all parts of the citie, so forceably charged the proud Ianizaries on euerie side, that they were glad to retire with more hast than they before entred: in which retrait, many of them were slaine, and the rest flying out at the breach, were either slaine or burnt to death in the towne ditch with wild fire; whereof the defendants had cast great store vpon the Turks at the breach, which hauing taken hold vpon the faggots, hurdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had vpon the sudden made their way ouer the towne ditch, did so terribly burne, that the Ianizaries which had entred the breach, being againe repulsed, were in that fierie lake consumed, or else with smoke strangled. In this assault Amurath is reported to haue lost eight thousand of his best men, beside seauen thousand others ouerwhelmed or strangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Christians. The other part of the Turks which at the same time assaulted the citie by water, out of their gallies and small ships, had as euill or rather worse successe: many of them were sunke with great shot, and some burnt by the fire cast from the wals, and so fired one another; and diuers of them in that sudden feare, for avoiding of that present danger, ran a ground vpon the shelfs in the riuer, and so split. Amurath wonderfully discouraged with the slaughter of his men, and shamefully beaten from the assault, returned to his camp with his Turks, much like men which had lately escaped from some great shipwracke. And thus partly by famine, and partly by the defendants force, hauing lost the greatest part of his armie, he determined now after seauen moneths siege to returne home. Yet because hee would not encourage his enemies, by shewing his feare, he sent for the embassadours into the campe, and with sterne countenance answered them in this sort.

Belgrade notably defended by the Christians.

Amurath his answere to the embassadours.

We will (said hee) then talke of peace, when Vladislaus shall deliuer vnto vs all that part of RASCIA which he yet holdeth, and also this citie of BELGRADE, as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raise my siege, to giue Vladislaus time to aduise himselfe: yet I would wish him, rather to accept of my friendship vpon these conditions, than by denying that little which is demaunded, to hazard the state of both his kingdomes. I aske but that which is mine owne by law of armes, before Vladislaus was called into HUNGARIE: and the Hungarians cannot transfer vnto him that right which they had not themselues. Wherefore if hee will proceed rather to striue for that which is other mens, than quietly to possesse his owne, I will in good time repaire hether againe, with my God the beholder and reuenger of wrong.

With this answere he dismissed the embassadours, and forthwith rise with his armie, sore repenting his comming thether: yet because he would take something in his way, he left his nephew Isa-beg with certaine troupes of horsemen at SCOPIA in SERVIA, who so troubled the king of BOSNA, that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promise vnto him a yearely tribute of fiue and twentie thousand duckats.

Vladislaus newly elected king of HUNGARIE, seeing that part of his kingdome which is called TRANSILVANIA, or PANNODACIA, to bee much subject to the incursion of the Turks, (who hauing got into their possession all the countrey of MOLDAVIA, and growne insolent by continuall victories ceased not to inuade and spoile the countrey of TRANSILVANIA) for remedie of that daily mischiefe, created Iohn Huniades Vayuod, or his vice-gerent in TRANSILVANIA. This Huniades as some write, was Earle of BISTRICE, borne in VALACHIA: others say that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Huniades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and proweſſe. Whatsoeuer his parents were, he himselfe was a most politicke, valiant, fortunate, and famous captaine, his victories so great, as the like was neuer before by any Christian prince obtained against the Turks: so that his name became vnto them so dreadfull, that they vsed the same to feare their crying children withall. This worthie captaine according to the trust reposed in him, began to keepe the Turks short, by cutting them off, whensoeuer they presumed to enter into his countrey; and also by shutting vp the passages wherby they were wont to forrage the countrie of TRANSILVANIA; & when he had put his owne charge in good safetie, hee entred into MOLDAVIA, and neuer rested till hee had won it quite out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, passed many times ouer DANUBIVS into the Turks dominions, making hauocke of the Turks, and carying away with him great bootie, with many captiues.

Now

Now were two great and worthie captaines met together, in places nigh one to another, Huniades in TRANSILVANIA, and the next part of HUNGARIE; and Iſa in RASCIA, and the vpper part of SERVIA: the one lying at TEMESVVAR, and the other at SINDEROVIA; both men of great ſpirit, and deſirous of honour. Of theſe two, Iſa in great fauour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increaſe his credit with the Sultan his vncle, & to inlarge the bounds of the Turkiſh kingdome committed to his charge, continually forraged the countrey about BELGRADE, to the intent that hauing wearied the inhabitants with the harms he daily did them, and brought the citie into great wants, he might ſo at length gaine the ſame, for the moſt part abandoned of the citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine, and ſo to open away into HUNGARIE. Thus was the countrey by him ſpoiled, the villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers both of men and cattell daily caried away: yea ſometimes not contented to haue ſpoiled the open countrey, he aſſailed the verie ſuburbs of the citie, and was thence hardly repulſed: and finding Huniades the onely man that hindred his further proceedings, to requite him, and prouoke him the more, he brake ſometimes into his countrey, laying in euerie corner as he went ſtrong ambuſhes, ſo to haue circumuented that warie captaine, if it had been poſsible. But he, greeued to ſee the countrey thus ſpoiled, and purpoſing to be therof reuenged, ſecretly raiſed a ſtrong power, both of horſe and foot, and with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant captaine, paſsing ouer DANUBIVS, came and encamped betwixt BELGRADE and SINDEROVIA, being about twentie miles diſtant. Of whoſe comming Iſa-beg vnderſtanding, forthwith ſet forward with a great armie againſt him, leaſt he ſhould by longer delaie, ſeeme to ſtand in doubt of his enemie, whom he had by many injuries ſo often prouoked. So marching on with his armie ranged in order of battaile, hee found Huniades as readie for battaile as himſelfe, who in both wings had placed his light horſemen, and behind them his men at armes, with certaine companies of crosbowes on horſebacke: in the middeſt ſtood his armed men with his archers, and other ſouldiours more lightly armed, readie at all aſſaies, all ſtrongly guarded with men at armes: after whom in the reareward followed alſo a ſtrong ſquadron of valiant footmen. The ſignall of battaile being giuen, there began a great and cruell fight, as amongſt men deſirous either to ouercome, or there honourably to end their daies. At the firſt encounter, the wings of Huniades his bataile were by the Turks enforced to retire: but comming to the men at armes, their furie was there ſtaied, and a cruell battaile fought, wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks moe, who truſting to their agilitie and nimbleneſſe of bodie, were not able long to endure the ſhocke and ſtrength of the men at armes, but were there by heapes ouerthrowne, and moſt miſerably ſlaine. Which Iſa-beg beholding, and perceiuing the Hungarians couragiouſly to fight, as men almoſt in poſſeſsion of an aſſured victorie; to ſaue himſelfe turned his backe and fled to SINDEROVIA. The reſt beholding the flight of their generall, betooke themſelues to flight alſo: after whō the Hungarians fiercely followed, eſpecially Huniades himſelfe, who by his example to animate the reſt, left not the chaſe vntill he was come almoſt to the ſuburbs of SINDEROVIA: few of the Turks eſcaped, the reſt being either taken or ſlaine. Huniades after ſo great a victorie, with a rich prey and a multitude of priſoners returned to BELGRADE: hauing now ſufficiently reuenged himſelfe of the wrongs he had before receiued: after which time, Iſa the Turke was more quiet, as hauing ſufficient proofe of his valour. The fame of this victorie increaſed not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to BUDA, filled the citie with joy and gladnes: but moſt of all king Vladiſlaus, who therevpon cauſed publique praiers, with thankſgiuing to be made in euerie Church: and by his letters gratulatorie, with many rich preſents, encouraged Huniades to the proſecution of the relgious warre, wherein was propounded vnto him not onely the increaſe of his wealth (a baſe regard in the honourable) but the immortalitie of his name, and hope of eternall bliſſe. 1440

Not long after this victorie, Huniades obtained a farre greater in TRANSILVANIA. For Amurath much greeued with the loſſe he had firſt by himſelfe, and after by his lieutenant Iſa, receiued at BELGRADE, and in the countrey thereabout; leaſt he ſhould ſeeme to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, repaired his broken forces with new ſupplies, with purpoſe againe to renew his warres in VALACHIA. And ſo hauing put all things in a readineſſe, ſent one of his Baſſaes called Meſites (his Viceroy in ASIA, a man of great wiſedome, experience, and valour) with a puiſſant armie vpon the ſuddaine by the way of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, to inuade TRANSILVANIA. This worthie captaine according to his charge, departing out of SERVIA, and paſſing

Tranſiluania inuaded and ſpoiled by Meſites Baſſa.

sing ouer DANVBIVS, suddenly entred into Huniades his countrey, burning and spoyling whatsoeuer came in his waie, and killing all that he light vpon, man, woman, and child, without respect of age, sex, or condition; filling all the countrey as he went, with tumult and terror. Wher-of Huniades (but lately come into the countrey) vnderstanding, and hauing as then, no sufficient forces to oppose against the furie of so puissant an enemie, either meanes to raise any, in so great a confusion and feare; was wonderfully grieued thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well know-Huniades flieth. ing which way to turne himselfe. At length hee tooke his flight into ALBA IVLA, vnto his old friend George Lepe, Bishop of that citie, a man of great vertue and grauitie: but whilest hee there staieth with his friend, about the raising of a tumultuarie armie, the enemie was now come neere vnto him; who hauing ouer-runne the greatest part of the countrey, had scraped together such a bootie, and taken such a multitude of prisoners, that surcharged as it were with the spoile, he was glad to march softlier: yet still burning the countrey before him. Which Hnniades and the good bishop beholding out of the citie, so much greeued thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themselues, with an handfull of men in hast taken vp hand ouer head, too weake to encounter with their enemies: yet thought it better with such power as they had, to goe out, and so in defence of their countrey honourably to die, than longer to behold the most miserable destructi-Huniades & the bishop of Alba-Iula entrapped by the Turks. on of the same. But whilest they vpō this resolution (caried forth with too hot a desire of reuenge) march vnaduisedly on headlong, without any scouts or espials sent out before them, they fell before they were aware into such ambushes, both of horse and foot, as the craftie enemie had in the secret woods and vallies wherby they were to passe, laid of purpose to intercept them; which now with great force and horrible outcries breaking out vpon them on euerie side, dismaied them with a great feare. Huniades and the bishop, seeing themselues so entrapped and beset with the multitude of their enemies, as that they must needs perish if they should longer staie, fled incontinently backe againe; after whom followed all the rest of their armie, and at their heeles the egre Turks, who spared none of the flying Christians they could ouertake, but put them all to the sword: neuertheless, most part of them escaped backe againe to ALBA IVLA. The Bishop thinking to haue saued himselfe by the swiftnesse of his horse, comming to a riuer, in taking the same was ouerthrowne, and there by the enemie slaine. With whose death the Bassa encouraged, as also with the present victorie, began now more at libertie to range abroad, and at his pleasure with fire and sword to wast that part of the country which yet remained vnspoiled: leauing in the meane time (as a man out of feare) the rich prey hee had taken, together with his baggage and cariages, to be carried all together, as a notable testimonie of his victorie vnto his great lord and maister. Huniades in the meane time, with wonderfull celeritie running about the borders of his country, and out of euerie towne and village taking such souldiors as he could, perswaded also the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their wiues and children to take vp armes: who all, in respect of the present necessitie, cheerefully did whatsoeuer he commaunded.
With this tumultuarie armie, he followed the Bassa (who thē in great pride was returning, laded with the spoile of the whole countrey) with purpose to set vpon him, as time or place should giue him occasion. In the meane time Mesitis being told, that Huniades with a great power was com-ming after him, and now euen at hand: is reported to haue made no great reckoning thereof, but to haue proudly answeared vnto him that brought the newes, Let him come, and with the spoile of himselfe enrich our victorie. There was present when he thus said, one Iohn, one of Huniades his espials, who discouered vnto him many of the Turkes designes, concerning the joyning of battaile with him; but especially, that the Bassa had commanded through his armie, That aboue all things they should in the beginning of the battell assaile the person of Huniades himselfe, for that he being once slaine, the rest would easily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction: and that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certaine companies of his best souldiours, gi-uing them certaine tokens whereby they might know both him and his horse. There was then in the armie, one Simon Kemene a right valiant and couragious gentleman, not much vnlike vnto Huniades, with whom he chaunged both his horse and armour, appointing vnto him a strong troupe of his choise horsemen to attend vpon him: neither was this counterfait Huniades vnwilling to expose himselfe vnto the danger, accounting it honour inough, if by his death he might saue the life of his friend, and preserue so worthie a defendour of the common weale. Huniades following fast after the Bassa marching before him, sought by light skirmishes sometimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, and sometimes in the reareward, to stay him, and at some aduantage,

uantage, if any such were giuen, to fight with him, before he should get out of the countrey: At length finding such an oportunitie as he thought good to lay hold vpon, he with all his forces, as if it had ben a violent tempest, came vpon the Turks so sodainly, as that they had not time to put themselues into order of battell, but were glad confusedly to fight as they might, and without order: in which disordered fight many fell on both sides, but farre more of the Turkes. But whilest both armies with like obstinacie encounter together, certaine troupes of the most valiant Turks deserying Simon the counterfeit Huniades, and by the signes before deliuered vnto them, both of his horse and armour, supposing him to haue been Huniades indeed; with all their power made towards him, to haue slaine him, according as they had in charge: where meeting with right valiant men, of no lesse courage than themselues, there was fought a most terrible & bloodie battell, in such sort, as if in that very place should haue ben tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turks still bending their forces more & more thither, for the killing of him, of who they stood in more dread than of all the rest: at length by plain force made a way vnto him, & hauing slain them that were about him, though not without their own great losse, furiously assailing him, slew him, vainly supposing it to haue ben the very generall himselfe: who had he there perished (as like inough it was he should, had hee not beene before warned of the Bassaes purpose) no doubt, but that the whole country had bin with him, or shortly after, quite lost. But Huniades in the mean time riding too and fro in the armie, encouraged his souldiors not to forsake the victorie they were now as it were in possession of, nor leaue vnreuenged so many slaughters and harmes so lately committed by their enemies, but to remēber as they were fighting, that they caried in their hands their wiues and children, and were in that one battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Sometime he with new supplies encouraged such as were ouercharged and euen now ready to flie; othersome he with cheerfull words staied, that had already turned their backs; performing in euery place all the parts both of a worthie commander and valiant souldior, as the necessitie of the time and place required. In the heat of this battell, fortune yet fauoring neither part, but both fighting with all their power, the Transiluanian prisoners that in great number were kept in the campe, wishing rather there to die than to be caried away in captiuitie, and thinking it now or neuer, time for them to attempt their deliuerance; with one consent brake in sunder their bonds, & with such weapons as first came to hand, set vpon their keepers, of whom they slew a great number: and so desperatly issuing out into the battell, encouraged their countrimen, and discouraged their enemies. Yet was the battell hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cause: for why, the Transiluanians fought for their country, their wiues, their children, their liues, their libertie, their religion and altars: but the Turks for the rich prey they had before taken, and that they were by victorie in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the prisoners (who laid about them like desperat men) out of hope of the victorie, began by little and little to retire: and the other on the contrary part, by this vnexpected aid encouraged, and quickly finding the enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Mesites seeing his armie thus in euery part wauering, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but presently after, beholding some of his men retiring, as if they had fled, and othersome flying outright, and no means to stay them, for safegard of his life turned his horse and fled also: after whom the Hungarians followed with most terrible execution, as men desirous of the bloud of thē that had done them so great harme. In this chase Mesites himselfe with his son, were both slain: the report of whose death, in the pursuit, added swiftnesse vnto the Hungarians to the increasing of the slaughter of the Turks, whō for the desire of reuenge, they ceased not for certain daies to pursue, vnto the top of the alps. In this battell were slain of the Turks 20000, & of the Hungarians about 3000. Huniades with this victorie recouered all the prey the Turks had taken of the spoile of the country, together with their tents & baggage: vnto whom at his returne into the campe, a wonderfull number of the poore captiues came, and falling at his feet and kissing them gaue God thanks for their deliuerance by him: some called him the father, some the defender of his country; the souldiors, their inuincible generall; the captiues, their deliuerer; the women, their protector; the yong men & children, their most louing father. In all which joyfull acclamations, no honourable additions was heard, which in the judgement of all men, worthely agreed not with his deserts. He againe with teares standing in his eies, courteously embraced them, rejoycing at the publicke good: and himselfe giuing most heartie thanks vnto God, commaunded the like to be done in all churches of that prouince. Sometime he commended the souldiours valour, and in generall, the peoples loyaltie. The nobilitie and woorthie captaines he extolled by name, according as their deserts had beene in that notable battaile, not detracting any thing from any mans worthie praises: part of the spoile of the Turks he appointed vnto deuout vses, and the other part he deuided amongst the souldiors: and willing as it were with the first fruits thereof to gratifie king Vladislaus, and the Despot of SERVIA, then present with him, he sent a great waggon, which ten horses could scarce draw, laded with the Turkes ensignes and the cheese of their heads, where the heads of the Bassa and his sonne stood formost, and aboue them was placed an old Turke, sometime well knowne vnto the Despot: who in this order presented vnto them, is said to haue thus deliuered his message, as followeth:

The speech of an old Turke, in deliuering the present vnto the king.

Huniades your maiesties most humble seruant, and the most honourable Despots sonne, sendeth vnto you this part of the spoile gained by this late victorie, least he should seeme to defraud you of the honor of the battaile, happily fought vnder your good fortune. These heads of the Asian nobilitie hee sendeth you for a present, that you should not want the assured testimonie of so notable a victorie: these are two princes heads, the one of Mesites Bassa the generall, and the other of his sonne. The rest are the heads of the other great commaunders and Sanzacks. All these witnesse the greatnesse of the late slaughter, and exhort you to greater atchieuements. What your royall maiestie for the naturall instinct of pietie and religion ingrafted in you, may hope for; and what an occasion of immortalitie and glorie is offered vnto you, Huniades wisheth you hereby to consider: and humbly requesteth, that generall supplications may be commaunded, and a great armie prouided, for as much as all men suppose, that the Turke will gage his whole forces, and leaue nothing vnattempted, in reuenge of so great a slaughter of his people.

Hauing ended his speech, he shewed vnto them the grisely mortified heads: which the nobilitie and others there present, earnestly beheld and wondered at, especially the king and the Despot, who by letters farther vnderstanding the whole proceeding of the warre, and fortune of the battaile, highly commended the discreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victorie, worthie (as they said) of a Romane triumph: for which, Vladislaus commaunded publicke supplications to be made in all churches through HVNGARIE, and by honourable messengers sent of purpose to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deserts, with many rich presents also, commending his faithfull and worthie seruice: and requesting him with like courage and care to prosecute the warre so happily begun, promising him, That hee should want neither men nor money, or any thing els needfull thereunto. Vpon this victorie, the countries of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted againe vnto the Hungarians, to the great greefe of Amurath: & the fame of Huniades was in short time dispersed through all EVROPE, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one most like to be one of the greatest champions of the Christian commonweale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was.

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Bassa Mesites, and the losse of his armie, being brought to HADRIANOPLE, much troubled the Turkish tyrant: but most of all the reuolt of the two countries of MOLDAVIA & VALACHIA. So that full of wrathfull indignation and desire of reuenge, he commaunded a great armie to bee raised against the next Spring, with intent to haue gone therwith himselfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his purpose, he committed the leading therof vnto one Schech Abedin Bassa (corruptly called Sciabedin Bassa) an eunuch, and yet neuertheless a right valiant and expert captaine, and his viceroy in EVROPE; with charge first to enter into VALACHIA, and there hauing done what harme hee could with fire and sword, to doe the like in MOLDAVIA: and after that with all his power to breake into TRANSILVANIA, there to reuenge vnto the full, the losses before receiued, and with the slaughter of the Hungarians to sacrifice vnto the ghosts of their dead friends & companions. The Bassa according to his charge, departing out of MACEDONIA, and marching through MYSIA, and so passing ouer Danubius, with an armie of fourescore thousand fighting men, whereof foure thousand were of the best Ianizaries, entred into VALACHIA, filling the country with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in despaire to bee able to defend themselues against the furie of the Turks, and sore repenting them of their reuolt from them vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheerefull words, willing them betime to retire themselues vnto the safest places of their countrey, and not to expose themselues with their too weake forces against the furie of the Barbarians, promising in good time to come himselfe to their releese; not doubting by the power of Iesus Christ, to dare them battell in the plaine field, & to haue of them a glo-

a glorious victorie, although they were in number farre moe than they were reported to be. The Baſſa diuiding his armie into two parts, forraged the countrey farre and neere, burning the countrey townes and villages before them, ſpoyling whatſoeuer came in their way, and killing whoſoeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part, had retired themſelues, ſome into the mountains, ſome into the ſtrong townes, and ſome into places further off; ſo that few fell into the enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to flie, or not regarding the danger had negligently ſtaied the enemies coming, and ſo periſhed. VALACHIA thus ſpoiled, the Turks paſsing ouer the mountaines, deſcended into TRANSILVANIA, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to haue done the like or greater harme, if poſsible it had been to haue ſo done: but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen ſoldiors readie to incounter thē. A ſmall power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led: but all men of great experience and reſolution, in valour counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men reſolued rather to die than to flie. Of whoſe approch the Baſſa (vnto whom the name and fortune of the man was dreadfull) by his eſpials vnderſtanding, ſtayed his intended furie, and as one well aware with whom hee had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelfe with his armie, to ſee what power and courage the enemie had. But certainely informed by his ſcouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as the Turkes, but lay ſtrongly encamped with his waggons and carriages, as in a ſure fort, in ſuch order, as that he could not without great danger bee aſſailed, and yet might at his pleaſure come foorth, and ſo if need were retire againe, as into a ſtrong hold: he wondered at his courage and skilfull maner of encamping; yet preſuming of his own multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battell. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victorie, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betooke themſelues both vnto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a conflict as well to ſhew the vttermoſt of their pollicie and skill, as of their courage and valour. The Turke thought it beſt not to joine battaile with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to deuide his armie into certaine battailions, and ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make all his men profitable: or if he could not do ſo, then with his multitude to encloſe the Chriſtians round, and ſo to ouerwhelme them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his ſouldiours, aboue all things to keepe their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelues to bee deuided by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call VASCAPE, both the armies by the breake of day began to diſlodge, at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great armie, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by prouident foreſight and pollicie to match the multitude of his enemies. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, calling vnto him the cheefe captaines and commaunders of his armie, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

The moſt Chriſtian ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſouldiours againſt the Turke.

No courage (beleeue me) worthie companions, and fellows in arms, could haue induced me to encounter ſo great a multitude, did not neceſsitie it ſelfe enforce me, your approued valour perſuade me, & the aſſured hope I haue in Chriſt Ieſu aboue all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this his ſacred battaile, and by our right hands to reuenge the diſhonour of his holy name. In which his eſpetiall choice we are to conſider how much hee hath beloued vs: and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite goodneſſe and mercie. Three ſuch commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if we will be the ſame men we haue been in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encourage men of worth, for the ſame to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer ſo deare: Firſt, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues, and countrey, joyned with your whole eſtate: then, for eternall glorie and renowne in this world: and laſt of all, for immortalitie and a crowne that ſhall neuer be taken from you, in the world to come. How many miſeries and calamities we haue in former times, and of late, receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than ſeene the ſame with your eies, and endured them in your ſelues. You had long ſince been bereft of your welbeloued wiues and children, whom moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither houſe nor church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your rare proweſſe been at hand for preſent reſcue: your countrey, your goods, your honour, your libertie, you could not haue kept, had not your valor, confirmed by an aſſured confidence in the higheſt, preſerued all theſe things vnto your ſelues: The horrible furie of the Turke had now brought all theſe things into the power of it selfe, had they not been by your armes defended: and he by so many bloodie ouerthrows repressed. He could not before be staied: the Grecians, the Macedonians (both sometimes the greatest commaunders) the bold Thracians, the strong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirots, and Dalmatians, could not abide their force: The Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, authors and maisters of the antient discipline of warre, willingly gaue place vnto these. Vnto vs, is this praise and great glorie of this victorie by God assigned, who often times with a small power, yea and that sometime against all hope, haue with a notable slaughter ouerthrown them, vanquished them, & put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the world whom they more feare and stand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they haue by their daily slaughter and losses, learned no lesse to feare, than if you were many. And now to trie the vttermost of their power, they are come with their innumerable legions: but are not for that of you any thing the more to be feared than before, seeing that we all beare armes vnder the conduct of the most mightie God; and are by daily victorie, long experience, and approoued valour taught, what we are to dare: besides that, the greatest part of their armie is of common souldiours, slaues, or rude countrey pesants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Ianizaries, are no good souldiours among them, the rest as men enforced, serue them for feare, and against their wils, and they by their cowardize brought into that bondage and slauerie. What Greeks, Macedonians, or Sclauonians soeuer are sent to their aid, forasmuch as they are not yet reuolted from the Christian faith, deeme them not to stand for them, but for vs; they long for vs the reuengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerours: in this warre they haue giuen vnto the Turkes their names, but vnto vs their hearts, and power, and pray heartily for our victorie: wherefore you ought so much the more valiantly and couragiously to fight, by how much greater you see the victorie, the honour, the prey before your eies. We are not to fight for other mens houses, and altars, but for our owne; so our present necessitie requireth, in such sort, that if wee our selues deliuer not our selues, and beare our selues vpon our woonted hope and valour, wee shall this day bee enforced to endure the greatest miserie that men may possiblie: First, the losse of our goods and substance, the captiuitie of our children, the deflouring of our daughters, the rauishing of our wiues, the slaughter of our parents, the burning of our houses, and churches; and that which worse is than all this, the scorne of our Sauiour Christ Iesus, and his saints, whose images you shall see in despight broken, or dragged in the durt, or moulten and conuerted into other prohane vses; all religion trodden downe, and God himselfe (if it were possible) with violence and dispaire driuen out of our hearts, if we stand not manfully vnto it as becommeth worthie champions. God is able with his little finger, if he so will, forthwith to destroy all the Turks in the world; but seeing he hath committed vnto our right hands the defence of his name, he first maketh proofe of our courage and valour, that finding the same faithfull, and readie, hee may strengthen and defend it with his owne right hand. He neuer yet forsooke any faithfull or deuout man, neither will our Sauior Christ be wanting vnto you, if you be not wanting vnto your selues: in the power of his name, which is aboue all names, he shal tread down his rebellious enemies, and exalt the righteous that put their trust in him. Moreouer, the causes that we and they combat for, are diuers, and our hopes much stronger: They fight for their Prophet, a most prophane man, author of all impietie, for spoile and prey, for the destruction of nations and countreys, for other mens kingdomes, for the enlarging of their dominions and territories, for worldly praise and glorie: But wee contrariwise beare armes for the sauiour of the world, for our faith and religion, for the Christian common wealth, for our native countrey, for our wiues and children, for our fortune and state; than which nothing can bee more excellent, more commendable, or honourable. What reward is laid vp for them in heauen which haue worthily protected or deliuered their countrey, or laid downe their liues in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, hauing often prooued, are we ignorant, that God will neuer forsake them that honour, feare, and serue him. Whereby (fellow souldiors) you may plainely perceiue, how farre your hopes are beyond theirs. Beleeue our Sauiour, promising vnto you an eternall reward: and shew your fidelitie and valour vnto God and your countrey together. Wherefore, seeing without the power of God wee can doe nothing, before the signall of battaile be giuen, I beseech you collonels, captaines, and lieutenants, by your effectuall and Christian exhortations in your regiments and companies, to encourage your souldiors, valiantly to fight the Lords battaile; and for the present, euerie man by taking a little earth in his mouth, to prepare himselfe according to the necessitie of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the lords supper: so hauing clensed your soules, embrace you one another, plight your mutuall faith with your right hand and a kisse; and make a perpetuall couenant among your selues, none of you to forsake one another in this holy battaile, but for your religion and countrey valiantly to fight it out, euen vnto the the laſt man. And a little refreſhing your ſelues with a ſhort repaſt as you ſtand, vpon the ſignall giuen, thrice calling aloud vpon the mightie name of Chriſt Ieſu, fight with the like valour and courage ſo neere as you can, that he in the agonie of death fought for your redemption and libertie: which that you will willingly do, I requeſt and charge you this for our ſauiours ſake, for the loue of our countrey, and for the faith you owe both to God and man. I alſo pray and beſeech you, ſo to fight, as men reſolued either to gaine a moſt glorious victorie, (whereof I doubt not) or elſe if it ſhould otherwiſe chaunce, this day to purchaſe vnto your ſelues a bleſſed life in the kingdome of heauen: not to ſup in Hell with the Turks, but with the bleſſed wights in heauen: For Chriſt Ieſus our Sauiour will be alwaies preſent with vs, who (beleeue me, and ſo hope) will this day not onely deliuer vs out of the hands of the Turks, but to our immortall glorie lode vs with the rich ſpoyles of our enemies, and ſo in ſafetie bring all home againe with much ioy and triumph.

The Baſſa on the other ſide likewiſe encouraged his ſouldiors, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their worthie anceſtours and themſelues, by whoſe great valour the glorie and empire of the Turkes had been ſo mightily encreaſed: and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpretor of the gods, had foretold the empire of the whole world to be by all the gods allotted; and had by diuine inſpiration prophecied, that antient and ſtately nation in time to become the terror of the world, the ſcourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto thē what an increaſe of kingdomes they had got in that ſhort time, ſince which they firſt paſſed ouer into EVROPE: and filled them with the hope of a great ſpoile; promiſing vnto them that ſhould in the battaile valiantly behaue themſelues, not onely the ſpoile and prey, but whole villages, towns, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they ſhould deſerue. As for the victorie, conſidering the weake power of their enemies, and the great number of themſelues, hee aſſured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In concluſion, he told them, that hauing ouercome Huniades, whom onely, as hee confeſſed, he had found to bee the moſt valiant and skilfull captaine of the Chriſtians, nothing ſhould afterward be able to ſtand in their way, or to hinder their farther conqueſts: and that if this day they ſhould vtterly ouerthrow him, they ſhould gain the moſt honourable victorie that was euer yet got in EVROPE. Wherefore hee willed them aboue all things, in the battell to ſeeke after him; promiſing vnto him that ſhould kill him, a great reward, with moſt honourable preferments. Hauing thus ſufficiently, as he thought, encouraged his Turks, he ſet forward with his armie in order of battaile. His horſemen and footmen he deuided into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a ſquare battaile, all men of approoued valour: after whom followed the rereward: vnto the wings he had alſo joyned certaine looſe companies of light horſemen to begin the battaile, and to flie about the enemies, and ſo as occaſion ſhould ſerue, either to charge or retire: Huniades likewiſe had placed in both wings two ſquare battailions of men at armes, and with them certaine horſemen with croſſe-bowes: before theſe wings he had alſo placed certaine troupes of light horſemen, to encounter the enemies: in the middeſt ſtood two ſquare battailes of men at arms: and betwixt them a ſtrong ſquadron of armed men, guarded behind with a conuenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings he had compaſſed about with a multitude of carts and waggons, and they alſo well manned. So marching forward, and both armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the ſignall of battaile was on both ſides giuen, and the battaile begun. Huniades ſeeing the multitude of his enemies, caſt his firſt battaile into the forme of a wedge, the more eaſily to deuide them: and they on the other ſide in forme of a paire of ſheeres, were readie to receiue him: where on both ſides they encountered together with ſuch furie and outerie, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or ſeene. The Turks truſting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horſemen, firſt with their light ſtaues, and afterward with their crooked Scimators fiercely aſſailed the Chriſtians light horſemen, in which firſt encounter many fell on both ſides. But the wedge battaile of the Chriſtians could not of the Turks be broken, as conſiſting all of valiant expert ſouldiors, and they alſo ſtrongly armed; who, doe the Turks what they could, with a great ſlaughter cut their armie in ſunder, but not without a great fight, and ſome loſſe alſo vnto themſelues. In the wings alſo the light horſemen for a while fought courageouſly and with like hope: But the Turks with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Chriſtians, & better appointed for that purpoſe, and exceeding in number alſo, put the Chriſtian light horſemen to the worſt, and enforced

ced them to retire to the men at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turks to ſtay, where both parts deſperatly aſſailing the one the other, was made a moſt terrible fight, wherein moſt part of the Turks light horſemen were ſlaine: for why, they were not able to abide the force of the men at armes, although in compariſon of them, but few; but were with their launces & arming ſwords ouerthrowne and ſlaine, no otherwiſe than if they had beene naked men: ſo that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battaile in both the wings yet wauering and the victorie doubtfull, in the maine battaile was fought a moſt cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a ſtrong power of men at armes, and certaine troupes of light horſemen, compaſſed about the men at armes that ſtood (as we ſaid) in the maine battell of the Chriſtians, where the old Ianizaries with their crooked Semitaries, with great courage cut in ſunder the legs of the horſes of the men at armes; of whom many fell downe, and lying along vpon the ground, were made ſhorter by the head: as likewiſe on the other ſide, the Ianizaries whileſt they ſeeke the deſtruction of the men at armes, were themſelues ouerborne and troden vnder foot. Whereupon ſuch a ſlaughter was made, that the bloud ran like riuers, whileſt they deſperatly fight with furious rage both on the one ſide and the other. In this cruell fight moſt part of the Ianizaries were ſlaine, and many of the Chriſtian men at armes alſo. The Baſſa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the maine battaile, and yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although hee ſaw great ſlaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, and a number of other freſh ſouldiors which he had left for the guarding of his baggage, all yet ſound men, in good hope ſo to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Baſſa began it afreſh: neither was this by him done without reaſon; for why, he was afraid leaſt if his men ſhould turne their backes and flie, the whole armie ſhould follow after: and therefore to make vſe of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies, now ſpent with long fight, would not longer endure a freſh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commaunded them to compaſſe in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied enemies, vainely boaſting, That it would bee the laſt battaile that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide, Huniades perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his men to bee in part enuironed, and by and by cauſed the waggoners with the armed carts and waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſſe them in, deuided in part from the reſt, and afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the battaile with the enemie. The fight was great, and in euery place right terrible: and albeit that the ſlaughter of the Turks was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperately: vntill that they in the right wing ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind with the waggons, & ſo from them charged with ſhot, darts, and other ſuch miſsiue weapons; ſtanding in doubt which way to turne themſelues, and beſet with danger on euery ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhruncke from the fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victorie, with great and cheerefull outcries, as men inſpired with freſh ſpirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them alſo that aſſailed thē behind in the waggons, to approch them neerer: with which double danger the Turks hardly beſet, fought diſorderly, and doubting to be all incloſed round, firſt retired, and preſently after betook themſelues to plaine flight. But they which were alreadie ſhut in betwixt the waggons and them that fought before thē, periſhed euery mothers ſon. They which fought in the left wing alſo, diſcouraged with the flight of their fellowes, fled likewiſe: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelfe ſeeing both the wings of his battell put to flight, & his own battell ſore broken alſo, ſtricken with diſpaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had ſtill kept about him againſt al euents, for the ſafegard of his perſon: after whō followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could; the reſt diſperſedly flying through the woods, forreſts, & mountains, either there periſhed with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians, were by them ſlain. Of ſo great an armie as the Baſſa brought into TRANSILVANIA, ſcarce the one halfe returned againe ouer Danubius. It is reported by ſome that were in that battell, that if Huniades hauing them in chace, had purſued them vnto Danubius, ſcarcely one man of them had eſcaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with ſo great a victorie, & to haue driuen his enemies out of the field, purſued them not far: but entring into their campe, with the ſpoile therof greatly enriched both himſelfe and his ſoldiors. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlaine, 5000 more were taken priſoners, & 100 of their enſignes. Long it were to rehearſe and reckon vp the rich ſpoile there taken, the guilt armour, and goodly furni-

furniture, both of men and horſes, beſide the rich pauillions and tents there ſtanding. In breefe, the wealth there found, was ſo great, as that there was no man in Huniades armie, which was not thereby for euer enriched. Huniades for this ſo great a victorie, and for his countrey, deliuered from ſo great a feare, cauſed generall prayers with thankes giuing, for the ſpace of three daies, to be made in all churches of thoſe three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatened; and at VASCAPE, where the battaile was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turks enſignes, as trophees of the victorie there gotten. This was the famous battaile of VASCAPE, wherein Huniades got the greateſt victorie that euer any Chriſtian prince before that time obtained againſt the Turkiſh kings. The fields thereabouts lay couered with the dead bodies of the ſlaine Turkes, whoſe carrion carkaſſes ſo infected the aire, that many of the better ſort of the inhabitants of the countrey were glad for a ſeaſon to leaue their dwellings, and to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to BVDA, and there preſented vnto king Vladiſlaus the enemies enſignes, with ſuch a part of the ſpoile, as might both well declare the greatneſſe of the victorie, and beſeeme the greatneſſe of ſo great a prince, which the king thankefully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in ſhort time filled euery corner of EVROPE.

Amurath a little before this great ouerthrow of his armie in TRANSILVANIA, aſſuring himſelfe of the victorie, had ſent a proud embaſſage vnto king Vladiſlaus into HVNGARIE, offering him peace, vpon condition, That he ſhould deliuer vnto him the ſtrong citie of BELGRADE or els yeeld to pay him a yearely tribute: vnto which, vpon the firſt report of the victorie, anſwere was giuen by the king, anſwerable to the proud demaund, That according to the iſſue of matters in TRANSILVANIA, hee would ſhortly in perſon himſelfe come and giue him farther anſwere. With which ſhort anſwere the proud embaſſadors were diſmiſſed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to BVDA.

How much this late ouerthrow greeued the great king Amurath, Vladiſlaus was not ignorant; either of his power and deſire of reuenge, as ſufficiently warned thereof by the worthie Huniades: for the withſtanding whereof, he thought it good not to be vnprouided. Wherefore calling together the ſtates of his kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angel, the Popes Legat; at ſuch time as they were all aſſembled, he propounded vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger threatened by the angrie Turke, leauing it vnto their graue conſideration, to determine how the ſame were by ſtrong hand and plaine force, or otherwiſe to be auerted. In which moſt honourable aſſemblie, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpoſe ſent thither by Pope Vrbane to ſtirre vp the Hungarians againſt the Turks, being requeſted by the king to deliuer his opinion firſt, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The effectuall ſpeech of Iuliam the Popes legate in the parlement to perſuade the warre.

Since the time that the Turkiſh peſtilence began to rage in EVROPE, no newes was euer more welcome vnto the great Biſhop, vnto the Apoſtolicall Senate, and other princes of ITALIE (moſt mightie king, and you other moſt worthie princes) than when it was told them, That Vladiſlaus, king of POLONIA, was by you alſo choſen king of HVNGARIE: For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian ſtate, and leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: as he in whom iuſtice, religion, wiſedome, valour, and martiall skill, doth ſo abound, that he ſeemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God ſent from heauen, than here in earth choſen by men. By this happie & fortunat choice, the minds alſo of all the Italians, which before lay heauie and diſcouraged, were lightened and reuiued: and therefore, that this choice might be vnto the Chriſtian commonweale both glorious and fortunate, they made their ſolemne vowes and prayers. At ſuch time as the moſt holy Senat vnderſtood of the ciuile diſcord of this kingdome, and the danger of the Turks faſt by, it ſent me hither to deale with you for the appeaſing of thoſe troubles and repreſſing of that miſcheefe (as you haue oftentimes heard me ſay.) The kingdome is by your force and valour, by my mediation, and the death of the queene, well pacified: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of ſafetie, glorie, and immortalitie, beſt ſitting Vladiſlaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkiſh tyrannie and their proud commaund (worthie princes) is to be repreſſed: yea their ſeruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our neckes, is to be ſhaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to dare to doe, the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune ſaid I of Huniades, nay the fortune of the Chriſtian commonweale, and preſent mercie of our bleſſed Sauiour, which ſuffereth his people to be vp and downe toſſed, but not quite drowned. If ſo great an armie of the enemies was vanquiſhed and put

to flight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but small: what is to bee hoped of thee (most mightie king) if thou shalt lead foorth thine armies thy selfe in person, vnder thine owne conduct, and the protection of Christ Iesu. The eyes of all Christian princes are cast vpon thee, vpon the Hungarian and Polonian forces; vpon thee haue they reposed all their hopes, they all expect that thou shouldest bee the reuenger of the Barbarian crueltie, the defendor of the faith, and protector of EVROPE: and that is it for which the Pope doth with his letters dayly solicite and importune you. And albeit that the common cause and quarrell of the Christian religion require it, yet doth the necessitie of HVNGARIE and POLONIA no lesse enforce it: of which, the one is most miserably and daily vexed with the Turkes forces and furie out of SERVIA and DALMATIA; and the other out of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA. Now if any there be, whom neither the Zeale of religion, the necessitie of the cause, the hope of immortall fame and glorie, can moue, let their owne safetie, the present seruitude of their wiues and children, the safegard of their wealth and substance, the lawfull reuenge of the wrongs done them, stir them vp to take in hand this sacred expedition. So fit an oportunitie is now giuen vnto you, that at one and the selfesame time you may set your bodies in perpetuall safetie and happinesse, your soules in quietnesse and rest, and vnto both giue eternall glorie and happinesse. You lacke not (worthie captaines) money, the sinewes of the warre, which shall be brought vnto you from all parts of the Christian commonwealth, not lustie and courageous souldiours, not policie, not fortune, not the propitious heauenly powers, which haue made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion: you want nothing (woorthie princes) but will. It is an expedition necessarie, religious, profitable, and honourable: wherein are propounded most ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (most mightie prince, and you right worthie princes all) I pray and beseech you by the faith of Christ Iesu, by the loue of your children, by the health of your kingdome, and deliuerance from your present destruction, with valiant courage, and one consent to take this sacred war in hand, and so thereby to enroll your names in the eternall booke of fame. And sith that you are to goe, not so much to a worldly as a spirituall war, against the enemies of Christ and his truth, take vp your armes with such Zeale, courage, and cheerefulnesse, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valour, the present danger, and the mercies of God towards you, seeme of right to require.

The pitifull complaint of the Despot, of the crueltie of the Turks, perswading the Hungarians to take the warre against them in hand.

The Legat hauing made an end, forthwith ensued the miserable supplication and teares of the Despot, perswading them, of the necessitie of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring vnto them the crueltie of the Turks, their torments and strange tortures, his sonnes depriued of their sight, and spoiled of their genitoires, many halfe mangled, and moe cut in sunder with sawes; some slaine quick, and other buried aliue, with many other strange kinds of death, such as would abhorre any Christian eares to heare. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to looke to themselues, told them, That they were but by the riuer SAVVS, deuided from the Turks; which in Summer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in Winter hard frozen, and so to bee passed: that the countrey beyond DANVBIVS lay all open vpon them; and that he, sometime the rich king of SERVIA, was now driuen into exile by the power of the Turke, depriued of his kingdome, of his children, shamefully disgraced, spoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to find any safe place to rest in. First he fled (as he said) to RAGVSIVM, where by and by he was sought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into HVNGARIE, which was also forthwith by them on euery side infested; and whereof the Barbarian king now asked tribute, to haue some colour for the inuasion thereof: which dreadfull enemie was not farre off from it, but still houered euen ouer it: as well witnessed VALACHIA and TRANSILVANIA, two of the greatest and richest prouinces of the Hungarian kingdome; which had not the valour of Huniades, the fortune of the commonweale, and aboue all, the mercie of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthie nation, the state of HVNGARIE had now ben vtterly forlorne. The euents of war (he said) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not euery day bee tempted. Wherefore with many teares abundantly running down his aged face, he besought king Vladislaus & the rest, not to let slip this faire occasion, neither by cowardise or negligence to break off the course of their good fortune and victorie: but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes than of their own, and to satisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he said) a sufficient example to all men. Besides that he offred a great sum of mony himselfe towards the defraying of the charges of the war, assuring thē also of great supplies both of men & mony from diuers other Chri-

Chriſtian princes. Which opinion of the Legat & Deſpots, being generally liked & approued, a decree was made by the whole court of parlament there aſſembled, That the king ſhould himſelfe in perſon with all ſpeed poſsible entertain that honorable war. So that though it were now vpon the approach of winter, yet were men taken vp in euerie place, and embaſſadours ſent vnto the Emperour, and the other neighbour princes, to pray of them aid againſt the common enemie. Who for the moſt part excuſed themſelues by their owne particuler affaires, but ſent no aid at all. Neuertheleſſe many deuout Chriſtians both out of FRANCE and GERMANIE, for the zeale they bare vnto Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion, forſaking wife and children, and whatſoeuer they had elſe, came and worthily ſerued vpon their owne charge. The Spring being come, and ſupplications made in all places for the proſperous ſucceſſe of that religious warre, king Vladiſlaus the firſt of May ſet forward from BUDA, where paſsing the riuer DANUBIVS and marching faire and ſoftly, and coming to the riuer TIBISCVS, hee there ſtaied three daies for the comming of his armie. Departing thence, and marching on alongſt the ſide of DANUBIVS, vntill he came within the ſight of BVLGARIA, hee there at a place called COBIS, ouer against SYNDEROVIA, paſſed ouer DANVBIVS with his armie, which was now growne verie great: and ſo marched directly to SOPHIA ſcituate about ſixe daies march from DANVBIVS, in the frontiers of BVLGARIA, ſo called of a moſt ſumptuous and magnificent temple there built by Iuſtinian the great emperour. Which citie being then old and ruinous, and but badly fortified, was eaſily taken; and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the kings commandement burnt, as were all the other countrey townes and villages thereabouts, to the terrour of the reſt. Marching thence hee came vnto the riuer MORAVA and there encamped: where the plaine countrey, eaſily riſeth and falleth in manner of the ſea when it is mooued with a little wind. Here fiue hundreth light horſemen, being ſent ouer the riuer, not ſo much to ſeeke after preie, as to view the countrey which way the armie might moſt ſafely and eaſily paſſe, hapned vpon the Turks ſcouts, of whom they tooke foure: and vnderſtanding by them, that two thouſand of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themſelues to weake to encounter them, they retired backe againe with all ſpeed they could vnto the riuer: where many of them, for feare, leapt headlong from the high and broken bankes, and ſo periſhed in the deepe; the reſt terrified with the misfortune of their fellows, ſtood ſtill doubtfully expecting what ſhould become of themſelues. Beyond the riuer was another hill, vpon the top whereof the king with a great number of horſemen were hunting: whom the Turks a far off diſcrying, and doubting to fall into ſome ambuſh, of purpoſe laid for them betwixt them and the riuer, without cõming on further, retired. Which they that before fearefully ſtaied on the farre ſide of the riuer perceiuing, and now encouraged by the comming of the king downe to the riuer, followed a while after, ſo to increaſe their feare; and ſo hauing well feared one another, retired on both ſides worſe afraid than hurt. The next daie the king paſſed ouer the riuer, ſending out his ſcouts to ſee if all were cleare before him: by whom he was aduertiſed that the Turks were at hand, hauing placed certaine ambuſhes faſt by, expecting but a fit time to ſet vpon him. Wherevpon entring into counſaile with his beſt and moſt expert captaines, what were beſt to be done; it was reſolued vpon, that Huniades the next night with ten thouſand choice horſemen, ſhould vpon the ſuddaine ſet vpon the enemie, then fearing nothing leſſe. Who conducted by the eſpials, was in the firſt watch of the night brought verie neere vnto them. The moone by chance as fauoring his great attempt, did then ſhine out, ſo that he might well diſcern how the enemie lay encamped, and which way for to charge them to his moſt aduantage; which was by the ſame way they were moſt like to flye, if they ſhould be put to the worſt: vnto which place he led his men, and there with a moſt hideous outcrie, entred the campe, as then for the moſt part buried in ſleepe and ſecuritie: when as the Turkes awaked with the ſuddaine noiſe as it were out of a dead ſleepe, and diſmaied with the horrour of the crie, began to betake them ſome to their weapons, ſome to their heeles. Of whom ſuch as fled, lighting vpon the enemies troupes ſtanding in their way, ran as faſt backe againe: the other ſcarce yet well awake, and ouercome with feare, and now ſcarcely themſelues, had much adoe to make themſelues readie to fight. Huniades in the meane time riding vp and downe amongſt his men, cheered them vp, ſtill crying out and calling vpon them, couragiouſly to aſſaile their ſleepie naked and fearefull enemies, and not to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion and ſo notable a victorie now alreadie in their hands. At the firſt encounter the Turks rather made a ſtirre than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men diſmaied with his name, they turned their backs and fled, finding which way ſoeuer they tooke, their fellowes halfe dead or wounded: yea ſuch a confuſion was raiſed amongſt them, with the greatneſſe of the ſudden feare, that thuſting together, with an inconſiderate deſire of flight, they trod one another vnder foot, and thruſt themſelues vpon one anothers weapons: the greateſt part of them driuen headlong into the thickets, and other ſtraits, and not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious enemie fiercely purſuing of them, ſlaine. All that night the fearefull Turks were with great ſlaughter held in chace: but as ſoone as it was day, the reſt that remained of them ran alſo the ſame fortune with their fellowes. A farre greater ſlaughter was there made, than a man would thinke that ſo few men could haue made, when as but with ten thouſand horſe, thirtie thouſand Turks were in one night ſlaine, and foure thouſand taken, with a number of their enſignes. Of Huniades his men were not many loſt, for the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter, moſt report not aboue fiue hundreth; for few of them found any enemie to reſiſt them. There was taken all the ſpoile of a moſt rich camp, the enemie hauing caried with them nothing out of it. Huniades hauing in ſo ſhort time gained ſo notable a victorie, and enriched his armie, returned to the king in great triumph: neither was that day more joyfull vnto theſe victorious ſouldiors, than vnto the reſt of the armie, who moſt joyfully expected their returne. The king and the Deſpot, hearing of the approach of Huniades from the ſlaughter of the Turks, with the great applauſe and joyfull acclamation of the other legions went to meet him three miles: and at ſuch time as at their firſt meeting Huniades was about to haue lighted to haue done him honour, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to doe, but taking him by the right hand, joyed with him for the victorie, thanking God in the hearing of the whole armie, that hee of his mercie had giuen him ſuch a captaine, as without enuie in all mens judgements was worthie to rule the Romane empire. In briefe, he ſhewed how much his countrey, his kingdome, yea the Chriſtian commonweale was bound and indebted vnto him, gaue him his due praiſes, exhorting all others to imitate his glorie: the like honour did alſo all the reſt of the nobilitie vnto him. As for the common ſouldiors, they could not be ſatisfied with beholding of him, but embracing one another, as if they would haue died one in anothers armes, welcomed their victorious friends. So with joy joyning their forces together, and ſending the rich ſpoile of the enemie, with the priſoners chained together in long rancks, before them; the king and Huniades, in great triumph returned into the campe, where they cauſed generall prayers with thankeſgiuing vnto almightie God, for ſo great a victorie, to bee made thoughout the armie.

The meeting of Vladiſlaus and Humades after the victorie.

The Legat Iulian, generall of the voluntarie Chriſtians, which for deuotion ſerued of their owne charge, after ſo great a victorie moſt earneſtly perſuaded the king and the reſt of the great commaunders of the armie to proſecute their good fortune, and in God his ſo great fauor not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the reſt of BVLGARIA. Now had Huniades by his eſpials learned, that from SOPHIA it was but three dayes journey to PHILIPPOPOLIS, a great citie of THRACIA; and the like diſtance from thence to HADRIANOPLE, the cheefe ſeat of the Turkiſh tyrant; and as much more to CONSTANTINOPLE. The onely difficultie was, how to paſſe the great and rough mountaine HEMVS, which running a maruellous way in length, euen vnto the Euxine ſea, and mating almoſt the skie, deuideth the countries of BVLGARIA and SERVIA, from MACEDONIA and THRACE: and for the great height and roughneſſe thereof, is not to be paſſed ouer but in two places; the one made by the great emperor Traian and the Romanes, where as yet is to be ſeene a mightie ſtrong gate built of great ſquare ſtone, whereby the paſſage that way was opened or ſhut at the pleaſure of them that had the keeping thereof: the other neere vnto a little riuer, which the Bulgarians now call SALTIZA. By either of theſe waies if he ſhould find them open, Huniades, vnto whom the king had committed both the leading and the conduct of the armie, purpoſed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they tooke all ſuch townes of BVLGARIA as ſtood in their way; ſome by force, ſome by compoſition: wherein was no ſmall helpe, the conformitie of the Chriſtian religion, the horrible crueltie of the Turks, and great affinitie of language, the moſt effectuall meanes to win the loue of ſtrangers: For the Polonians and the Bulgarians, both deſcended of the Sclauonians, and vſing the ſame language, the Polonian horſemen came to no towne, but it preſently yeelded. But being come vnto the mountaine HEMVS, to haue entered into THRACIA, the Winter weather being now very cold, they learned by their eſpials, that the aforeſaid paſſages were both faſt ſhut vp with great ſtones, timber, and ſuch other like matter, ſo ſtrongly, as that they were very hardly to be forced. Wherefore Huniades leauing the straighter way made by the hand of man (which beside the former fortification at the great gate, the Turkes had in many places, with abundance of water poured downe the steepe hill in the night, and hard frozen with the coldnesse of the weather, made so slipperie, as that it was not possible either for man or beast there to stand, or to get vp that way) vpon Christmas euen came to the other, by which the riuer Saltiza runneth, the which he found likewise shut. Here they met with many inconueniences: first, the difficultie of the passage, which old Amurath had not without great reason shut vp, and there placed strong garrisons, so at ease and without danger of battaile (so often by his Bassaes vnfortunatly proued) to defend his kingdome in MACEDONIA and THRACIA from the inuasion of the Hungarians, whom now of all nations he most dreaded. Beside that, in the armie was such want of all things, as that the souldiors were readie to forsake their ensignes, and to rise vp in a generall mutinie: for the countrey neere vnto the mountaine HEMVS, rising high with broken rockes and inaccessible places, was altogether barren, and victuals failing in the campe, they were glad to liue with a little wheat and flesh boiled together, and that so sparingly, as that the soldiors began now generally to grow weake and faint. Besides that, the Winter was exceeding cold, and the frost so great, that many times they could not goe out of their tents to seeke for forrage or water. So that the armie enforced with hunger and cold, and the difficultie of the passage, began to retire, & had now vndoubtedly beene dissolued, had it not been for the often and earnest persuasions of Huniades: for he daily told them, that the greatest difficulties were alreadie past, that that which remained, was with their wonted valour and courage to be endured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult: that they should forthwith come into the borders of THRACIA, where they should find plentie of all things: that they were now come so farre, that if they would go backe againe, they should in those wast countries, through which they were to passe, find greater difficulties and dangers than in going forward: that these straights once opened, remained no more trauell, but cheerefully to fall to the spoile of a most rich and pleasant country. They were not (as he said) to stay in the middest of their fortunes, for that it was not alwaies permanent: and for that the contempt of God his fauours, caused them to be oftentimes taken from vs: all that was yet done (hee said) was nothing, if they proceeded not farther: for that whatsoeuer they had alreadie woon, was easily by the enemie to be recouered; except that those which yet remained (for that most part of them, as he said, were slaine with their houses burnt ouer their heads) were driuen out of THRACIA and MACEDONIA, and so quite out of EVROPE. So whilest the souldiours heard Huniades speake, euery man was well encouraged: but when they remembred the miseries wherewith they were enuironed, they cursed all the rash attempts of ambitious princes. In the meane time newes was brought by the scouts, that the Turkes were comming after them: but then began they to rejoice, as deeming it much more honor, manfully to die in battell, than to starue with hunger and cold. Against these Turks was Huniades sent, with certain troupes of horsemen: who encountering with them, easily inforced them with losse to retire. Eight times he encountred them (as the soldiors there present reported) and as often put them to flight. In retiring backe from the impregnable mountaine, the king with the greatest part of the armie went before; after whom followed Huniades & the Despot, a good daies march: when the Turks that kept the passage vpon the mountain, vnderstanding of their return, followed them downe the hill, in good hope to be of them well reuenged, before they should get out of BVLGARIA. Carambey the Bassa of ROMANIA, and brother to Caly-Bassa (a man of all others in greatest fauor with Amurath, and his brother in law, as hauing married his sister) was generall of this armie, and by him appointed for the keeping of these straits; with expresse charge, vpon no occasion whatsoeuer, although it made shew of neuer so assured a victorie, to fight with the enemie: for he thought it victorie ynough, without any losse to haue kept his enemies out of THRACIA. Which the old kings cõmand, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory easily to answer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Christian armie descending down the broken mountains was come to a great mountaine, which the Bulgarians call CVNOBIZA, and part of the mountain HEMVS: at whose heeles followed Carambey, with his Turks, still houering ouer their heads, to take them at some aduantage: whom the Christians beholding, could not by their captaines be staied, but that they would many times by companies flie forth vpon them, and desperatly fight with them in places of great disaduauntage, saying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than to starue with hunger and cold. Here Carambey, being himselfe a man of great courage, and deſirous of honour, and by the raſhneſſe of his enemies allured to fight; and withall, beſide the aduantage of the ground, perceiuing himſelfe to exceed his enemies both in ſtrength and number of men, could not be ſtaied but would needs giue battaile, with ſuch a deſire, as if he had been alreadie aſſured of the victorie. Huniades and the Deſpot had before perceiued that the Turks, prouoked with the brauing of their men, would aſſuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the abſence of the king, who (as is beforeſaid) was gone a dayes march before they ſaw they could neither ſhun battaile, neither if they could haue ſo done, would their deſperat ſouldiors be ſtaied, for the deſire they had to fight. Yet ſeeing Carambey comming down vpon them, they put themſelues (though vnwillingly) in beſt order they could to receiue him; perſuading their ſoldiors not raſhly in furie to run vpon their enemies, as deſperat men prodigall of their liues, but to keepe their rankes, and orderly to fight, and ſo like valiant men to carie away the victorie, or to leaue vnto their enemies a bloodie remembrance thereof. Now had Carambey ſent his horſemen downe the hill, and the battaile was begun, where both the armies met together with great furie, and a cruell fight was made both at the foot of the hill and amongſt the hils and vallies alſo: in which hard encounter many were ſlaine, as well on the one ſide as the other. The Polonian men at armes (whom the king but a little before had left with Huniades againſt all euents) with the Hungarian light horſemen (of whom the Deſpot had the leading) fought ſo that day, as if they had ſought for nothing more but how honourably to die. And the Turkes for a ſpace ſtood hard to it, ſo that many were there ſlaine: yet at length finding themſelues hardly laied to, as by deſperat men, reſolued to ſell their liues deere, they began to faint and to giue ground: when as Carambey comming in behind them with new ſupplies, rated the cowardly, ſtayed them that were flying, and ſometime with rough ſpeeches, ſometime with faire perſuaſion, encouraged the wauering, and reſtored the battaile, before almoſt quite loſt. Neither did Huniades and the Deſpot leſſe beſtirre them, but as ſoone as they perceiued the enemie a little to faint, by and by cried out Victorie; with cheerefull ſpeech encouraging their men, ſtill calling vpon them, To keepe their rankes ſtrong, and to vrge their preſent good fortune, aſſuring themſelues, that they fought againſt thoſe infidels, vnder the fauour and protection of the Almightie. And forthwith ſent certaine companies of footmen, who climbing vp the hill, amongſt the buſhes with their halfe pikes and bore-ſpeares paunched the Turks horſes as they paſſed by them. Theſe looſe companies did the Turkes horſemen much harme, and here began their battaile to decline; they which were comming downe, for feare of the danger retiring backe againe vnto them that were left aboue, for the keeping of the ſtraits. And the bolder ſort of them, which were come downe into the valleyes, compaſſed about with the men at armes, hardly recouered the riſing of the hill. Carambey in the meane while crying out behind them, one while called backe them that fled, another while releeued them that fainted, and to the vttermoſt of his power reſtoring the battaile, performed all the parts both of a valiant ſouldiour and worthie captaine, couragiouſly fighting himſelfe in the thickeſt of his enemies, and by his owne valour ſtaied for a time the loſt battaile. At length performing his laſt endeuour, deceiued by the ſnow, he fell into a bogg, where ſticking faſt with his horſe, and not able to helpe himſelfe, hee was taken priſoner by a common ſouldior. The reſt that eſcaped out of this bloodie battaile, retired themſelues vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountaine for the defence of the paſſage. After whom the Chriſtians followed, through the vntract and rough places, vntill that hindered of their farther purſuit by the approch of the night, and the abrupneſſe of the way, they were glad to ſound a retrait, and ſo retired vnto the campe. Many other great men were taken beſide Carambey, but many moe ſlaine in the battaile, and moſt of all in the flight; few eſcaped, but ſuch as fled backe againe vp into the mountaines. In the retrait Huniades ſeeing ſo gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether vnknowne) vnworthily bound, and led priſoner by a common ſouldiour, asked the ſouldiour, if he would ſell his priſoner? who ſaid, he would; and asked for him ten duckats (a poore price for ſo great a man:) vnto whom Huniades commaunded to be giuen foure hundred, and ſo ſent him to his tent, comforting of him vp with cheerefull words, and willing that he ſhould be well vſed. The Deſpot the ſame night comming to Huniades his tent, to conferre with him about the remainder of the war, and ſeeing ſo braue a man ſtanding among the reſt by the fire ſide, began to talke with him in the Turkiſh language, whereof hee had ſome knowledge, by reaſon of the neereneſſe of the nation, and ſuch matters as he had ſometimes to do with them; and hauing ſome geſſe by his talke what he

he was, and pittying his eſtate, asked Huniades, how he would ranſome him? who ſaid, that hee coſt him foure hundred duckats, but that he valued him at fortie thouſand, which the Deſpot offered to pay him. Thus by the ſtrange change of fortune was Carambey, of late ſo great a commaunder, and ſo neere alied vnto the great Turke, valued and prized twice in one day by his enemies, as a mirrour of the vncertaintie of worldly bliſſe and felicitie. The Polonians report ſomewhat otherwiſe of this battaile, as that Vladiſlaus ſhould himſelfe therin be preſent, and the cheefe that therein commaunded: howbeit the Hungarian writers, whoſe credit herein we follow, report it as before, not to haue beene fought vnder the good fortune of the king then abſent, but vnder the leading of Huniades and the Deſpot.

Out of this battaile (or as ſome others report, a little before out of the battaile of MORAVA) fled the great captaine George Caſtriot, otherwiſe of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now ſeeking to deliuer both himſelfe, and his natiue countrey of EPIRUS out of the thraldome of the Turks, as preſently after he did: whoſe vnwonted flight, not a little terrified the reſt of the Turks armie, and much furthered the Chriſtians victorie, whoſe proceedings he alwaies ſecretly fauored: hauing (as it was thought) ſecret intelligence with the great captain Huniades, who not without inſtructions from him (as ſome ſay) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turkes at MORAVA. But of him and his worthie acts done for the deliuerance and defence of his countrey, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Shortly after this great ouerthrow and diſcomfiture of the Turks, the two great captaines Huniades, and the Deſpot, together with the king, conſulted for the remouing of the Turks gariſons left aboue for the keeping of the ſtait paſſages of the mountaine, and the proſecution of the war. Which Vladiſlaus (conſidering the difficultie of the matter, and his ſouldiors neceſsitie) thought it not good further to proſecute, but forthwith to returne. But Huniades and the Deſpot, the one thirſting after honour, and the other in no leſſe hope, by the good ſucceſſe of this war, to recouer again his loſt kingdome, ſayd, That the Turkes were in any caſe to be remooued, the paſſage opened, and the ſparks that yet remained, for feare of raiſing a greater fire, extinguiſhed: oppoſing againſt the difficultie by the king alleaged, the inuincible courage of his ſouldiours, whereunto they ſaid nothing was impoſsible or difficult. Vnto which opinion the king alſo (leaſt he ſhould ſeeme to diſtruſt the valour of his captaines or ſouldiours) eaſily yeelded, and ſo commaunded on God his name to ſet forward. The firſt that mounted the hill was the king his battaile, which by the roughneſſe and abruptneſſe of the mountaine hindered, oftentimes ſtaied. But Huniades ſtill caried with an earneſt deſire to proſecute the victorie, and leauing nothing vnattempted, in ſearching about found a crooked turning way, whereby he with his men more eaſily and readily got vp to the top of the mountaine euen with their enemies, vndeſcried or moleſted, by reaſon of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope eaſily to haue come vnto their enemies. But being come vp to the place they deſired, they found ſuch a deepe and wide gaping of the rocke, betwixt them and the enemie, as was neither to bee paſſed, or filled vp: yet being come verie neere, they attempted by crosbow ſhot, and great ſtones caſt out of ſlings, and other ſuch engines to haue remooued the Turks from their places: who were therewith and with their vnexpected approach, at the firſt ſo greatly both annoyed and diſcomfited, that they were almoſt at the point to haue forſaken the paſſage, had not Alis Beg (but the night before choſen for their Generall in ſtead of Carambey) encouraged them and taught them, how by ſhrowding themſelues vnder the broken rocks, and parapets with tumultarie labour caſt vp, to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of their enemies. In the meane time alſo, Huniades by another more high and ſteepe way, whereby the enemie was alſo to be approached, had ſent vp other companies of ſouldiours: who fighting at too much diſaduantage, were by the Turks eaſily rejected. So at length ſeeing the vain attempt giuen by himſelfe vpon the top of the hill: and the deſperate danger of the other in climing the inacceſsible mountaine, where one might keepe downe an hundreth, diſpairing to inforce the enemie, hee by the kings commaund, cauſed a retrait to bee ſounded, and ſo againe retired downe the mountaine, to the great rejoycing of the Turks. The next daie the winter cold raging, and wants in the armie ſtill more and more increaſing, the king with the reſt of the great commaunders entred into conſultation, for the haſting of their returne out of that rough and barraine countrey, into places of greater plentie, before the armie were brought to any greater extremitie. Whereunto Huniades (giuing place vnto neceſſitie, which alwaies ſuffereth not to bee regarded that is ſeemely) now eaſily yeelded: onely the Deſpot ſpake againſt it, blaming them, that hauing taken the Generall, and put their enemies to flight, and victorie now as it were in their hands, they would not proſecute the ſmall remainder of the warre, but cowardly turne their backs vnto their vanquiſhed enemies: promiſing that hee himſelfe would find money inough for the prouiding of all things needfull for the releefe of the armie. So ſaid the Popes Legat alſo. But foraſmuch as the wants in the armie were great, and the ſouldiours preſently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer ſo great, be perſuaded to ſtaie; openly crying out, that it was not their captains and lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poore ſouldiours that ſtarued for hunger: as for the Deſpot, that he in hope of recouering of his kingdome, perſuaded things impoſsible, and no way to be performed, neither to be any thing mooued with the death of their men or cattell: Need (they ſaid) could not be vanquiſhed: but that when Winter was paſt, they would willingly returne againe vnto the ſacred warre: In the meane time Winter raging, and hunger commaunding, let vs giue ouer (ſaid they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refreſh our bodies, ſpent with labour, cold, and hunger. For which reaſons, the king ſending before his baggage, retired againe by the ſame way he came. Which the Turkes from aboue beholding, and ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled: oftentimes aſſailing them in the rereward, and ſetting vpon them ſometimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, with often skirmiſhes both did and receiued much harme. Whoſe manner of fight was, to retire when they were themſelues charged, and preſently by great troupes to charge again their enemies, their backes once turned to them; and ſo troubled the armie, that it was conſtrained oftentimes to ſtay; beſides that, loaded with the rich ſpoile of the enemie, and much baggage, it could not of it ſelfe make any great haſt. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke wood, full of deepe boggs and water-courſes, hard to be paſſed through: where the reſt of the armie going before, in the rereward, at the entrance of the wood, were left certaine ſtrong companies of men at armes, as a wall againſt the purſuing enemies; whom the Turks with their readie light horſemen fiercely charged: where betwixt them, in the wood, was fought a great fight, and a great tumult raiſed: vnto the noiſe whereof, they which marched before haſtily returning, in skirmiſhing, many of them fell into thoſe deepe boggs and queachie places, out of which they could hardly rid themſelues againe. Beſides that, there were many crooked and troubleſome turnings and windings, with ſuddaine diſcents, ſo ſteepe, as that in going downe the ſame, their horſes came tumbling heeles ouer head, and there lay ouerthrowne, together with their riders: in ſuch ſort, as that to auoid theſe difficulties, they were oftentimes enforced to fight on foot. In which troubleſome skirmiſh, about foureſcore of the men at armes were loſt; but of the Turkes, beſide them which were ſlaine, were taken an hundred and ſeuentie, all whom Huniades cauſed to be preſently ſlain. In this wood the Chriſtians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies aſſaults. Wherefore wants daily more and more encreaſing in the armie, which by reaſon of the multitude of their carriages, abundance of their baggage, and often aſſaults of the Turkes, was able to make no way: the king for feare his armie ſhould in ſo long & ſlow a march through thoſe troubleſome and barren countries, be conſumed with hunger and other wants, cauſed all the carriages and baggage to be brought into the middeſt of the armie, and of it, all ſuch things as ſerued rather for burthen than vſe, to be there burnt: and the armes as well of ſuch ſouldiors as he had loſt, as of the enemie, to bee buried in the ground, and all the weake beaſts that ſerued for burthen, to be killed. So the armie well diſcharged of ſuch vnprofitable burthens, marched much more ſpeedily, neither was ſo much ſubiect vnto the aſſaults of the Turks, as before. And ſo at length by long journies, Vladiſlaus with his armie arriued at BELGRADE, where hee was of his ſubiects honourably receiued. And hauing there ſtaied certaine daies, and well refreſhed his armie, departing thence, and paſsing the riuer SAVUS, came to the royall citie of BVDA: where he was of all his ſubiects joyfully receiued alſo. The Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Deſpot on the left: after whome followed other colonels, captaines, and lieutenants, with their companies; who at the firſt meeting with the cittizens, more than a mile out of the cittie, in token of their mutuall joy, gaue together ſuch joyfull acclamations and outcries, as that the heauens ſeemed to reſound, and the earth to ſhake with the noiſe thereof. Before the king, at his comming vnto the cittie, went a long companie of the notable Turkes captiues; and next before him, Carambey, bound in chaines, vpon whom all mens eyes were fixed. With them were alſo carried the enemies enſignes, and ſuch ſpoyles as had beene ſaued.

The Hungarians much troubled in paſsing a thicke wood.

Vladiſlaus honorably receiued at Buda.

Behind

Behind the king came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the middeſt betwixt the Legate on the right hand, and the Deſpot on the left, as he that next vnto the king had beſt deſerued the honor of the triumph. Next vnto them followed the deuout Chriſtians, that for the zeale of religion had moſt honourably of their owne charges voluntarie ſerued in thoſe wars: and on both ſides of them the ciuile magiſtrates and beſt of the citizens: behind them came the reſt of the legions, and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiſcuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praiſes of the king, and Huniades. Before all theſe went the prelates and prieſts in ſolemne proceſſion, ſinging hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing vnto almightie God. Vladiſlaus comming vnto the gate of the citie, acknowledging God to haue been the authour of ſo great a victorie, alighting from his horſe, on foot went firſt vnto the Cathedrall church of our ladie; and there giuing moſt hartie thanks vnto almightie God, hanged vp the enemies enſignes, and part of the ſpoile, in perpetuall remembrance of ſo notable a victorie: which hee afterward cauſed to bee moſt liuely depainted in a faire table of moſt curious worke, and there in the ſame church to bee hanged vp: as were alſo the armes of all the noble Chriſtians that ſerued in that moſt famous expedition, which there long time after remained. Which ſolemnities ended, he went to his pallace in the caſtle, and there hauing giuen vnto euerie man, but eſpecially vnto Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leaue to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom alſo the Polonians in moſt part agree, report of this notable expedition of their king Vladiſlaus: howbeit the Turks (notable diſſemblers of their own loſſes) confeſsing the great ouerthrow, call the Baſſa ſo ouerthrowne not by the name of Carambey, but of Caſſanes; and the noble priſoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet Beg, Sanzacke of ANCYRA Amurath his ſon in law, and brother to Cali-Baſſa Amurath his great councellour, of ſome called Carambey after the name of his father.

Out of this late ſlaughter of the Turkes, wherein Carambey was taken, eſcaped that valiant prince and famous warriour George Caſtriot (of the Turks called Scanderbeg) as is before declared: whoſe noble mind had long time deſired to breake out of the golden fetters of the Turkiſh thraldome, and to be reuenged of the intollerable injuries by Amurath done to his countrey, his parents, his brethren, and himſelfe. Although hee had alwaies moſt warily diſſembled the ſame, for feare of the old tirant: being often times ſolicited and animated therevnto by ſecret letters and meſſengers from his friends in EPIRVS, knowing right well that the leaſt ouerture thereof, had been vnto him preſent death. But finding no fit meanes for the accompliſhing thereof, wiſely diſſembled the ſame, with all the ſhewes of loue and loyaltie vnto Amurath that might be: vntill that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turks armie, vnder the leading of Carambey, and in ſo great a confuſion, he tooke occaſion to put in practiſe what he had long before in his deepe conceit plotted, for the deliuerie both of himſelfe and his countrey from the Turkiſh bondage and ſlauerie. At which time Scanderbeg (for ſo from henceforth we will call him) hauing a little before imparted the matter vnto ſome of his truſtie friends and countrey men, no leſſe deſirous of libertie than himſelfe, but eſpecially vnto his nephew Ameſa, the ſonne of his brother Repoſius, a young man of great courage (in that great confuſion of the Turkiſh armie, when euerie man was glad to ſhift for himſelfe) had euer in his flight a vigilant eie vpon the Baſſaes principall ſecretarie; whom accompanied with a few Turks, he with his nephew Ameſa, and other of his faithfull friends cloſely followed, as he fled from the ſlaughter: but when he had got the ſecretarie with his few followers in place moſt conuenient for his purpoſe, he ſet vpon the Turks and ſlew them euerie one: and carying the ſecretarie away with him faſt bound, when hee had brought him whether he thought good, with great threats compelled him (ſore againſt his will) to write counterfait letters, as from the Baſſa his maiſter, vnto the gouernour of CROIA, commanding him in Amuraths name, Forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg, the new choſē Gouernor, the charge of the citie with the garriſon there: cunningly enterlacing many other things in the ſame letters, wherby the matter might ſeeme more probable. Which letters ſo extorted, he preſently ſlew the Secretary, & as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpoſe that his doings might be the longer kept from knowledg of Amurath, who not hearing what was become of him, might reaſonably conjecture that he was ſlaine by the Hungarians amongſt the reſt of the Turks.

Whileſt the fame of this great ouerthrow is going to HADRIANOPLE, and there filleth the Turks court with ſorrow and heauineſſe, in the meane time Scanderbeg hauing with him three thouſand Epirot ſouldiours which followed him out of the battaile, as men deſirous rather to fight for the libertie of themſelues and of their countrey, than in the quarrell of the Turke, was with incredible celeritie come into the vpper country of DIBRA, in the borders of EPIRUS, about ſeauenty miles from CROIA: into which countrey he was moſt joyfully receiued, where he ſtaied but one daie, and choſe a few of thoſe three hundreth which he brought with him, to wait vpon him when he went to CROIA, as if they had been his domeſticall ſeruants: the reſt, with other three hundreth luſtie ſouldiours, which were then come vnto him out of DIBRA, he appointed to be led by ſecret by-waies through the woods and mountaines by perfect guides, vntill they came ſo nigh CROIA as was poſsible for them to come, vnperceiued; and there to ſtaie vntill he might find oportunitie to conuaie them into the citie to oppreſſe the Turkiſh garriſon. So hee with a ſmall companie of his followers, as if they had been his priuat retinew, tooke the way towards CROIA. But when he began to draw neere to the citie, he ſent Ameſa before with two ſeruitours attending vpon him, as if he had been his Secretarie, to certifie the Gouernour of his comming. This young gentleman, as he was of a moſt ſharpe wit, and well ſpoken, ſo had he framed his countenance and attire, that he ſeemed to be a naturall Turke: who aſſoone as he was come into the citie, he went vnto the gouernor, whom after he had ſaluted according to the Turkiſh manner, hee deliuered his meſſage as from Scanderbeg his maiſter, with ſo good grace and words ſo well placed, that all he ſaid was verily beleeued for truth. But when Scanderbeg himſelf came, and had deliuered the great commaunders letters, the Gouernour made no further queſtion of the matter, but preſently deliuered vnto him the gouernment of the citie, and the next day departed out of CROIA with all his houſhould towards HADRIANOPLE. Scanderbeg hauing by this pollicie got the gouernment of the cheefe citie of EPIRVS, the night following found meanes in the dead time of the night, to receiue into the citie the ſouldiors of DIBRA, who were by this time come according as he had before appointed: moſt part of them hee placed in moſt conuenient places of the citie, and for the ſpeedie ſuppreſsion of the Turkiſh garriſon, hee with the reſt firſt ſet vpon the Turkes which kept the watch vpon the wall, and ſlue them; and afterwards breaking into their priuate houſes, ſlew many of them in their beds: the Chriſtian citizens alſo taking vp armes at the ſame time, helped to increaſe the ſlaughter of the Turks, ſo that in the ſpace of a few houres, there was none of the Turkiſh garriſon left aliue, except ſome few which were content to forſake their Mahometan ſuperſtition, and to become Chriſtians. Many of the Turks might ſo haue ſaued their liues, and would not, chooſing rather to die, and (as it is reported) alſo to kill themſelues, than to forſake their damnable ſuperſtition: ſo ſmall is the regard of life vnto reſolute mindes, in what quarrell ſoeuer.

The citie of CROIA being thus happily by Scanderbeg recouered, wherein appeared both the greateſt difficultie, and hope of his good or bad ſucceſſe in ſo great an attempt; he preſently ſent Ameſa backe again into DIBRA, and other ſpeedie meſſengers likewiſe into all the parts of EPIRVS, to diſpierce the newes, and to ſtirre vp the people to take vp armes for the recouerie of their loſt libertie: but flying Fame, the ſpeedie poſt, had preuented the meſſengers by him ſent, and alreadie filled euerie corner of EPIRVS with report of Scanderbeg his comming, and of all that was done at CROIA. And the oppreſſed Epirots which had long wiſhed to ſee that happie daie, were now vp in armes in euerie place, wanting nothing but leaders; whoſe comming although they greatly deſired, yet they ſtayed not therevpon, but running together by heapes (as the maner of the common people is in all great tumults) they ſet vpon the Turkes garriſons which lay abroad in the countrey, and ſlew moſt part of them; whereby it came to paſſe, that no Turke could ſtirre in the countrey, but that he was ſnatched vp and ſlaine, ſo that in few daies there was not a Turke to be found in EPIRVS, but ſuch as lay in garriſons in ſtrong townes. In this furie of the people, the Gouernour of CROIA, with all his retinue, was by the countrie people by the way as he went ſet vpon and ſlaine, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recouered CROIA, and ſcoured the countrey; yet to remoue the garriſons which Amurath had put in euerie ſtrong citie, was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficultie. For which purpoſe he commaunded thoſe whom he had appointed for captaines, ſpeedily to repaire vnto CROIA with all the power they could make. At which time alſo, diuers noble men his nigh kinſmen, reſorted vnto him with their followers: ſo that within a few daies, he had together at CROIA twelue thouſand ſouldiours well appointed. With this armie he marched from CROIA to PETRELLA, a ſtrong citie 25 miles diſtant from CROIA, and encamped before it. This citie is ſtrongly ſcituate vpon the top of a ſteepe rocke mountaine, mountaine, as all the rest of the cities of EPIRUS be, and was by the Turks well furnished with men, munition, and others things needfull: yet Scanderbeg was in good hope, that the Turkish garison there, terrified with the fortune of the garrison of CROIA, and the slaughter of the Turks in the countrey round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reasonable conditions. Which to make proofe of, as soone as he was encamped, he sent one of those souldiours which had followed him out of HUNGARIE (a faithfull and wise fellow) vnto PETRELLA, to offer vnto the souldiors, That if they would yeeld vp the citie, it should be at their choice, either to continue in seruice with Scanderbeg, with whom they should find most bountifull entertainement; or else to depart in safetie with bagge and baggage at their pleasure, with an honourable reward to bee diuided amongst them. The subtile messenger comming thether, and framing his tale according to the present occasion, and necessitie of the time; first declared vnto them, how that Amurath of late vanquished by the Hungarians in a great battaile, and looking euerie day to bee set vpon by diuers other Christian princes, was so busied that he had no leasure to looke into EPIRVS, or to send them any releefe: after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg, offered them the conditions before rehearsed, setting the same forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way to consider the dreadfull miserie that but the other day befell to the garrison at CROIA, and other their fellowes abroad in the countrey, whose dead bodies as then lay in euerie corner of EPIRVS for a prey to the hungrie dogs and greedie wolues: which thing was easily beleeued of them of the garrison, for that diuers of the Turks lately fled out of the countrey into the citie, had themselues seene the same to be true. The Gouernour hauing a little considered of the matter, was content to giue vp the citie, vpon condition that he with the souldiours might in safetie depart with such things as they had: not couenanting vpon any further reward, because it should not be said that he had sould the citie. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promised to performe, the Turkish Gouernour comming forth with all his garrison, yeelded vp the citie: and Scanderbeg mindfull of his promise, gaue vnto them both meat and money, and sent them with a sufficient conuoy of horsemen in safetie out of EPIRVS.

Petrella yeelded vnto Scanderbeg.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained PETRELLA, he placed therein a conuenient garrison, and set all things in order as he thought good: but suffered none to enter into the citie, more than the appointed garrison, although it was then verie cold and frostie weather. This done, he presently raised his campe, and following his good fortune, marched towards PETRA-ALBA in such hast, as if the citie had been running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be euer more pretious, yet neuer more than in martiall affaires, wherein the least moment is often times of such power as to effect or frustrate mens greatest designes. PETRA-ALBA is a citie in the country of ÆMATHIA distant from PETRELLA thirtie miles, strongly scituat vpon the top of a mountain, neere vnto the riuer ÆMATHVS. Scanderbeg had scarcely well encamped himselfe before this citie, but that the Gouernour thereof, terrified with the fortune of CROIA, and PETRELLA, offered to deliuer vp the citie, vpon the same conditions that were graunted at PETRELLA: which being agreed vpon, the citie was forthwith deliuered, and the conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba yeelded.

PETRA-ALBA being thus taken, & all things set in order: Scanderbeg caried with the course of his victorie, without delay came to STELLVSA, which is also a strong citie of ÆMATHIA, fiftie miles distant from CROIA, pleasantly (as it were of purpose) built vpon the top of an high hill, standing in the middest of a pleasant and fruitfull vallie, with great plaines round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going downe of the sunne, and rested that night. In the morning he sent a messenger to the cittie, with like conditions as were accepted at PETRELLA and PETRA-ALBA: which most part of the garrison souldiours of the Turks would gladly haue accepted, but that Desdrot the Gouernour of the citie, with some few others, earnestly withstood the rest; whereupon a great contention arose amongst the garrison souldiours. But the greater part desirous to yeeld vp the citie, when they could by no meanes persuade the Gouernour and those few which tooke his part, to yeeld to their desires; they violently set vpon him, and deliuered him with the rest to Scanderbeg, fast bound, and so yeelded vp the citie. For which fact, fearing to returne to Amurath, some of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwardes became Christians: the rest were either honestly prouided for, or else well rewarded and suffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of EPIRVS wherein any of the Turkish garrisons lay, hearing that the strongest cities were alreadie deliuered vnto Scanderbeg, in short time time yeelded themselues vpon like conditions: onely SFETIGRADE (otherwise called the holy citie) remained in the possession of the Turks: which citie is placed in the vpper country of DIBRA, in the frontiers of EPIRVS, vpon the top of an high & steep hill, as if it were an Eagles neast. Vnto this citie came Scanderbeg with all his armie: and hauing placed his tents, hee began first to assay if he could gaine it by composition, as he had done the rest: and the rather to moue them by the examples of others, he caused his embassadours to declare vnto them all that had happened at CROIA, PETRELLA, PETRA-ALBA, and STELLVSA, especially how he had vsed the garrison of STELLVSA which yeelded vnto him, with all bountie and courtesie; and how that on the contrarie part he had the gouernour in bands with all his wilfull partakers, whome they should presently see executed before their faces, if they forthwith deliuered not the citie. This message troubled the minds of all the garrison, but especially of the gouernour, seeing before his eies in the wofull example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himselfe. Whereforе fearing to deliuer his owne opinion and to giue answere vnto the embassadour, for offending the inconstant multitude and vnknowne minds of the people, he first entertained the embassadours honourably, and afterwards turning himselfe vnto the citizens and souldiours, said vnto them: Worthie men and most faithfull souldiors, what is your pleasure, or what shall we answere to these our enemies demaunds? Then one of the souldiors that stood by (a rough bold spirited fellow) vnwilling for his owne part to giue vp the citie, and deeming the gouernour to be of the same mind, in that he had tearmed them worthie and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemie, drawing out his sword, and with his right hand shaking it on high, answered:

A notable speech of a common soldior to the rest of his fellowes for the holding out of the citie against Scanderbeg.

Most valiant Gouernour, this same and the like, shall make answere for vs. Nothing was to lesse purpose, than with premeditated words to seeke to terrifie valiant minds, first with the diuerse fortune of CROIA, and then of STELLVSA; for as the faces and countenances of men are diuers, so also are their minds and dispositions. Euery man wisely directeth his owne actions, according to his owne proper humour, and by the same plaies the foole or bedlam. We prescribe no laws to them of PETRELLA, nor to them of STELLVSA, neither let them prescribe any vnto vs. Let neuer so base examples of cowardly slaues euer enter into the thoughts of courageous men: braue minds disdaine to imitate other men in their honest actions, much lesse in their cowardise. And why? for euery man liueth after his owne fashion. Wherefore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kill the gouernour of STELLVSA before our faces, let him sacrifice our fellow souldiors, doe you therefore thinke that we shall die in their bodies? Shall our liuing spirits be there extinguished? shall our blood there be spilt? But ô happie bodies, ô ghosts of me euer to be reuerenced, which in worthie defence of your libertie and faith haue indifferently contemned gold, siluer, death, and torture, and whatsoeuer els miserable worldlings hold deere in dismall! Wherefore carrie thou backe againe vnto thy master this answere from a common souldior, If he seeke to impose these conditions vpon vs, let him once more bare that arme of his, which men of courage feare not so much as he thinketh. He may peraduenture inforce vs to these conditions of his, if God forsake vs: but assuredly, persuade vs vnto them, shall he neuer. And yet for all that, your master Scanderbeg is not the man we haue long since heard him reported to be, of an honourable mind, easie to forgiue, and such a one as will indifferently judge betwixt the enemie and himselfe: for why then doth he hold in bonds the gouernour of STELLVSA, for that he freely, justly, and honorably stood in defence of his king, his faith, and libertie? Why doth he threaten him with death, whereas he hath not deserued the same, although he hath resolutely offered himselfe thereunto, for defence of his libertie?

All they which were present, listened with great attention to the soldiors speech, neither was he interrupted by any, vntill he had said what he would. Thē the soldiors thronging about him, and beating their swords & targets together, withall gaue a great shout, in token that they all approued his speech for answer. So the gouernor, encouraged with the cheerefulnes of his soldiors, returned the embassador without other answer than that of the common soldiors, and presently appointed euery man to his charge, and with great carefulnesse ordred all things for the better defence of the citie. But whē Scanderbeg had heard the answere that was sent him from the citie, deliuered by the mouth of a cōmon soldior, he smiled thereat & said: He is vndoubtedly a valiant soldior: if his deeds be answerable to his speeches: but if my force faile me not, I will also make him happy amongst the happy ghosts of thē of STELLVSA: and by & by commanded the gouernor of STELLVSA, with the other captiues to be brought before him, & there caused some of thē which were content voluntarily to forſake their Mahometane ſuperſtition, to be preſently baptized, to the great greeſe of the other Turks. Desdrot the Gouernour, with the reſt, to the terrour of the defendants, were in their ſight put to death: whereupon the garriſon ſouldiors with great indignation gaue a great ſhout from the wall, and bitterly rayled vpon the Chriſtians.

Desdrot gouernour of Stelusa, executed.

Scanderbeg conſidering the ſtrength of the citie, with the time of the yeare, vnfit for ſouldiors to keepe the field, for Winter was now growne on; left Moſes Golemus, a moſt valiant captaine, with a garriſon of three thouſand ſouldiors, to keepe in the Turkes garriſon at SFETIGRADE, and to defend the borders of EPIRVS, vntill he might at more conuenient time himſelfe returne againe to the ſiege: and ſo with the reſt of his armie repaired to CROIA, when hee had in the ſpace of little more than one moneth, to his immortall praiſe, recouered his kingdome, and driuen the Turks out of euery corner of EPIRVS, excepting onely SFETIGRADE: which citie alſo not long after was by compoſition deliuered vnto him. During all this time, from his firſt comming into EPIRVS, he neuer ſlept aboue two houres in a night, but with reſtleſſe labour proſecuted his affaires. He euer fought againſt the Turkes with his arme bare, and that with ſuch fierceneſſe, that the blood did oftentimes burſt out of his lips. It is written, that he with his owne hand ſlew three thouſand Turkes in the time of his warres againſt them. But of his great and worthie victories obtained againſt the two mightie Turkiſh kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his ſonne, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force and pollicie wrung his inheritance out of Amuraths hands, and ſcoured the Turks out of euery corner of EPIRVS; he proceeded further, and ouerran part of MACEDONIA, making ſundrie incurſions into the heart of that countrey, being then in the Turks poſſeſsion, whereby he ſo enriched his ſouldiours, that they deſired of him no better pay. Which was ſo vſuall a thing with this reſtleſſe prince, as that it began to grow into a prouerbe in moſt princes courts, That the ſpoile of Amurath his dominions, was Scanderbegs reuenewes. Complaint hereof came daily to Amuraths court, which the craftie aged ſire (being then troubled with the Hungarian warres) ſeemed at the firſt to make no great account of, but as of that hee could eaſily and at his pleaſure remedie; although hee was therewith inwardly greeued at the heart. But when the certaine report of one miſcheefe as it were in the necke of another, continually ſounded in his eares, and that he ſaw no end to be expected of theſe miſeries; he ſent Alis Baſſa, one of his greateſt men of warre, with an armie of fortie thouſand ſelect ſouldiors, at once to ſubdue the countrey of EPIRVS, and to bring it againe vnder his obeiſance. The ſetting forth of this great armie, vnder the conduct of ſo famous a captain, repleniſhed the minds of the Turks with ſuch an aſſured hope of victorie, that a man would haue thought Scanderbeg had been alreadie taken, and now brought to execution: yea the common ſouldiors before their ſetting forth, were oftentimes at vaine contention for the diuiſion of the ſpoile they were neuer like to haue: So readie are men to promiſe wonders to themſelues, whileſt they conferre but with their owne deſires. And on the other ſide, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the ſmall countrey of EPIRVS, with great terrour and feare of Alis Baſſaes comming. The countreymen with their families fled into the ſtrong citties, and the cittizens within their wals fell to fortifying the ſame, and kept continuall watch and ward, as if the enemie had then lien euen faſt by them: the aged men and women commended themſelues and all theirs firſt vnto God by prayers, and then to the courage of the luſtie ſouldiors with teares, as in caſe of extreame perill and danger. Onely Scanderbeg was nothing mooued either with the terrible report of the Baſſaes comming, or the vaine feare of his ſubjects; but alwayes kept the ſame cheerefulneſſe both of countenance and ſpeech, as he was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkiſh wars, and hauing (as was ſuppoſed) certaine intelligence before from his ſecret friends in the Turkes court, of all Amuraths deſignes. So that hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafetie of his countrey, he began to leuie an armie at CROIA: at which time moſt part of his ſubjects of EPIRVS, which were able to beare armes, repaired vnto him: the confederate Chriſtian princes alſo, his neighbours, and for moſt part his kinſmen, ſent vnto him great ſupplies: beſide other deuout and warlike minded Chriſtians, which voluntarily reſorted vnto him from farre, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he choſe only eight thouſand horſemen and ſeuen thouſand foot, when as he might haue raiſed a far greater armie: and placing ſome few in garriſons in the frontier cities where he thought moſt conuenient, all the reſt he ſent home againe to their dwellings. At which his confidencie, his friends, yea and his enemies alſo much maruelled, that when hee might might haue had so many, he would take the field with so few. With which small armie of fifteene thousand, he marched from CROIA, fourescore miles to DYBRA: where hearing by his espials, of the approch of his enemies, after he had with cheerefull speech encouraged his souldiors, he encamped with his armie in the lower countrey of DYBRA, neere vnto a wood side, right in the way where the Bassa must needs passe. In which wood, he placed Gnee Musachee, and Ameſa in ambush with three thousand men: commanding them to stand close, vntill they saw he had throughly joyned battaile with the Bassa, and then with all their force to breake forth vpon his rereward. The Bassa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg, a little before the going downe of the Sunne, and there rested that night, making great shew of mirth and joy, with great fires in euerie corner of the campe, as the Turkish manner of encamping is. Wheras in Scanderbegs campe, all things were silent, and no shew of any fire at all; for so Scanderbeg had commanded: which made the Turks the more carelesse, deeming thereby the Christians as good as alreadie discouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his armie in order of battaile, placing Tanusius in the left wing, with fifteen hundreth horsemen, and as many foot; and Moses in the right with like number: and leading the maine battell himselfe: The reareward was committed to Vranacontes, a man renowned in those daies, both for his grauitie in counsell, and for his valour in armes, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongst the rest most famous, for the worthie defending of CROIA against Amurath, being then there himselfe in person. Alis Bassa contemning the small number of Scanderbeg his armie, seeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order thereof, gaue the first charge with a small troupe of horsemen: who at the first encounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpose that the Christians hastily pursuing their vntimely hope, might disorder their battaile, and so giue occasion to their owne ouerthrow. But by the commaundement of Scanderbeg (who easily perceiued the Bassaes meaning) their dangerous forwardnesse was warily waied, and all with safetie kept in good order. So both armies comming on, the wings beganne the battaile a fresh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Bassa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the battailes were throughly joyned, Musachee and Ameſa suddenly issued out of the wood, and fiercely set vpon the rereward of the Turkes armie, where they made great slaughter, and forced many of the Turkes for feare to flie. Thus was the Bassaes great armie driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly beset and laied vnto with a small number. The Bassa had placed his best souldiours neerest vnto himselfe in the maine battaile, as his most assured strength and last refuge: these valiant men stood fast, and renewed the battaile, before almost lost. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a stand: vntill that the well aduised and valiant captaine Vranacontes hauing receiued the wearied souldiors into the rereward, and setting all things there in safetie, accompanied with certaine troupes of fresh souldiors which he brought out of the rereward, brake through the Bassaes armie with such slaughter of the Turks, that hee made way for Scanderbeg and all the rest of his armie. The Turks discomfited with the inuincible courage of these old souldiours, and the slaughter of their fellowes, which lay by heapes wallowing in their owne blood, betooke themselues to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued, and slew of them two and twentie thousand: at which time were also two thousand others taken prisoners, with foure and twentie of the Turks ensignes: whereas of the Christians were slaine not past a hundreth and twentie. The enemies tents with all their cariages, were at the same time taken also. After this great victorie, when Scanderbeg had made all his seauen thousand footmen, horsemen, by giuing vnto them the horses of the slaine Turks, he brake into the enemies countrey, and entred farre into MACEDONIA, where he filled the desires of his souldiours with the wealth and spoile thereof, sparing nothing that fire and sword could deuoure: and so with victorie returned to CROIA, where he was of his subjects joyfully receiued. Alis Bassa with the remainder of his discomfited armie, returned to HADRIANOPLE, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardise, and want of discretion, for that he had lost so puissant an armie to so weake an enemie. Whereof when he had cleared himselfe by the modest rehearsall of his former victories, and the testimonie of all the other captaines present with him in that battaile, he was pardoned, and so againe receiued into fauour, and that great ouerthrow imputed to the chance of warre.

The battell betwixt Alis Bassa and Scanderbeg.

A great slaughter of the Turks.

Amurath hauing reciued two so great ouerthrowes, first from Huniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg; and seeing himselfe elsewhere beset with so many mischiefes, as that he could not tell which way to turne himselfe; tormented with dispaire, and desire of re-

Amurath in dispaire.

uenge, whereof hee saw small possibilitie, fell into such a melancholie passion, that ouercome with the darke conceits thereof, he was about to haue become the bloodie executioner of himselfe, had not Cali Bassa by his graue aduice comforted vp his dying spirits: by whose persuasion, contrarie to his haughtie nature, he yeelded by his embassadors sent for the same purpose, to desire peace of Vladislaus king of HVNGARIE, vsing the exiled Despot of SERVIA (his father in law, then present with the king) as a meane therein. Who at the first gaue small credite vnto the embassadours, or vnto such things as they told him, vntill that at length better persuaded of the true meaning of the Turke, he so wrought the matter both with the king and the rest of the nobilitie, and especially with Huniades, that there was an honourable peace concluded. The capitulations whereof were, first, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces and garrisons, should clearly depart out of SERVIA, and restore the same vnto the possession of George the Despot, the right lord and owner thereof; deliuering also freely vnto him his two sonnes, Stephen and George, who bereft of their sight, he had long time kept in straight prison. Also, that from thenceforth he should make no claime vnto the kingdome of MOLDAVIA, nor to that part of BVLGARIA which he had in the last wars lost. And finally, that he should not inuade or molest the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace: and to pay 40000 duckats for the ransome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkish tyrant full sore against his will had condiscended, a peace for ten yeares was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the same by solemne oath confirmed: king Vladislaus taking his oath vpon the holy Euangelists, and Amurath (by his embassadors) vpon their Turkish Alcoran. This was the most honorable peace that euer Christian prince had before that time made with any of the Turkish kings, and most profitable also, had it been with like sinceritie kept, as it was with solemnitie confirmed.

Amurath by the persuasion of Cali Bassa seeketh for peace of king Vladislaus.

The capitulations of the ten yeares peace concluded betwixt Vladislaus and Amurath.

Amurath with this peace deliuered of his greatest feare, conuerted all his forces against the Caramanian king, in reuenge of the injuries by him done, whilst he was occupied in the Hungarian warres. This king of CARAMANIA knowing himselfe vnable to withstand so great an enemie, durst neither meet him in the field, nor trust himselfe to the strength of any his cities or strong castles, but fled into the mountaines, there fortifying himselfe more surely than in any other his strong holds. Amurath entring into CARAMANIA, made great spoile in the country as he went, and tooke great booties. At last comming to ICONIVM, he laid hard siege to the same. The poor king seeing his kingdome spoiled, and his cheefe citie in danger to be lost, sent embassadours, and with them his wife also, which was Amuraths sister, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yearely the double tribute which hee before paied, and for the performance thereof to giue his sonne in hostage. Vpon which conditions Amurath graunted him peace, and so returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldest sonne, died, to the great greefe of his aged father, being slain with a fall from his horse, as he was hawking.

Amurath inuadeth Caramania.

Old Amurath throughly wearied with continuall warres, and other troubles incident vnto restlesse roomes, resolued now to retire himselfe to a more priuat and quiet kind of life: and therfore sent for his sonne Mahomet, being then but fifteene yeares old, to whom hee voluntarily resigned his kingdome, appointing Caly Bassa his tutor, with one Chosroe, a learned doctor of their law, to be his trustie counsellors and cheefe directers. And so taking with him Hamze-Beg, one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greatest pleasure, departed to MAGNESIA, and there as a man wearie of the world, gaue himselfe to a solitarie and monasticall kind of life, in the companie of certaine religious Turkish monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great kings and princes, as well Mahometanes as Christians, glad before of the Hungarian victorie, were now no lesse sorrie to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt king Vladislaus and the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, That the prosecution of that warre so happily begun, would haue beene the vtter ruine and destruction of the Turkish kingdome. Wherefore they sought by all possible meanes to induce the young king Vladislaus to breake the league he had so lately and so solemnely made with the Turke: especially Iohn Palæologus the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, did by letters importune the king to remember the confederation he had made with the other Christian princes, for the maintenance of the wars against the common enemie of Christianitie: which princes were now prest and readie (as he said) to assist him with their promised aid: adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had diuerse times sought to joyne with him in amitie and friendship, hee had vtterly rejected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuersall profit (like to ensue to all Christendome by that religious warre) before his owne proper securitie and profit, being for his part in readinesse to joyne his forces with the kings, if he would presently enter into armes: which he could neuer doe in better time than now, whileſt Amurath, terrified with his late ouerthrow, and ſtill beſet with doubtfull war, had drawne his greateſt forces out of EVROPE into ASIA, in ſuch diſordered haſt, as that it ſhould ſeeme he rather fled for feare of his enemies in EVROPE, than marched to encounter his enemies in ASIA, and now being wearie of all, had betaken himſelfe vnto a priuat kind of life. To conclude, he requeſted the king not to leaue him and the other Chriſtian princes of ſmall power, as a prey vnto the Turke, who would aſſuredly with all hoſtilitie inuade them, ſo ſoone as he thought himſelfe ſafe from the danger of the Hungarians. At the ſame time alſo, and vpon the departure of the Turkes embaſſadours, for the performance of ſuch things as they had promiſed; letters came from Francis the Cardinall of FLORENCE, Generall of the Chriſtian fleet, declaring how that Amurath hauing left almoſt none in EVROPE, was with all the power hee could make, gone ouer into ASIA againſt the Caramanian king, leauing a moſt faire occaſion for the Chriſtians eaſily to recouer whatſoeuer they had before loſt in EVROPE: and that hee was in good time come with his fleet vnto the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS, according vnto promiſe, and there lay readie to embarre the Turks paſſage backe againe out of ASIA. Both theſe letters being read in the Counſell, ſo much mooued the king, with all the reſt of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE there preſent, as that they were neuer more ſorrie or aſhamed for any thing they had done in their liues, than for the league ſo lately with Amurath concluded: for why, they ſaw that all the plot they had laied, for their immortall glorie, was now by this haſtie peace that they had made with the Turke, without the good liking or knowledge of their confederats, brought to nought; and that they had thereby moſt ſhamefully deceiued the generall expectation that the Chriſtian commonweale had conceiued of them; and that they, of long time called the protectors of the Chriſtian faith, the defendours of true religion, the reuengers of Chriſt his name, and deliuerers of the faithfull nations; ſhould now be accounted the breakers of the Chriſtian league, men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greeks, contemners of immortalitie, and louers of their owne profit onely. In this doubtfulneſſe of minds whilſt they ſtood yet thus wauering, Iulian the Cardinall and Legat, alwaies an enemie vnto the peace, and by reaſon of his place a man in greateſt authoritie next vnto the king, tooke occaſion to diſſuade the ſame as followeth.

The cunning ſpeech wherewith Iulian the Cardinal perſuadeth king Vladiſlaus to breake the league he had before made with Amurath.

If any of you right worthie (ſaid hee) ſhall happily maruell, that I ſhould ſpeake of breaking the league, and violating our faith, let him firſt vnderſtand, That I at this preſent am to perſuade you to nothing els, but the faithfull obſeruing both of the one and the other: led with like repentance with you, repentance I ſay, and not ſorrow, when as I, as from a watch-tower foreſeeing all theſe things which were decreed againſt my will, to ſort alſo contrarie to your expectation, am now for the dutie of my legation, and the zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion, enforced with you to doubt: and ſo much the rather, for that at this preſent the queſtion is of the loſſe and hazard of all our honours and credit in common: which except we by common conſent, and wonted valour, endeuour to amend; ô how much it is to be feared, leaſt for ſhame neither may you goe out of HVNGARIE, or I returne to ROME, where all things are with moſt deepe iudgement cenſured. Conſider I pray you into what miſeries this haſtie reſolution hath caſt vs. We haue entred into league with the Turke, an infidell, to violate our faith with the Chriſtians, and to breake the holy league before made with the great biſhop, and the other Chriſtian princes our confederats. And that for what, for what profit I ſay? Forſooth, that ſo we might againe recouer SERVIA, long before deſtroied. Verily a ſmall and wofull profit, which may againe in ſhort time be cut off, and deprieth vs of others farre greater, and of much longer continuance. For what can bee more fond or inconſiderat, than in our conſultations to haue regard to our priuat profit only, and not the publicke, without reſpect of religion, honeſtie, or conſcience? It is not demaunded of you at this preſent (right honorable) what you owe vnto the periured Turke: but you are by me Iulian, the great biſhops and the confederat Chriſtian princes Legat, and Agent, before the tribunall ſeat of your owne conſciences, accuſed of breach of faith, breach of league, and breach of promiſe; and thereof euen by your owne iudgement, rather than by the iudgement of God, or other man, I will condemne you. Anſwere me you noble Worthies: After you had happily ſix moneths made warres againſt the Turkes in BVLGARIA and the borders of THRACIA, and after that, triumphantly returning into HVNGARIE, receiued you not honourable embaſſages from almoſt all ITALIE, and from the great emperour, with common reioycing for your ſo glorious a victorie, and exhortations to continue the war? We receiued them. Did not you in my preſence, and I the author therof, willingly make a moſt holie league with the Italians and Greeks, That the one ſhould with their aid and power meet you out of THRACIA; and the other with a great fleet ſhould come into the HELLESPONTVS? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks? or by what right can you keep the ſame, being made? Wherefore, if the laſt yeare you made a league with the great Biſhop (God his vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Chriſtians, this ſecond league is to be broken, leaſt you ſhould violate the firſt, and that a moſt Chriſtian league: which except you doe, I feare leaſt that as Iudas betraied Chriſt, ſo you may ſeeme to betraie his vicar; or that God, whom hetherto you haue alwaies found preſent, propitious, and fauourable, you ſhall hereafter find him angrie, and an enemie to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me, what will you anſwere vnto the Conſtantinopolitan emperour; who according to your appointment, hath now with the firſt taken the field, and in ſo great an oportunitie expecteth but your comming? what will you anſwere the great Biſhop? what the Venetians and Genowaies, who haue their great fleet readie as was appointed? what the Burgundians, who for their zeale vnto the Chriſtian faith & religion, haue long ſince paſſed the Ocean, and ſo by many dangers of the ſea now flote in the HELLESPONT? Deuiſe (I praie you) if you can, ſome excuſe and colour, that we may not ſeeme altogether vnlike our ſelues: if out of your hidden skill you can coine any thing, ſhew it. You promiſed with the firſt of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your ſouldiors both the Spring and Summer, play, ſo great and ſo wholſome occaſion paſſing away, through your wofull ſlouth and negligence. O the great blindneſſe of mens minds! O groſſe cowardiſe! O deteſtable league, made to the deſtruction of the common weale! Some man happily will blame mee, and aske, why I ſuffered it with the reſt? I was preſent I confeſſe: but as much as in mee was, I intreated it might not be. I diſliked it: and as many of you here preſent can teſtifie, I vtterly condemned it. I was ouercome by the wiſedome and authoritie of Huniades, and the compaſſion of the Deſpot, leaſt vnhappie man, he ſhould by my interceſſion ſeeme longer to want his kingdome and children: and leaſt any man ſhould call me a contemner or impugner of your good, I full of ſorrow, and vnwillingly, gaue way; not ignorant the health of the Chriſtian common weale to be therin weakened, the hope of your immortall glorie extinguiſhed, and vs all (by your leaue may I ſay it) accounted breakers both of diuine and humane leagues, forſworne men, and traitors vnto all good Chriſtians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiouſneſſe be further bruted, we deliuer our ſelues from this infamie, nothing can be greater or more miſerable than our ſhame or villanie: if we will ſo do, we may not ſo eaſily, as juſtly and religiouſly do it. Hauing made reſtitution againe of SERVIA and the captiues, what remaineth els for you to do noble worthies, but to repaire your armie, to prepare what ſo is needfull for war, & to keep your firſt league with the Chriſtian princes? and to ſay, That king Vladiſlaus, after his league made with the Greeke and Latin princes, could not without the conſent of thoſe his confederats and allies, vnder whoſe good fortune that common war was vndertaken, conclude any thing, eſpecially with the enemies of the Chriſtian religion? And that therfore, if any thing were agreed vpon betwixt him and the Turk, it was fruſtrate, & the firſt league to be ſtood vpon. Who is ſo partiall an eſteemer of mens actions, that would not eaſily judge, That in caſe Faith were giuen to both, it were rather to be kept with a Chriſtian, than with a Turk; with a beleeuer, than with an infidell? Againſt a perfidious enemy it is lawfull (as they ſay) for a man to vſe all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraud with fraud. By craft the Turke firſt paſſed ouer into EVROPE, by little and little he crept into that kingdome, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by ſtrength: and are you become ſo blind, as to thinke it better to keepe your promiſe with the Turke, deuoid of all faith and humanitie, rather than with the faithfull Chriſtians, and eſpecially the moſt holy Biſhop? All great things are done by deuice and policie: the Romanes our anceſtors vprightly and religiouſly alwaies kept their leagues with their confederats, but deluded the deceitfull with their cunning. Cæſar was of opinion, That for ſoueraigntie the law was ſometimes to be broken. And Philip, the father and maſter of him that conquered ASIA, oftentimes vſed cunning and deceit for the deſire of rule: yet were not theſe men called traitors. It is ſometime lawfull for the commonweale ſake, neither to ſtand to our leagues, neither to keepe our faith with them that be themſelues faithleſſe. Lawfull it is to breake vnlawfull oaths, and eſpecially ſuch as are thought to be againſt right, reaſon, and equitie. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, vowing for to ſacrifice vnto the gods whomſoeuer he firſt met at his returne into his countrey, to kill his ſonne by that his vow and oath? verely it was a great impietie. Wherefore a juſt and lawfull oath is in the judgement of all men to be religiouſly kept, but ſuch an oath as tendeth not onely vnto priuat but publicke deſtruction, that ought to be vaine and fruſtrate. Wherefore before our faithleſſe dealing be farther spread abroad, I beseech you worthie men, and thee especially most glorious king, not in any point to violate your faith, for the good of the Christian commonweale giuen vnto the most holy father and the other Christian princes. The league you haue made with the Greekes and the Latines, faithfully and religiously keepe; the expedition by common consent taken in hand by the example of your confederates, prosecute; the foundation of immortall glorie by you laid, build vpon. Deliuer the Christian prouinces oppressed with the Turkish seruitude, satisfie the hope conceiued of you, and deceiue not the expectation the world hath now conceiued of you, than which, nothing can be more dishonourable: make no conscience of the league you haue made with the Infidell, but thinke it a great impietie and wickednesse to violate the holy league made with the great bishop, and the other Christian princes: thinking, that if you should doe otherwise, God (which he of his mercie forbid) would become of that your falsified faith a most seuere and sharpe reuenger: and that you can do nothing more acceptable vnto our Sauior Christ, or more glorious to your selues, than to deliuer the oppressed Christian countries from the cruell slauerie and bondage of the Turke. Suffer not this so fit an occasion to slip away, than which, a fitter can neuer be giuen. EVROPE is vnfurnished of the Turks, busied in the Caramanian war; their returne is embarred by the Christians fleet, now in the sea of HELLESPONTVS; you need but to goe see, and as it were to take a view of THRACIA, MACEDONIA, GRECIA, and EPIRVS, there is no enemie there left to oppose himselfe against you. Wherefore for God his cause, I request you aboue all things to continue the Christian league, and with your happie and victorious forces, to march forward into MACEDONIA and THRACIA, as is before by you with the other Christian princes your confederates, agreed.

In conclusion, hauing much spoken of the authoritie and power of the great bishop, he in his name disanulled the league whatsoeuer, by the king made with the Turke; and absolued him, with the rest whom it might concerne, from the oath they had giuen, and the promises they had made. Which so well contented both the king and the rest, that there was now no more question of the oath, or of the lawfulnesse of the warre, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Christian princes their confederats (and for the prosecution of the warres against the Turks) as was with them before agreed: whom they could now say, they were not to forsake, and to leaue them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedie enemie; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their request they had taken vp armes in their quarrell. Vnto which vnfortunat decree, both the Despot and Huniades, the cheefe authors of the late peace betwixt the king and Amurath, easily consented: the Despot, induced with the great hope he had conceiued of the good successe of the war; and Huniades, with the desire of the kingdome of BVLGARIA promised vnto him by Vladislaus, and by faire charter also (as some said) assured vnto him.

Of this the kings resolution for the breach of the peace with the Turke, notice was with all speed giuen vnto the Constantinopolitane emperour, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of seuentie gallies at the straits of HELLESPONTVS: for feare least they hearing of the former concluded peace, should alter also or els quite desist from their former purposes. In the meane time whilest these things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereof, according to his promise had withdrawne all his garrisons out of SERVIA, and other places before agreed vpon in the late concluded peace, restoring the same vnto the Despot, and others the lawfull owners, although it was not done at the very prefixed day, at which it should haue been done. In which time also he set at libertie great numbers of captiues, & amongst the rest, the two blind sonnes of the prince of SERVIA; faithfully performing whatsoeuer he had before vpon his religion promised in the league with the Christians before concluded, so desirous hee was of peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit, Vladislaus by the counsell of Huniades, detained to his own vse certaine of the strong holds in SERVIA: for which cause, George the Despot euer afterwards bore a secret grudge against Huniades.

Now as king Vladislaus (hauing by the persuasion of Iulian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him and Amurath) was preparing his forces, the fame of the Epirot prince Scanderbeg was also (by the recouerie of his fathers kingdome of EPIRVS out of the Turkes hands, and by the late ouerthrow of Alis Bassa) growne great, euery man speaking of him honour and praise. Wherewith Vladislaus moued, and reasonably perswaded what a furtherance it would be vnto his haughtie designes (aiming at no lesse than the vtter ouerthrow of the Turks kingdome in EVROPE) if he might vnto his owne great preparations joine also the strength of that so fortunate tunate a prince, by the conſent of his nobilitie, with all ſpeed diſpatched away his embaſſadours with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honorable purpoſe, for the rooting out of the Turks, and in that common cauſe praying his aid againſt ſuch a dangerous and dreadfull enemie: the purport whereof here followeth.

Vladiſlaus king of Hungarie and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg, prince of EPIRVS, greeting.

The letters of king Vladiſlaus to Scanderbeg.

It may be that ſome good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation vntill this preſent, to the intent we might at this time together with you, rejoyce in the double ſucceſſe of your proſperitie: firſt, for the happie recouerie of your eſtate; and then, for that the ſame hath by your wiſedome and valour beene of late ſo notably defended. Wherefore in this we rejoyce, not onely in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Chriſtians, that it hath pleaſed God of his goodneſſe, by your valour to haue giuen ſo great an encreaſe and comfort vnto the Chriſtian commonweale: for as much as amongſt other our great euils, the loſſe of the Albanian people hath not beene to be accounted the leaſt, at ſuch time as Iohn Caſtriot, a worthie prince, your father, oppreſſed by Amurath and by the vngratefull deſtinies taken out of this world, had neither the meanes to leaue vnto you his kingdome and ſcepter (as vnto his ſonne, then liuing in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwiſe to prouide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, moſt happie in ſuch a ſonne, might haue till now liued: whoſe felicitie had in that ſurmounted all others, if he might but haue ſeene you before his death. For as you ſeeme vnto me aboue all other princes in the world (without offence bee it ſaid) moſt accompliſhed with all the good graces and perfections both of bodie and mind, ſo are you endowed alſo with a certaine diuine and wonderfull fortune: vnder the good conduct whereof, not onely the whole kingdome of EPIRVS may thinke it ſelfe in ſecuritie; but all the reſt of the other nations alſo, lately by the deteſtable fraud and violence of the Othoman kings diſmembred from the realme of MACEDON, may alſo recouer the former beautie of their antient lawes and liberties. For (to ſay nothing of thoſe things which euen from your childhood hauing continually made you enuied, haue heretofore purchaſed vnto you an immortall fame and glorie euen amongſt the Barbarians themſelues) what can be more glorious than this victorie, which (as wee haue heard and beleeue) you to your ſingular admiration, haue obtained by the ouerthrow and vtter diſcomfiture of Alis Baſſa, with his ſo great and mightie apower? But now ô Scanderbeg (God ſo appointing it, who in his deepe and ſecret wiſedome hath reſerued you vnto theſe ſo dangerous times, for the publicke good and comfort of the Chriſtian commonweale) there offers it ſelfe vnto you an obiect of farre greater glory, with a moſt faire and fit occaſion for you to reuenge your ſelfe of all the wrongs and injuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan done, not in priuate to the perſon of your ſelfe onely, but vnto the whole ſtate and kingdome of EPIRVS alſo; and not the domeſticall and ciuile miſeries of your own countrey onely, but the publicke calamities alſo, and thoſe opprobrious diſgraces done againſt the Chriſtian faith and religion in generall, now oppreſſed (I will not ſay extinguiſhed:) and that is, if you with your victorious forces will ſuccour vs in this extremitie of our affaires, not yet altogether deſperate. Hereunto doe all the princes of HVNGARIE and POLONIA, and all other men of courage inuite you, Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell entreateth you, with all thoſe deuout and courageous Chriſtians, which long ſince here with vs, and readie in armes, wiſh for nothing more than the preſence of your victorious enſignes. Which ſo faire an occaſion (by God himſelfe now offered) if you refuſe not, will in all mens iudgement bee a ſure meane to vanquiſh and ouerthrow our common enemie the Turke, and to driue him quite out of EVROPE, wrongfully by him of ſo long time poſſeſſed. I neede not therefore (as I ſuppoſe) to vſe any kind of perſuaſion vnto you in this cauſe and quarrell, the defence whereof doth purchaſe vnto vs health, light, and libertie: but being neglected, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may enſue thereof. Wee Chriſtians haue beene too too ſlacke and backeward in helping one another: the flame hath now well neere conſumed vs all, whileſt no man thought it would haue come neere himſelfe. What doe we ſee of the Greeke empire? what of the Bulgarians, and Seruians? yea mine owne loſſes and manifold calamities, alreadie, and yet alſo to bee endured, who is able to recount? The braue and moſt valiant princes, the ſureſt bulwarkes and defences of the kingdome of HVNGARIE, from time to time loſt; and the puiſſant armies with one and the ſame fatall chaunce of warre conſumed and brought to nothing, who is able to reckon vp? Inſomuch that there is no houſe, wife, or matrone, in all HVNGARIE, which is not in ſome

measure partaker of this heauinesse. All this doe the Christian princes heare of, and yet the miserable estate and condition of their allies can nothing mooue any one of them: but suffer vs thus as a sacrifice for the rest, to be on all parts exposed to the rage and furie of the common and mercilesse enemie. Onely Eugenius the most holy bishop of Rome, and Philip duke of Burgvndie, haue not refused to beare a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune: The one hath sent hither his Legat Iulian the Cardinall, with notable and puissant succours; and the other with his fleet at sea, and comes as farre as Hellespontvs, so much as in him lieth doth notably hinder the Turkes passage into Evrope. And one other hope there is not now farre from vs, and that is, your helpe, whereof we are so desirous: which we require of you, mooued thereunto, partly by your valour so well knowne, and partly in regard of the imminent perill and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how euill you may be at leisure to take such an expedition in hand, for the late troubled estate of your affairs, and your new recouered kingdome, as yet scarcely well established: yet notwithstanding, let it not withhold you or keepe you backe; assuring you, that as this expedition cannot be but vnto you most honourable, euen so this your present desert shall not be bestowed vpon vngratefull or thankelesse men: but that which you shall now first begin and vndertake for our preseruation & dignitie, we will from henceforth and euer continue for your glorie and for the increase of your greatnesse. Fare you well from our regall citie of Byda, the fourth of Iuly 1444.

Of this the kings motion, Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in so fit a time, with his owne forces joined vnto the Hungarians his friends, throughly to busie Amurath, than in short time after, himselfe alone to sustaine his whole power: by the generall consent of the Albanian princes his confederats and allies, yeelded vnto his request; in liberall tearmes promising him by his letters, in good time to be present with him with thirtie thousand good souldiors. The copie of which letters I thought it not amisse here to set downe also.

Scanderbeg prince of the Epirots, vnto Vladislaus king of Hvngarie and Polonia, greeting.

Scanderbeg his answere by letters vnto king Vladislaus.

Your letters most inuincible king, I haue with like joy and contentment receiued: which I in the generall assembly of my cheefetaines hauing caused publickly to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of opinion, but that so just an occasion of war by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalfe also embraced. And so euery man doth both publickly and priuatly affirme, That nothing could haue happened vnto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by some notable seruice testifie their gratefull minds, and bind vnto them so excellent a prince: as also to giue so fit succors vnto the Christian commonweale. In which forwardnesse of my people, I my selfe tooke great contentment and pleasure, both in regard of your selfe, and in the behalfe of the publicke and common cause: seeing my men of warre, and all other my subjects, of what state or degree soeuer (without any persuasion vsed on my part) to be so cheerefully and couragiously minded in defence of the faith, and of the Christian religion; and so well affectioned towards your most royall majestie. And to say the truth, who is he (if he be not hatefull vnto God and man) albeit there were no question of religion, or of the common danger, that would refuse so just and lawfull a warre? for such a king, as vnto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Christians doe not onely raigne, but euen liue, breath, and enjoy the libertie of our speech. Who would not willingly take vp arms, and aduenture himselfe into most manifest and certaine danger for the people of Hvngarie; by whom in all ages the Christian commonweale hath with their so many trauels and so much of their blood, beene so mightily supported and defended? who euen from the very cradle haue beene continuall enemies vnto our enemies, and haue as it were euen vowed themselues for the honour of the Christian religion and name. Would God (most mightie and redoubted Vladislaus) it had beene in my power to haue brought vnto you such forces to this honourable warre, as were answerable vnto my courage and desire: then happily Evrope should not longer lie in this ignominious estate, oppressed by Amurath; neither should the fields of Varna or Basilia so often smoke with the blood of the Hungarians, nor euery corner of Macedonia with the blood of the Epirots: both nations being as it were become the expiatorie sacrifices of others sinnes and offences, we all now by turnes perish, whilest euery man thinketh himselfe borne but for himselfe alone. But why do I vnto my selfe poure forth these vaine complaints. Truly, it neither repenteth me of my forces, neither as I suppose (if it shall please God, that our forces may once meet and joyne together in ſo happie a warre) ſhall the Chriſtian commonweale haue any cauſe to ſorrow or be agreeued with the iſſue and euent of our fortune. For vnto thoſe fifteen thouſand good ſouldiors which lately diſcõfited Alis Baſſa on the borders of Macedonia, my purpoſe is to ioine as many moe vnto them: with all which ſtrength as ſoone as conueniently I may, I will begin to ſet forward, ready to follow your enſignes to all euents whatſoeuer. And ſo fare you well, from Croia the third of Auguſt 1444.

Theſe letters being diſpatched away vnto the king, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leauie his forces. And firſt of all he cauſed with new ſupplies to be made ſtrong, all thoſe companies wherwith he had ouerthrowne Alis Baſſa; not ſuffering any one of them to abſent himſelfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteen thouſand, all men of approoued valour, hee joyned other fifteen thouſand moe, no leſſe valiant than they: ſuch a power as hee neuer either before or after raiſed for the recouerie, or defence of his kingdome. And ſo furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for ſo honourable a war, cheerefully ſet forward, accompanied with the vowes and hope of all his moſt faithfull and louing ſubjects. But being come to the borders of Servia, he found the ſtrait and difficult paſſages of that rough countrey ſhut vp by George the Deſpot, (lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwiſe a verie wicked damned Atheiſt, and a Chriſtian but in name only) who but lately before reſtored vnto his kingdome by the helpe of king Vladiſlaus, hauing changed his mind, did now mightily cleaue vnto the Turke his ſonne in law (by whom he had before been himſelfe exiled) and in fauour of his quarell, and deſpight of the Hungarians, but eſpecially of Huniades, had ſtopped vp the waies and paſſages whereby Scanderbeg was with his armie to paſſe: who by his embaſſadour ſent of purpoſe vnto the Deſpot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in mind of the perjurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithſtanding he had maried his daughter; and of the great pleaſures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proofe: requeſting him if it were but in regard of the common cauſe of Chriſtianitie to giue vnto him (as vnto his friend by whom hee was neuer in any thing wronged) paſſage; and not to ſtaine himſelfe with the perpetuall note of infamie, That he being a Chriſtian prince, and of late ſo mightily oppreſſed by the Turk, ſhould now to the great hinderence of the Chriſtian cõmon weale take part with him, againſt his friends and deliuerers. But what auaileth praiers or requeſts, bee they neuer ſo reaſonable, with a man ſet downe to miſchiefe? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, reſolued ſo to doe: although it much grieued him to ſpend thoſe forces vpon a Chriſtian prince, which he had prepared againſt the capitall enemie both of himſelfe and all good Chriſtians, old Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan.

But whileſt he thus diſcontented, ſpendeth his time with his armie vpon the borders of Servia, beſet with many difficulties: Vladiſlaus prickt forward by the continuall ſolicitation of Iulian the Cardinall, or elſe drawne on by his owne ineuitable deſtinie, hauing aſſembled a great armie of valiant and couragious ſouldiours out of Hvngaria and Polonia (yet in number farre inferiour to that he had the yeare before, for that moſt of the voluntarie ſouldiours were returned home) ſet forward from Segedinvm, and in the beginning of Nouember (a time vnfit for wars) paſſed ouer Danvbivs, and entring into Bvlgaria came to Nicopolis, the Metrapoliticall citie of that kingdome (but then in poſſeſsion of the Turks;) where he burnt the ſuburbs therof, and in that fruitfull countrey therabouts refreſhed his people three or foure daies, where he alſo muſtred his armie and tooke a view thereof: at what time Dracula Vaiuod of Valachia, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then preſent, and conſidering the ſmall number of the kings armie, began to perſuade him to retire, ſaying, Hee had ſufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme aright of the power of the Turkiſh Sultan; who (as hee ſaid) was wont many times to carie more men with him into the fields in his diſport of hauking and hunting, than was there in the kings campe: wherefore he ſhould doe well, not to expoſe thoſe his ſmall forces vnto ſo manifeſt perill, in ſuch vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, but to reſerue them vnto a more fit oportunitie, when hee might with greater power encounter his puiſſant enemie. This his counſaile moſt men of greateſt experience, and not caried away with other priuat reſpects, thought wholeſome: but the Cardinall, authour of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the laſt yeares victorie obtained againſt the Turke, with glorious promiſes of great aid, as well by ſea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the emperour of Constantinople and other Chriſtian princes; augmenting alſo the great troubles in Aſia,

King Vladiſlaus ſetteth forward againſt the Turks.

SIA, and promising an easie and happie successe vnto these wars in EVROPE; perswaded the king that Dacula his speech proceeded either of ignorance, vpon a superficiall judgement which he made of the kings power there present, without regard of further strength from his friends; or else of the priuat respect of his owne securitie, in regard of a commodious league made a little before betwixt him and the Turke. So that the poore prince seeing his counsell mightily impugned by the Cardinall, and not so well taken, as it was meant by him; stood in doubt whether to leaue him to his owne fortune, and himselfe to his quiet peace, or casting off the Turkish league, to joyne with the king in this chance of warre: but at length resolued as a martiall minded man, preferring the vncertaine glorie of the field before his owne assured rest, said vnto the king:

Seeing that either your princely fortune, which hath euer hetherto fauoured your high attempts: or else the hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the secret designement of your destinie, vnable to be auoided, doth draw your majestie into a different opinion from me: that your resolution which I cannot by reasonable persuasion alter, I will as the suddenesse of time, and my small abilitie will permit, most gladly further.

Dracula aideth Vladislaus with his sonne and 4000 horse.

And therewith presented vnto the king, his sonne, with foure thousand horsemen well appointed, to serue him in these wars; wishing vnto him such good successe as he himselfe desired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the king, he preferred vnto him two lustie yong men, perfect guides for that countrey, with two horses of incredible swiftnesse, and with teares standing in his eies said vnto him:

His last farewell vnto the king.

Take this small gift in good part, as a poore refuge to flie vnto, if your fortune happe to faile you, which I tremble to thinke vpon: I pray God they be giuen in vaine, and so they shall if my prayers may preuaile. Yet if necessitie shall inforce you to vse them, you shall find them seruiceable at your need.

And so taking his last farewell of the king, returned into VALACHIA. Vladislaus marching on from NICOPOLIS toward THRACIA, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the Turks for feare yeelded vnto him: at last he came to SVMIVM and PEZECHIVM, where the Turkish garrisons trusting as much to the strength of the places, as to their owne valour, stood vpon their guard: but the king laid siege to both the said places, and tooke them by assault; where he put to sword fiue thousand of the Turks.

The Turks Bassaes terrified with these vnexpected troubles, aduertised Amurath thereof, requesting him to leaue his obscure life, and to leauie the greatest power he could in ASIA, for the defence of the Turkish kingdome in EVROPE, which otherwise was in short time like to be lost: blaming also his discretion, for committing the gouernment of so great a kingdome, to so yong a prince as was Mahomet his sonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did halfe scorne to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath herewith awaked, as it had been out of a dead sleepe, left his cloister, and with great speed gathered a stong armie in ASIA, & came to the straits of HELLESPONTVS; where he found the passage stopped by the Venetian and Popes gallies, and was therfore at his wits end. But marching along the sea side vnto the straits of BOSPHORVS, he there found means to conuay ouer his whole armie: vsing therin (as some write) the helpe of the Genoway marchant ships, paying vnto the Genowayes for the passage of euery Turke a duckat, which amounted to the summe of 100 thousand duckets: or as some others affirm, corrupting with great bribes them that were left for the defence of this passage. And being now got ouer, joyned his Asian armie with such other forces as his Bassaes had in readinesse in EVROPE: and so marching on seuen daies, encamped within four miles of VARNA, a citie pleasantly standing vpon the Euxine sea side in BVLGARIA, where the Christian armie lay: for Vladislaus hearing of Amurath his comming with so great an armie, had retired thether, hauing but a little before taken the same citie of VARNA from the Turks, with CALACRIVM, GALATA, MACROPOLIS, and others vpon the sea coast.

Vpon the first report that Amurath was with such a mightie armie come ouer the strait of BOSPHORVS, Vladislaus who before was in good hope that he could not posibly haue found any passage, entred into counsaile with the commaunders of his armie, what course was now best to take: where many which before had been most forward in that action (presuming that Amurath could by no means haue transported his armie) were now so discoraged with the fame of his comming, that they aduised the king in time to retire home, and not to oppose so small an armie against such a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captaines of of greater courage, and eſpecially Huniades, ſaid, It was not for the kings honour, firſt to inuade his enemies dominions, and preſently to turne his backe vpon the firſt report of their comming; wiſhing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former wars, and that he was to fight againſt the ſame enemie whom he had victoriouſly ouerthrowne the yeare before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he ſayd) not to bee mooued therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkiſh kings, more to terrifie their enemies with the ſhew of a huge armie, than with the valour of their ſouldiours, which were nothing to bee accounted of, but as effeminat, in compariſon of the Hungarians. Whereupon the king reſolued to trie the fortune of the field.

Vladiſlaus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Amurath the night before encamped within foure miles, was now putting his armie in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captaine Huniades: who with great care and induſtrie diſpoſed the ſame, garding the one ſide of the battaile with a fenne or marriſh, and the other ſide with cariages, and the rereward of his armie with a ſteepe hill. Therein politiquely prouiding, that the Chriſtian armie, being farre leſſe than the Turks in number, could not bee compaſſed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks armie approaching, began to skirmiſh with the Chriſtians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage maintained, and that with diuers fortune, ſometime one partie preuailing, and ſometime the other; but with ſuch ſlaughter on both ſides, that the ground was couered and ſtained with the dead bodies and blood of the ſlaine. At length the battaile beeing more cloſely joyned, the victorie began to incline to the Chriſtians, for Huniades had moſt valiantly with his Tranſiluanian and Valachian horſemen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkiſh armie, and made great ſlaughter whereſoeuer he came. Inſomuch, that Amurath diſmaied with the flight of his ſouldiours, was about to haue fled himſelfe out of the maine battaile, had hee not been ſtaied by a common ſouldiour, who laying hands vpon the raines of his bridle ſtaied him by force, and ſharpely reprooued him of cowardiſe. The captaines, and prelats about the king (whom it had better beſeemed to haue been at deuout prayers in their oratories, than in armes at that bloodie battaile) encouraged by the proſperous ſucceſſe of Huniades, and deſirous to be partakers of that victorie, fooliſhly left their ſafe ſtations, where they were appointed by him to ſtand faſt, and diſorderedly purſued the chaſe, leauing that ſide of the battell where they ſtood, open vnto the Turks: But they were not gone farre, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks armie, for ſuch purpoſe placed in a vallie faſt by. In which fight Leſco one of the moſt valiant captains of the Hungarians was ſlaine; and the Biſhop of VBRADIVM a better church man than ſouldior, and the firſt man that diſordered the battaile, ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight through the fenne, was there filthily ſtrangled in the deepe mud, after he had with his horſe therein ſtruggled a great while. The Biſhop of AGRIA, a man of greateſt authoritie with the king, was at the ſame time alſo loſt, with many other church men more. The Cardinall, with ſome other of the expert captaines retiring toward their former ſtandings, were hardly aſſailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the king and Huniades, were with great ſlaughter forced to retire, and euen readie to flie. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and all brought into extreame danger, beholding the picture of the Crucifix in the diſplaied enſignes of the voluntarie Chriſtians, pluckt the writing out of his boſome, wherin the late league was compriſed, and holding it vp in his hand with his eies caſt vp to heauen, ſaid:

The great battell of Varna fought betweene king Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

Behold thou crucified Chriſt, this is the league thy Chriſtians in thy name made with mee: which they haue without cauſe violated. Now if thou bee a God, as they ſay thou art, and as we dreame, reuenge the wrong now done vnto thy name, and me, and ſhew thy power vpon thy perjurious people, who in their deeds denie thee their God.

Amurath prayeth vnto Chriſt.

The king with Huniades furiouſlie purſued the chaſed Turks, with bloodie execution a great ſpace: when as the king in his heat hardly perſuaded by Huniades to returne againe vnto his campe, at his comming thether found the Cardinall Iulian, with Franke, one of his cheefe captaines, and others, ouercharged with the Turkes, which had againe made head againſt that part of the Chriſtian armie: and there yet ſought couragiouſlie, by reaſon of their multitude, being alſo backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had ſtood faſt with their old king, as his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge, but were now come in. There began a moſt cruell and fierce fight: in the ſucceſſe whereof, the Turks well ſaw the whole eſtate of their kingdome in EVROPE to conſiſt,

A cruell fight.

many

many were there ſlaine on both ſides : the Turks feeling their loſſe leſſe than indeed it was, by reaſon of their multitude; and the Chriſtians, by reaſon of their courage. A great while the victorie ſtood doubtfull, inſomuch, that at length the Turkes began to ſhrinke backe, in that part of the battaile where the king and Huniades fought. But in the left ſide, they preuailed ſo vpon the Chriſtians, that they were euen readie to haue fled. Which when Huniades (hauing a vigilant eie vnto euerie part of the armie) perceiued, hee with ſpeed made thether, and there againe with his preſence reſtored the battaile almoſt before loſt. Which done, hee returned againe towards the king, who in the mean time had moſt valiantly repulſed a great number of the Turks, and was now come vnto the Ianizaries, Amurath his laſt hope. There was to be ſeene a thouſand manners of death, whileſt both the armies fought more like wild beaſts in their rage and furie, than warie and politique ſouldiours. In this confuſed medly, the yong king Vladiſlaus with greater courage than care of himſelfe, brake into the battaile of the Ianizaries : at which time, Amurath himſelfe was by a valiant Frenchman a knight of the Roads, firſt wounded with a pike, and after aſſailed with his ſword, and had there ended his daies, but that hee was ſpeedily reſcued by his guard, by whom this worthie knight after great proofe of his valour was there ſlaine in the middeſt of his enemies. Vladiſlaus being got in alſo amongſt them, valiantly performed all the partes of a worthie ſouldiour, vntill ſuch time as his horſe being ſlaine vnder him, hee was forthwith oppreſſed by the multitude of his enemies and ſlaine: his head being ſtrucke off by Ferizes, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him preſented vnto Amurath; who commaunded it preſently to be put vpon the point of a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Chriſtian king : which was afterwards ſo caried through the principall cities of MACEDONIA, and GRECIA, as a trophey of the Turks victorie. Huniades after hee had in vaine giuen diuers braue attempts, to haue reſcued the kings bodie, retired with a few Valachian horſemen, and ſeeing no hope of better hap (for all the Chriſtians being diſcouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themſelues to flight) gaue place to neceſsitie and reſeruing himſelfe to his future fortune, fled ouer the mountaines into the thicke woods, from whence with much difficultie he got ouer DANVBIVS into VALACHIA, and was there (as ſome write) by Dracula prince of that countrey taken priſoner : In reuenge whereof, after hee was enlarged by the Hungarians, hee ſo aided Danus againſt Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his ſonne were both ſlaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Iulian the Cardinall flying out of the battaile, was found by that worthie man Gregorie Sanoſe, lying in the deſert forreſt by the way, ſide mortally wounded, and halfe ſtripped: by whom hee was in few wordes ſharpely reproued, as the wicked authour of that perfidious warre : and there left giuing vp the ghoſt. Many of the Chriſtians which fled out of that battell fell into the enemies hands, and ſo were ſlaine : but greater was the number of them, which were drowned in the fennes, or that by hunger and cold periſhed in the woods, or elſe after long and miſerable trauaile, finding no paſſage ouer DANVBIVS fell at length into the Turkiſh ſlauerie. This great and mortall battaile as it was with diuers fortune fought, ſo was alſo the preſent report thereof moſt vncertaine : for the Turks that were at the firſt put to flight, reported in the townes thereby as they fled, that the battell was loſt: and they which had all the daie endured the fight, not altogether aſſured of the victorie, and not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themſelues, whileſt they ſuſpected ſome deceit in the kinges campe, by reaſon of the great ſilence therein, ſtaied two daies before they durſt aduenture to take the ſpoile thereof. The number of them that were ſlaine in this battaile, as well on the one ſide as the other, was great; as the mounts, and little hils, raiſed of the bones and bodies of them that were there buried, doe yet at this daie declare. Howbeit the certaine number was not knowne, ſome reporting moe, ſome fewer. Yet in this moſt agree, that of the Chriſtian armie being not great, ſcarce the third part eſcaped: and that the Turkes bought this victorie, with a farre greater loſſe, although it was of them leſſe felt, by reaſon of their multitude, made leſſe by that ſlaughter ; as they that report leaſt thereof affirme, by thirtie thouſand. Which may well ſeeme rather to be ſo, for that Amurath after this victorie, neither farther proſecuted the ſame, nor ſhewed any tokens of joy at all, but became verie melancholie and ſad, and being of them about him, demanded why after ſo great a victorie, he was no merrier: anſwered, That he wiſhed not at ſo great a price, to gain many ſuch victories. Yet in memoriall thereof hee erected a great pillar, in the ſame place where the king was ſlaine, with an inſcription of all that was then done: which as they ſay is yet there to be ſeene at this day. This bloodie battaile, was fought neere vnto VARNA (in ancient time called DIONISIOPOLIS

Amurath in danger.

King Vladiſlaus ſlaine.

Huniades ſpeed.

NISIOPOLIS (a place fatall vnto many great warriors, and therfore of them euen yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord Chriſt 1444.

Some malicioufly impute the loſſe of the battaile of VARNA, and the death of the king, to Huniades, who (as they ſaid) fled out of this battaile with ten thouſand horſemen: but this report agreeth not with the noble diſpoſition of that courageous and valiant captaine, but ſeemeth rather to haue been deuiſed, to excuſe the foule dealing of the cleargie; who as moſt hiſtories beare witneſſe, were the cheefe authors both of the warre, and of the lamentable calamitie enſuing thereof.

From the battaile of VARNA Amurath returned to HADRIANOPLE, hauing loſt the greateſt part of his beſt ſouldiors, and there with great ſolemnitie buried the bodie of Caraſia, viceroy of EVROPE, ſlaine in that battaile: and then calling together all his nobilitie, againe reſigned vp his kingdome vnto his ſonne Mahomet, retiring himſelfe vnto MAGNESIA, where he liued a ſolitarie and priuat life, hauing before vowed ſo to do, in the great feare he was in, in the late battaile againſt Vladiſlaus: but after hee had a ſhort time performed theſe his vowes in that obſcure and melancholie life, he weatie thereof, as ſome ſuppoſe, as not a little reuiued with the late victorie, or els ſolicited by Caly Baſſa and other great counſellours, returned againe to HADRIANOPLE, reſuming vnto himſelfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great diſcontentment of his ambitious ſonne Mahomet.

Amurath perform his vowes reſigneth his kingdome to his ſonne Mahomet, which he in ſhort time after taketh again vpon him.

Scanderbeg yet ſticking in the borders of SERVIA, and hearing what had happened vnto king Vladiſlaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly greeued: and hauing now loſt the hope whereupon he had vndertaken that ſo great an expedition, reſolued to returne home again into EPIRVS. Neuertheleſſe, to be in ſome part reuenged of the wicked Deſpot, he with his armie forcibly brake into his country, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter at VARNA, repaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremitie of their fortune) courteouſly releeued: and furniſhing them with ſuch things as they wanted, prouided them ſhipping to RAGVSA, from whence they might in ſafetie returne into their owne countries. Thus by the diſloyaltie and trecherie of the faithleſſe Deſpot of SERVIA, was Scanderbeg ſtayed from being preſent at the bloodie battaile of VARNA, to the vnſpeakeable loſſe of the Chriſtian commonweale: for it could not be, but that ſo many thouſands of moſt reſolute and expert ſouldiors, vnder the leading of ſo worthie a cheefetaine, muſt needs haue done much for the gaining of the victorie. And what more glorious ſight could a man haue wiſhed for, than to haue ſeene ſo puiſſant an armie in the field againſt the ſworne enemie of Chriſtendome, directed by two ſuch valiant and renowned cheefetaines, as neuer either before or ſince their time was ſeene the like in one battell againſt the enemies of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding ſtrength, and agilitie of bodie, wiſe, prudent, and ſubtile; both of long time exerciſed in the Turkes warres, the greateſt terrour of that nation, and moſt worthie champions of the Chriſtian religion, being therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better commaunder, and the more polliticke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reaſon of his greater yeares: which was well counteruailed by Scanderbeg his perpetuall good fortune, ſtill as it were attending vpon him, & by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the courſe of his hiſtorie well appeareth.

The compariſon betwixt Huniades and Scanderbeg.

Amurath aduertiſed of theſe proceedings of Scanderbeg, as alſo of the great harmes by him done in MACEDONIA, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon EPIRVS, were by his furie vtterly waſted and ſpoiled, and his people there for moſt part ſlaine, and that the reſt had for feare forſaken their dwellings and left the countrey deſolate and vnpeopled; was therewith exceedingly mooued. Yet for ſo much as he ſtill ſtood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himſelfe clogged with yeares, and therefore more deſirous of reſt; conſidering alſo the young yeares of his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, as yet vnfit for the gouernement of ſo great and troubleſome a kingdome; with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and mallice of Huniades: he thought it not beſt to conuert all his forces vpon him, but to proue if he could cunningly draw him into ſome diſhonourable peace for a time, that ſo he might afterwards at leiſure bee the better reuenged of him. For which cauſe he writ vnto him letters, mixt with grieuous threats and ſome faigned courteſies, as followeth:

Amurath

Amurath Ottoman, king of the Turkes, and emperour of the East, to the most ingratefull Scanderbeg, wisheth neither health nor welfare.

The sullen and crafiie letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I neuer wanted honourable preferments to bestow vpon thee all the while thou diddest liue in my court, of all others most vnkind Scanderbeg; but now I want words wherewith to speake vnto thee, thou hast so highly offended my mind, and touched mine honour, that I know not in discretion what words to vse vnto thee, but of late one of my domesticall seruants. For neither will hard speech mollifie the naturall fiercenesse of thy proud disposition, neither art thou worthie of better, which hast farre exceeded all hostilitie. And because thou wouldest omit no occasion to prouoke me, hast of late proceeded to that point of follie, that thou hast had thine owne affaires, and the welfare of thine owne subiects, in small regard, by confederating thy selfe in armes with the Hungarians, against me. It greeueth mee to rehearse other thy vnkindnesse, and as it were to touch those sores, if my mind would euer suffer me to forget the same, or that thy so manifold & horrible treasons, and strange examples of a most vnthankfull mind, were to be couered with silence. Yet I thought good to aduertise thee (although perhaps too late) least that thy vnstaied heat doe vntimely ouerthrow thee, with thy vnluckie kingdome: and then thou wouldest make humble confession of thy long transgression, when thou hast lost thy selfe, and left no hope of refuge in thy desperat estate. We haue hitherto sufficiently suffered thy manifold iniuries: thou hast sufficiently prouoked the majestie of the Othoman empire, with wrong and contumelious despight, and I with patience haue borne all these thy contempts. Thinkest thou that my armie by thee betrayed vnto the Hungarians, shall be vnreuenged? Thinkest thou that so many cities and townes in Epirvs, by thee rent from the bodie of my empire, with my garrisons there slaine, shall be forgotten? Or thinkest thou with thy late committed outrages to escape my reuenging hands? Remember the destruction of mine armie vnder Alis Bassa; the wasting and burning of my dominions; and lately, the Hungarian warres, by thee so far as in thee was, countenanced; with the territories of George, the Despot of Servia, my father in law, by thee spoiled. At length amend thou graceless man, and expect not farther, whether my indignation will breake out. Let not these trifling allurements of thy good fortune, so puffe vp thy foolish desires, and sharpen thy conceits, that thy miserable fortune afterwards may moue euen thy greatest enemie, or my selfe, to compassion. I would thou shouldest at length remember my courtesies (if any sparke of humanitie remaine in thy sauage nature) and make me not longer sorrie, that I haue so euill bestowed the same. And although it is not the part of an honourable mind, to rehearse those things which we haue in bountie bestowed vpon any man; yet is it the token of a most vnthankfull nature, so easily to forget all kindnesse past, as to need to be put in remembrance therof. Wherfore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament thine estate: For, to let passe the health of thy soule (which thou a very reprobat, esteemest as nothing) not to speake of the lawes of Mahomet, by thee despised, and the holy prophet by thee contemned, for the Zeale thou hast vnto the Christian superstition: what hast thou (which now holdest thy poore and base kingdome in such price) euer wanted at my hands of all those things which most delight the desires of men? Diddest thou euer want armour, horses, a great traine of followers and seruants, money, or other superfluities, the allurements of all ages? Or diddest thou want matter to exercise thy valour, for encrease of thine honour? Wast thou euer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all sorts fit for thine age, both at home and abroad? Was any man in my court deerer vnto me, than thy selfe? What growing wit, not of strangers onely, but of them that were neerest vnto my selfe, was better welcome vnto me than thine? With what carefull instruction did I cause thee to be brought vp? When thou wast deliuered vnto me almost a child, I daily cherished and encreased thy hoped towardlinesse, with learning and nurture: I haue at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praises, and honours of the field (which of all worldly things is most glorious) so that in all feats of armes no souldior was to me better knowne, or captaine of me more honoured. For all these great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now shewest thy selfe such an one, that I may be thought not to haue brought vp such a man as I hoped for, but a very serpent in mine owne bosome. But the loue of thy countrey did moue thee: which if thou hadst asked of me, would I haue denied the same vnto thee? Which (if thou doest well remember) I so oftentimes voluntarily profered vnto thee? But thou haddest rather to gaine the same by trecherie, than to receiue it at my hands of courtesie. So, thine be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verely, according to my accustomed clemencie towards all them whom I haue once well knowne, and beene familiarly acquainted with,

with, I now pardon thee all thou haſt offended me; not for any thy preſent deſerts, which are none, but becauſe in this publique enmitie, it pleaſeth mee to remember my former kindneſſe in priuat towards thee, and thy faithfulneſſe ſometimes in my affaires; eſpecially for that the time was much longer wherein thou ſeruedſt me, than the time wherein thou haſt offended me. CROIA and thy fathers kingdome (although thou haſt gained the ſame by fowle treacherie) I giue vnto thee, vpon condition thou willingly reſtore vnto me the other townes of EPIRVS, which by no right belong vnto thee, but are mine by law of armes, by my ſelfe honourably wonne. Whatſoeuer thou haſt taken from my father in law, the prince of SERVIA, thou ſhalt forthwith reſtore, and make him an honourable recompence for the other harmes thou haſt done vnto him; and for euer hereafter, thou ſhalt as well forbeare to offer violence to any our friends, as to aid any our enemies. So ſhalt thou for euer auoid the diſpleaſure of the Turks, and ſtand in my good grace and fauour, as thou haſt done before: except thou haddeſt rather (being taught by thine owne harmes) then in vaine crie for mercie, when thy furious outrage ſhall haue me in perſon, an implacable reuenger. Thou knoweſt thy forces, thou knoweſt the ſtrength of mine armes; thou haſt before thine eies the freſh example of the Hungarian fortune, ſo that thou needeſt no further admonitions. Yet I would thou ſhouldeſt write at large what thou intendeſt to do. Thou maieſt alſo conferre with Ayradin our ſeruant, our truſtie and faithfull meſſenger, of whom thou ſhalt vnderſtand more than are in theſe letters compriſed. Farewell if thou be wiſe. From HADRIANOPLE.

To theſe letters Scanderbeg gaue ſmall credit, and leſſe to the meſſenger, but leaſt of all to the old Fox himſelfe, whom he well knew to haue written nothing ſimply of good meaning, but onely to gaine a ceſſation from warres, vntill he might at better leaſure ſet vpon him with all his forces: wherefore calling Ayradin the meſſenger vnto him, whom he rather held for a craftie ſpie, than an honourable embaſſador, after hee had many times both publiquely and priuatly diſcourſed with him, ſo farre forth as was poſsible to ſound the depth of his comming, and had alſo further entertained him with all honourable courteſies, hee ſhewed him all his campe, with the ſtrength thereof; which hee did, becauſe he would not haue the craftie meſſenger to thinke, that he was any thing afraid of his maiſters greatneſſe. And at laſt greatly complaining of Amurath his cruell and perfidious dealing againſt his father, his brethren, and himſelfe, he ſent him away with ſuch anſwere in writing as followeth.

The ſouldiour of Chriſt Ieſu, George Caſtriot ſurnamed Scanderbeg, prince of EPIRVS, to Amurath Ottoman king of the Turkes ſendeth greeeing.

The reſolute anſwere of Scanderbeg to Amurath his letter.

Thou haſt in times paſt (as thou writeſt) exceeded mee in many kinds of courteſies, and at this preſent I will exceed thee in modeſt and temperat ſpeech: For I thinke there is no greater token of a baſe mind, than to be able to forbeare to giue railing and opprobrious words, euen vnto our moſt mortall enemies. Wherefore we haue with patience receiued and ſeene, both thy letters and meſſenger: and to confeſſe a truth, they haue miniſtred vnto me greater occaſion of ſmile, than choller: whileſt at the firſt thou ſhameſt not to accuſe me of much ingratitude, & treſon: and preſently following a milder paſſion, ſeemeſt carefull of my ſoules health, being ignorant of thine own miſerable eſtate, as a ſtudious defender of a moſt damnable errour. And at laſt, keeping neither law of armes, nor orderly courſe anſwering to our affaires, doeſt moſt inſolently and vnaduiſedly, as a valiant conqueror to his vanquiſhed enemie, propound many conditions of peace, of ſuch qualitie and condition, that mine eares ſcorne to heare the ſame. Truely Amurath, although thy immoderat railing might mooue a man of greateſt patience to intemperat ſpeech: yet I impute the ſame partly to thy great age, and partly to the waiwardneſſe of thy nature; and the reſt, to thy conceiued griefe, which I know thou canſt hardly moderat: and the more, for that I haue not ſet downe my ſelfe to contend with thee in foule and vnſeemly language, but with armes and the juſt furie of warre. Yet I pray thee, wherfore doeſt thou ſo exclaime vpon me before God and man: as though thou hadſt firſt ſuffered wrong and injurie from me, and that thou hadſt not in truth firſt don the ſame. Doeſt thou call my neceſsary departing, a perfidious treacherie? my natiue countrey by my policie and valour recouered, doeſt thou obiect to me as a villanie? obiect the ſame ſtill and ſpare not; charge mee with ſuch crimes for euer, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindneſſe towards me, which thou reherſeſt, I could willingly rmēber, if it drew not with it the woſull remembrance of my greater miſeries. Which if they were to be compared together, the greatneſſe of thy good deſerts would be ouerwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater tyrannies; which I had rather thou ſhouldeſt count with thy ſelfe, than bluſh whileſt I repeat them. Euery man that knoweth them, may meruell how I had power to endure them, or that thou waſt not wearie at laſt of thy crueltie and ſecret hatred. Thou tookeſt away my fathers kingdome by force; thou diddeſt murther my brethren; and my ſelfe thou diddeſt moſt wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any ſuch crueltie. And doth it now ſeeme ſtrange to thee, ô Amurath, that an inuincible mind, deſirous of libertie, ſhould ſeeke to break out of the bonds of ſo great ſlauerie? How long at length diddeſt thou thinke I would endure thy proud and inſolent bondage? which for all that I many yeares endured, and refuſed not thy commaund. I expoſed my ſelfe to publicke and priuat dangers, both voluntarily and by thy deſignement: ſpeeches were giuen out daily by thy ſelfe, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deepe trecherie, was rife in mine eares: yet for all that, of long time I ſimply beleeued both thy words and deeds to haue beene deuoid of all fraud, vntill thy cankered mallice began too too apparently to ſhew it ſelfe, then began I alſo to gloſe with thee, wholly metamorphoſed into thine owne conceits, vntill I found occaſion to recouer my libertie. Wherefore there is no cauſe thou ſhouldeſt now greeue, if thou be well beaten with thine own rod. But theſe are but trifles, Amurath, in compariſon of thoſe things which I haue laied vp in hope and reſolution of mind. Therefore hereafter ſurceaſe thine angrie threats, and tell not vs of the Hungarian fortune. Euery man hath his owne reſolution, and euery man a particular gouernour of his actions: and ſo will we with patience endure ſuch fortune as it ſhall pleaſe God to appoint vs In the meane time, for direction of our affaires, we will not requeſt counſell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victorie by the helpe of God. Farewell from our campe.

When Amurath had read theſe letters, and further conferred with Arradin, hee was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great reſolution of ſo ſmall a prince, preſently caſting in his mind (as was thought) the difficultie of that warre. Yet becauſe he would giue no token of feare, oftentimes ſtroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was throughly angrie, with a diſſembled cheerefulneſſe of countenance ſaid:

Amurath his paſſionat ſpeech in his rage againſt Scanderbeg.

Thou deſireſt (wicked man) thou deſireſt the title of ſome honourable death: we will giue it thee (beleeue vs) wee will giue it thee. Wee our ſelues will bee preſent at the buriall of our foſter child, and in perſon (though vnbidden) honour the funerall pompe of the great king of Epirvs; that thou ſhalt neuer complaine among the damned ghoſts, that thou diddeſt die a baſe or obſcure kind of death.

And for becauſe at that time, by reaſon of many great occurrents, hee could not conuert his whole power into Epirvs, he ſent Feriſes, one of his beſt captaines, with nine thouſand choice horſemen, to keepe Scanderbeg in doing, and to ſpoile his countrey ſo much as he could. Which was with ſuch ſpeed done, that it was thought Feriſes would haue beene in the heart of Epirvs, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his comming. But for all his haſt, he could not ſo preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and hauing his men alwayes in readineſſe, placed fifteene hundred good footmen in ambuſh vpon the rough mountaines, leading into the valley of Movea, whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe into Epirvs; placing alſo two thouſand horſemen, as he thought moſt fit & conuenient for his purpoſe. Feriſes deſcending from the high mountaines full of woods and buſhes, by the broken and ſtonie waies leading into the valley, was in that troubleſome and intricate paſſage fiercely ſet vpon by Scanderbegs readie footmen, ſuddainely ariſing out of ambuſh, where the Turks hauing no vſe of their horſes, but rather by them encombered, were ſlaine as Deere encloſed in a toyle. In this conflict ſeuen hundred and ſixtie Turks were taken priſoners, and a greater number ſlaine, and Feriſes himſelfe, with the reſt, enforced to flie, crying ſtill out as hee fled, Better ſome ſaued, than all loſt. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Feriſes, purſued him into Macedonia, and with the ſpoile there taken, rewarded his ſouldiours, as he had alſo many times before done.

Amurath greeued with the ouerthrow of Feriſes, preſently ſent Muſtapha a politicke and hardie captaine, with a new ſupplie of ſix thouſand ſouldiours to take the charge from Feriſes: commaunding him in no caſe, nor vpon any occaſion, to enter farre into Epirvs: but onely to burne and ſpoile the frontiers thereof, ſaying, That he would account it for good ſeruice, if he might but vnderſtand, that the trees and fruits of that countrey, had felt the force of his anger.

Muſtapha

A Mustapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere the borders of EPIRVS, continually sent out scouts before his armie, to see if the passages were cleere, and so warily entred the vallie of MOCRE, A where Ferises not long before was ouerthrowne. In this fruitfull vallie, being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion, Mustapha entrenched his armie, vpon the rising of a hill, and placed espials vpon the tops of the high mountaines round about, by them to discouer the comming of the enemie, and to haue notice thereof by signes into the campe: then reseruing foure thousand horsemen with himselfe, to keepe his campe, hee sent forth the rest of his armie, about nine thousand horsemen, to forrage and spoile the countrey; giuing charge before, that euerie man vpon paine of death should presently retire to the campe, vpon signe giuen from
B thence, as to a place of safetie and refuge. The Turkish armie ranging ouer that rich and pleasant vallie, burnt the villages, cut downe trees, spoiled the vineyards, and made hauocke of all things that fire and sword could destroy; in that point executing Amuraths commaund to the full. At length Scanderbeg drawing neere to this vallie, with foure thousand horsemen and a thousand foot, was aduertised of all the enemies doings, by an Epirot souldiour, who greeuously wounded had hardly escaped from the Turks: of him he vnderstood, what number of Turkes were burning and destroying the countrey, of the campe also kept by Mustapha, and how espials were placed vpon the mountaines. Scanderbeg hauing well considered Mustapha his warie proceedings, and seeing no pollicie to bee vsed against so carefull an enemie, resolued to vanquish him by plaine force, by assaulting him suddainely in his trenches, before his dispierced souldiors
C could repaire to the campe: and hauing to this purpose, with effectuall persuasions encouraged the minds of his valiant soldiors, readie of themselues to follow him through all dangers; whē he had set all things in order for assaulting the enemies camp, speedily entred the vallie, and was presently discouered by the enemies espials, from the tops of the high hils, and a signe giuen to the campe, from whence also the appointed signe was giuen for the dispierced soldiors to retire: but most of them being straied from the campe; and busied in taking the spoile of the country, heard not or saw not the sign giuen: Those which were within the hearing therof retired to the campe, and at their heeles followed Scanderbegs souldiours, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Christians slaine in the entrance of the campe, with their booties in their hands, and presently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbegs sol-D diors couragiously assaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They hauing wonne the trenches, preuailed still vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with feare and slaughter. There was no vse of shot in that medlie, by reason of the straightnesse of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Mustapha seeing his souldiours put to the worst, and that the campe was not long to be defended, tooke horse and fled by the port which was furthest from the enemie. The rest of the souldiors fled also, making such poore shift for themselues as they could. In this battaile 5000 Turks were slaine, and but 300 taken; for the Christians enraged with the spoile of the country, reuenged themselues with the slaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg lost in this conflict but 20 horsemen, and 50 footmen. The rest of the Turkes armie dispersed in the countrey, hearing the tumult in the campe, misdoubting the fortune of their fellowes, fled also: yet many of E them were in that fight pursued and slaine.

Scanderbeg his valiant resolution for the assaulting of Mustapha in his camp.

After this ouerthrow, Mustapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuse the misfortune of himselfe, and the other captaines before sent, greatly commended the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderfull skill in feats of armes; persuading Amurath either to send a greater power against him, or else none at all, saying, That to send such small armies, was but to minister matter to the increase of his glorie, and the infamie of the Turks; and to vse pollicie against him the maister of pollicie, was but meere follie. It greeued Amurath to heare the praises of his enemie, although hee knew the same to be true, by the continuall fortune he had alwaies against his great captaines Alis-bassa, Ferises, and Mustapha: wherefore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to suffer him to liue in peace: yet commaunded Mustapha to renew his
F armie for defence of the borders of his kingdome towardes EPIRVS, against the innouation of Scanderbeg; but straightly commaunding him in no case to inuade any part of EPIRVS, neither vpon any occasion offered, or conceiued hope of victorie, to joyne battaile with Scanderbeg, for feare of such euill successe as before.

At this time also the Grecians of PELOPONESVS now called MOREA, hauing before fortified the strait of CORINTH from sea to sea, with a perpetuall wall, which they called HEXA-

MYLVM, and deep trenches about six miles in length, had also built fiue strong castles in the same wall, of purpose to take away all passage by land into that rich countrey, and began now not only to denie the yearely tribute they were wont to pay vnto the Turkish king, but also to inuade such princes of ACHAIA their neighbours, as were content to remaine still the Turks tributaries; amongst whom Nereus prince of ATHENS, and Turacan Gouernour of THESSALIA for Amurath, ceased not by continuall complaints to incense him against them of PELOPONESVS. Who hauing his armie in readinesse, although it was now winter, and he himselfe verie aged, set forward from HADRIANOPLE, and marching through THESSALIA, came into ACHAIA, where most of the Grecians were before fled for feare into PELOPONESVS. So passing on with his armie, he came to the strait commonly called ISTMVS, where the famous citie of CORINTH somtime stood; and there encamped his armie neere vnto the strong wall, and castles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of PELOPONESVS, terrified with the multitude of his armie, would without resistance submit themselues: but when he perceiued them to stand vpon their guard, and to trust to their strength, he laid battrie to the wall foure daies, and hauing made it saultable, brake throgh the same with his armie. The Grecians hauing lost the wall (their cheefe strength) fled, some to one strong hold, and some to another, as their fortune led them; the Turks at their pleasure spoiling and destroying that rich & pleasant country, sometime the nurse of worthie wits, and famous captaines: where they found wonderfull riches, and tooke prisoners without number; insomuch that they were sold among the Turks at most vile price. There Amurath for his pleasure, cruelly sacrificed six hundreth Christian captiues, to the hellish ghost of his dead father Mahomet: & afterwards imposing a yearely tribute vpon the Peloponesians, and others Grecian princes now yeelding againe vnto him, as an induction to their futher slauerie vnder the Turkish tirannie, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of PATRAS and SICYONE. Thus the rich countrey of PELOPONESVS, and all the rest of GRECIA, sometime fountaine of all learning and ciuilitie, became tributarie to the barbarous and cruell Turkes, in the yeare of our Lord 1445.

Peloponnesus made tributarie vnto the Turke.

1446 Baiazet borne. Old Amurath now clogged with yeares, and wearied with long wars, was content to take his rest at HADRIANOPLE: during which time, Baiazet the sonne of Mahomet was borne in the yeare 1446, who afterwards of long time with great glorie gouerned the Turkish empire at CONSTANTINOPLE, as in his place shall appeare.

The Hungarians after the calamitie of VARNA, wherein they had together with Vladislaus their king, lost most part of their nobilitie also; in a generall assembly of their states, made choice of Ladislaus, the posthumous sonne of Albertus (and then in keeping of Fredericke the emperour) for their king. But for as much as he being then but a child of fiue yeares old, and chosen king, more for the remembrance of the emperour Sigismund his grandfather, and Albertus his father, and for the good hope conceiued of him, than for any other thing presently to bee expected from him; it was thought more than necessarie, to make choice of some notable and woorthie man, vnto whom they might (during the time of the kings minoritie) commit the gouernement and protection of that so great and turbulent a kingdome. Many there were in that honorable assemblie well thought of, both of themselues and others: but such was the glorie and valour of Huniades, and so great the remembrance of his worthie deserts both of the kingdome of HVNGARIE, and of the Christian commonweale in generall, as without his seeking, procured vnto him the generall fauour and suffrages of all; yea so farre, that euen they which most enuied at his honour, as ouershaddowing their own, were glad to hold their peace, for that without him it was commonly thought the state of that shaken kingdome could not long stand: So by the generall consent of all the states there assembled, hee was with the great applause of the people chosen and proclaimed gouernour, as of all others most fit for so great and heauie a charge: wherein he quietly spent some few yeares in deciding of ciuile controuersies, in composing the quarrels of the nobilitie; not forgetting in the mean time the indifferent administration of justice to all men, ending many controuersies farre from the place of judgement, and that without all suspition of corruption, vsing therein such expedition and neuer-wearied patience, in hearing euery mans cause, that sitting, going, standing, riding, hee dispatched many great and waightie matters: alwayes shewing himselfe affable and courteous, as well vnto them of the poorer sort, as others of greater calling, that had any sutes vnto him. So that it was of him truly said, That no man was than he vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more crosse and contrarie.

Huniades in the minoritie of the king, chosen Gouernour of all the kingdome of Hungarie.

In

In time of peace he was alwayes prouiding for warre, heaping vp great treaſure; and ſuch other things, as without which, the warres could not be maintained. But aboue all things, he was carefull of the good agreement of the nobilitie, taking great paines in reconciling their diſpleaſures conceiued one againſt another, and that with ſuch dexteritie, as that he was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

In the meane time, whileſt he was thus buſied in diſpoſing of the ciuile affaires of the commonweale and the adminiſtration of juſtice, hee was aduertiſed by his eſpials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raiſing great forces both in ASIA and EVROPE, and that as the common fame went, for the inuaſion of HVNGARIE. For the withſtanding whereof, Huniades not vnprouided, as neuer vnmindfull of ſo dangerous an enemie, or of any thing more deſirous, than in ſome ſort to be reuenged of the great loſſe receiued at VARNA; in the fourth yeare of his gouernment and in the yeare of our Lord 1448 accompanied with moſt part of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, and the Vaiuod of VALACHIA his friend and confederate, ſet forward againſt the Turke, with an armie of two and twentie thouſand choiſe ſouldiours. So hauing paſſed the riuer TIBISCVS, or TEISE, and trauailing through VALACHIA, a little beneath where the riuer MOROVA running through SERVIA, falleth into DANVBIVS, he with moſt part of his armie paſſed that great riuer; the reſt in the meane time taking paſſage ouer at a towne called SEVERIN. Huniades with his armie being thus got ouer into SERVIA, by his embaſſadours requeſted the Deſpot, as he had oftentimes before, to put himſelfe into that moſt Chriſtian warre; and remembring the great benefits he had receiued from the Hungarians, not to ſhew himſelfe therfore vngratefull, than which, nothing could be more diſhonourable: and to encourage him the more, certified him both of his owne ſtrength, and of the aid brought vnto him by the Vaiuod; and that for the good ſucceſſe of the warre, there wanted nothing but his preſence and direction, with ſuch troupes of light horſemen as he knew he had euer in a readineſſe. Wherewith he requeſted him with all ſpeed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turke than to Huniades, the more cleanly to withdraw himſelfe from this warre, pretended many excuſes: firſt, the league he had with Amurath his ſonne in lawe, which he ſaid he might not breake, for feare that if things chanced not well, he might ſo fall againe headlong into his old miſerie; then, the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the time, Autumne being now paſt, which difficulties in thoſe cold countries they had to their coſt too much felt in the late warr: Theſe with many other ſuch like he alleadged, in excuſe that he came not: but the truth was, the malice of the man, grieued to ſee Huniades preferred before him in the gouernment of the kingdome, and diſdaining to ſerue vnder his enſignes, being himſelfe Deſpot, and king of SERVIA, deſcended of the royall race, the cauſe of his backwardneſſe: ſo that blinded with enuie, he could not there rightly judge of himſelfe, or what was fit for him in this caſe to haue done. But Huniades angrie with his vnkind anſwere, threatned him with his owne hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to giue away his kingdome to one more worthy thereof than he, if he ſhould with victorie returne. So paſſing through SERVIA, as through the enemies countrey, he came into BVLGARIA. After whoſe departure, the falſe Deſpot by ſpeedy meſſengers aduertiſed Amurath both of the comming of the Hungarians, and of their ſtrength; yea he certified him of euerie daies march, and how that Huniades was but with a ſmall companie of his owne, and ſome weake ſupplies of the Vaiuods come ouer DANVBIVS: whom if he ſhould not preſently meet, but ſuffer him to come on further, and ſo with his armie to get betwixt him and home, hee might ſo ſhut him in, as that he ſhould hardly be able to ſcape his hands. All which he did, partly for enuie, partly to gratifie the Turke, and the better to keepe friendſhip with him. So Amurath not contemning the Deſpots counſell, ſuffered Huniades without reſiſtance to enter a great way into his countrey, and comming two or three daies march behind him, ſo ſtopped the paſſage as that he could not poſsibly retire, but that he muſt needs fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plaine in BVLGARIA, which the Hungarians call RIGOMEZV, and the Raſcians the plaine of COSSOVA, through the middeſt whereof the riuer SCHICHNIZA riſing out of the mountaines of ILLIRIA running, at length falleth into MOROVA, and ſo into DANVBIVS: this plaine is about 20 miles in length, and in bredth fiue, enuironed on each ſide with pleaſant mountaines, in manner of a theatre, the riuer and low vallies at the foot of the mountaines being garniſhed with many countrey villages and townes. Into this fatall plaine when as the Hungarians firſt, and after them the Turks, were as into a place of combate deſcended;

an old woman dwelling in one of the villages vpon the riuer ſide faſt by, where both armies of late paſſed, with a loud voice cried out, Oh how much I now feare, the hard fortune of the Hungarians. When as their paſſage ouer by the foord troubled the riuer but one daie, and the Turks three. By the ſmall number of their armie, diuining their enſuing ouerthrow. In the middeſt almoſt of this plaine ariſeth a ſmall hill, by the foote whereof the riuer SCHICHNIZA runneth; not farre beyond which, toward the head of the plaine, was a certaine tower built like a piramides, in memoriall of Amurath the firſt of that name, and third king of the Turks there ſlaine: which tower, Amurath fearing leaſt Huniades marching before him, ſhould take, and ſo become vnto him ominous (for in ſuch matters the Turkes are verie ſuperſtitious) hee made the more haſt, of purpoſe to joyne battaile with him before he ſhould come to the foreſaid tower. Huniades being come vnto the hill, eaſily ariſing in the middeſt of the plaine, there encamped, expecting the comming of Scanderbeg; who was ſaid (according to appointment made betwixt him and Huniades) to be euerie houre comming. Wherefore Amurath fearing leaſt the tower faſt by ſhould be taken, and the enemies power ſtrengthened by the comming of the Albanois, prouoked Huniades to battaile; who ſtill refuſed the ſame, in hope of his friends comming: which made the Turke more fierce vpon him, ſeeking by all meanes he could to draw him to battaile, but eſpecially by cutting him off from water and forrage: for why hee much preſumed vpon his multitude, hauing in his armie about foureſcore thouſand fighting men. At length Huniades for want of water and other neceſſaries, enforced to fight, vpon S. Lukes day being then Thurſday, commaunded his ſouldiours to make themſelues readie: and diuiding his armie into two and thirtie battailions, in ſuch order as he ment to giue battaile, the more to encourage them ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The omynous ſpeech of an old woman.

The notable ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſouldiours againſt the Turks.

At length (valiant ſouldiours and fellowes in armes) the day is come, wherein you may reuenge that diſhonour, or diſgrace, you receiued in the battaile of VARNA; and recouer your former credit of conſtancie, and praiſe, if you will play the men: the enemie oppoſeth againſt you, but theſe reliques of his armies, by you ſo often broken and diſcomfited; who although they be in number moe than you, yet are they in hope, quarrell, and ſtrength, far inferior. For what can they hope for, which fight not for their owne, but for another mans kingdome? and in conquering, procure vnto themſelues nothing but bondage in this life, and torment in the life to come, and in both perpetuall and endleſſe miſerie? Whereas you on the other ſide, howſoeuer the matter fall out, fighting for your owne kingdome, your children, your countrey, your houſes and altars, may aſſuredly hope for in both, eternall and vndoubted bliſſe. You haue alſo far greater cauſe to fight, as they which if they do not valiantly ouercome their enemies, are in danger with themſelues to looſe alſo all that theirs is. The ſtrength of both are ſufficiently tried. Once we vnfortunatly joyned battaile at VARNA, where if wee might make exchange of our fortunes there found, happily the Turke would make choiſe of our flight, rather than of the great ſlaughter of his owne men: who being not able to ouertake vs, was there notably beaten, with the loſſe of a great part of his armie: whoſe great loſſe there receiued, may counteruaile our diſhonour; although the loſſe, he ſuffred perforce, but we our flight by choiſe. But of that our ouerthrow, the angrie powers from aboue (willing to reuenge our breach of faith) were as I verily beleeue, the cauſe, rather than our cowardiſe: for euen there, all the authors of that perfidious dealing, euen there I ſay, euerie one receiued the juſt guerdon of their treacherie. Whereas we againſt our wils, drawne into that wofull warre, by the mercie of God yet liue with you, preſerued for the defence of the Chriſtian commonweale, and eſpecially of HVNGARIE, that it ſhould not be ouerrunne with the Turkiſh power and rage. The number of your enemies is not of you to be feared, when as you with few, haue oftentimes learned to fight with their multitudes, and caried away from them the victorie. Hetherto we haue rather fought by the power of God than man, and in the name of Chriſt Ieſu our Sauior, haue eaſily ouerthrowne their prophane battailes. Which way ſoeuer wee haue turned our ſelues, in his moſt mightie name, we haue with our victorious armes opened our way, for that wee fought vnder the leading and conduct of the higheſt, whoſe helpe we haue alwaies felt at hand: neither ſhall we thereof this daie faile, if we be mindfull of his forepaſſed loue towards vs, and of our wonted valour. God is alwaies preſent with them that in his juſt quarrell fight couragiouſly. Hereunto is joyned the ſafe manner of our fight, by reaſon of our men at armes, and barbed horſes, who like a ſtrong caſtle cannot eaſily be ouerthrowne. Our battalions are ſuch as may eaſily be commaunded, and yet ſtrong inough againſt our enemies: whereas their great multitude breedeth but confuſion. We haue many notable and forcible engines of warre, which they haue

haue not. Beſides that, euerie houre we looke for the worthie Scanderbeg his comming. The danger is not ſo great, as that we ſhould feare it; or ſo little, as that we ſhould contemne it. Backe againe without victorie we may not goe, for that our armie is hardly by the ſtraits of theſe mountaines to bee led: and if the way were neuer ſo eaſie, yet without doing that we came for, and glorie with victorie, we may not retire. Vnto the valiant, all difficulties are propounded. Wherefore ſith this your laſt labour is at hand, wherein the whole ſtrength of the Turkes may be for euer cut off, I pray and beſeech you (fellow ſouldiors) by that God vnder whoſe power and protection wee ſerue, and by the loue you beare vnto your countrey, your wiues, your children, and wealth, vpon the ſignall of battaile giuen, ſo to ſhew your valour, as men reſolued to be fully reuenged of the injuries by that filthie and wicked nation done both to God and man: and eſpecially of the loſſe receiued at VARNA. We loſt there a deuout king, who for our ſafetie, and for the breach of his faith, ſacrificed himſelfe; by which royall ſacrifice, that diuine anger is appeaſed: vnto whoſe ghoſt, I beſeech you, in this battaile to make an honourable ſacrifice. Not forgetting withall, to reuenge the death of other worthie men in that battaile ſlaine. This feare of the Turks, is at once and euen this day to be cut off; and ſo, as that it ſhould neuer grow againe: and the kingdome of HVNGARIE, ſo to be deliuered from the danger of moſt cruell ſlauerie, as that it may by this daies worke gaine perpetuall reſt, and glorie, vnto the enioying of the pleaſures both of this life, and of the life to come. Wherefore (worthie ſouldiours) we muſt fight with all our force, for that our honour ſo requireth, our profit ſo perſwadeth, and neceſſitie enforceth. As for our ſelues, howſoeuer the matter fall out, all ſhall be with vs well: If victorie, perpetuall bliſſe and happineſſe ſhall thereby be procured vnto our countrey, and immortall fame vnto our ſelues; but if we ſhall be ouercome, here we ſhall be moſt honourably buried in the bed of fame, to liue in heauen with God and his ſaints for euer. Wherefore I beſeech you ſo to fight, as men reſolutely ſet downe to ouercome, or if it ſhall otherwiſe fall out, as men reſolued honourably to die.

With this the Generals ſpeech, all the minds of the hearers were greatly enflamed, and they all by his words, and their owne hot deſires, ſufficiently encouraged. Neither did old Amurath on the other ſide with leſſe care or diligence marſhall his armie and encourage his Turks, ſparing neither cheerefull ſpeech, glorious promiſes, or ſeuere commaund: Whoſe armie being brought into the plaine, and ranged in order of battaile, filled the ſame from the one ſide to the other, euen vnto the verie mountaines, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Chriſtians: and ſo about nine a clock in the morning ſet forward. Huniades had from the hill where he lay, ſent downe both the wings of his armie, and had afront on both ſides before them, ſtretched out certain long troupes of light horſemen, to begin the skirmiſh: In the middeſt betwixt both he had placed Zechel, his ſiſters ſonne, with a ſtrong ſquare battaile of men at armes: and ſuch as he had kept aloft vpon the hill for reſcues, he had compaſſed about with his waggons, as with trenches. The ſignall of the battaile being giuen, the fierce and couragious ſouldiors on both ſides, with cheerefull mindes, began at firſt to skirmiſh a farre off: but afterwards fortune as it were fawning vpon both ſides, and their courage thereupon increaſing, they began with greater force to fight foot to foot, and hand to hand. Which hot fight, continued about three houres: at length the Turkes battaile was put to the worſt, by Benedict Loſoncius, who had the leading of the right wing; and ſo likewiſe in the left alſo by Stephen Bamffi, who with great ſlaughter had notably foyled the great Baſſa of EVROPE, ſtill preſsing hard & deſperatly vpon him. Which diſcomfiture of his men in both wings Amurath beholding, preſently ſent in ſtrong ſupplies, & in both places renewed the battaile: whereby the Hungarian and Valachian light horſemen before wearied, were enforced to retire vnto the men at armes; who ſerred together, and ſtanding as a ſtrong wall, eaſily repulſed the greateſt aſſaults of the Turks: In which manner of fight many were on both ſides ſlain, but farre mote of the Turks, by reaſon they were neither ſo well horſed nor armed as were the Chriſtians. Huniades in the meane time with the artillerie from the hill, did the Turks great harme: which Amurath perceiuing, drew as cloſe vnto the hill as he could, by that meanes ſauing his people (ſo much as was poſsible) out of the danger of the artillerie, mounted on high aboue them in ſuch ſort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them. Which Huniades from the hill beholding, came downe to the releeſe of his men, ſending new ſupplies to both wings; ſometime encouraging them with cheerefull ſpeech, and ſometime with his owne moſt valiant hand: vnto the wearie he ſent releeſe, the fearefull he encouraged, them that were flying he ſtaied, and where hee ſaw the enemies faſteſt comming on, there was hee himſelfe preſent to meet them;

them, omitting nothing that was of a good Generall or worthie ſouldiour to be done. The valiant he commended, the coward he reproued, and as a carefull Generall, was himſelfe in euery place preſent. Whereby the battaile became ſo fierce and terrible, that in euerie place a man might haue ſeen all fowly foiled with blood, and the quarrey of the dead. Amurath in like manet ſtill ſent in new ſupplies, nothing diſcouraged with the great loſſe of his men, preſuming vpon his multitude, as fully reſolued orderly to fight, and to make vſe of all his forces; in hope at length by continuall ſending in of freſh ſupplies, to wearie his enemies, whom he ſaw hee could not by force ouercome. Wherein he was not deceiued, for one battailion of the Hungarians was often times enforced to wearie foure or fiue of the Turks before they could be releeued, they came on ſo faſt. That day they dined and ſupped in the battaile, refreſhing themſelues with ſuch ſhort repaſt as they could eat ſtanding, going, or riding. The Turkes armie was that day in euerie place put to the worſt, & often times with great ſlaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almoſt vnto their trenches: yet was the battaile ſtill againe renewed, and ſo fought on both ſides, as well appeared they were reſolued either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruell fight maintained all the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retiring into their owne trenches: but with purpoſe the next daie to renew the battaile, and not to giue ouer or turne their backes, vntill the victorie were by dint of ſword determined. So with little reſt, was that night ſpent, both armies keeping moſt diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as by battell therein to trie whether they ſhould liue or die. It was yet ſcarce faire daie, when both the armies in good order readie ranged began againe the battaile: which at the firſt, was not by the Hungarians fought with ſuch force and courage as before, for there was none of them which had not the day before ſpent their whole ſtrength; whereas there was yet almoſt fortie thouſand of the Turks, which either had not fought at all, or but lightly skirmiſhed. Yet Huniades exhorted his ſouldiors, not by faint harted cowardiſe to breake off the courſe of the victorie by them the daie before ſo well begun, but courageouſly to proſecute the ſame; beſeeching them not to be now wanting vnto themſelues and their country, but to remember how well they had fought the day before, how many thouſands of their enemies they had ſlaine, and not now at laſt to giue ouer, and ſo ſhamefully to fruſtrate all the paines and dangers by them before endured: for that they (as he ſaid) were to be thought worthie of honour, not which began, but which well ended honourable actions. He wiſhed them to ſet before their eies the calamities like to enſue, if they ſhould as cowards be ouercome: firſt, the diuers kinds of death and torture; then, the ſlauerie of their wiues and children; the rauiſhment of their virgins and matrons; and laſt of all, the vtter deſtruction of their kingdom, with the horrible confuſion of all things, as well ſacred as prophane: all which were by that one daies labour (as he ſaid) to be auoided. And therefore he beſought them for the loue both of God and man, with their wonted valour, that day to ſet at libertie for euer, themſelues, their countrey, their wiues and children, and what ſoeuer elſe they held deere. In like manner alſo did Amurath encourage his ſouldiours, with great promiſes, and threats, perſuading them rather to endure any thing, than by that daies ouerthrow to bee driuen out of EVROPE. He carefully viewed his armie, ordered his battailes, and with many graue reaſons perſuaded them to play the men. But after that ſome light skirmiſhes being paſt, both the armies were fully joyned, the battel was fought with no leſſe force and furie than the day before. Of the Chriſtians many then wounded, came now again into the battaile, there either by ſpeedy death or ſpeedie victorie to cure their wounds before receiued; and there did right good ſeruice. Great was the ſlaughter in euerie place, neither could the force of the Hungarians be withſtood; whoſe furious impreſsion, whē the Turks could not by plain force endure, they began with their freſh horſemen, cunningly to delude their deſperat fierceneſſe: at ſuch time as the Hungarians began moſt hardly to charge them, they by & by turned their backs, ſuffering them a while to follow after thē, far ſcattered & diſperſed: who allured as it were with the hope of a preſent victory, eagrely purſued them, & in the purſuit ſlew diuers of them. And they again vpon a ſignall giuē, cloſing together, & turning back vpon the diſpierced troups, well reuenged the death of their fellows: & with their often charges, & retraits, wonderfully wearied the Hungarians; notably deluding their furious attempts with that vncertain kind of fight, all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were there ſlain, and the Turks had that day the better, and ſo both armies being wearied, night and wearines ended the fight: both retiring into their trenches, there keeping moſt carefull watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battaile was again begun. Huniades his bro-

brother, Generall of the Valachians, with his light horſemen ſetting firſt forward; after whom in ſeemly order followed the reſt of the nobilitie, with their companies. Where for certaine howers, the battaile was hardly fought with like hope on both ſides, and a great ſlaughter made, but eſpecially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, & moſt part of them wounded, were now all to endure this third daies labour. Zechel (Huniades his ſiſters ſonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battaile, was the firſt of the leaders there ſlaine in the thickeſt of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus and Stephen Bamffi, both great commaunders, encloſed by the Turks, there died alſo. Amurath ſeeing the formoſt enſignes of the Chriſtians which ſtood in Zechel his regiment, taken, and his ſoldiors (diſcomfited with the death of their colonell) turning their backs; preſently commaunded all the companies, which were manie (yet left in the trenches, for freſh ſupplies) to iſſue foorth, and at once to ouerwhelme the Chriſtians, being (as hee ſaid) but few and ouerweried with three daies continuall fight. Vpon which the kings commaund, they fiercely breaking out, preſently ouerthrew both the wings of the Chriſtians, before wauering; and in a great battaile (wherein moſt of the chiefe commaunders were ſlaine, and their enſigns taken) diſcomfited the reſt, and with a great ſlaughter put them to flight. Huniades ſeeing his brother now ſlaine, the enſignes taken, and the battaile quite loſt; betooke himſelfe to flight alſo, leauing behind him his tents and baggage, all which ſhortly after became a prey vnto the Turkes: who from noone vntill night furiouſly followed the chaſe, with moſt cruell execution; but at length ſtaied by the comming on of the darkeneſſe, they returned againe vnto their trenches. The reſt of the Turkes armie that followed not the chaſe, compaſsing in the Hungarian campe, were there by the wounded ſouldiors, the wagoners, and other drudges of the armie, kept out ſo long as they had any ſhot left; but yet were in the end euerie mothers ſonne ſlaine, though not altogither vnreuenged, two or three of the Turkes in many places lying dead by the bodie of one Hungarian. Amurath to couer the greatneſſe of the loſſe he there receiued, commanded the bodies of his captaines there ſlaine, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common ſouldiours, to be for the moſt part caſt into the riuer SCHICHNIZA: For which cauſe the inhabitants of the countrey there by, of long time after abſtained from eating of any fiſh taken in that riuer. The plaine by this great battaile made once againe famous, lay neuertheleſſe many yeares after couered with dead mens bones, as if it had been with ſtones: neither could be ploughed by the countrey people, but that long time after armour and weapons were there ſtill in many places turned vp and found. Thus albeit that this bloudy victorie fell vnto the Turkes, yet was their loſſe farre greater than the Hungarians; hauing loſt (as was reported by them that ſay leaſt) foure and thirtie thouſand of themſelues, for eight thouſand of their enemies. Howbeit they themſelues report the loſſe to haue beene on both ſides far greater; as that of the Chriſtians were ſlaine ſeuenteene thouſand, and of themſelues fortie thouſand: which in ſo long and mortall a fight, is not vnlike to haue been true. In this vnfortunate battaile fell moſt part of the Hungarian nobilitie: all, men worthy eternall fame and memorie, whoſe names we for breuitie wil paſſe ouer. Many in the chaſe taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandement of the angrie tyrant ſlaine. Such as eſcaped out of the ſlaughter by the way of ILLYRIA, returned in ſafetie: but ſuch as ſought to ſaue themſelues by returning back againe through SERVIA the Deſpots countrey, found the ſame ſo troubleſome as that few of them eſcaped, but that they were by the way either ſlaine, or quite ſtripped of all they had.

The battaile againe begun the third day.

Huniades flieth.

The number of the Turkes and Chriſtians ſlain in the battaile of Coſſoua.

Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the reſt, who hauing on horſebacke all alone by vncouth and vntract waies, trauailed three daies without meat or drinke, and the fourth day tired his horſe and caſt him off; being on foot and diſarmed, fell into the hands of two notable theeues, who in diſpoiling him of his apparell, finding a faire crucifix of gold about his necke, fell at ſtrife betwixt themſelues for the ſame: whereby he tooke occaſion to lay hand vpon one of their ſwords, and with the ſame preſently thruſt him through; and then ſuddenly aſſailing the other, put him to flight alſo. So deliuered of this danger, trauailing on, and almoſt ſpent with thirſt and hunger, the next day he light vpon a ſheepheard, a ſturdie rough knaue, who hearing of the ouerthrow of the Hungarians, was (in hope of prey) roaming abroad in that deſolat countrey: Who at their firſt meeting, ſtrucken with the majeſtie of the man, ſtood at gaze vpon him; as did alſo Huniades, fearing in his ſo great weakneſſe to haue to doe with him. Thus a while hauing the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talke, the ſheepheard bluntly asking him of his fortune; and he for Gods ſake craning uing of him ſome thing to eat. When as the ſheepheard hearing of his hard happe, mooued with his eſtate, and hope of promiſed reward, brought him vnto a poore cottage not farre off, cauſing to be ſet before him bread and water, with a few oynions. Who in the pleaſant remembrance of that paſſed miſerie, would oftentimes after in his greateſt banquets ſay, That he neuer in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he ſupped with this ſheepheard. So well can hunger ſeaſon homely cates. Thus refreſhed, he was by the ſheepheard conducted to SYNDEROVIA: whereof the Deſpot hauing intelligence (whoſe countrey was all layd for the ſtaying of him) cauſed him by the captaine of the caſtle to be apprehended, and impriſoned. But after certaine daies ſpent in talke about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, that all ſuch ſtrong townes in RASCIA and SERVIA, as had by the Hungarians been detained from the Deſpot, at ſuch time as his kingdome was by king Vladiſlaus reſtored vnto him, ſhould now be againe to him deliuered; and that Matthias, Huniades his youngeſt ſonne, ſhould for the confirmation of farther friendſhip, marrie the Deſpots daughter: with ſome other ſuch conditions as it pleaſed the vngratefull prince for his owne behoofe to ſet downe. For performance whereof, he required to haue Ladiſlaus, Huniades his eldeſt ſon, in hoſtage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto, for feare the falſe Deſpot ſhould haue deliuered him into the hands of Amurath, his mortall enemie. So the hoſtage being giuen, Huniades was againe ſet at libertie. Who vpon Chriſtmas day comming to SEGEDINVM, was there by all the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, and great concourſe of the people, honorably receiued. This ingratitude of the Deſpots no leſſe greeued this worthie man, than the diſhonour receiued from the Turke. Wherefore vpon the ſuddaine raiſing a great armie, he inuaded the territorie, long before giuen to the Deſpot by the emperor Sigiſmund in HVNGARIE, in exchange of the ſtrong town of BELGRADE, deſtroying the countrey before him, and burning the villages, neuer reſting, vntill he had got into his power whatſoeuer the Deſpot had in HVNGARIE: & yet not ſo contented, preſently entred into RASCIA, where the Deſpots embaſſadors met him, bringing with them Ladiſlaus the hoſtage, honorably rewarded, & humbly crauing peace at his hands: which he at the requeſt of the nobilitie, eaſily granted, with forgiueneſſe of all former wrongs or injuries. And ſo hauing with him concluded a peace, returned backe again into HVNGARIE. But Fortune neuer ſuffereth long the valiant man to reſt, but ſtill keepeth him buſied, leaſt he ſhould at too much eaſe attaine vnto honours glorie.

The Deſpot inuaded by Amurath, craueth aid of Huniades.

The yeare following, Amurath certainely enformed, That George the Deſpot hauing of late Huniades in his power, had againe ſet him at libertie: was therwith exceeding wroth, blaming him of great ingratitude, That for a kingdome which he had at his hands receiued, he had not deliuered vnto him his enemie, in full recompence thereof: whom of all others he moſt feared, & therefore likewiſe wiſhed to haue had him periſh. In reuenge of which injurie (as he tooke it) the melancholie tyrant, ſent Fritze-beg and Ioſe-beg, two of his moſt expert captaines, with a ſtrong power to inuade RASCIA, the Deſpots countrey: who accordingly entring thereinto, ſtrongly fortified CHRYSONICVM, a towne before ruinated, vpon the ſide of the riuer MORAVA, and from thence with fire and ſword deſtroyed the countrey both farre and neere. The Deſpot diſmayed with this ſuddaine and vnexpected inuaſion, wiſt not well which way to turne himſelfe: the angrie Turke, he well knew, was not to bee appeaſed without yeelding vnto ſome great inconuenience; and to pray aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withſtand the Turkes, hee thought but vaine, for the wrong he had before done him. So that what to do he wiſt not: yet had he rather to endure any thing, than againe to ſuffer the heauie bondage of the Turke. In this extremitie he thought beſt to make proofe of Huniades, of whom hee humbly and not without great ſhame craued aid. Which the courteous gouernour, according to his honourable nature, forgetting all former injuries, eaſily graunted: and the rather, for that hee deſired nothing more, than to be of the Turks in ſome part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late receiued in the plaines of COSSOVA: as alſo for that he wiſely foreſaw, That the Deſpots countrey being loſt, hee ſhould haue the Turkes ſtill brauing him euen as it were in the gates of HVNGARIE. Wherefore hauing with great ſpeed raiſed a conuenient power, he forthwith in perſon himſelfe ſet forward, and at SYNDEROVIA paſsing ouer the riuer DANVBIVS into RASCIA, there ioyned his power with the Deſpots, which hee found there readie. And ſo marching forward with ſuch expedition, that hee preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather alſo at the ſame time as it were fauouring his purpoſe, and couering the countrey with a thicke miſt, hee was the fourth day vpon the Turkes before they were aware of him. Who wonderfully diſmayed with the ſuddaine comming of the Chriſtians, and vpon the breaking vp of the miſt, diſcouering alſo Huniades his enſignes (alwaies vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of reſiſtance, or of the ordering of their battaile, but as men diſcouraged, betooke themſelues to ſpeedie flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Seruian light horſemen, with moſt bloodie execution hauing them in chace all that day; Huniades with his men at armes following ſtill after in good order, for feare the Turkes ſhould againe make head vpon the light horſemen that had them in chace. And had not the comming on of the night ended the ſlaughter, few of the Turkes had there eſcaped: but by the approch thereof many of them got into the woods, and ſo ſaued themſelues. Fritze-beg the Generall, with moſt part of the Turkes beſt commaunders, were in that flight taken. Huniades after this victorie entering into BVLGARIA, came to BVDINA, the metropoliticall citie of that countrey, which (as the cauſe oftentimes of great wars) he burnt down to the ground. And ſo hauing well reuenged himſelfe, and cleared the countrey of the Turks, he returned backe againe into SERVIA, and there gaue vnto the Deſpot for a preſent all the priſoners he had taken: and contenting himſelfe with the honour of the victorie, returned with triumph to BVDA, there to find no leſſe trouble with the Bohemians, and ſome of the diſcontented nobilitie of HVNGARIE, than hee had with the Turkes, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian commonweale.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Muſtapha lying ſtill vpon the borders of MACEDONIA, as Amurath had commaunded; it chaunced that a great quarrell grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech Zacharie (a noble man of EPIRVS) then ſhamefully murthered by his vnnaturall kinſman Lech Duchagne; part of whoſe inheritance lying in the frontiers of EPIRVS, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their ſeignorie: and hauing got poſſeſsion of the citie of DAYNA, part thereof, by force held the ſame againſt Scanderbeg: vpon which quarrell great warres aroſe betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before beene very great friends: inſomuch, that in the end they joined in battaile at the riuer of DRINE, where the Venetians were by him in a great battaile ouerthrowne. Of which troubles Muſtapha daily vnderſtood, and how that Scanderbeg ſo buſied, had left but a ſmall garriſon vpon the borders of EPIRVS. Wherefore being deſirous to redeeme his former diſgrace with ſome better hap; hee would faine haue taken the oportunitie now preſented, but that his great maſters command lay ſo heauie vpon him, as that he durſt not without his leaue attempt the ſame; knowing that the danger of his euill fortune, if it ſhould ſo fall out, would farre exceed the vncertaine glorie of his better ſucceſſe. Yet ceaſed hee not from time to time to giue Amurath intelligence of theſe troubles and warres in EPIRVS, earneſtly requeſting him not to let ſlip ſo faire an oportunitie, but to giue him leaue to enter into the countrey: in manner, aſſuring him beforehand of the victorie. yet the ſuſpitious old king was long in reſoluing what to doe, ſtill fearing the fortune of his enemie. At length diſcharged of the feare of the Hungarians, and commending Muſtapha his forwardneſſe, hee ſent vnto him a meſſenger with letters of this purport, anſwerable to his deſire.

E The warres thou ſo greatly deſireſt, behold Muſtapha we graunt vnto thee: the glorie thereof (if thoſe things be true which we heare of the Venetian war) thine owne valour, and worthie right hand ſhall giue thee: yet thou muſt warily deale with that enemie, and not raſhly take vp armes, which thou maieſt be enforced ſhamefully to caſt away, when thou thinkeſt leaſt. Peraduenture the counterfeit ſhew of warre, and faigned falling out among the Chriſtians, do too much allure thee; for the common ſaying is, There is no quarrell ſooner ended, than betwixt the father and the ſonne: wee in perſon abſent, can neither aduiſe thee as preſent, nor commend a fooliſh forwardneſſe in armes. Thou muſt before thou put on armes, diſpoſe of all things, and conſider of euery particular, which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou haſt a great armie of freſh and luſtie ſouldiors, thine enemies are with continuall warres wearied and ſpent: in that remaineth, doe as thou thinkeſt good, for I forbid thee the doing of nothing, which thou thinkeſt may be for the aduancement of our honour.

Muſtapha hauing thus obtained leaue, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into EPIRVS, hoping in one battaile to end that warre: which he (preſuming vpon the ſtrength of his armie) many times offered in the plaine field. Newes hereof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the ſiege of DAYNA againſt the Venetians) from his garriſons lying vpon the frontiers of

of EPIRVS, to whom he addreſſed a ſpeedie meſſenger: commaunding them in no wiſe to encounter with the enemie, but to keepe themſelues within the ſauegard of their ſtrong holds, and to protract the time vntill his coming. Afterwards ſelecting out of his armie fiue hundreth horſemen,& fifteen hundreth choſen footmen,all old beaten ſoldiors, he with that ſmall number marched to the place where he knew lay his garriſons intrenched, in the vpper countrey of DIBRA: leauing Ameſa his nephew at the ſiege of DAYNA. Muſtapha hauing many times in vaine ſought to draw the garriſon ſouldiours out of their trenches by offering them many faire oportunities of aduantage, and now out of hope that way to circumuent them, began to ſpoile and burne the countrey round about. But when he vnderſtood by his ſcouts of Scanderbeg his comming, hee ſpeedily called together his armie, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbegs campe, at a place called ORONOCHE, in the vpper countrey of DIBRA. Scanderbeg had there in his campe of his garriſon ſouldiours and thoſe he brought with him, foure thouſand horſemen, and two thouſand foot,all old expert ſouldiours: where, after he had made his trenches ſtrong, hee left therein three hundreth of them, and brought the reſt into the field in order of battaile. Muſtapha on the other ſide likewiſe brought on in good order his armie alſo. But whileſt both armies thus ſtood ranged one within the view of the other, expecting nothing but the ſignall of battaile, ſuddenly a man at armes,in gallant and rich furniture,iſſued out of the Turks armie into the middeſt of the plaine betwixt both armies, and from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Chriſtian armie. This Turke was called Caraguſa. At the firſt Scanderbegs ſoldiors vpon this challenge ſtood ſtil,one looking vpon another: for as they were all aſhamed to refuſe ſo braue an offer, ſo the danger ſo ſuddainly offered, ſtaied euerie mans forwardneſſe for a while: Vntill that one Paul Maneſsi,accounted the beſt man at armes in Scanderbeg his armie(vpon whom euerie mans eie was now caſt, as if he had been the man by name called out by the proud challenger)not able longer to endure the Turkes pride, with great courage and cheerefull countenance came to Scanderbeg,requeſting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on God his name to ſet forward, firſt to win honour to himſelfe, and then to giue example of his valour for all the reſt of the armie to follow. Paul ſtaying a while, vntill he had for that purpoſe moſt brauely armed himſelfe,mounted preſently to horſe, and riding forth into the plaine,called aloud vnto the Turk, that he ſhould make himſelfe readie to fight. Whom Caraguſa required to ſtay a while that hee might ſpeake vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The ſpeech of Caraguſa the Turke,to Maneſsi.

The victorie (ſaid he) our force and fortune ſhall determine: but the conditions of the victorie, we are now to appoint our ſelues. If the Deſtinies haue aſsigned vnto thee the honour of this daie, Irefuſe not,but that thou maieſt by law of armes,when I am ouercome,cary away with thee my rich ſpoiles, and at thy pleaſure diſpoſe of my dead bodie. But if thou ſhalt fall vnder my hand, I require that I may haue the ſame right, and power ouer thy captiue bodie: and that the Generals will graunt that no man ſhall mooue out of either armie, to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combat, or after.

Maneſsi his ſtout anſwere to Caraguſa.

Whereunto Maneſsi anſwered, That hee agreed to thoſe conditions of the combat, which hee vpon a needleſſe feare had ſo required to be kept: ſaying, That where the fierce ſoule had yeilded, there of good right all the reſt ought to be the conquerours; and that therefore he ſhould fight without feare of any more enemies than himſelfe: whom ſo ſoone as he had depriued of life, he ſhould haue free power to doe with his dead bodie what he would. Which if thou wouldeſt giue (ſaid he) vnto the teares of my fellow ſouldiours, yet would not worthie Scanderbeg ſuffer the carkaſſe of a vanquiſhed coward to be brought backe againe into his campe.

Caraguſa maruailed to heare his ſo braue a reſolution, and as it was thought,repented him of his challenge. But after that both the Generals had vpon their honours confirmed the lawes of the combat before rehearſed, both the Champions were left alone in the middeſt of the plaine betweene both armies, with all mens eies fixed vpon them. Now both the armies betwixt feare and hope,ſtood in great expectation of the euent of the combat, preſaging their own fortunes in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both hauing withdrawn themſelues one frō the other a conuenient diſtance, for the making of their courſe,and after with great violence running together: Caraguſa was by Maneſsi, at the firſt encounter ſtroke through the head and ſlaine. Maneſsi alighting, diſarmed the dead bodie, and ſtroke off his head: and ſo loaded with the armour and head of the proud challenger, returned with victorie to the armie, where he was joyfully joyfully receiued and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there presently honourably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg seeing his men by this good fortune of Manesti greatly encouraged, and the Turkes as men dismaied with the death of their Champion hanging their heads, like an inuincible captaine himselfe set first forward toward the enemie, as it were in contempt of their multitude: and had charged them as they stood, before they had set one foot forward, had not Mustapha to encourage his souldiours, with certaine disordered troupes opposed himselfe against him, which the whole armie seeing, faintly followed: but as they set forward with small courage, so were they at the first encounter easily driuen to retire. Which when Mustapha saw, he called earnestly vpon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his owne example, put spurres to his horse, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbegs armie, as one resolued either to gaine the victorie, or there to die; after whom followed most of the principall captains of his armie, which would not for shame forsake their generall: thus by his valour the battaile was for a while renued. But Moses preuailing with great slaughter, in one part of the armie, the Turks began to flie: in which flight Mustapha the Generall, with twelue others of the cheefe men in that armie, were taken prisoners, but of the common souldiours few were saued. There was slaine of the Turkes armie ten thousand, and fifteen ensignes taken, whereas of the Christians were lost but three hundreth. The Turks tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof, became a prey to Scanderbegs souldiours. Wherewith although he had satisfied the desires of them all, yet to keepe his old custome, he entred into the confines of MACEDONIA, and there burnt and spoiled all that hee could. And afterwards leauing a garrison of two thousand horsemen, and a thousand foot, for defence of his frontiers, returned againe with the rest of his armie to the siege of DAYNA.

The battaile betwixt Scanderbeg and Mustapha.

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg: and Amurath desirous to redeeme his captaines, about the same time sent great presents vnto Scanderbeg, with fiue and twentie thousand duckats, for the ransome of Mustapha, & the other chieftaines: whom Scanderbeg so honourably vsed, as if there had neuer been any hostilitie betwixt him and them: and so with a safe conuoy, sent them out of his countrey. The raunsome of Mastapha and the other Turks he deuided amongst his souldiours. When Scanderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, hee forthwith led his armie againe into MACEDONIA, with the spoile of that countrey to make his souldiours better pay, as his vsuall manner was. And to doe the greater harme, he diuided his armie into three parts, wherewith he ouerrunning the countrey, wasted and destroied all before him, putting to the sword all the Turks that came in his waie. As for the Christians that there liued amongst them, he spared, but left them nothing more than their liues: the buildings of the countrey he vtterly consumed with fire, so that in all that part of MACEDONIA which boardereth vpon EPIRVS, nothing was to be seen more than the bare ground, and the showes of the spoile by him there made. Which vnmercifull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turks should find no releefe in those quarters, whensoeuer they should come either to lie in garrison in that countrey, or to inuade EPIRVS. The spoile hee made was so great, that it was thought hee left not in all that countrey, so much as might releeue the Turkes armie for one daie.

Of all these great harmes by Scanderbeg done in MACEDONIA, Amurath was with all speed aduertised, and therewith exceedingly vexed: howbeit he resolued with his great counsellors, no more to send any of his Bassaes or captaines, but to goe himselfe in person, with such a royall armie, as should be sufficient not to conquer EPIRVS, but if need were, to fill euery corner thereof. Wherefore hee commaunded commissions to bee speedily directed into all parts of his kingdomes and prouinces, for the leuying of a great armie for HADRIANOPLE: yet whither he intended to imploy the same, was not knowne to any in the Turks court, more than to the Bassaes of the counsaile. Which caused all the bordering Christian princes to make the best preparation they could for their owne assurance, euery one fearing least that growing tempest should breake out against himselfe. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkish policie, easily perceiued all that great preparation to be made against him: which he was the rather induced to thinke, by reason of the vnaccustomed quietnesse of Amurath, who all that while had neither sent any armie to reuenge the ouerthrow of Mustapha, nor so much as a garrison for defence of the borders of his kingdome, but had let all things negligently passe, as if he had beene in a dead sleepe. Besides that, it was also thought, that he had secret intelligence from some of his old friends and

acquaintance in Amurath his court, who probably ſuſpected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg ſetting all other things apart, gaue himſelfe wholly to the preparing of things neceſſarie for the defence of his ſmall kingdome againſt ſo mightie an enemie. Firſt hee by letters and meſſengers aduertiſed all the Chriſtian princes his neighbours and friends, of the greatneſſe of the danger of that warre; wherein Amurath (as he ſaid) ſought not onely his deſtruction, but the vtter ruin of them all: exhorting them therefore to conſider, how farre the danger of ſo great an armie might extend, and therefore to ſtand faſt vpon their guard. Then hee ſent Moſes and other his expert captaines into all parts of EPIRVS, to take vp ſouldiors, and all the prouiſion of corne and victuals that was poſsible to be had. Wherein he himſelfe alſo buſily trauailed day and night, not reſting vntill he had left nothing in the countrey whereupon the enemie might ſhew his crueltie. Moſt part of the common people with their ſubſtance, were receiued into the ſtrong cities, the reſt tooke the refuge of the Venetian and other Chriſtian princes townes and countries farther off, vntill this furie was ouerpaſt: all ſuch as were able to beare armes, were commaunded to repaire to CROIA; where when they were all aſſembled, there were ynow to haue made a right puiſſant armie. But out of all this multitude Scanderbeg made choice onely of ten thouſand old expert ſouldiors, whom he purpoſed to lead himſelfe to encounter with the Turkes great armie, as he ſhould ſee occaſion: and placed a thouſand three hundred in garriſon in CROIA. The cittizens alſo themſelues were throughly furniſhed with all manner of weapons and other prouiſion meet for the defence of their cittie. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men vnfit for warres, with the women and children, ſhould depart the citie; and none to bee therein left but the garriſon ſouldiors, and ſuch cittizens as were willing to tarie, and able to beare arms. This cittie of CROIA was the cheefe citie of EPIRVS, and of the fortune thereof ſeemed to depend the ſtate of all the other ſtrong townes and cities, and ſo conſequently of the whole kingdome: for which cauſe, Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miſerable ſight to ſee the lamentable departure of this weake companie out of CROIA: all was full of weeping and wailing; no houſe, no ſtreet, no part of the cittie was without mourning: but eſpecially in the churches was to be ſeene the very face of common ſorrow and heauineſſe; where all ſorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout praiers, with fountaines of teares, wringing their hands; yea, and ſome in the impatiencie of their greefe forgetting themſelues, ſeemed to expoſtulate their greefe with God. But when their ſorrow was with teares aſſuaged, and their hearts ſomewhat eaſed, the aged mothers kiſsing their ſonnes, gaue them many a fearefull commandement: ſometime reherſing how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and otherſome times ſhewing vnto them their feeble limmes and hoary haires, willing them to bee mindfull of them: The wiues preſented their children vnto their husbands, bewayling to leaue them as childleſſe wydowers, and their houſes deſolat: The old men mute with ſorrow, & carefull of their children, durſt neither encourage them, for feare of making them too forward; neither diſſuade them from aduenturing themſelues, leaſt they ſhould ſeeme to loue them more than their natiue countrie. In the middeſt of theſe paſsions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they muſt now depart, that the ſouldiors might take their places & charge. Then began their ſorrowes afreſh, with pittious ſcriching & teares. A man would haue thought the cittie had euen then been preſently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawne from the embracing of their friends, all now deſiring to remaine ſtill with them in the citie, partakers of their common dangers. But when they ſaw the officers begin to be earneſt vpon them, and to haſten their departure, then with heauie hearts they tooke as it were their laſt farewell, and departed out of the cittie, ſetting their feet many times they wiſt not where, for deſire they had to looke backe againe vpon the cittie. This great multitude was conueyed alſo into the Venetian cities, and other places free from danger: whither all the countrey people, which were not before receiued into the ſtrong cities, reſorted alſo, with all their ſubſtance and cattell; leauing nothing in all the countrey of EPIRVS, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed, and all well quieted, and none left in the citie but men fit for ſeruice, Scanderbeg throughly ſtored it with all things needfull for the defence thereof, and for the enduring of a long ſiege: beſides that, he gaue to euery ſouldior conuenient armour, with ſome ſmall reward. Then he placed Vranacontes (a valiant and famous captaine, honourably deſcended) gouernour of the cittie. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafegard thereof, after hee had in few words exhorted them courageouſly to endure the ſiege, and not to liſten to Amurath his flattering ring and deceitfull charmes, he departed out of the cittie vnto his armie, then lying within view, and began preſently to march towards DYERA. But he was not farre gone, before he met with Moſes with a gallant troupe of horſemen comming from SFETIGRADE, a ſtrong citie of DYERA, ſituate in the confines of EPIRVS, bordering vpon MACEDONIA: which citie was Scanderbeg his ſecond care, for that it was like to be the firſt that ſhould endure the angrie tyrants furie, ſtanding firſt in his way, as it were the fortreſſe of that countrey. Moſes had there ſet all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in CROIA; and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a graue and polliticke man) Gouernour, with a ſtrong garriſon of ſouldiors choſen out of all the countrey of DYERA, which were alwaies accounted the beſt men of warre in all EPIRVS, and was for ſo doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who deliuering vnto him all the forces hee had prepared for the defence of the other caſtles and cities of EPIRVS, ſent him with diuers other of his nobilitie and captaines, to take order for the ſafetie of thoſe places, appointing vnto euery man his charge. As for himſelfe, he with a ſmall troupe of horſemen went to SFETIGRADE, carefull of that citie aboue meaſure, as it were before deuining the enſuing danger. Being come thither, and all the ſouldiors aſſembled by his commaundement into the market place, hee there in open audience ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Scanderbeg commeth to Sfetigrade.

Almightie God could not this day offer vnto you (worthie ſouldiours of SFETIGRADE*) better matter: neither could a fairer occaſion be preſented vnto braue minds and ſouldiors deſirous of honor, than that which now hath cauſed you to take vp moſt juſt armes. Wherein you may for euer by worthie example make knowne your conſtant faith and worthie valour, both towards me in priuat, and the people of* EPIRVS in generall. Hitherto we haue borne armes for the honour of our kingdome, but now we muſt fight for our liues, our libertie, and the wals of our countrey. You muſt now force your ſelues, that you doe not by reproch and cowardiſe ſtaine the worthie praiſes you haue alreadie deſerued, by the great victories by you obtained vnder my conduct. The greateſt part of the fortune of this war dependeth vpon you: For the firſt paſſage of Amurath into EPIRVS (that I my ſelfe may be vnto you the firſt meſſenger of that danger) will be this way: the firſt furie of the Turkes will aſſaile you, that hauing here as it were broken downe the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe of EPIRVS*, hee may afterwards breake through the countrey, more ſubject to danger. The firſt fruits of this war is yours, you (if you beare the hearts of courageous men, mindfull of your libertie) may beat downe the proud ſtrength of the haughtie enemie, and diſcourage his high conceits. The* Othoman king ſhall haue the beginning both of his hope and feare, of you: if he ſhall find you ſo minded, as I now ſee you gallantly mooued, and with joy heare your violent indignation; he will in euery place feare a great force of danger, and thereby learne to abſtaine from the other cities of EPIRVS*: neither will he lie here long at a vaine ſiege, except the warward old man, will fooliſhly hereupon gage all his forces: for ſuch is the ſituation and ſtrength of this citie, that it may eaſily ſet at nought an angrie enemie. Wherefore reſolue with your ſelues worthie ſouldiors and cittizens, only by conſtancie and faithfulneſſe, without bloodſhed, to gain vnto your ſelues an honourable victorie. Of your valour (which I willingly ſpeake of) dependeth for the moſt part the faithfulneſſe of all the reſt; they will looke vpon you whom they may praiſe or accuſe, and whoſe example they may follow in the fortune of theſe warres. But to what purpoſe ſhould men of woorth in their actions pretend the neceſſitie of faith, or chaunce of fortune? whereas, by reaſon things are both beſt begun and accompliſhed. It ſeldome chaunceth, that fortune faileth the ſound aduice, or is not obedient vnto vertue: and you haue all things which moſt politicke care could prouide for your ſafetie. You want not armour, you want not plentifull prouiſion of victuals, you want not valiant men: the ſuperfluous multitude of vnneceſſarie people, the pitifull lamentation of women, and troubleſome crying of children ſhall not withdraw you from your publike charge, from your ſeruice and defence of your countrey; I haue left you alone to your ſelues, for defence of your citie, your religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged onely with the prouocations of honour and libertie, with the emulation of aduenture and danger, and the very ſight one of another; and I my ſelfe will not be far off with my courageous ſouldiors, a ſilent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not auert from you all the force of the cruell enemie by raſh aduenture, nor trie the whole fortune of this war in plaine field; yet will I turne a great part of your dangers vpon my ſelfe, and trouble the enemies deſignes, with many a hot ſkirmiſh. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor ſafer kind of warre, for vs amongſt ſuch a multitude of men, and ſo many thouſands of ſouldiors, than neuer to offer battaile vnto the enemie in plaine field, neither to aduenture all vpon the fortune of one conflict, although a man did* see apparent signes of victorie. He will of purpose at the first giue vs the oportunitie of good hap: hee will feed our hardinesse with the blood of his base souldiors, the easilier to intrap and oppresse our rashnesse, allured with the sweet bait of good fortune: but the craftie deuises of the Othoman king, are by great policie and consideration to be frustrated. This mightie enemie is by little and little to bee cut off, as time and place shall giue occasion. For truly that victorie should bee vnto me lamentable, which I should buy with the blood of my souldiors: and beleeue me, it would be vnto me a more sorrowfull than pleasant sight, to see eight or ten thousand of my enemies slaine, with the losse of a few of you. I will praise and honour my subiects of Epirvs for valiant conquerours, if they shall not suffer themselues to be conquered of the Turkish king. The rest I had rather you courageous souldiors of Dibra should consider with your selues, than that I should seeme to distrust of your assured faith, by giuing you a carefull and tedious admonition.

The effectuall ſpeech of Scanderbeg vnto the ſouldiors and cizens of Sfetigrade, to encourage the againſt the comming of Amurath.

When Scanderbeg had with cheerefull persuasion thus encouraged the minds of them of Sfetigrade, he departed thence, and visited diuers other cities of Epirvs, where finding all things politickely ordered by Moses and the other captaines, whom he had put in trust, he returned to his armie, then lying neere vnto Croia.

Whilest Scanderbeg was with great carefulnesse yet thus prouiding for the safegard of his kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his armie was assembled at Hadrianopie, to the number of a hundred and fiftie thousand men, whereof many were pioners, and men appointed for other base seruices necessarie at the siege of townes. Of this great armie Amurath sent fortie thousand light horsemen before him to Sfetigrade, who according to his commaund came and encamped before the citie: the newes of their comming, with a great deale more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his small armie neere Croia: whereupon he with foure thousand horsemen, and a thousand foot, took the way toward Sfetigrade, and strongly encamped his armie within seuen miles of the citie. Where hauing set all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moses and Tanusius, went by certaine blind waies through the mountaines and woods, vntill he came so neere vnto the citie, that from the place where hee stood, vpon the top of a hill, he might easily discouer in what sort the enemie lay encamped: and so returning backe againe to his campe, rise with his armie in the night following, and drawing as neere vnto the Turks armie as he could, vndiscouered, placed all his armie in the couert of the woods and secret valleyes, vnperceiued of his enemies. After that hee sent forth Moses and Musachi his nephew, with thirtie of his best horsemen, apparrelled as if they had been but common souldiors, but passing well mounted, driuing before them certaine horses laden with corne, by a by-way, as if they had purposed to haue secretly got into the cittie. The day then breaking, they were discouered by the Turks scouts, and set vpon: where at the first Moses and the rest began of purpose to flie, but when he saw that they were pursued but with like number to themselues, hee returned backe vpon the Turks, and slew fiue of them, and chased the rest vnto the campe. The Generall seeing what had happened, sent foorth foure thousand horsemen to pursue these supposed victualers: whom they quickly recouered the sight of, for that Moses of purpose had made small hast to flie: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moses left the horses laden with corn, and fled; yet so that he still drew on the Turks with hope to ouertake him, vntill he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his armie lay in wait: by whom they were suddainly assailed on euerie side, and with great slaughter put to flight. In this conflict, two thousand of the Turkes were slaine, and a thousand of their horses taken: of the Christians were lost but two and twentie. This was the first welcome of the Turks armie to Sfetigrade.

About eight daies after came Amurath with all his armie, in the beginning of May in the yeare of our lord 1449, and hauing made the greatest shew he could with his huge armie to terrifie the defendants: he encamped the baser sort of his footmen at the foot of the hill, whereon the citie stood, and lay himselfe with his Ianizaries, and other his most valiant souldiors, about three quarters of a mile further off: where after he had line still one daie, & well considered the strength of the place, towards euening he sent a messenger to the citie, who requested to speake with the Gouernour Perlat. Whereof hee hearing, came to the wall: of whom the messenger requested, That he would commaund the souldiours standing by, to goe further off, for as much as he had some thing in secret to say vnto him from his master. Vnto whom Perlat merrily answered: It is like indeed to bee some great secret, that you would haue kept not onely from the hearing ring of my ſoldiors, but from the verie light of the daie, and therefore haue choſen the night: but I haue not learned of mine elders, to heare any meſſage from mine enemie by night, neither at any time elſe out of the hearing of the gariſon, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this citie, and I the ſauegard of my perſon: you muſt therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your maiſter ſo pleaſe, I will heare you at large. And therewith commanded him to depart from the wals. So he returned for that time without audience as he came. It grieued Amurath not a little to ſee his meſſenger ſo lightly regarded: yet foraſmuch as hee had more hope to gain the citie by large offers, or ſome reaſonable compoſition, than by all his great force, he diſſembled his wrath: and the next daie ſent the ſame meſſenger again, with one of his Baſſaes, a graue and well ſpoken man, himſelfe borne in EPIRVS. This Baſſa with three ſouldiours, and two ſeruitours, was by the gouernours commaundement by one of the ports receiued into the citie, and brought into S. Maries church. Where after he had with great eloquence ſought to inſinuate himſelfe into the minds of the Gouernour, and the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terrour of Amuraths power beyond all meaſure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained againſt the Hungarians, and the other Chriſtian princes: in fine he exhorted them to yeild the citie vnto him, in whoſe name he promiſed firſt that the citizens ſhould in all reſpects vnder his gouernement liue as they had before done vnder Sanderbegs; then, that the Gouernor ſhould receiue at Amurath his hands moſt honourable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts; and that it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſouldiours to depart in ſafetie whether they would, and to haue three hundreth thouſand Aſpers diuided amongſt them in reward. But when the Baſſa had ended his ſpeech, the Gouernour in this ſort replied:

If you had not deliuered this ſpeech vnto reſolute men, deuoted vnto the defence of their libertie, it might perhaps haue wrought ſome effect; and we (ſaid he) might peraduenture liſten vnto your offers, if we were either afraid of the Othoman king, and the vaine threats of our enemies, or elſe were wearie of the gouernement of the noble Scanderbeg. But foraſmuch as no euill deſert of his, nor good deſert of your maſters, hath yet paſſed, for which we ſhould preferre a ſtranger before our naturall ſoueraigne, an enemie before a friend, a Turke before a Chriſtian; let your maiſter proceed firſt in his action begun, let him prooue his fortune, let him by force terrifie vs, beat downe our wals, make hauocke of our men, and by ſtrong hand driue vs to humble our ſelues at his feet, and to ſue for peace: But it were a great diſhonour, yea a thing almoſt to be laughed at, if we ſhould cowardly accept of theſe conditions by him offered, before any aſſault giuen, before one drop of bloud ſpilt, before any ſouldior did ſo much as once grone for any wound receiued, before one ſtone were ſhaken in the wall, or any ſmall breach made. But your maiſter ſhall doe better to raiſe his ſiege, and get him backe againe to HADRIANOPLE, there to ſpend the ſmall remainder of his old yeares in quiet, and not to prouoke vs his fatall enemies, whoſe courage in defence of our liberties, and fidelitie towards our prince, hee hath ſo often times prooued to his great diſhonour, and loſſe of his armies. The faith I haue once giuen to my Soueraigne, for the defence of this citie, I will neuer forget, vntill the effuſion of the laſt drop of my bloud. It ſhall be vnto me reward and honour inough, if I either liuing defend this citie, or with loſſe of my life ſhall leaue my guiltleſſe ſoule at libertie, and my carkaſſe amongſt the dead bodies of worthie ſouldiours, when I ſhall find a way into a farre better place.

The reſolute anſwere of Perlas the Gouernor, vnto the Baſſa.

The Generall hauing giuen this reſolute anſwere vnto the Baſſa, bountifully feaſted him that day at dinner, and afterwards led him through the middeſt of the citie: where he ſaw great ſtore of victuals, by the Gouernour commaunded of purpoſe to be ſet in ſhew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the citie by long ſiege. And ſo ſent the Baſſa out by the ſame port whereby he came in, much diſcontented with the anſwere he was to returne to his maiſter.

Sfetigrade aſſaulted.

When Amurath vnderſtood by the Baſſa, of the Gouernours reſolution, he was therewith exceeding wroth, and thereupon with his great ordinance battered the citie three dayes without intermiſsion. And hauing by the furie of his artillerie made a ſmall breach, he foorthwith gaue thereunto a moſt terrible aſſault, labouring firſt to win the ſame by the force and multitude of his common ſouldiors, which the Turks call Aſapi, whom hee forced by great numbers to that ſeruice. Of theſe ſouldiors, the Turke in his warres maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the ſwords of his enemies, or to abate their firſt furie, thereby to giue the eaſier victorie to his Ianizaries and other his better ſouldiors: which the Othoman kings hold for good policie. Whileſt theſe forlorne ſouldiors, without reſpect of danger preſsing forward, are ſlaine by heapes at the breach, the Ianizaries at the ſame time in another place attempted to haue ſcaled the wals of the citie: but whileſt they with much labour and difficultie firſt crawle vp the ſteepe rocke whereon the cittie was built, and afterward deſperatly mount vp their ſcaling ladders, they were by the defendants with huge ſtones and weightie peeces of timber caſt vpon them, beaten down, wherwith they were driuen headlong to the bottome of the rocke, and ſo miſerably ſlaine. Many of them together with their skaling ladders, were by the Chriſtians thruſt from the wall, and tumbling downe the rocke, violently carried with them others, comming vp behind them. Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the wals, loſt ſome their fingers, ſome their hands, but moſt their liues, being beaten downe as the other were. Many of them which ſtood farther off, were then wounded alſo, and with ſhot from the wals ſlaine. With this miſerable ſlaughter, and no hope to preuaile, the Turks diſcouraged, began to withdraw themſelues from the aſſault: but the Baſſaes and captaines ſtanding behind them, forced them againe forward, exhorting ſome, threatening others, and beating the reſt forward with their trunchions. By which meanes the aſſault was againe renewed, but not with ſuch courage as before, though with no leſſe ſlaughter: which the defendants ſeeing, gaue from the wals great tokens of joy and triumph. Amurath perceiuing his diſcouraged ſouldiours readie of themſelues to forſake the aſſault, preſently ſent Feri-Baſſa (one of his moſt valiant captaines) with a new ſupplie of three thouſand choſen ſouldiours to renew the fight. The Chriſtians well aware of their comming, ceaſed not with continuall ſhot to beat them from the wals: but ſuch was the forwardneſſe of that fierce captaine, that without regard of danger he brought his men to the wals, where the defendants from aboue ouerwhelmed them with ſtones, timber, wild fire, and ſuch other things as are vſually prepared for the defence of townes beſieged. For all that, Feri-Baſſa gaue ſo great an aſſault, that he ſlew diuers of the defendants vpon the wals, and had there forcibly entered, had not the Gouernour perceiuing the danger, with a companie of freſh ſouldiors come with ſpeed to the defence of that place; whereby the enemie was preſently repulſed, and driuen againe from the wals. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and no hope of ſucceſſe, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and ſo leauing the aſſault, retired againe into his campe. The great loſſe and diſhonour at this aſſault receiued, much troubled his wayward mind: who for all that yet ceaſed not to giue the like vaine attempts. At length the captaine of the Ianizaries perceiuing that part of the citie which was fartheſt from the campe, to be commonly but ſlenderly manned, by reaſon that it ſeemed a place impregnable, both for the height and ſteepeneſſe of the rocke; told Amurath, That he would aſſay (if it ſo pleaſed him) ſecretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the cittie: where as they thought nothing was more to bee feared, than the height thereof, which they ſupported with the wings of deſire, doubted not to mount vnto. This his deuice exceedingly pleaſed the king, and was the next night with great ſilence put in execution. But ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the Gouernour ouer euery part of his charge, that nothing could be done againſt the ſame, but that it was by him forthwith diſcouered. The Gouernour aduertiſed by the watch, of the Turks attempt; with great ſilence preſently repaired to the place with a great companie of the garriſon ſouldiors, and ſtanding cloſe, from the top of the wall beheld the Turks, as it had beene a ſwarme of Emmets climing vp the high rockes, and one helping vp another by ſuch deſperate way, as was in reaſon to haue been thought no man would haue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rocke, & now euen readie to enter, they were from aboue ſuddenly ouerwhelmed, as it had been with a ſhower of ſhot, and ſo violently forced downe that high rocke, that moſt part of them which had got vp to any height, were miſerably cruſhed to death either with the weight of themſelues, or of others falling vpon them, and many of the reſt ſlaine with ſhot from the top of the rocke: whereof Amurath preſently vnderſtanding, was therwith exceedingly greeued.

The Turkes repulſed, retire.

The Ianizaries deſperatly attempt to ſurpriſe the citie.

The Ianizaries repulſed.

During the time of this ſiege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long ſtill in one place, but remooued continually from place to place, as beſt ſerued his purpoſe, breaking ſometimes into one quarter of the Turks campe, and ſometime into another, and ſtraightway ſo ſuddenly gone againe and as it were vaniſhed out of ſight, that Amurath many times wondered what was become of him. At this time, being the latter end of Iune, he was come with his armie within eight miles of Amuraths campe: and from thence ſent Moſes his greateſt captaine, in the attire of a common ſouldior, with two other, to take view how the enemie lay encamped. By which truſtie eſpials he was en-enformed, That the Turkes lay in great ſecuritie, as men without feare, keeping but negligent watch. Of which oportunitie, Scanderbeg rejoycing, the night following ſuddenly aſſaulted one quarter of the Turks campe. Whoſe comming, although it was a little before by the Turkes ſcouts diſcouered; yet his furious aſſault was ſo ſuddaine and ſo forceable, that he ſlew two thouſand of the Turks, and filled euery corner of that great campe with feare and tumult, before they could well arme themſelues or make reſiſtance. After which ſlaughter he ſafely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirtie horſe, with ſeuen of the Turkes enſignes, hauing in this skirmiſh loſt of his men but two and fortie: whoſe dead bodies the Turkes the next morning in reuenge of their ſlaine friends hewed into ſmall peeces.

Vpon theſe great diſgraces one following in the necke of another, Amurath hauing no other obiect but the citie to ſhew his furie vpon, gaue three fierce aſſaults vnto the ſame, one after another, and was alwaies with loſſe both of his men and honour repulſed. But the more he loſt, the more he burnt with deſire of reuenge, perſuading his ſouldiors, That as the ſtrongeſt citties and fortreſſes were built by mens hands, ſo were they to bee ouerthrowne and laied euen with the ground by reſolute and valiant men: encouraging them to a freſh aſſault, with greater promiſes of reward than euer hee had done before in all his warres, from the firſt beginning of his raigne. And becauſe he would with more ſafetie giue this his laſt and greateſt aſſault, he appointed Feri-Baſſa, with twelue thouſand horſemen and ſix thouſand foot to attend vpon Scanderbeg, if hee ſhould hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the aſſault, by aſſailing of his camp. Feri-Baſſa glad of this charge, well hoping now to redeeme his former ouerthrow with ſome great victorie, and leading forth his armie a little from the campe, as he was commaunded, ſo lay; wiſhing for nothing more than the comming of Scanderbeg, vainely boaſting, That he would ſeeke him in the field, and there trie his force and fortune with him hand to hand: which he did ſhortly after to his coſt. When Amurath had thus ſet in order all things requiſit, as well for the ſiege, as for the ſafegard of his campe: the next morning he compaſſed the citie round about with his armie, and couered the ground with his men of war, purpoſing at that time to gage his whole forces vpon the taking thereof. The wals he had before in ſome places battered, ſo much as was poſſible; and yet but ſo, as that they were not without skaling ladders to be aſſaulted: partly for the naturall ſtrength of the place, and partly for that the defendants had with great diligence continually repaired and filled vp with earth what the furie of the cannon had throwne downe. This aſſault Amurath began firſt with his archers and ſmall ſhot, which deliuered their arrowes and bullets vpon the top of the wall, and into the citie, as if it had beene a ſhower of haile, thereby to trouble the ſtationarie ſouldiours. In this heat, ladders were clapped to the wals in euery place where any could be poſsibly reared, and the Turkes began deſperatly to skale the wals: but the Chriſtians nothing diſmaied thereat, with great courage reſiſted them, and with ſhot from their ſafe ſtandings wounded and ſlew many of them: yet others ſtill preſſed vp in the places of them that were ſlaine, ſo that the aſſault became moſt terrible in many places at once, but eſpecially neere vnto the great gate of the citie; where the Turks had vpon the ſuddaine with ladders, timber, and planks clapped together, raiſed cloſe vnto that tower, as it had beene a woodden tower, equall in height to the wall; from whence the Turks greatly diſtreſſed the Chriſtians in that place, fighting with them as if it had been vpon euen ground, ſtill ſending vp freſh ſouldiors in ſtead of them that were ſlaine: and thereby preuailed ſo far, that they had ſet vp certaine of Amurath his enſignes vpon the wall, to the great comfort of the Turkes, and aſtoniſhment of the beſieged Chriſtians. The Gouernour ſeeing the imminent danger, haſted to the place with a companie of freſh and valiant ſouldiors, by whoſe force the Turks were quickly repulſed from the wall, their enſignes taken and ſent into the market place: the tower of wood with many ladders and much timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly conſumed with wild fire caſt vpon the ſame from the wals. Perlat hauing deliuered the citie of this feare, preſently placed freſh ſoldiors in ſtead of them which were ſlaine or hurt, and ſo worthely defended the citie.

Scanderbeg commeth to trouble the aſſault, and is met with by Feri-Baſſa.

Whileſt Amurath was giuing this great aſſault to Sfetigrad, Scanderbeg to withdraw him from the ſame, came with nine thouſand ſouldiours to aſſaile the Turkes campe, as Amurath had before ſuſpected, and was now come verie neere the ſame. Feri-Baſſa glad of his comming, oppoſed his armie againſt him: which Scanderbeg ſeeing, retired a little, of purpoſe to draw the Baſſa farther from the campe, and then forthwith began to joyne battaile with him. The Baſſa conſidering the ſmall number of his enemies, and his own greater power, withdrew foure thouſand ſand horſemen out of his armie to fetch a compaſſe about, and to ſet vpon the rearward of Scanderbegs armie: hoping ſo to incloſe him, that he ſhould neuer eſcape thence, but there either to be ſlaine or taken aliue, and his armie vtterly defeated. But the expert captaine perceiuing his purpoſe, to meet therewith, left Moſes to lead the maine battaile, and he himſelfe with two thouſand horſemen, ſo valiantly charged thoſe foure thouſand of his enemies before they were well departed from the reſt of the Baſſaes armie, that they had now more cauſe to looke to their own ſafetie, than how to circumuent others. In this conflict Feri-Baſſa hand to hand, as he had oft times before deſired, encountring with Scanderbeg, was by him there ſlaine. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Baſſa in the right wing of the armie, and Muſachie in the left, Moſes ſtood faſt, receiuing the aſſault of the enemie without mouing anie thing forward, expecting the ſucceſſe of the wings. But Scanderbeg hauing diſcomfited the right wing, and ſlaine the Generall, comming now in, he ſet forward with ſuch force and courage, that the Turkes not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled: of whom manie were ſlaine in this chaſe, though Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemie ſo nigh at hand, durſt not follow them farre; but ſounding a retrait, put his armie againe in good order, for feare of ſome ſodaine attempt from the campe, and after appointed ſome of the meaneſt of his ſouldiors to take the ſpoile of the ſlaine Turkes. When Amurath had vnderſtood what had happened to Feri-Baſſa, he was ſo ouercome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not ſpeake one word: but after the heat was a little paſt, he commaunded certaine ſmall peeces of ordinance, which he had before vſed againſt the citie, to be remoued into the campe, and there placed vpon that ſide which was moſt in danger to the enemie. He alſo preſently ſent thither foure thouſand ſouldiours to joyne with the remainder of Feri-Baſſaes armie, for defence of the campe, with ſtraight charge that they ſhould not iſſue out of the trenches. Neuertheleſſe he himſelfe continued the aſſault of the citie all that day: but when night drew on, and no hope appeared for him to preuaile, he cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and leauing the aſſault, he returned againe into his campe. At this aſſault Amurath loſt ſeuen thouſand men, beſide manie that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the garriſon ſouldiours were ſlaine but ſeuentie, and nintie mo hurt.

The terror of the turkiſh armie, began now to grow into contempt throughout EPIRVS; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after ſo manie ouerthrowes and ſhamefull repulſes, would at length raiſe his ſiege and be gone: yet he ſent ſpies continually to diſcouer what was done in the Turkes campe, and he himſelfe with two thouſand ſouldiours would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe vpon the ſides of the mountaines neere vnto Amurath his campe, of purpoſe to draw the Turkes out, that hee might take them at ſome aduantage. But the old king had giuen commandement vpon paine of death, that no man ſhould go out of the trenches without leaue, or once to ſpeake of giuing battaile or aſſault: ſo that hee lay certaine daies in his campe, not like a king beſieging of a citie, but more like a man beſieged himſelfe: the which his ſtill lying, Scanderbeg had the more in diſtruſt, fearing greatly that he was hatching ſome miſchiefe, which ſo ſoone as it was ripe would violently breake out.

Amurath by great promiſes ſeeketh to corrupt the garriſon of Sfetigrade.

Amurath conſidering with what euill ſucceſſe he had manie times aſſaulted the citie, and holding it for a great diſhonour to raiſe his ſiege and depart, hauing done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once againe to prooue, if it were poſsible to ouercome the minds of the garriſon ſoldiors with gifts, whom he was not able to ſubdue by force. For which purpoſe he ſent an embaſſadour vnto the citie, offering vnto the beſieged and garriſon ſouldiors eaſie conditions of peace, with ſuch large gifts and rewards as had not been heard offered to any garriſon in former time. All which his magnificall promiſes were lightly rejected by the common conſent of all the whole garriſon, preferring their faithfull loyaltie before all his golden mountaines. For all that, Amurath was in good hope, that amongſt ſo manie, ſome would be found into whoſe minds his large offers might make ſome impreſsion: wherein he was not deceiued.

A traitor corrupted with Amurath his large promiſes, conſpireth to betray the citie.

For one baſe minded fellow amongſt the reſt, corrupted with the Turkes great promiſes, preferring his owne priuat wealth, before the welfare of his countrey, waiting his time, had ſecret conference with the Turks eſpials, and promiſed vpon aſſurance of ſuch reward as was before by Amurath proffered, to find meanes that in few daies the citie ſhould bee yeelded into his power. This corrupted traitour, had laid many miſchieuous plots for the effecting of this horrible treaſon: but the firſt deuice he put in practiſe, which of all others a man would haue thought to haue been of leaſt moment, ſerued his wicked purpoſe in ſtead of all the reſt. All the garriſon ſouldiours

diours of SFETIGRADE were of the vpper countrey of DIBRA, put into that citie, by Moſes, for their approoued valour aboue all the other ſouldiours of EPIRVS. But as they were men of great courage, ſo were they exceeding ſuperſtitious both in their religion and manner of liuing, putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawfull meat and other: accounting ſome cleane, ſome vncleane; abhorring from that, which they fondly deemed vncleane, with more than a Iewiſh ſuperſtition, chuſing rather to die than to eat or drinke thereof: ſuch is the ſtrong deluſion of blind errour, where it hath throughly poſſeſſed the minds of men. The cittie of SFETIGRADE (as is aforeſaid) is ſituat vpon the top of a great high rocke, as moſt of the cities of EPIRVS now be, and was then watered but with one great well in the middeſt of the cittie, which ſunke deepe into the rocke, plentifully ſerued both the publicke and priuat vſe of the inhabitants. Into this common well the malicious traitour in the night time caſt the foule ſtinking carion carkas of a dead dog, knowing, that the conceited garriſon ſouldiors of DYBRA would rather indure the paines of death, and ſtarue, or els yeeld vp the citie vpon any condition, than to drinke of that polluted water. In the morning when the ſtinking carrion was eſpied, and drawne out of the well, the report thereof was quickly bruted in euery corner of the citie, and that the well was poyſoned: ſo that all the people were in manner in an vprore about the finding out of the traitor. The citizens were exceeding ſorrie for that had happened, but the garriſon ſoldiors deteſted that loathſome and vncleane water (as they accounted it) more than the Turkiſh ſeruitude, proteſting, that they would rather periſh with thirſt, than drinke thereof. Whereupon ſome of them deſired to ſet fire vpon the citie, and whileſt they had yet ſtrength, to breake through the enemies campe or there manfully to die. And they which thought beſt of the matter, requeſted, That the cittie might be yeelded vp: for now, they diſcouraged with a ſuperſtitious vanitie, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea they were readie ynough of themſelues to ſue vnto Amurath for peace, though it had beene vpon harder tearmes. The Gouernour troubled with that had happened, and aſtonied to ſee ſo great an alteration in the minds of his ſouldiours vpon ſo ſmall occaſion, could not tell whether hee might thinke it to proceed of a ſuperſtitious conceit, or of ſome ſecret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter, hee came into the market place, and there in the hearing of all the garriſon, with many effectuall reaſons, exhorted them to continue faithfull vnto their prince and countrey in that honourable ſeruice; and in a matter of ſo great conſeqence to make ſmall reckoning to vſe that water, which would eaſily in ſhort time be brought againe to the wonted puritie and cleaneneſſe: And to perſuade them the rather, he went preſently to the well himſelfe, and in the ſight of them all drunke a greater draught of the water, whoſe example the cittizens following, dranke likewiſe. But when it was offered to the captaines and ſouldiors of the garriſon, they all refuſed to taſt thereof, as if it had been a moſt loathſome thing, or rather ſome deadly poyſon, and with great inſtance cried vnto the Gouernour, to giue vp the citie: for which cauſe many thought they were corrupted by Amurath his great promiſes. Howbeit none of that garriſon (except that one traitour) did euer afterwards reuolt vnto the Turkiſh king, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby ſuch ſuſpition might be confirmed. When the Gouernour ſaw that the obſtinate minds of the garriſon were not to be mooued with any perſuaſion or reward (whereof hee ſpared not to make large promiſe) nor by any other meanes which he could deuiſe: hee called vnto him his cheefe captaines, with the beſt ſort of the citizens, & reſolued with them full ſore againſt his will, to yeeld vp the citie to Amurath, vpon ſuch conditions as they themſelues there agreed vpon: which were, That it ſhould be lawfull for all the captaines and ſouldiors to depart in ſafetie with their armour and all other things; and that ſo many of the citizens as would ſtay, might there ſtill dwell in the citie, in ſuch ſort, as they had done before, vnder the gouernment of Scanderbeg; the reſt that liſted not to remaine there ſtill, might at their pleaſure with bag and baggage depart whether they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him, and graunted them all that was deſired, ſauing that hee would not conſent that the citizens ſhould continue in the citie, yet was he content that they ſhould liue vnder him as they had before done, quietly enjoying all their poſſeſsions, but to build their houſes without the wals of the citie: which condition ſome accepted, and ſome forſaking all, went to Scanderbeg. When all was throughly agreed vpon, the keyes of the gates were deliuered to Amurath, and the Gouernor with the captaines and all the garriſon ſouldiors ſuffered quietly to paſſe through the Turkiſh campe, as the king had promiſed. Howbeit, Mahomet the ſonne of Amurath, a prince of a cruell diſpoſition, earneſtly earnestly perſuaded his father, to haue broken his faith, and to haue put them all to the ſword: ſaying, it was one of their prophet Mahomets cheefe commaundements, to vſe all crueltie for the deſtruction of the Chriſtians. But the old king would not therein hearken vnto his ſonne, ſaying, That he which was deſirous to be great amongſt men, muſt either be indeed faithfull of his word and promiſe, or at leaſtwiſe ſeeme ſo to be, thereby to gaine the minds of the people, who naturally abhorre the gouernment of a faithleſſe and cruell prince. The traitor which corrupted the water, remained ſtill in the citie, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich ſuites of apparell, and fiftie thouſand Aſpers, and had giuen vnto him beſides a yearely penſion of two thouſand duckats. But ſhort was the joy the traitour had of this euill gotten goods: for after he had a few daies vainely triumphed in the middeſt of Amurath his fauours, he was ſuddenly gone, and neuer afterwards ſeene or heard tell of: being ſecretly made away (as was ſuppoſed) by the commandement of Amurath: whoſe noble heart could not but deteſt the traitour, although the treaſon ſerued well his purpoſe. Amurath entring into SFETIGRADE, cauſed the wals to be foorthwith repaired, and placed one thouſand two hundred Ianizaries in garriſon there. And raiſing his campe the firſt of September, departed out of EPIRVS, hauing loſt thirtie thouſand of his Turks at the ſiege of SFETIGRADE; much greeued in mind for all that, that hee could not vanquiſh the enemie, whom he came of purpoſe to ſubdue. In his returne, the viceroy of ASIA marched before him with the Aſian ſouldiors; in the rereward followed the viceroy of EVROPE with his European ſouldiors; in the middeſt was Amurath himſelfe, compaſſed about with his Ianizaries and other ſouldiours of the court. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of Amurath his departure, followed ſpeedily with eight thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot, and taking the aduantage of the thicke woods and mountaine ſtraits (to him well knowne) wherby that great armie was to paſſe, oftentimes skirmiſhed with the Turks, charging thē ſometime in the vaward, & ſometime in the rereward, ſometime on the one ſide, and ſometime on the other, and ſlew many of them: whereby he ſo troubled Amurath his paſſage, that he was glad to leaue the viceroy of ROMANIA, with 30000 to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he himſelfe might in the meane time with more ſafetie march away with the reſt of his armie. Scanderbeg perceiuing the ſtay of the viceroy, ceaſed to follow Amurath further, fearing to bee encloſed betweene thoſe two great armies. The viceroy ſeeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after he had ſtaied a few daies, followed his maſter to HADRIANOPLE, and ſo Scanderbeg returned to CROIA.

A traitor worthely rewarded according to his treaſon.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of EPIRVS, Scanderbeg left two thouſand ſouldiours vpon the borders for defence of the countrey againſt the Turks. Theſe ſoldiors ſo ſtraightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garriſon at SFETIGRADE, that they could not looke out of the citie, but they were intercepted and ſlaine. And within a few daies after came himſelfe with an armie of eighteene thouſand, and laied ſiege to SFETIGRADE the ſpace of a moneth, which was from the middle of September vntill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great aſſaults to haue recouered the citie, but was both times repulſed, with the loſſe of fiue hundred men. Amurath vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg lay at the ſiege of SFETIGRADE, ſent with all ſpeed to recall his armie, but lately before diſperſed. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing intelligence, conſidering alſo the difficultie of the enterpriſe, with the approch of Winter, raiſed his ſiege, and returned to CROIA: where he ſet all things in the ſame order he had done before the comming of Amurath to the ſiege of SFETIGRADE, and put two thouſand of his beſt ſouldiors there in garriſon, vnder the charge of the famous captaine Vranacontes, and ſtored the citie with ſufficient victuall for a yeares ſiege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Chriſtian princes, for that there was then great ſcarcitie of all things in EPIRVS, by reaſon of the late warres. The like care he had alſo of all the reſt of his cities, being continually aduertiſed from his ſecret friends in the Turks court of the great preparation intended againſt him by the Turkiſh king, againſt the beginning of the next Spring.

Amurath vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg was departed from SFETIGRAD, changed his former determination for the calling backe again of his armie, & appointed it to meet againe at HADRIANOPLE, in the beginning of March following: whether the Baſſaes, and other great commaunders, at the time appointed aſſembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commaunded. So that by the latter end of march, hee had there in readineſſe an armie of an hundreth and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkiſh warres, ſent fortie thouſand horſemen, vnder the leading of Sebalyas a polliticke capcaptaine, as his vauntcourriers into EPIRVS, in the beginning of April, in the yeare 1450. The valiant captaine with great ſpeed and no reſiſtance entred into EPIRVS, as was giuen him in charge, and without let came to CROIA: where, after he had aduiſedly conſidered of the ſcituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he ſtrongly encamped himſelfe neere thereunto in the pleaſant plaine called TYRANNA: and there within his trenches kept his ſouldiours cloſe, attending nothing more, but that no new ſupplie of men, munition, or victuals, ſhould be conuaied into the citie, more than was therin before his comming. For he was not able with his horſemen to doe any thing againſt the citie: and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the countrey ſubject to his furie. Beſides that, he was expreſly by Amurath forbidden, to attempt any thing againſt Scanderbeg himſelfe.

After Sebalyas had twentie daies thus line encamped before CROIA, neither doing nor taking harme; Amurath by reaſon of his great age, hauing marched oftentimes but fiue miles a day, came thether alſo with his whole armie, wherewith hee filled all the countrey round about: the very ſight whereof, had been inough to haue diſcouraged the ſmall garriſon in CROIA, had they not been men both of great experience and reſolution. Where after he had ſpent foure daies in ſetling of his campe, he ſent two meſſengers to the Gouernour (as the manner of the Turkes is) offering him if he would yeeld vp the citie, that it ſhould be lawfull for him with all his ſouldiors in ſafetie with bagge and baggage to depart; and the Gouernour himſelfe to receiue in reward two hundreth thouſand aſpers, with an honorable place amongſt the great Baſſaes of his court, if it would pleaſe him to accept thereof: and further, that the citizens ſhould enjoy all their antient liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promiſe alſo of greater. Theſe meſſengers comming to the gates of the citie, could not bee ſuffered to enter, but ſtanding without, were commaunded there to deliuer their meſſage. Which when the Gouernour had heard, hee ſcornefully rejected their offers, and returned the meſſengers ſhamefully derided by the ſouldiours which ſtood vpon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refuſall of his offers; and ſeeing no other meanes to gaine the citie, conuerted all his deuiſes vnto the ſiege thereof. Wherefore he firſt commaunded ten great peeces of artillerie to be forthwith caſt, for he had brought none with him readie made, becauſe of the difficult paſſage ouer the high mountaines into EPIRVS; whereby it ſeemed to bee a matter of infinite trouble to haue brought his great ordinance: and therefore caried with him great ſtore of mettall in maſſe, whereof at his pleaſure to make his great artillerie as he ſaw cauſe. In fifteen daies this worke was brought to perfection, and ten peeces of huge greatneſſe were readie mounted vpon cariages. Six of them he placed againſt the Eaſt ſide of the citie, towards the plain of TYRANNA, and the other foure againſt the gate: in which two places onely, CROIA was ſubject to batterie, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rocks, vpon the tops whereof were built faire battlements more for beautie than needfull defence. Theſe two places Amurath battred foure daies continually, and with the furie of his artillerie had in both places beaten downe halfe the wall, and ſore ſhaken the reſt. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, and with great cheerefulneſſe made all thinges readie to aſſault thoſe breaches, whenſoeuer Amurath ſhould commaund, ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhould ſhew himſelfe moſt forward in that dangerous enterpriſe. And Mahomet the young prince, the more to encourage the ſouldiors, beſides the great rewards by his father propoſed, promiſed of himſelfe to giue an hundreth thouſand aſpers to him that ſhould firſt ſet vp an enſigne vpon the wals of the citie. The garriſon ſouldiours on the other ſide, conſidering that the whole ſtate and welfare of EPIRVS was repoſed in their valour; and that the eies of moſt part of Chriſtendome were as it were fixed vpon them, were nothing diſmaied with the breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might poſsibly chance: but eſpecially the worthy Gouernour Vranacontes, who going through the middeſt of his ſouldiours, and ſhaking ſome of them by the hands, withall ſaid:

Croia battred.

The cheereſull ſpeech of Vranacontes the Gouernour to encourage his ſoldiours.

Theſe, theſe are the fortreſſes of our citie, theſe are the inuincible bulwarks, theſe are the irremouable ſtones and ſureſt ſement. What honour? what praiſe? what triumph ſhould we hope for? if theſe wals ſtanding whole and ſtrong, we ſhould lie ſhrouded vnder the defence of them, and not they defended by vs? So can cowards defend cities, and ſheepe feare not the wolues rage, when they are ſafely ſhut vp within the wals of their ſheepcoats: But that is the praiſe of the wals, and not of the men.

Worthie

Worthie Castriot, our prince hath commended this his citie to bee defended by vs, and not vs by it: Honour is attended vpon with danger, and fostred vp amongst perils: euerie base mariner may be a master in faire weather: and firme things stand of themselues and need not our vpholding. Wherefore, men of worth shun such things, which being kept or lost, yeild like praise. Things readie to fall need shoaring, and thether hasteth honour; and there (worthie souldiours) appeareth courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend these broken breaches, and in stead of these dead wals, couragiously oppose our lustie and liuely armed bodies against the force of our enemies. If these wals stood still firme, and vnbattred, you should then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are something shaken, you shall as men stand vpon somwhat more euen ground, and encounter your enemies hand to hand, the better to satisfie your furious desire. Where I also in the thickest, shall easily view and judge of euerie mans priuat courage, in perticular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if we well consider of the matter, the place it self doth yet notably make for vs; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by these small breaches diminished: For, this rising of the hill (not possible to be taken from vs) although it be not so high as it is in other places, yet doth it not serue vs sufficiently at great aduantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their assault? the steepenesse whereof, as it will be troublesome vnto them, so will it keepe vs most fresh in strength: and make our shot more forcible. Wherfore this had been a thing of vs to haue been wished for, if we desire the slaughter of our enemies at this siege; or if wee wish for perpetuall honour and glorie by this warre. For this breach of the wals wil encourage these barbarians, & allure their armed men to clime vp in greater multitude than if the wals were whole; whereof so many shall on euerie side bee easily slaine, as wee shall but ayme at: except you had rather sit still, holding your handes together in your bosomes as cowards: Their dead bodies shall fill vp the breaches againe, if you be men mindfull of your libertie. What is there (worthy captaines and souldiors) that letteth our victorie? or memorable slaughter of our enemies? by whom onely these two places of the citie can bee assaulted: all the rest is out of daunger, and feares no enemies force. Here onely is the paines to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here shall you all be: the courage, force, and strength of you all shall in this place appeare. How will you so many worthie captaines, and valiant souldiours, in so little roome bestow your selues? we are too many defendants for so small breaches. Yet let vs play the men, and doe our endeauour: let vs in one conflict weaken the tyrants strength, and burst his proud heart; he will forsake this citie, and raise his siege vnfortunatly begun, so soone as he shall see his first assault to cost him the liues of so many thousands of his men.

Croia assaulted.

When Vranacontes had with this comfortable speech thus encouraged his souldiours, against the assault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence set all things in order for the same, and repaired the breaches as well as was posible in that case: hee gaue them leaue for that night to take their rest. In the morning Amurath commaunded the assault to bee giuen to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turkes cheerefully begun, and euerie man busie to performe the seruice hee was appointed vnto. But by that time that the assault was well begun, a suddaine allarum was raised throughout all the Turks campe: for Scanderbeg with fiue thousand valiant souldiours, had suddainely broken in vpon one side of the Turkes great campe, and at the first encounter had slaine six hundreth of the Turks, and was now spoiling their tents. The rumour whereof, troubled the whole campe, and made the Turks with lesse courage to assault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amurath although hee had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the sauegard of his tents, yet for more surety sent Seremet one of his greatest captaines, with foure thousand souldiours backe into the campe, for more suretie: saying, That nothing could be too sure, against that wild beast: meaning the furie of Scanderbeg. Mahomet also the yong prince, hasted thether in great choler with his guard, much against his fathers will. But Moses, Scanderbeg his lieutenant, knowing himselfe too weak to withstand the multitude that was swarming thether (contenting himselfe with that which was alreadie done) had before Mahomet his comming, speedily retired with all his armie into the safegard of the mountaines, from whence he came: hauing done great harme in the Turks campe, with the losse but of ten men.

Scanderbeg in danger.

Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmish, forgetting himselfe, had so farre engaged himselfe among the Turkes, that hee was by them on euerie side encloſed, and in great danger to haue been slaine or taken: yet valiantly breaking through them, hee escaped the danger and recouered the mountaines, and with much adoe came at length to his campe, to the great ioy and comfort of them all, being before in great feare hee had been lost. This was accounted the

the greateſt ouerſight of Scanderbeg in all his warres, for ſo much as the office of a good Generall conſiſteth not in aduenturing of his perſon to manifeſt danger, but in the politike gouernment of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus aſſailed the Turkes campe, Amurath but faintly aſſaulted the breaches, expecting the ſucceſſe in the campe: but when he vnderſtood that Scanderbeg was retired and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the wals, and firſt with the multitude of his archers and ſmall ſhot, laboured to driue the defendants from the wals, ouerwhelming them with arrowes falling as thicke as haile. And likewiſe at the ſame time other common ſouldiours of baſer account, brought ſcaling ladders and other things needfull for the ſcaling of the wals. After whom alſo followed the Ianizaries and other choſen ſouldiours, readie to mount the ladders as ſoone as they ſhould be ſet to the wals: But whileſt they climbe vp the high hils in this order, the garriſon ſouldiours made ſuch ſlaughter of them with ſhot from the wals and out of the citie, that they would haue preſently retired, had they not been forced forward by their captaines, who ſpared neither ſtripes nor wounds when words would not ſerue. By this tyrannicall meanes, the ſcaling ladders were with great ſlaughter of the common ſouldiours ſet vp againſt the wals, and the Turkes climing vp, came to handie blowes with the defendants at the breaches: nothing was to be heard, but the crying of people, the clattering of armor, and the inſtruments of warre, which was terribly redoubled with the ecchoes from the mountaines round about. The Turkes doing what they might to winne the breaches, were by the Chriſtians worthily repulſed, & with their ladders tumbled headlong downe the mountaine, with ſuch horrible ſlaughter and diſcomfiture, eſpecially of the common ſouldiours, that none of them would ſet one foot forward againe towards the walles, although they had ſmall hope to ſaue themſelues by retiring backe: for the fierce young prince Mahomet, euen then making ſhew of his cruell diſpoſition, cauſed them that returned, to be ſlaine, by the terror thereof to driue others forward. Theſe common ſouldiors whom the Turkes make ſmall reckoning of, are for moſt part miſerable Chriſtians, which liue in ſuch coũtries as had ſomtimes receiued the faith of Chriſt, but are now vnder the Turkiſh ſlauerie; of which ſort of wretched people, the Turkiſh tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their warres, moſt commonly vnarmed, becauſe they dare not well truſt them in warres againſt the Chriſtians: theſe carrie all the baggage of the campe, theſe ſerue to fetch wood and water for other ſouldiours of better account, theſe ſerue in ſteed of pioners to caſt trenches and raiſe bulwarks: and when battaile is to be giuen, if it be in plaine field, theſe haue then weapons put into their hands, and thruſt into the forefront of the battaile to blunt the enemies ſwords: but if a citie be to be beſieged, theſe ſerue as fit matter to fill the ditches with their dead bodies, or to make bridges for other ſouldiours to paſſe ouer vpon: and if they ſhrinke to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly vſed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath ſaw his ſouldiours ſo diſcouraged, he ſtood in doubt whether it were better for that time to ſound a retrait, or to ſend a new ſupply: but being inraged with the loſſe of his men, and deſirous to be in ſome part reuenged, he ſent diuers companies of his better ſouldiours for the incouragement of them which were before diſcouraged, and ſo gaue a freſh aſſault. But with as euill, or worſe ſucceſſe than before: for Vranacontes had withdrawne from the breaches all thoſe ſouldiours which had indured the former aſſault, and placed other freſh and luſtie men in their ſteed; who incouraged with the former victorie, and loth to be accounted inferior to their fellowes, repulſed the Turks with double ſlaughter: vntill that the aged king, not able longer to behold the endleſſe loſſe of his men, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded; which all his ſouldiours were glad to heare, and ſo returned into his campe, hauing loſt in thoſe two aſſaults eight thouſand men, without any notable harme done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance.

This ſhamefull repulſe much grieued all the captaines and commaunders of Amuraths army, but eſpecially Mahomet the young prince, whoſe violent nature vnacquainted with miſhap burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched vpon the mountaine of TVMENIST not farre from his fathers army, he drew moſt of the beſt and readieſt ſouldiours of all the whole campe, into that quarter which was neareſt vnto Scanderbeg: of purpoſe that if he ſhould againe aſſaile the campe in that place (as it was moſt like he would) he ſhould be encountred with ſo many braue and valiant men there in readineſſe, as that it ſhould be hard for him either to doe any great harme, or for himſelfe to eſcape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as alſo in what order the campe lay: Wherupon he left Moſes with fiue hundreth ſouldiours in the place where he lay, taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certaine appointed houre in the night following, ſhould aſſaile the Turkes campe in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay; and hauing there raiſed ſome tumult, ſpeedily to retire againe to his aſſured ſtrength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg himſelfe with the whole ſtrength of his army, in number about eight thouſand, in the meane time tooke a compaſſe about, and by certaine ſecret by-waies through the woods and mountaines, came vnto the farther ſide of the Turkes army, to a place called MOVNTECLE. The night following, Moſes at the appointed houre with his fiue hundreth ſouldiours aſſailed that part of the Turkes campe next vnto him, with ſuch noiſe & tumult, as if it had been ſome great army. By occaſion whereof, all the Turkes campe was in alarme, and drew in haſte to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet cõmanded. When at the ſame inſtant, Scanderbeg with all his army brake into the other ſide of the Turks campe, where he was leaſt feared or looked for, and from whence the beſt ſouldiors were before drawne by Mahomet: and there made ſuch ſlaughter and hauocke of the reſt, not knowing which way to turne themſelues, that the loſſe a little before receiued vnder the wals of CROIA was now forgot, as a ſmall thing in compariſon of this. Moſes hauing raiſed a great feare, and done little harme, retired in ſafetie to his well known ſtrength: and Scanderbeg hauing made great ſpoile in the campe, fearing to be oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies if he ſhould there longer ſtay, returned in good time, hauing ſcarce loſt one man.

Amurath after this great loſſe and trouble of his campe, withdrew moſt of his ſmall ordinance which he had before bent againſt the citie, into his trenches, placing it as commodiouſly as he might for the defence thereof againſt the ſuddaine attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hoat ſeaſon of the yeare ſo cloſely encampe his great army, but that ſome part thereof would ſtill be in like danger as before; he therefore appointed Sebalias with ſixteene thouſand ſoldiors to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he ſhould no more trouble the whole campe. After which order taken, he battered the walles of CROIA afreſh, and with his great ordinance ouerthrew whatſoeuer the citizens had repaired, making the breaches greater and more faultable than before, intending once againe by a new aſſault to prooue his fortune, and the force of his ſouldiours: which he appointed to be the next day. But when he perceiued no ſigne of courage or good hope in the heauie countenances of them diſcouraged, and that they yeelded to him their conſents, rather for feare and ſhame, than for hope of victorie; he called them cowards diſcouraged with the leaſt frowne of fortune, and ſaid:

Euery weake caſtle is able to hold out one aſſault: but if you will draw theſe wilde beaſts out of their dens, you muſt arme your ſelues like reſolute men of inuincible courage, to indure what thing ſoeuer ſhall happen. Great captaines with their puiſſant armies haue growne old vnder the wals of their enemies, vpon light and ſmall diſpleaſures: and will you hauing receiued ſo many diſgraces of theſe periured Epirots, leaue them all vnreuenged? What great victorie was euer yet by any man gained without bloudſhed? Remember the moſt glorious victorie of VARNA. It is hard without bloudie hands to put the yoke vpon the fierce enemies necke. All honourable things are brought to paſſe with aduenture and labour: and the end of this warre dependeth of the taking of CROIA. If it were once woon, all this warre were at an end: which if Scanderbeg loſe (being the ſtrength of his kingdome) he will not tarrie one day longer in EPIRVS. Wherefore be of good cheere, and couragiouſly ſet vpon it: there is not more vncertaintie in any thing, than in matters of warre. Fortune is to be prooued, and oftentimes prouoked of him that will wed her. And yet I will not denie, but that we muſt go more warily to worke againſt this enemy, and hazard our ſelues with better aduiſement, and not without reaſon like wild beaſts to runne headlong vpon our owne death. At length we ſhall weare them out, if we kill but ten of them at an aſſault: yet are they daily to be aſſailed, that they may haue no leiſure to refreſh themſelues, or to make vp their breaches. And peraduenture if force may not preuaile, fortune may find ſome meane that we looke not for, as it fell out at the ſiege of SFETIGRAD, beyond all your expectation. Treaſon is ingenious, and mens deſires great, where great rewards are propounded.

With theſe and like ſpeeches old Amurath encouraged his captaines and ſouldiours, and the nex day early in the morning began the aſſault, which the Turkes valiantly attempted: and without regard of danger came to the gates of the citie, aſſaying, but with vaine and deſperate labour, bour to haue broken them open. In this aſſault wild fire was caſt into many places of the citie, and the great artillerie oftentimes diſcharged into the breaches: whereby many of the Turkes themſelues were ſlaine with their owne great ſhot, together with the Chriſtians: for Amurath deſperatly ſet, was content to buy the life of one Chriſtian with the loſſe of twentie of his Turks. But the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly repulſed their enemies, ſo that of them that came to the gates, none eſcaped aliue; and of them that aſſaulted the greater breach, they which were moſt forward, were firſt ſlaine, and they which ſtood farther off, were ſore wounded with ſhot. Yet for all that, Amurath ſtill maintained the aſſault, by ſending in of new ſupplies, delighting to ſee them goe forward, but greeued at the heart to ſee them ſo ſlaine: vntill at laſt, wearie with beholding the ſlaughter of his men, he cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and ſo ended the aſſault; perſuaded by his Baſſaes, not wilfully to caſt away his valiant ſouldiors where there was no hope to preuaile, but to reſerue them for his better ſeruice. The Turkes retire.

Amurath now out of hope to win the citie by aſſault, thought good to proue what might be done by vndermining of the ſame: during which worke, he cauſed ſmall alarums daily to be giuen vnto the citie, to the intent that the defendants buſied therewith, ſhould not perceiue the ſecret worke of the mine. About which time his prouiſion of corne began to faile in his campe; for which cauſe hee ſent his purueyors for corne to LISSA, a citie of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in league, and bought of them great ſtore of corne. But as his officers were conueying it to his campe, Scanderbeg hauing intelligence thereof, ſlew the conuoy, and carried away with him all that prouiſion, deuiding it amongſt his owne ſouldiors. Howbeit, not long after Amurath receiued great abundance of corne and other prouiſion out of MACEDONIA: beſide that, the Venetian marchants afterward furniſhed him with plentie of corne, oyle, honey, and other neceſſaries; which Scanderbeg might well haue hindered, but that he would not in ſo doing offend the Venetians, which were alſo his ſecret friends, conſidering that Amurath might haue had all the ſame prouiſion out of the further part of MACEDONIA, THRACIA, MYSIA, and ſuch other places, if he had not otherwiſe had it from the Venetians. Amurath ſeeketh to vndermine Croia.

Whileſt Amurath thus lay expecting the ſucceſſe of his mine, foure hundred of the garriſon ſouldiors of CROIA ſallying out of the citie, chaſed diuers of the Turks that were come foorth backe againe vnto the campe: whereof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further loſſe giue the like attempt afterwards. But the ſtaied diſcretion of the Gouernour deceiued that his expectation: who conſidering the danger, would not ſuffer his ſouldiors any more to ſallie out of the citie. Scanderbeg alſo at this time hauing encreaſed his armie with a new ſupplie of two thouſand ſoldiors, deuided the ſame into three parts, deliuering one part to Moſes, another to Tanuſie, and reſeruing the third to himſelfe. With this armie of nine thouſand thus deuided, he determined by night at one inſtant to aſſaile the Turks great campe in three diuers places: appointing in which quarter euery one ſhould charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed, was comming towards the Turks campe, hee was diſcouered by their ſcouts: whereupon a ſuddaine alarme was raiſed in the campe, and all mens minds turned that way, and ſouldiours appointed with all diligence to guard that ſide of the campe. But whileſt the Turkes were all at gaze this way for feare of Scanderbeg, Moſes and Tanuſie, in the dead of the night, at one time aſſailed the Turks campe in two diuers quarters, as they were appointed, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoile. At which time Scanderbeg did alſo what he might: but by reaſon he was before diſcouered, did not much harme. Vpon the approch of the day Scanderbeg retired againe to the hils, and by that time it was faire daylight, ſate downe vpon the ſide of a great mountain, about twentie furlongs off, in the open ſight of all the Turks campe: which he did of purpoſe, that Moſes and Tanuſie, which were by night retired into the mountains, might ſee which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turks thinking that hee ſtood there to braue their whole campe, and as it were to deface them, to the great encouragement of the defendants: diuers of them earneſtly craued leaue of Amurath, That they might goe vp to him, and at leaſtwiſe beat him out of ſight: which hee graunting, twelue thouſand of his beſt ſoldiors, whereof ſeuen thouſand were horſemen, and the reſt foot, preſently ſet forward to encounter him. Scanderbeg ſeeing them all the way they came, vpon their approch ſoftly retired a little farther vp into the mountaines, ſtill expecting the comming of Moſes and Tanuſie. The Turks vnacquainted with ſuch difficult waies, marched vp the ſteepe hils after Scanderbeg with much labour and paine, well wearied of themſelues: but when they were come a great way into the mountaines, they perceiued by the rising of the dust, that some greater force was comming crosse those mountaines: and not long after they might plainely see the formost of their enemies. Wherefore fearing to be enclosed, they began to retire, in which retreat Scanderbeg hardly pursued them, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, slew many of them, but especially with his archers. Moses also comming in afresh on another side, caused them to flie downe the hill amaine, and beside the slaughter that he made, took diuers prisoners. After which victorie, by Scanderbeg obtained in the sight of Amurath and his whole armie, he retired againe into the mountaines.

The late spoile of the Turks campe, with this ouerthrow of the soldiors but now sent against Scanderbeg, much greeued the old tyrant: but the worke of the mine, wherein he had of long laid vp his greatest hope, sorting now to no good purpose, being deemed as well an endlesse peece of worke for the naturall hardnesse of the rocke, as also of small importance, for that it was by the defendants discouered, draue him to his wits end. His forces hee had to his great losse sufficiently prooued, and still found them too weake: and policie preuailed not. Nothing now remained, but to prooue, if by great gifts and glorious promises hee could first corrupt the faith of the Gouernour, and afterwards the garrison: wherein he determined to spare no cost. Vpon which resolution, he sent one of his Bassaes (a man of great authoritie and dexteritie of wit) vnto Vranacontes, with such rich gifts and presents as might haue moued a right constant mind: commaunding the Bassa (if it were possible) first to fasten the same vpon the Gouernour, as presents sent from Amurath of meere bountie, in the honour of his valiant mind; and afterwards to deliuer his message, not sparing to promise any thing for the giuing vp of the citie, yea more than should be desired. The Bassa attended on but with two seruants, came with this rich present neere to the gates of the citie, and there staied, vntill the Gouernours pleasure were knowne: by whose commaund he was receiued into the citie, and brought to his presence. Then the Bassa with much reuerence and many magnificall words presented vnto Vranacontes the rich gifts sent from Amurath, and would forthwith haue deliuered them vnto him, as the rewards of his valour. But Vranacontes willed him first to declare his message from Amurath; vpon the hearing whereof, he would (as he said) as hee saw cause, either receiue or refuse them: before which time hee would not be beholden to his enemie, by receiuing from him the least courtesie. With which answere the subtile Bassa nothing dismayed, with great constancie thus began to deliuer his message.

The crafty speech of the Bassa sent from Amurath to corrupt the Gouernour, and to perswade the souldiers to yeeld vp the citie.

Howsoeuer we agree (said he) vpon other matters we come for, we brought not these gifts of purpose to deceiue any: for so men vse to deale with their children and seruants, and not with men of courage and valour. And albeit that enemies gifts are euer to be suspected (as you haue right wisely said, and we our selues well know) yet wee durst not for shame come vnto so worthie a Gouernour (as the common saying is) emptie handed: neither ought you, if you be the man you seeme to be, and whom men report you are, to refuse our courtesie. Take these presents in good part, which shall no way enforce or hinder you to determine or dispose of your affaires otherwise than shall seeme vnto you good: neither shall we once object vnto you these gifts, which wee so franke and freely offer in the great Sultans name, whether you reject or admit our demaunds and message; wherein there is (perhaps) no lesse regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no greater token of a base mind, than to giue, in hope to receiue againe. We come vnto you frankly (worthie Gouernour) I speake it from my heart: we goe not about with filed speech and rich rewards to circumuent thee, whose inuincible mind wee haue so often in vaine prooued with our forces and power. That is it for which Amurath loueth thee. He doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his enemies, and if it were possible, desireth to haue them with himselfe. There verily with so mightie a monarch might thy inuincible mind and pregnant wit find a better way vnto the highest type of fortunes blisse. Not that I condemne Scanderbeg, whom we his enemies doe highly commend, for his countrey so well recouered, and so oftentimes worthely defended, yet cheefely by your helpe: but you are worthie another manner of Soueraigne, and of another manner of calling, and not to spend all the daies of your life and such heroicall vertues in obscuritie and (without offence be it said) in contemptible baseneſſe. Besides that, Scanderbeg his estate is but momentarie; the destinies haue assigned vnto him too too mightie an enemie; his destruction may well be deferred, but not by any meanes auoided. Amurath hath conceiued against him an implacable displeasure, and prepared his forces accordingly: hee hath sworne to spare no cost, no labour, no danger: and that hee

will neuer whileſt he liueth depart out of EPIRVS, before he haue impoſed a deadly yoke vpon his neck. And behold, the firſt of this miſerie beginneth at this citie, and vpon your ſelues. We daily heare his pauilions ſound with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, That hee will neuer depart out of this place before hee haue taken this citie, and ſatisfied his angrie mind with the torture of your bodies, no, not if he ſhould therefore loſe HADRIANOPLE, yea, and that more is, his whole kingdome. And verily he will doe it, which I feare to deuine or thinke vpon. For although I with others beare againſt you the mind of an enemie, yet am I a man, and mooued with humane compaſſion: beleeue me (ye men of GROIA) beleeue me, my eyes would ſcarcely endure to behold the horrible ſpectacle of your miſerable fortune. I tell you againe he will doe it, except you change your purpoſe, and now receiue health, life, libertie, and peace, whileſt it is ſo freely offered. For albeit, that this notable ſtrong place, theſe impregnable wals, and eſpecially your owne valour, doe yet defend you: how long will it hold out? Verely, no longer than you haue victuall, no longer than you haue meat to ſuſtaine your bodies. Do you thinke that Amurath will raiſe his ſiege in the middle of the heat of this war, and be gon? No, no, if force may not preuaile, if all his attempts faile, yet ſhall you ſee and feele theſe enemies continually to your hurt: you ſhall alwaies haue theſe tents in your eyes and at your gates, vntill long famine, which maſtereth all things, tame your courage alſo. I pray you, what hope haue you left? from whence ariſeth in your reſolute minds ſuch deſperate contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victuall you, being ſo ſtraightly beſieged? which hideth himſelfe (poore man) in the woods all day, and flieth ouer the tops of the mountains, loaden with trauaile and care, ſcarce able to releeue his owne miſerie. Or will the Venetians releeue you? which daily bring vnto vs and ſtore vs with too too great plentie of all things neceſſarie for this war againſt you. Wherefore repent your too much hardineſſe, and gather your wits together. Behold I your enemie aduiſe you. You haue long ynough continued in your obſtinacie. Your countrey and libertie is not ſo far to be defended, as that you ſhould therefore fight againſt God. But wherefore doe I call this libertie? You muſt giue place vnto your fortune, and learne to obey them that be too ſtrong for you. You ſhall find aſſured libertie, rich rewards, perpetuall reſt, with Amurath. Prouide for your ſelues, if you be wiſe, whileſt all things are yet whole for you to determine of; whileſt we your enemies exhort and requeſt you, and had rather haue you our voluntarie companions and friends, than our enforced ſeruants and ſlaues.

This the Baſſa ſpake with great grauitie and no leſſe vehemencie, expecting ſome great motions to haue riſen in the minds of the ſouldiors. But when he perceiued that his ſpeech had rather filled them with indignation, than with feare: and that it was but a vaine thing to goe about to terrifie them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons, he requeſted to talke alone with the Gouernour in ſecret: which was alſo graunted. For all men had no leſſe good opinion of the worthie Gouernours fidelitie, than of his great wiſedome and valour. The craftie Baſſa hauing him by himſelfe, began with great cunning to deliuer his mere ſecret meſſage: when Vranacontes perceiuing by a little what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his ſpeech, and without more adoe commaunded him to depart: ſtraightly charging him, That neither hee nor any other ſhould after that time preſume to come from his maſter to the cittie to ſpeake with him about any ſuch diſhonourable matter; for if hee did, he would in deteſtation thereof cauſe their hands, their noſes, and their eares to be cut off, and ſo returne them diſmembred in ſtead of anſwere. And ſo the Baſſa was with his preſents againe turned out of the citie, and no man ſuffered to receiue any thing of him in reward, although the ſoldiors could haue beene well content to haue eaſed him and his ſeruants of that carriage, if the Gouernour would but haue winked thereat.

Vranacontes reiecteth Amurath his preſents, and threatneth the Baſſa.

Great was the expectation in the Turks campe, of the Baſſaes returne: but when they ſaw the preſents were not receiued, they eaſily gueſſed that all went not as they wiſhed. But when Amurath himſelfe vnderſtood the Gouernors reſolute anſwere, he in great rage commanded all things to be made readie for a freſh aſſault: which he did rather to ſatisfie his anger, than vpon any hope he had to preuaile therein. The next day, he cauſed a furious aſſault to be giuen to the citie, but with greater loſſe to himſelfe than before; the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly defending the citie againſt the Turkiſh furie. In this aſſault many of the Turks were ſlaine at the breach, with their owne great ſhot: for whileſt Amurath ſought therewith to driue the Chriſtians from the defence of the breach, he ſlew a great number more of the forwardeſt of his owne men than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endleſſe ſlaughter of his men, he gaue ouer the aſ-

ſault, and returned into his campe, as if he had been a man halfe franticke or diſtract of his wits; and there ſat downe in his tent, all that day full of melancholie paſsions, ſometimes violently pulling his hoarie beard and white locks, complaining of his hard and diſaſter fortune, that hee had liued ſo long to ſee thoſe daies of diſgrace, wherein all his former glorie and triumphant victories were obſcured, by one baſe towne of EPIRVS. His Baſſaes and graue counſellours labouring in the meane time with long diſcourſes to comfort him vp: ſometimes recounting vnto him his many and glorious victories; and other whiles producing antient examples of like euent. But darke and heauie conceits, had ſo ouerwhelmed the melancholy old tirant, that nothing could content his waiward mind, or reuiue his dying ſpirits: ſo that the little remainder of naturall heat which was left in his aged bodie, now oppreſſed and almoſt extinguiſhed with melancholie conceits, and his aged bodie dried vp with ſorrow, hee became ſicke for griefe. Whereupon by the counſaile of ſome of his Baſſaes, he ſent an embaſſadour to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, if he would yeild to pay vnto him a yearely tribute of ten thouſand duckats: thinking by that meanes his honour to be well ſaued, if before his departure out of EPIRVS, hee could but make Scanderbeg his tributarie. This embaſſadour was by Scanderbeg honourably entertained in his campe, but the offered peace at the ſame time vtterly refuſed. The embaſſadour returning to Amurath, declared vnto him the euill ſucceſſe of his embaſſage, which greatly encreaſed his melancholie ſickneſſe. And Scanderbeg to greeue him the more, vnderſtanding that he was dangerouſly ſicke, and that the great Baſſaes were more carefull of the kings health than of the ſucceſſe of the warres; diuers times aſſailed the Turks campe. Which thing though the Baſſaes kept from his knowledge with all carefulneſſe: yet he often times ſuſpected the matter, by the often allarums and tumults in the campe, and with the greeſe thereof languiſhed. So feeling his ſickneſſe daily to increaſe, and that he could not longer liue, lying vpon a pallet in his pauillion, greeuouſly complained to his Baſſaes, That the deſtinies had ſo blemiſhed all the former courſe of his life, with ſuch an obſcure death, that hee which had ſo often repreſſed the furie of the Hungarians, and almoſt brought to naught the pride of the Grecians, together with their name, ſhould now be enforced to giue vp the ghoſt, vnder the wals of an obſcure caſtle (as hee termed it) and that in the ſight of his contemptible enemie. After that, turning himſelfe to his ſon Mahomet, he earneſtly commended him to the faithfulneſſe of his Baſſaes, and gaue him many graue aduertiſements, ſometimes in ſecret betwixt themſelues, and ſometimes in the hearing of others: want of ſtrength, & abundance of teares running down his aged face (vpon the ſight of his ſon) often times interrupting his ſpeech. Yet ſick vnto death as he was, and drawing faſt vnto his end, he forced himſelfe, to warne his ſonne of ſuch things as now at his death greeued him moſt.

The laſt ſpeech and admonition of Amurath vnto his ſonne Mahomet vpon his death bed.

Let mine example (quoth he) be a warning vnto thee my ſonne, neuer to contemne thine enemie, be he neuer ſo weake: of which one thing aboue all others, I haue repented my ſelfe of long, and ſhall doe after my death, if any feeling of humane thinges remaine in the dead. And that I was ſo fooliſh, and inconſiderat as to foſter vp as it were in my boſome this my domeſticall and neglected enemie: wherby I haue purchaſed vnto my ſelfe this calamitie, and for euer blemiſhed the honor of the Othoman kings: whileſt I ſo baſely ending my daies vnder the wals of CROIA, ſhall become a by-word vnto the world, and all poſteritie for euer. This traitour ſhould euen then haue been oppreſſed, when hee by great treacherie, firſt recouered his wicked kingdome: in that newneſſe of his eſtate, and before the minds of the people were aſſured vnto him, then it had been an eaſie matter, without bloud ſhed to haue vtterly extinguiſhed the wretch, together with his name. Ali Baſſa whoſe euill fortune was the firſt beginning of his good: nor the other Generals, who by him ſlaine or taken priſoners, increaſed his ſtrength and credit with his ſubiects, ſhould not haue been ſent againſt him: a thing which I haue oftentimes thought vpon, but could ſcarce haue beleeued, that euer I ſhould haue thereby receiued ſuch diſgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdome; if I had not been taught the ſame by mine owne experience, to my great loſſe and hearts greefe. We entred into EPIRVS, and here encamped an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong: now if leiſure ſerue you, take view of them, examine the matter, you ſhall find a great want of that number. The fields could not contain our regiments and the multitude of our men: but now, how many tents ſtand emptie? how many horſes want riders? You ſhall go to HADRIANOPLE with our forces much impaired. As for me, the deſtinies haue vowed my ſpirits to this country of EPIRVS, as vnto me fatall. But wherfore do I impute vnto my ſelfe theſe impediments and chances of Fortune? for then firſt began this ſeed of miſchiefe in EPIRVS, when the Hun-

Hungarians with other the Chriſtian princes, roſe vp in armes againſt vs: at which time we fought not with them for ſoueraigntie, but for the whole ſtate of our kingdome; as the bloudie battailes of VARNA and COSSOVA ſtill witneſſe vnto the world. So whileſt I had neither leiſure nor ſufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once; in the meane time this enemy grew as you ſee. But how, or in what order you are hereafter to wage warre againſt him, you may not looke for any direction from me, which haue in all theſe matters ſo euill directed my ſelfe: Fortune neuer deceiued my endeuors more, than in this. But happely thou Mahomet my ſonne, maieſt prooue a more fortunat warriour againſt him: and for ſo many honors alreadie giuen vnto me, the deſtinies haue reſerued the triumph of EPIRVS for thee. Wherfore my ſonne, thou ſhalt receiue from me this ſcepter, and theſe roial enſigns: but aboue all things, I leaue vnto thee this enemie; charging thee not to leaue my death vnreuenged. It is all I charge thee with, for ſo great and ſtately a patrimonie as thou art to receiue from me: it is the only ſacrifice that my old departing ghoſt deſireth of thee.

Amurath his death.

Shortly after he became ſpeechleſſe, and ſtriuing with the pangs of death halfe a day, he then breathed out his gaſtly ghoſt, to the great joy and contentment of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians. He died about the middle of Autumne, in the yeare of our Lord 1450, when he had liued 85 yeares, as moſt write: and thereof raigned 28 (or as ſome others report 30;) about fiue months after the ſiege laid before CROIA.

Amurath an example of the vanitie of worldly honour.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erſt not inferiour vnto the greateſt monarchs of that age, dead almoſt in deſpaire: a worthy mirror of honours frailtie; yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor reliefe. Who had fought greater battails? who had gained greater victories, or obtained more glorious triumphs than had Amurath? Who by the ſpoils of ſo many mightie kings and princes, and by the conqueſt of ſo many prowd and warlike nations, againe reſtored and eſtabliſhed the Turkes kingdome, before by Tamerlan and the Tartars in a manner clean defaced. He it was that burſt the hart of the prowd Grecians, eſtabliſhing his empire at HADRIANOPLE, euen in the center of their bowels: from whence haue proceeded ſo many miſeries and calamities into the greateſt part of Chriſtendome, as no tongue is able to expreſſe. He it was that firſt brake downe the Hexamile or wal of ſeparation on the ſtrait of CORINTH, & conquered the greateſt part of PELOPONESVS. He it was that ſubdued vnto the Turks ſo many great countries and prouinces in ASIA; that in plaine field and ſet battaile ouerthrew many puiſſant kings and princes, and brought them vnder his ſubiection: who hauing ſlaine Vladiſlaus the king of POLONIA and HVNGARIE, and more than once chaſed out of the field Huniades that famous & redoubted warriour; had in his prowd and ambitious heart, promiſed vnto himſelfe the conqueſt of a great part of Chriſtendome. But O how farre was he now changed from the man he then was! how farre did theſe his laſt ſpeeches differ from the courſe of his forepaſſed life! full of ſuch baſe paſsionat complaints and lamentations, as beſeemed not a man of his place and ſpirit; but ſome vile wretch ouertaken with diſpaire, and yet afraid to die. Where were now thoſe haughtie thoughts, thoſe loftie lookes, thoſe thundring and commaunding ſpeeches; whereat ſo many great commaunders, ſo many troups and legions, ſo many thouſands of armed ſouldiours were woont to tremble and quake? Where is that head, before adorned with ſo manie trophies and triumphs? where is that victorious hand that ſwaied ſo many ſcepters? where is the majeſtie of his power and ſtrength, that commanded ouer ſo many nations and kingdoms? O how is the caſe now altred! he lieth now dead, a gaſtly filthy ſtinking carkas, a clod of clay vnregarded, his hands cloſed, his eyes ſhut, and his feet ſtretched out, which erſt prowdly traced the countries by him ſubdued and conquered. And now of ſuch infinit riches, ſuch vnmeaſurable wealth, ſuch hugie treaſures, ſuch ſtately honors and vainglorious praiſes as he in his life time enjoyed; his fraile bodie enjoyeth nothing, but left all behind it. O the weake condition of mans nature! O the vaine glorie of mortall creatures! O the blind and peruerſe thoughts of fooliſh men! Why do we ſo magnifie our ſelues? why are we ſo puffed vp with pride? why do we ſo much ſet our minds vpon riches, authoritie, and other vanities of this life? whereof neuer man had yet one daies aſſurance, and at our moſt need and when we leaſt thinke, quite forſake vs; leauing euen them that moſt ſought after them, and moſt abounded in them, ſhrowded oft times in the ſheet of diſhonor and ſhame.

That his death is otherwiſe by ſome reported, I am not ignorant: the Turkes ſaying, that he died miraculouſly forewarned of his death at HADRIANOPLE: and ſome others, that he died in ASIA, ſtrucken with an Apolexie proceeding of a ſurfet taken of the immoderat drinking of wine. But Marinus Barleſius, who liued in his time in SCODRA faſt by EPIRVS, whoſe authoritie, in report of the warres betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, ſetteth it downe in ſuch maner as is aforeſaid.

in

Preſently after his death, Mahomet his ſonne, for feare of ſome innouation to be made at home, raiſed the ſiege, and returned to HADRIANOPLE: and afterward with great ſolemnitie buried his dead bodie at the Weſt ſide of PRVSA, in the ſuburbs of the citie, where he now lieth in a chappell without any roofe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks: which (they ſay) he ſo commaunded to be done in his laſt will; that the mercie and bleſſing of God (as he termed it) might come vnto him by the ſhining of the Sunne and Moone, and falling of the raine and dew of heauen vpon his graue.

He whileſt he liued mightily enlarged the Turkiſh kingdome, and with greater wiſedome and pollicie than his predeceſſours, eſtabliſhed the ſame: inſomuch that ſome attribute vnto him the firſt inſtitution of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiours of the court (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the firſt, his great grandfather, (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, and the pollicie of that ſtate, whereby it hath euer ſince in his poſteritie flouriſhed, euen by himſelfe plotted. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof in his owne houſe, and to cut off all occaſions of feare; as alſo to leaue all ſuch as might haue the heart to ariſe againſt him, all naked and bare of forces to reſiſt; but eſpecially the other ancient and noble families of the Turks, ſtill ſecretly repining at the great honour of the Othoman kings: he as a man of great wiſedome and judgement, to keepe them vnder, in the beginning of his raigne, by manifold fauours began to bind vnto himſelfe men of ſtrange and forraine countreys, his ſeruants; and by ordering of his moſt waightie affaires by their authoritie, ſo by little and little to caſt off the ſeruice of his naturall Turks: they in the meane time little or nothing at all looking into this his practiſe. And whereas the Othoman kings his predeceſſours had for the moſt part, or rather all together raiſed their Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the court, of ſuch children of the Chriſtians as were taken in the warres; he, ſeeing by experience how ſeruiceable thoſe new kind of ſouldiors were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himſelfe an armie all together of ſuch able perſons, his owne creatures, and ſo to bring in a new kind of warfare, wholly depending of himſelfe. And to that end, by his officers appointed for that purpoſe, tooke from the Chriſtians throughout his dominions, euerie fift child: the faireſt and apteſt of whom, he placed in his owne Seraglio at HADRIANOPLE, and the reſt in other like places by him built for ſuch purpoſe: where they were by ſufficient teachers, firſt inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion, and then in all manner of actiuitie and feats of armes. Of theſe, when they were grown to mans ſtate, he made horſemen, gaue them great penſions, and ſorting them into diuers orders appointed them alſo to guard his perſon; honouring the better ſort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to ſay, His ſonnes the knights. And of theſe he began to make his Baſſaes, his Generals of his armies, and the Gouernours of his prouinces and cities, with all the great offices of the ſtate. The reſt and farre the greateſt part of theſe tribute children taken from their Chriſtian parents, and not brought vp in theſe Seraglioes, hee cauſed to bee diſpierced into euerie citie and countrey of his dominion in ASIA, there for certaine yeares to be brought vp in all hardneſſe and painfull labour, neuer taſting of eaſe or pleaſure: out of which hard brood ſo enured to paines, he made choiſe of ſo many of the moſt luſtie and able bodies fitteſt for ſeruice, as he thought good; who kept in continuall exerciſe, and by skilfull men taught to handle all maner of weapons, but eſpecially the bow, the peece, and the Scimitar, were by him as occaſion ſerued added to the other Ianizaries, and appointed for the guarding of his perſon: calling them commonly by the names of his ſonnes. The remainder of theſe tribute children, as vnfit for the warres, hee put vnto other baſe occupations and miniſteries. But vnto thoſe martiall men of all ſorts ſo by him ordained, hee appointed a continuall pay, according to their degrees and places: and by great benefits and liberties beſtowed vpon them, bound them ſo faſt vnto him, as that he might now account himſelfe to haue of them ſo many ſonnes, as hee had ſouldiours: For they together with the Chriſtian religion, hauing forgot their parents and countrey, and knowing no other lord and maſter but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace onely, remained euer bound and faithfull vnto him; and ſo kept others alſo, as well the naturall Turks themſelues, as the other oppreſſed Chriſtians within in the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great pollicie proceeding from a deepe judgement, firſt to weaken the Chriſtians by taking from them their beſt children, and of greateſt hope; and then by them depending wholly of himſelfe, to keepe in awe and dutifull obedience his naturall ſubjects alſo: hauing them alwaies as a ſcourge readie to chaſtice the rebellious or diſloyall. A great pollicie

Now the other Othoman kings and emperours, the ſucceſſors of Amurath, keeping this cuſtome, and alſo increaſing it one after another, haue therby not onely kept the empire ſtill in their houſe and familie, where it was firſt gotten: but alſo ſo maintained the majeſtie of their ſtate, as that they are of their ſubjects feared, obeyed, and honoured, not as kings, but as gods. For the naturall Turks their ſubjects looſing courage continually, and daily growing more baſe and daſtardly, by reaſon they are not ſuffered to practiſe the knowledge of armes; and the ſouldiours in whoſe power all things are, knowing nothing of their owne, but holding and acknowledging all that they haue to come of their lord, account them as kings and lords of all: ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the antient kinges of ÆGYPT; who were abſolute lords and maſters, both of the publick and priuat wealth of their ſubjects, whom they kept vnder as ſlaues and villaines. And hereof cometh it to paſſe, that the better part of them, whom we call Turks (but are indeed the children of Chriſtians, and ſeduced by their falſe inſtructors) deſire to be called Muſulmans (that is to ſay, right beleeuers) hold it a reproachfull and diſhonourble thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people: For that they knowing right well, that there is not one naturall Turke among all thoſe that beare authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honour and reputation than the reſt (ſuch as are the men of warre and courtiers) but he is borne a Chriſtian either of father, or at the leaſt of his grandfather: auouch thoſe onely to be Turks which liue in NATOLIA, al of them either marchants, or of baſe and mechanicall crafts, or poore labourers with the ſpade and pickaxe, and ſuch like people vnfit for the warres; the reſt (as I ſay) holding it for a title of honour to be diſcended of Chriſtian parents. Yea the Grand Signior himſelfe, although by the fathers ſide he bee come of progenitors ſuch as were naturall Turks borne, yet many of them had Chriſtian mothers, which they accounted in the greateſt part of their nobilitie and honour. Thus by the wiſedome of Amurath was the order of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiours of the court greatly aduanced, though not by him begun, and the politicke ſtate of the Turks kingdome (to ſay the truth) quite altered; the naturall Turks (more than the Sultan himſelfe) now bearing therein no ſway: but onely theſe new ſouldiours, all of them diſcended from Chriſtian parents, and by adoption as it were become the ſonnes of the Turkiſh Sultans, and vnder them commanding all: by whom they haue euer ſince managed their eſtate, & by their good ſeruice wonderfully, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, encreaſed and extended their empire. But of them more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

This great king was whileſt hee liued, of his ſubjects woonderfully beloued, and no leſſe of them after his death lamented. He was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkiſh kings either before or after him: by nature melancholie and ſad, and accounted rather politicke than valiant, yet was indeed both: a great diſſembler, and painefull in trauaile, but wayward and teſtie aboue meaſure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had iſſue ſixe ſonnes, Achmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Haſan (otherwiſe called Chaſan) Vrchan, and Achmetes the younger, of ſome called Calepinus: three of whom died before him; but the two youngeſt were by their vnnaturall brother Mahomet, who ſucceeded him in the Turkiſh kingdome, euen in their infancie, in the beginning of his raigne moſt cruelly murthered. Amurath his diſpoſition. The ſonnes of Amurath.

I that ſo many nations, townes,

And haue alone diſmaied the world,

Am now by death (which all deuoures)

Yet doth the glorie of my name,

The great king Alexanders fame,

Nor worthy Hannibal, whoſe force

I vanquiſht the victorious Greeks,

The warlike people of EPIRE,

My force in field HVNGARIA felt,
my greatneſſe is there knowne:
Which of late time through ITALY,
to their great ruth is blowne.
Th'Aſſyrians felt my heauie hand,

The Perſian king with all his force,
I driue out of the field.
I purpoſed to win the RHODES,

If that the fatall deſtinies,

But wo is me, for griſly death

And in the twinckling of an eye,

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING AND FIRST EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SVRNAMED THE GREAT.

THe report of the death of old Amurath the late king, was in ſhort time blowne through moſt part of Chriſtendome, to the great joy of many: but eſpecially of the Greekes, and other poore Chriſtians which bordered vpon the tyrants kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkiſh king, to make exchange alſo of their bad eſtate and fortune: and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, after the death of his father, would haue embraced the Chriſtian religion, being in his childhood inſtructed therein (as was ſuppoſed) by his mother, the daughter of the prince of SERVIA, a Chriſtian. But vaine was this hope, and the joy thereof but ſhort, as afterward by proofe appeared. For Mahomet being about the age of one and twentie yeares, ſucceeding his father in the kingdome in the yeare of our Lord 1450, embraced in ſhew the Mahometane religion, abhorring the Chriſtian, but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other; but as a meere Atheiſt, deuoid of all religion, and worſhipping no other god but good fortune, derided the ſimplicitie of all ſuch as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which graceleſſe reſolution ſo wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his luſt, and making conſcience of nothing, kept no league, promiſe, or oath, longer than ſtood with his profit or pleaſure. 1450 Mahomet of no religion.

Now in the Court men ſtood diuerſly affected towards the preſent ſtate: the mightie Baſſaes and others of great authoritie, vnto whom the old kings gouernment was neuer greeuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting leaſt the fierce nature of the yong king ſhould turne to the hurt of ſome of them in particular, and the ſhortening of their authoritie in generall, as indeed it ſhortly after fell out. But the luſtie gallants of the Court wearie of the old king, who in hope of preferment had long wiſhed for the gouernment of the yong prince, were glad to ſee him ſet vpon his fathers ſeat. And the vulgar people (neuer conſtant but in vnconſtancie, and alwaies fawning vpon the preſent) exceedingly rejoyced in their young king. The Ianizaries alſo at the ſame time (according to their accuſtomed manner) tooke the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iewes that dwelt amongſt them, and eaſily obtained pardon for the ſame: whereupon he was by the ſame Ianizaries and the other ſouldiors of the Court with great triumph ſaluted king. Which approbation of theſe men of warre, is vnto the Turkiſh kings a greater aſſurance for the poſſeſſion of their kingdome, than to be borne the eldeſt ſonne of the king, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare: ſo great is the power of theſe maſterfull ſlaues, in promoting to the kingdome which ſoeuer of the kings ſonnes they moſt fauour, without much regard whether he be the eldeſt or not.

hands his youngeſt brother,then but eighteene moneths old,begotten on the daughter of Sponderbeius. Which vnnaturall part,Moſes one of his Baſſaes,and a man greatly in his fauour,perceiuing,requeſted him not to imbrue his owne hands in the blood of his brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to ſome other: which thing Mahomet commaunded him the author of that counſell foorthwith to doe. So Moſes taking the child from the nurſe,ſtrangled it, with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young ladie vnderſtanding of the death of her child(as a woman whom furie had made paſt feare) came, and in her rage reuiled the tyrant to his face, ſhamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane crueltie. When Mahomet to appeaſe her furie,requeſted her to be content,for that it ſtood with the policie of his ſtate: and willed her for her better contentment,to aske whatſoeuer ſhe pleaſed,and ſhe ſhould forthwith haue it. But ſhe deſiring nothing more than in ſome ſort to be reuenged,deſired to haue Moſes(the executioner of her ſonne)deliuered vnto her, bound: which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe preſently ſtrucke him into the breaſt with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankfull maſter for helpe:) and proceeding in her cruell execution,cut an hole in his right ſide, and by peecemeale cut out his liuer, and caſt it to the dogs to eat. At the ſame time alſo he cauſed another of his brethren,committed by his father to the keeping of Caly Baſſa,and now by him betrayed into his hands,to be likewiſe murthered.

A cruell reuenge of an angrie woman.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkiſh cõmonweale.

Thus beginning his tyrannous raigne with the bloodie execution of them that were in blood neareſt vnto him,and whom of all others he ought to haue defended, he preſently after began to frame a new forme of a commonweale,by abrogating and altering the old lawes and cuſtomes, and publiſhing of new,better fitting his owne humour,and more commodious for himſelfe: impoſing alſo new taxes and ſubſidies vpon his ſubjects, neuer before heard of; thereby to increaſe his treaſures, and ſatisfie his auaritious deſire: which amongſt many other his vices ſo much raigned in him,as that he was thought ouerſparing vnto himſelfe, as well in his apparrell as in his diet. And proceeding farther, hee called vnto ſtraight account all the great officers of his kingdome: of whom ſome he put to death,and confiſcated their goods; others he put to great fines, or quite remooued them from their offices. In like manner hee dealt alſo with his great Baſſaes, admitting many falſe and ſurmiſed accuſations againſt them: whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercie was to be looked for. By which meanes hee became no leſſe terrible vnto his ſubjects,than he was afterward vnto his enemies;and ſo was of them exceedingly feared, but more hated. Amongſt other things, hee much miſliked in his court the exceſsiue number of faulconers and huntſmen; which was growne ſo great by the immoderat delight which his predeceſſors tooke in the pleaſures of the field,that there were continually maintained of the kings charge,ſeuen thouſand faulconers,and not many fewer huntſmen,ſaying,That he would not be ſo much a foole,as to maintaine ſuch a multitude of men to attend vpon ſo meere a vanitie. And therefore tooke order,that from thenceforth there ſhould bee allowance made for fiue hundred faulconers onely,and one hundred huntſmen: the reſt he appointed to ſerue as ſouldiors in his warres. At the ſame time alſo he entered into league with Conſtantinus Palæologus, the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the other princes of GRECIA: as alſo with the Deſpot of SERVIA, his grandfather by the mothers ſide, as ſome will haue it; howbeit, ſome others write,that the Deſpot his daughter,Amurath his wife,was but his mother in law, whom hee vnder the colour of friendſhip ſent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, ſtill allowing her a princely dowrie. But if ſhee were not his mother (as like ynough it is that ſhee was not) much more happie was ſhe,that ſhe neuer groned for ſo graceleſſe a ſonne.

1451 Mahomet goeth againſt the king of Caramania.

Whileſt Mahomet was thus occupied about his ciuile affaires, Ibrahim king of CARAMANIA,who long before had married Amurath his ſiſter, and yet for all that, had (as his anceſtors had before him)alwaies enuied the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Othoman kings,tooke occaſion in the firſt yeare of Mahomet his raigne, with fire and ſword to inuade his dominions in ASIA. Which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood,he diſplaced Iſa his lieutenant in ASIA,as a man not ſufficient to manage ſo great warres,and appointed Iſaack Baſſa in his roome,a moſt valiant man of warre,vpon whom not long before he had vpon ſpeciall fauour beſtowed in mariage the faire daughter of Sponderbeius,one of his fathers wiues,of whom we haue before ſpoken. This great Baſſa paſsing ouer into ASIA, raiſed a great armie. After whom followed Mahomet in perſon himſelfe with a greater, out of EVROPE: and hauing all his forces together, entered with great hoſtilitie into CARAMANIA. But the Caramanian king perceiuing himſelfe vnable to withſtand

ſo puiſſant an enemie, fled into the ſtrength of the great mountaines, and by his embaſſadours offered vnto Mahomet ſuch reaſonable conditions of peace, as that hee was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by ſolemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his armie to PRVSA: but when he was come thither, the Ianizaries preſuming that they might be bold with the young king; putting themſelues in order of battaile, came, & with great inſolencie demaunded of him a donatiue or largious, as a reward of their good ſeruice done. With which ſo great preſumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed: but for ſo much as they were his beſt ſouldiors, and alreadie in armes, he wiſely diſſembled his anger for the preſent, hauing a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Baſſa, and Turechan-beg, two of his great captaines, who had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter: wherefore to content them, hee cauſed tenne great bags of aſpers to bee ſcattered amongſt them, and ſo pacified the matter. But within few daies after, he cauſed Doganes (the Aga or cheefe captaine of the Ianizaries) to be brought before him, and to be ſhamefully whipt: and ſo preſently diſcharging him of his office, placed one Muſtapha in the ſame. The like ſeueritie he vſed againſt the reſt of the vndercaptaines, cauſing them to be cruelly ſcourged and beaten like ſlaues: which in that tyrannicall gouernment is an vſuall puniſhment, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the king to be inflicted vpon any man, without reſpect of degree or calling, if he be not a naturall Turke borne. Preſently after he ſent Iſaack his lieutenant againſt Elias prince of MENTESIA or CARIA, by whom the poore prince was driuen out of his countrey: euer ſince which time it hath remained in ſubjection to the Turkiſh kings, as part of their kingdome and empire.

Mentesia ſubdued by the Turks.

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian war, and was determined with his armie to returne to HADRIANOPLE, he was aduertiſed, That the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS were ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the Chriſtian fleet, that he could not poſsibly there paſſe ouer but with moſt manifeſt danger: wherefore hee tooke his way through that part of BYTHINIA which lieth aboue CONSTANTINOPLE, and came to the caſtle which the Turks call Acce-Chiſar, and the Grecians ἀσπρόκαστρον, or White caſtle, ſtanding vpon the narrow ſtrait of BOSPHORVS on ASIA ſide, and there paſſed ouer into EVROPE at the ſame place where his father Amurath had not many yeares before in like manner found paſſage. Where when he was ſafely got ouer with his armie, he by the aduiſe of his Baſſaes encamped faſt by the ſea ſide, and there preſently began to build a great ſtrong caſtle cloſe vnto the ſtraits of BOSPHORVS, neere vnto PROPONTIS on EVROPE ſide, directly oueragainſt the other caſtle in ASIA. For the ſpeedie accompliſhment of which worke, he aſſembled thither all the workemen he could poſsibly get out of EVROPE and ASIA; apportioning vnto his captaines and ſouldiours of his armie part of the worke alſo: by whoſe induſtrie and labour, that great building was in ſhorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the firſt expected. This caſtle which for the greatneſſe thereof is of moſt writers reputed for a citie, was by the Turks named Genichiſar, & of the Grecians Neocaſtron, or New caſtle, and alſo Læmocaſtron, or caſtle vpon the ſtraits; and was there by the Turks built, as well for the ſafetie of their owne paſſage too and fro, as for to hinder the paſſage of the Chriſtians through thoſe narrow ſtraits, they now poſſeſsing the ſtrong forts on both ſides: and thereby alſo to diſtreſſe the cittie of CONSTANTINOPLE, from whence this caſtle was not aboue fiue miles diſtant. When Mahomet in the ſecond yeare of his raign had finiſhed this great caſtle, with ſome other ſmall forts about the ſame, and alſo repaired the other caſtle in ASIA oueragainſt it, hee placed therein ſtrong garriſons, and furniſhed the ſame with artillerie; in ſuch ſort, that no ſhip could paſſe through the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS into the great Euxine or blacke ſea, but ſhe was in danger to be ſunke: whereby the rich trade which the marchants of VENICE, GENVA, and CONSTANTINOPLE, had to CAFFA, and other places lying vpon the Euxine, were almoſt quite cut off, to the great hinderance of thoſe eſtates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall deſirous to doe ſome ſuch thing as the glorie whereof might farre paſſe the fame of his predeceſſors, thought nothing more anſwerable vnto his high conceits, than to attempt the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the vtter ſubuerſion of the Greeke empire: whereupon his father Amurath, and his great grandfather Baiazet, had before in vaine ſpent their forces. Beſides that, it greeued him to ſee that goodly cittie, the antient ſeat of the Chriſtian empire, to be ſo commodiouſly ſituated, as it were in the middeſt of his kingdome, and not to be at his commaund. Hereunto the ſmall power of the Greeke emperor himſelfe, and the other Chriſtian princes at the ſame time at mortall diſcord amongſt themſelues, miniſtred vnto his greedie desire no small hope of successe, and serued as spurres to pricke him forward vnto so great an enterprise. Wherefore all the Winter he caused great preparation to be made of shipping & other warlike prouision both for sea and land: and gaue out commissions for the leuying of a mightie armie, to be in readinesse against the next Spring. But whither hee would employ the same, no man could certainely tell: some gessing one thing, and some another, as the manner of men is, when such extraordinarie preparation is at hand. Constantinus the eight of that name, then emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, a prince of a mild and soft spirit, fitter for the church than for the field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkish king; and fearing least that tempest then growing, should vpon the suddaine breake forth vpon himselfe, first made such preparation, as his owne small abilitie would extend vnto: and then sent his embassadours vnto other Christian princes, earnestly crauing their aid and assistance in that his dangerous estate. But that labour was lost, and all his sute vaine: for they being at variance one with another, and hauing more care of priuat reuenge than how to repulse the common enemie of Christianitie, could not or would not affoord him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fift of that name, then bishop of ROME, with Alphonsus king of NAPLES, and the state of VENICE, promised to haue sent him thirtie gallies, but none for all that came.

Constantinus the emperor in vaine craueth aid of the Christian princes.

There was by chaunce at CONSTANTINOPLE certaine ships and gallies of VENICE, GENVA, CRETE, and CHIOS, of whom the emperour made stay: at which time also it chaunced, that Ioannes Iustinianus, an aduenturer of GENVA, who had beene scouring those seas, came to CONSTANTINOPLE with two tall ships, and foure hundred souldiors: where he was entertained by the emperour. And for as much as he was a man honourably descended, and supposed to be both of great courage and direction, was by the emperor appointed Generall of all his forces next vnto himselfe. He also entertained six thousand Greekes: which, with three thousand Venetians, Genowaies, and others, whom he had made stay of, joined vnto the cittizens, was all the weake strength he had to relie vpon, for the defence of his state and empire.

1453 Against the beginning of the Spring, the Turkish king had in readinesse a great and puissant armie of three hundred thousand men, of whom, the greatest part were taken out of BVLGARIA, SERVIA, RASCIA, THESSALIA, MACEDONIA, and GRECIA, which as yet were called the Christian countries, and were themselues either indeed Christians, or els such renegates as had not long before forsaken the Christian faith: vnto these also were joyned diuers other Christians which came out of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, and HVNGARIE, to serue the Turke in his warres. This hath been none of the least meanes, whereby the Turkish kings haue growne so great, and their kingdome so mightily enlarged, by enforcing and alluring Christians to fight against Christians, to the vtter confusion of themselues. Amongst the great multitude of the European Christians, were mingled his effeminat soldiors of ASIA, and his naturall Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number fewest, and yet commaunded all the rest.

With this great armie, well appointed with all warlike prouision, came Mahomet the Turkish king from HADRIANOPLE: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1453, encamped before CONSTANTINOPLE, and with the multitude of his armie filled all the maine land before the citie, from the sea side of BOSPHORVS, vnto the place where the same sea compassing in the citie on two parts, and running farre into the land betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, maketh there a goodly hauen betwixt them.

Mahomet encampeth before Constantinople.

This citie of CONSTANTINOPLE (called in ancient time BIZANTIVM) is in fourme of a Triangle, situated in EVROPE in the pleasant countrey of THRACIA, vpon a point of the main land shooting out towards ASIA, called of Plinie & Solinus, The promotorie CHRYSOCERAS; where the sea of PROPONTIS joyneth vnto that strait of sea which diuideth ASIA from EVROPE, called in ancient time BOSPHORVS THRACIVS; sometime the strait of PONTVS; and the mouth of PONTVS; and of the moderne writers, the strait of CONSTANTINOPLE; and about 200 yeares past, or more, S. George his arme. This point of the maine, whereon the citie standeth, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the ancient citie of CALCEDON, on the other side of the strait in ASIA: more than thirtie miles distant from the Euxine or blacke sea, lying from it Northward; and two hundreth miles from the strait of HELLESPONTVS or CALLIPOLIS, from thence South. Which noble citie (of all others most fitly seated for the empire of the world, and with great majestie ouerlooking both EVROPE and ASIA) is by the Cosmographers accounted to stand in the height of 43 degrees, vpon seuen little hils of

The situation of Constantinople.

no

no great and easie ascent: and was there first built by Pausanias the Lacedemonian king, and called BIZANTIVM, and so many yeares flourished as a populous and rich cittie, vntill the ciuile warres betwixt Seuerus the emperour, and Niger: what time it endured the siege of the Romanes vnder Seuerus, three yeares, with such obstinacie, that it yeelded not vntill it was brought to such extremitie that the citizens did eat one another; and then yeelding, had the wals ouerthrowne by Seuerus, and the citie it selfe destroyed, and brought to the low estate of a poore countrie village, and so by him giuen to the Perinthyans. In which base estate it continued vntill the time of Constantine the Great, the sonne of Helena (whom some will needs haue to haue ben an English woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings so stately and sumptuous, that vnto the strange beholders it seemed a dwelling place for heauenly wights rather than for earthly men. And to grace it the more, translated his imperiall seat thether, and called it NOVA ROMA, or new ROME; and all that pleasant part of THRACIA alongst the sea coast of HELLESPONTVS, PROPONTIS, and BOSPHORVS, by the name of ROMANIA, of the faire Romane collonies there by him planted, which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks called RVMILIA and RVM-ILI (that is to say) the Romane countrey. But as for the citie it selfe, the glorious name of the founder so preuailed, that the citie was and yet is of him called CONSTANTINOPLE, or Constantine his citie: and now of the barbarous Turkes commonly, but corruptly, STAMBOLL. It is (as we said) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longest side which runneth from Northeast to Southwest, is on the South side washed with the PROPONTIS; and towards the ending of the point which is about the seauen towers, is somewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other side lyeth East and West fiue miles in length, being washed with the hauen, which is somwhat more thā eight miles long before it meet with the fresh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad: on the farther side whereof standeth the citie of PERA, commonly called GALATA, sometimes a colonie of the Genowaies. This hauen is very deepe, and by that reason as commodious as deepe, bearing ships full fraught close to the shoare, so that they may discharge their burthens with the least trouble that may be, and is of Strabo called CORNV BIZANTII, or the horne of Bizantium. The third side of this citie towards the Continent, lyeth almost North and South fiue miles also in length: those two sides that lie vpon the sea, and the hauen, are enuironed and guirt in with a single wall, built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which strongly defend & flanke the same. Without which wals (especially towards the hauen) there lyeth a street between them and the shore. But the other side which is the third, and regardeth the main land (beside the ditch, which is also fenced) is defended with three wals: the first wall standing vpon the ditch being but low; and the second not farre distant from the first, raised somewhat higher; but the third ouerlooketh and commaundeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortresse both the other wals and all the ditch without may easily be defended. But the two vtter wals, with the whole space betwixt them, are now by the Turks but slenderly maintained, lying full of earth and other rubbish, euen as they were in the time of the Grecians: some cause why they with lesse heart and courage defended the same against their barbarous enemies. In the East part of the cittie, on that point which in the raigne of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, distant from ASIA not much more than halfe a mile, standeth the Seraglio or pallace of the great Turke, containing in it selfe a great part of an hill, enclosed round with a wall, as if it were it selfe a citie, in circuit more than two miles: wherein amongst other stately buildings, neere vnto the sea standeth a verie faire and sumptuous gallerie, built for pleasure, with a priuie gate well fortified and planted with great ordinance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times passeth, when he is disposed in his gallie to take his pleasure vpon the sea, or to passe ouer the strait vnto his houses or gardens of delight, on the other side in ASIA. In this great citie are also many other most stately and sumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkish Sultans, since they became lords thereof, as before by the Greeke emperours: amongst all which, the Temple of S. Sophia standing in the East side of the citie, not farre from the Seraglio (now reduced vnto the forme of a Mahometan Moschie, and whether the great Turk goeth often times to heare seruice, being indeed but the Sanctuarie or chauncell onely of the great, stately, and wonderfull church built by Iustinian the emperor) is most beautifull and admirable. That which standeth of it now, is both round & verie high, built after the fashion of the Pantheon in ROME, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top as is that: the wals thereof being of the finest Constantinople built by Pausanias, destroyed by Seuerus, reedified by Constantine the Great, and now taken by Mahomet the Turke.

The magnificent temple of S. Sophia.

marble, and the floare all paued with faire marble alſo. In the middeſt there is a verie great and large circle, compaſſed in with high and huge pillars of moſt excellent marble of diuers ſorts; and theſe ſupport a mightie vault that beareth vp as many moe pillars aboue, ſtanding after the verie ſame order, and in a downe right line, almoſt of the like greatneſſe and goodneſſe of the marble with the other below: vpon which, aboue the ſecond vault in manner of a looüar, reſteth the great round roofe which couereth all that ſpace of the church which is compaſſed with the aforeſaid pillars: being all enameled and fillited, with the pictures of Saints, after the antient manner of ſome great churches in Chriſtendome: but that the Turks, who like not to haue any pictures in their churches, haue put out their eies onely, as loath to ſpoile ſuch a rare peece of worke, and vtterly to deface it. In like manner the wals of the vpper vault, are wrought, painted, or portraied after the ſame order, though in ſome part decayed, by reaſon of their long continuance and ſtanding. About this church are eighteen or twentie dores of braſſe, right faire and coſtly, well declaring the magnificence and greatneſſe thereof in more antient times: when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred dores of like making and greatneſſe; and beſide the hugeneſſe of the frame and building it ſelfe, had alſo diuers faire monaſteries and houſes of religion joyned vnto it: whereunto belonged ſix thouſand prieſts, whoſe houſes and lodgings extended almoſt all ouer the place where now the Turke his pallace ſtandeth, and the other places adjoyning to this great church, which is now their cheefe Moſchie, and called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, becauſe they hold euen as we do, the wiſdome of God to be incomprehenſible and infinit. The next in magnificence vnto this, is the Moſchie of Solyman, wherin he lyeth buried, with his welbeloued wife the faire Roxolana: a worke well beſeeming the maieſtie of ſo mightie a monarch. There are beſide theſe alſo many other faire Moſchies, Seraglios for the Turke his wiues and concubines, Bezeſtanes or Burſes for marchants, Obeliskes, Bathes, and other publicke edifices and buildings of great majeſtie and ſtate, all well worth the beholding: wherein conſiſteth all the beautie of this ſo auncient and renowned a citie; farre vnlike to that it was in the time of the firſt Greeke emperours, and before it was ſpoiled by the Latines. For the Turkes priuat houſes in this ſo great and imperiall a citie, ſo much renowned through the world, are for the moſt part low and baſe, after the Turkiſh faſhion, built ſome of wood, ſome of ſtone, and ſome of vnburnt bricke, layd with clay and dyrt, which quickly decaieth againe: they after their homely manner (by long cuſtome receiued) neuer building any thing ſumptuouſly for their owne priuate vſe, but contenting themſelues with their ſimple cottages, how meane ſoeuer, commonly ſaying them to be good inough for the ſhort time of their pilgrimage: and yet not ſparing for any coſt vpon the publicke buildings and ornaments of the commonwealth, which they build with great majeſtie and pompe; but eſpecially their Moſchies, wherein they excell. Neuertheleſſe there yet are in CONSTANTINOPLE ſome other houſes alſo built high and comely inough; but theſe bee few, and verie old, all inhabited by the Chriſtians and Iewes, and not by the Turks. But of this inough, and ſo againe to our purpoſe.

The ſingalitie of the Turkes in their priuat buildings.

Mahomet with his puiſſant armie thus encamped before the citie, placing his Aſian ſouldiors on the right hand, toward the BOSPHORVS; his Europeian ſouldiors on the left hand, toward the hauen; lay himſelfe with 15000 Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the court, in the middle betwixt both, againſt the heart of the citie. On the farther ſide of the hauen alſo by PERA, hee placed Zoganus, one of his cheefe counſellors, with another part of his armie. At which time alſo Pantologes his Admirall came to the ſiege, with a fleet of thirtie gallies, and 200 other ſmall ſhips, and a number of other leſſer veſſels, which were rowed with three, or fiue oares a peece, full of Turkiſh archers, fitter for ſhew than ſeruice. But for defence of the hauen, and ſo of the citie on that ſide, the emperour had cauſed the hauen to bee ſtrongly chained ouerthwart from the citie to PERA: and within the chaine had orderly placed his ſmall fleet, the greateſt ſtrength whereof was ſeauen great ſhips of GENVA, with three gallies, and two galliots of VENICE, three of CREET, and a few others of the Iland of CHIOS; all which were there, rather by chance vpon marchants affaires, than that they were prouided for any ſuch ſeruice: yet by this meanes the Turks fleet was ſhut out of the hauen, and ſo the citie put in good ſaftie on that ſide.

The Turks fleet.

When Mahomet had thus conueniently encamped his armie, and ſurrounded the citie both by ſea and land: he firſt caſt vp great trenches as neere as hee poſsibly could vnto the wals of the citie, and raiſed mounts in diuers places as high as the wals themſelues, from whence the Turks with their ſhot greatly annoied the defendants. After that, hee placed his batterie againſt one of the the gates of the citie called CALEGARIA, and terribly battered the ſame, eſpecially with one peece of ordinance of a wonderfull greatneſſe, which with much difficultie was brought from HADRIANOPLE with an hundreth & fiftie yoke of oxen, & caried a bullet of an hundred pound waight, made (as his other ſhot was) of a kind of hard blacke ſtone brought from the Euxine ſea. For as yet (as it ſeemeth) ſo ſoone after the inuention of that fatall engine, the vſe of bullets of mettall was vnknowne. There with continuall batterie, he terribly ſhooke the wals, which although they were verie ſtrong, yet were they not able to withſtand the furie of ſo great a batterie. The Chriſtians alſo out of the citie diſcharged their great artillerie vpon the Turkes, but ſo ſparingly, as if they had beene afraid to ſhake their owne wals; or loath for good husbandrie, to ſpend ſhot & powder, which was vnto the canoniers verie ſparingly allowed: yet that which was ſpent, was ſo well beſtowed, that the Turks were therewith greeuouſly annoyed. The breach alſo which they had made at the aforeſaid gate, was by the defendants with great and dangerous labour againe repaired with faggots and earth, and ſuch like matter beſt ſeruing for that purpoſe, and ſo made ſtronger than before. In which moſt dangerous work, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iuſtinianus the Genoway, the emperours lieutenant generall for defence of the citie.

Conſtantinople vndermined by the Turks.

Yet for all this diligence of the Chriſtians, Mahomet continued his batterie with no leſſe furie than before: but repoſing greater hope to find a way into the citie, by the ſpade and mattocke, than by batterie; he employed his pyoners, whereof he had great ſtore, to digge a mine: being altogether directed by Chriſtians skilfull in that kind of worke, whom hee had for that purpoſe entertained. By whoſe cunning direction, with the induſtrious labour of the poore pioners, the mine was brought to ſuch perfection, that part of the wall, with one of the ſtrong towers in the ſame, was quite vndermined, and ſtood ſupported, but with ſuch vntruſtie ſtaies as the pyoners had left for the bearing vp thereof vntill ſuch time as it ſhould by the tirants appointment be blown vp. This dangerous worke was neither perceiued, neither yet feared by the Conſtantinopolitans, as a thing not poſsible to haue beene done: foraſmuch as Baiazet and Amurath had both with great labour before in vaine attempted the ſame, at ſuch time as they hardly beſieged the citie. But that which thoſe great kings had with much vaine labour by vnskilfull men made proofe of, Mahomet had now by men of greater deuiſe, brought to paſſe; although it tooke not ſuch effect as he wiſhed: for one Io. Grandis, a Germane captaine, and a man of great experience, ſuſpecting the matter, had cauſed a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turkes was in good time diſcouered, and they with fire and ſword driuen out of the mine, and the ſame ſtrongly filled vp againe, and ſo the citie for that time deliuered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiuing that it auailed him not to continue his batterie againſt that place which was againe ſo ſtrongly repaired, remooued the ſame, and planted it againſt a tower called BACTATINA, neere vnto the gate called PORTA-ROMANA, or Romane gate. Which tower ſhaken with continuall batterie, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vtter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was alſo ſpeedily and with great courage made vp againe by the defendants, although the Turkes did what they could, with continuall ſhot, to haue driuen them from the ſame. At which time they alſo erected certain high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the ſame from fire, out of which they with their ſhot ſlew many of the Chriſtians vpon the wals, and in making good the aforeſaid breach: but Mahomet ſeeing this valiantneſſe of the defendants, openly ſaid, That it was neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the citie: For the Turks commonly call all the Chriſtians of the Weſt by the name of Frankes or Frenchmen.

Seuentie of the Turks galliots brought eight miles ouerland (by the deuice of a Chriſtian) into the hauen of Conſtantinople.

The cheerefulneſſe and induſtrie of the Chriſtians in defending and repairing the aforeſaid breach, was ſo great, that the Turkiſh king began almoſt to diſpaire of winning the citie; which hee could no way aſſault but on one ſide. When as a wicked Chriſtian in his campe, put him againe in good hope, by ſhewing vnto him a deuiſe how to bring a great part of his fleet ouer land into the hauen, and thereby to aſſault that part of the citie by water, which the citizens leaſt feared: by which ingenious deuiſe, and by the great ſtrength of men; Zoganus Baſſa (to whom that charge was committed) brought ſeuentie of the leſſer ſhips and galliots, with all their ſailes abroad (to the great admiration of all that ſaw them) vp a great hill, and ſo by drie land, out of the Boſphorus behind PERA, the ſpace of eight miles, into the hauen of CONSTANTINOPLE, which running in betweene the citie and PERA, runneth into the maine land (as we ſayd) about eight eight miles. The Christian that discouered this deuice vnto the king, is supposed to haue learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of BENNACVS. Glad was Mahomet to see so many of his ships and gallies in the hauen, and the Christians with the sight thereof no lesse discouraged. Neuertheless, they attempted to haue burnt those vessels as they were in launching, but the Turkes had so commodiously placed certaine peeces of great Ordinance for their defence, that the formost of the gallies of the Christians, approching the Turks fleet, was presently sunke; wherewith the rest dismayed, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Christians of the lost gallie, whom the Turkes tooke vp swimming in the hauen, were the next day cruelly slaine in the sight of the Christians: in reuenge whereof, certain Turks before taken prisoners into CONSTANTINOPLE, were foorthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the sight of the campe with like crueltie put to death.

A wonderfull bridge made by the Turks ouer the hauen of Constantinople.

Mahomet thus possessed of the hauen, shortly after caused a wonderfull bridge to bee made quite ouer the hauen, from Zoganus his campe which lay by PERA, vnto the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE: which bridge was built with timber and plankes, borne vp with small boats & emptie caske, after a most strange manner, and was in length more than halfe a mile: by which bridge his armie came ouer the hauen, to assault the citie on that side also.

A notable fight betweene foure of the Christians ships, and the Turks fleet.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway ships laded with men and munition from the Island of CHIOS, with one of the emperours laded with corne from SICILIA, came with a faire wind for CONSTANTINOPLE. The Turks great fleet then lying not farre off, within the sight of the campe set vpon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turkes were slaine with shot, the gallies boorded the ships: but being much lower, were so far from doing any good, as that the Turks could not well looke out, but they were from aboue slaine or wounded. Mahomet from the shore beholding the vnequall fight, and slaughter of his men, cried out aloud, swearing and blaspheming God, and in great rage rid into the sea as farre as he durst; and comming backe againe, rent his clothes, faring with himselfe like a mad man. The whole armie of the Turkes beholding the same fight at sea, was filled with like indignation also, but could nothing remedie the matter. The great fleet ashamed in the sight of their king to bee ouercome of so few ships, did what they might desperately to enter: but all in vaine, being continually ouerwhelmed with shot and stones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Christian souldiours. At length wearie of their losse, they were glad with dishonour to fall off againe, and to get them farther off. The report of the losse the Turkes sustained in this fight, is almost incredible: some of the Turks fugitiues reported, almost ten thousand Turks to haue there perished: but certain it is, that such was the losse, as filled the whole armie with indignation & sorrow, many hauing there lost their kinsmen or friends. Three of these ships that had made this fight, arriued in safetie at CONSTANTINOPLE, the other was lost. Mahomet vpon this ouerthrow conceiued such displeasure against Pantogles his admirall, who in that fight had lost one of his eyes, that hee neuertheless thrust him out of his office, confiscated his goods, and was hardly by the great Bassaes entreated to spare his life.

Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the siege of CONSTANTINOPLE, and had thereunto giuen many great attempts, with more losse vnto himselfe than to the defendants, a rumour was raised in his campe, of great aid that was comming out of Italie by sea, and out of HVNGARIE by land, for the releefe of the besieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due consideration of the danger of the siege, filled the Turks campe with feare: so that the souldiors commonly murmured amongst themselues, saying, That to satisfie the ambitious humour of their young king, they were led to fight against impregnable wals and fortresses, yea against the barres of nature it selfe, without all reason. Whereupon Mahomet entered into consultation with the three great Bassaes his counsellors, Whether it were best for him to continue the siege, or not. When Caly Bassa, sometime his tutor, a man of greatest authoritie amongst the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall secretly fauouring the distressed emperour, after hee had with long and graue discourse declared the difficultie or rather impossibilitie of the wished successe in the present warre; and confirmed the same, by producing the examples of Bajazet his great grandfather, and of Amurath his father, who had both in vaine made proofe of their strength against that citie: at length concluded, that in his opinion it were best for him to raise his siege, and to depart before he had sustained any further losse or disgrace. But Zoganus the second Bassa, in great fauour also with Mahomet, and secretly enuying the greatnesse of Caly Bassa, persuaded ſtuaded the king to proceed in his honouble enterpriſe: aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof, and with all the reaſons he could deuiſe, impugned that which Caly-Baſſa had ſaid. And of the ſame opinion with Zoganus was alſo the third Baſſa, rather of purpoſe to croſſe Caly-Baſſa, and withall to fit the kings humour, than for any great hope he had in the good ſucceſſe of that hee ſo much deſired. Howbeit the ſpeech he and Zoganus deliuered, ſo well agreed with the kings affection, that he reſolued to continue the ſiege: and therevpon gaue full authoritie to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and generall aſſault to be giuen, reſoluing at once to gage all his forces vpon the winning of the city. Which charge Zoganus gladly took vpon him, & with his good liking appointed the 29 day of May for that generall aſſault, being then the Tueſday next following. In the meane time he ſent one Iſmael, the ſonne of Alexander prince of SINOPE, embaſſadour vnto the emperour, to offer him peace: but vpon ſuch hard conditions, as were no leſſe to be refuſed than death it ſelfe. Which thing he did, partly to ſatisfie the mindes of his Turks (who are for moſt part of opinion, that God will not proſper them in their aſſaults except they firſt make vnto their enemies ſome offer of peace, how vnreaſonable ſoeuer it forceth not) and partly to make proofe what confidence the enemie yet had in himſelfe, for the holding out of the ſiege. But that diſhonourable peace ſo offered, together with the intollerable conditions, was by the emperour honourably refuſed: who no leſſe feared the Turkes faith (if he ſhould haue accepted thereof) than he did the hardneſſe of the conditions. Three daies before this fatall aſſault was to be giuen, the Turks (according to their manner) kept their ſolemne faſt, eating nothing all the day vntill night; and then making the greateſt cheare and joy they could deuiſe, and in the winding vp of the ſame, tooke their leaue one of another, with ſuch kiſsing and embracing, as if they ſhould neuer haue met againe. At the ſame time Mahomet to encourage his ſouldiors, cauſed proclamation to be made through his campe, That he would freely giue all the ſpoile of the citie for three daies vnto his ſouldiors if they could win it: and for confirmation therof, ſolemnly ſwore the Turkes great oath, By the immortall God, and by the foure hundred prophets, by Mahomet, by his fathers ſoule, by his owne children, and by the ſword wherewith hee was girt, faithfully to performe whatſoeuer he had to them in his proclamation promiſed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Caly-Baſſa diſdaining that his counſaile was rejected, and the opinion of his aduerſaries followed: by ſecret letters aduertiſed the emperour of the day appointed for the generall aſſault, together with all the preparation made againſt him: perſuading him not to be afraid of them, who were themſelues no leſſe affraid of him; but carefully to prouide to haue all things in readineſſe for the defence of his citie, and valiantly to withſtand the raſh and laſt attempt of his enemies.

The citizens of Conſtantinople without cauſe murmure againſt the emperour.

This wofull emperour had alreadie done what he could to the vttermoſt of his power for defence of the citie, all the time of the ſiege: but ſuch was the diſloyaltie of the citizens his ſubjects, that many times they could hardly be drawne from their priuat trades and occupations vnto the wals to withſtand the enemie, fooliſhly affirming, That it was to no purpoſe for them to fight againſt the Turks at the breaches, and to ſtarue for food at home in their houſes. For which cauſe, the emperour commaunded a view to bee taken of all the corne in the citie (which then began to grow verie ſcarce;) but vpon diligent ſearch made, ſuch ſtore was found in many mens hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in to ſell afterwards at vnreaſonable priſes; or elſe ſo ſpatingly vttered, as if they had none to ſpare) as that it appeared, the dearth and ſcarſitie which then beganne to increaſe, to proceed rather of the couetouſneſſe of men, than of any true want of graine: this ſtore the emperour cauſed to bee proportionably diuided vnto euerie familie at reaſonable prices, according to their ſpending; and ſo eaſed the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercinarie ſouldiours alſo, regarding more their owne priuate profit than the publique ſeruice, refuſed any longer to goe to the wals than they were ſure of their dayly pay: which the poore emperour otherwiſe vnable to giue them, was glad to conuert the church plate and jewels into money, to content them. For he had many times before with teares, in vaine requeſted to haue borrowed monie of his couetous ſubjects, to haue been emploied in defence of the citie; but they would ſtill ſweare, that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade: which in few daies after, their enemies found in ſuch abundance, that they wondred at their wealth, and derided their folly, That poſſeſſing ſo much, they would beſtow ſo little, in defence of themſelues and their countrey. But this had been their vſuall maner of dealing with their emperours, in that declining ſtate of the empire:

pire: as well appeared in the time of the emperor Baldwin, who for lacke of monie was glad first to sell away many of the goodly ornaments of the citie, and afterwards to pawne his own sonne vnto the Venetian marchants, for monie to maintaine his state, as is in the former part of this Historie declared.

But to returne againe to the course of our Historie. The emperour certainely aduertised of the enemies purpose, for the generall assault shortly to be giuen, first commended the defence of himselfe and the citie vnto the protection of the almightie, by generall fasting and prayer: and afterwards appointed euerie captaine and commaunder, to some certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of Io. Iustinianus his Generall, in whose valor the Constantinopolitans had reposed their greatest hope.

But the cittie being on euerie side now beset with the Turkes great armie, and the defendants in number but few, for so great a citie, (in compasse eight miles) the wals could not but slenderly in many places be manned, and especially on both sides toward the sea, where indeed least danger was. The greatest strength and best souldiours, were placed for defence of the vtter wall, where the breach was, and the assault expected by land. Iustinianus the Generall himselfe, with three hundred Genowayes well armed, and certaine chosen Greekes, vndertooke the defence of that part of the battered wall, neere vnto the Romane gate, where the fall of the tower BACTATINA had filled the ditch, as is aforesaid: against which place Mahomet himselfe lay encamped, with his Ianizaries and best men of warre. Neere vnto Iustinianus lay the emperor himselfe, for defence of another part of the wall: and so other captaines orderly with their companies, all alongst the vtter wall. And because the defendants should haue no hope to saue their liues, more than their owne valour, the emperour caused all the gates of the inner wall to be fast shut vp. And in this sort they lay all the night, expecting continuallly when the assault should bee giuen: all which time they might heare great hurly burly and noise in the Turks campe, as they were putting things in readinesse for the assault.

A little before day, the Turks approached the walles, and begun the assault, where shot and stones were deliuered vpon them from the wals as thicke as haile; whereof little fell in vaine, by reason of the multitude of the Turkes, who pressing fast vnto the wals, could not see in the darke how to defend themselues, but were without number wounded or slaine: but these were of the common and worst souldiours, of whom the Turkish king made no more reckoning than to abate the first force of the defendants. Vpon the first appearance of the day, Mahomet gaue the signe appointed for the generall assault, wherupon the citie was in a moment and at one instant on euerie side most furiously assaulted by the Turks: for Mahomet, the more to distresse the defendants, and the better to see the forwardnesse of the souldiours, had before appointed which part of the cittie euerie colonell with his regiment should assaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrowes and shot vpon the defendants, so thicke, that the light of the day was therwith darkened: others in the mean time couragiously mounting the scaling ladders, and comming euen to handie stroakes with the defendants vpon the wall; where the formost were for most part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other side, the Christians with no lesse courage withstood the Turkish furie, beating them downe againe with great stones and waightie peeces of timber, and so ouerwhelmed them with shot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuises from aboue; that the Turkes dismaied with the terrour thereof, were readie to retire.

Mahomet renueth the assault.

Mahomet seeing the great slaughter and discomfiture of his men, sent in fresh supplies of his Ianizaries and best men of warre, whom hee had for that purpose reserued as his last hope and refuge: by whose comming on, his fainting souldiours were againe encouraged, and the terrible assault begun afresh. At which time, the barbarous king ceased not to vse all possible meanes to maintain the assault: by name calling vpon this and that captain, promising vnto some whom he saw forward, golden mountaines; and vnto others in whom he saw any signe of cowardise, threatning most terrible death: by which meanes the assault became most dreadfull, death there raging in the middest of many thousands. And albeit that the Turkes lay dead by heapes vpon the ground, yet other fresh men pressed on still in their places, ouer their dead bodies, and with diuers euent either slew, or were slaine by their enemies.

In this so terrible a conflict, it chanced Iustinianus the Generall to bee wounded in the arme: who losing much blood, cowardly withdrew himselfe from the place of his charge, not leauing any any to supplie his roome, and so got into the cittie by the gate called ROMANA, which hee had caused to be opened in the inner wall: pretending the cause of his departure to be for the binding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether discouraged.

The souldiors there present, dismayed with the departure of their Generall, and sore charged by the Ianizaries, forsooke their stations, and in hast fled to the same gate whereby Iustinianus was entered: with the sight whereof, the other souldiors dismayed, ran thither by heapes also. But whilest they violently striue, all together to get in at once, they so wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of so great a multitude, got in: in which so great a presse and confusion of minds, eight hundred persons were there by them that followed, troden vnderfoot or thrust to death. The emperor himselfe, for safegard of his life flying with the rest, in that presse as a man not regarded, miserably ended his dayes, together with the Greeke empire. His dead bodie was shortly after found by the Turkes amongst the slaine, and knowne by his rich apparrell; whose head being cut off, was forthwith presented to the Turkish tyrant: by whose commaundement it was afterward thrust vpon the point of a launce, and in great derision caried about as a trophee of his victorie, first in the campe, and afterwards vp and downe the citie.

The Turkes encouraged with the flight of the Christians, presently aduanced their ensignes vpon the top of the vttermost wall, crying victorie; and by the breach entred as if it had been a great floud, which hauing once found a breach in the banke, ouerfloweth, and beareth downe all before it: so the Turkes when they had woon the vtter wall, entred the citie by the same gate that was opened for Iustinianus, & by a breach which they had before made with their great artillerie; and without mercie cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further resistance became lords of that most famous and imperiall citie. Some few there were of the Christians, who preferring death before the Turkish slauerie, with their swords in their hands, sold their liues deere vnto their enemies: amongst whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Paleologus a Greeke, and Ioannus Stianus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deserue to be had in eternall remembrance: Who after they had like lyons, made slaughter of their enemies, died in the midst of them, embrued with their bloud, rather oppressed by multitude than by true valour ouercome. In this furie of the Barbarians, perished many thousands of men, women, and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition. Many for safegard of their liues, fled into the Temple of SOPHIA; where they were all without pittie slaine, except some few reserued by the barbarous victors, to purposes more grieuous than death it selfe. The rich and beautifull ornaments and jewels of that most sumptuous and magnificent Church (the stately building of Iustinianus the emperour) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt downe and carried away by the Turkes: and the Church it selfe built for God to be honored in, for the present conuerted into a stable for their horses, or a place for the execution of their abhominable and vnspeakable filthinesse: the Image of the crucifix was also by them taken downe, and a Turks cap put vpon the head thereof, and so set vp and shot at with their arrowes; and afterwards in great derision carried about in their campe, as it had been in procession, with drums playing before it, railing, and spitting at it, and calling it the god of the Christians. Which I note not so much done in contempt of the image, as in the despite of Christ and the Christian religion.

Constantinople woon by the Turkes.

But whilest some were thus spoyling of the churches, others were as busie in ransacking of priuat houses, where the miserable Christians were enforced to endure in their persons whatsoeuer pleased the insolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that stood with their lust, euerie common souldiour hauing power of life and death, at his pleasure to spare or spill. At which time riches were no better than pouertie; and beautie worse than deformitie. What tongue were able to expresse the miserie of that time? or the prowd insolencie of those barbarous conquerors? whereof so many thousands, euerie man with greedinesse fitted his owne vnreasonable desire: all which the poore Christians were enforced to endure. But to speake of the hidden treasure, money, plate, jewels, and other riches there found, passeth credit; the Turkes themselues wondred thereat, and were therewith so enriched, that it is a prouerb amongst them at this day, if any of them grow suddenly rich, to say, He hath been at the sacking of CONSTANTINOPLE: whereof if some reasonable part had in time been bestowed vpon defence of the cittie, the Turkish king had not so easily taken both it and the cittie. But euerie man was carefull how to encrease his owne priuat wealth, few or none regarding the publike state; vntill in fine,

euerie man with his priuat abundance was wrapped vp togither with his needie neighbour in the selfesame common miserie. Yea the securitie of the Constantinopolitans was such, that being alwaies enuironed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of so much as the inner wall of the citie (which for beautie and strength was comparable with the wals of any citie in the world, if it had been kept well repaired) but suffered the officers which had the charge to see to the fortifying of the citie, to conuert the greatest part of the money into their own purses: as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a verie poore man; and likewise by Neophitus, who then hauing that office to see vnto the fortification of the citie, had in short time gathered togither seuentie thousand florens, which became all a worthy prey vnto the greedie Turkes.

After that the barbarous common souldiour had thus by the space of three daies without controlment taken his pleasure in the citie (as Mahomet had before promised) and throughly ransackt euerie corner thereof: they then returned into the campe, with their rich spoils, driuing the poore Christian captiues before them as if they had ben droues of cattell, or flocks of sheepe: a spectacle no lesse lamentable, than was the sacking of the citie. It would haue grieued any stonie heart to haue seene the noble gentlewomen and great ladies, with their beautifull children, and many other faire personages, who lately flowed in all worldly wealth and pleasure, to bee now become the poore and miserable bondslaues of most base and contemptible rascals; who were so farre from shewing them any pittie, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more miserie vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of dogs. There might the parents see the wofull miserie of their beloued children, and the children of the parents, the husband might see the shamefull abuse of his wife, and the wife of her husband, and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the least part of heauie comfort) being in the thraldome of diuers cruell masters, by whom they were kept in sunder, like in few dayes to be dispersed into diuers farre countries, without hope that they should euer find releasse, or one see another againe.

The souldiors being all retired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerour, with great triumph entered into the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, then desolate and void of all Christian inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkish kings, made a sumptuous and royall feast vnto his Bassaes and other great captaines: where after he had surcharged himselfe with excesse of meat and drinke, he causèd diuers of the cheefe Christian captiues, both men and women (of whom many were of the late emperours line and race) to bee in his presence put to death, as hee with his Turks sat banquetting: deeming his feast much more stately by such effusion of Christian blood. Which manner of exceeding crueltie he daily vsed, vntill such time as he had destroyed all the Grecian nobilitie that was in his power, with the cheefe of the late Constantinopolitan citizens. At which time also diuers of the Venetian Senatours, with Baiulus their Gouernor, and many rich marchants of GENVA and other places of ITALIE were in like manner murthered: so that of seuen and fortie Senatours of VENICE which were there taken (whereof most part came thither by chaunce, bound for other places, but there vnluckily shut vp) some few found the fauour, with exceeding great ransomes to redeeme themselues.

Amongst these noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notaras, cõmonly called Kyr-Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great chancellor of CONSTANTINOPLE, a man of greatest account next vnto the emperour himselfe: whom the Turkish tyrant seemed greatly to blame, that hee being a man in so great credit with the late emperour, persuaded him not in time to haue sought for peace vpon any condition, or els to haue yeelded vp the citie, rather than to haue run that extreame course of wilfull miserie. Hee to excuse the matter, said, That the late emperor his master was encouraged to hold out the siege, by the Venetians and citizens of PERA, from whom he receiued secret aid: as also by some of the greatest men about his own person: for proofe whereof, hee drew out of his bosome the letters which Caly-Bassa had to that purpose written vnto the emperour, and deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping thereby to haue found some fauour. But when he had said what he could, the eldest of his sonnes then liuing (for he had lost two elder in the time of the siege) was cruelly executed before his face, and the youngest reserued for the tyrants lust: and after all this miserie had his owne head strucke off with the rest appointed for that daies sacrifice. Out of this generall calamitie escaped Io. Iustinianus the Generall, who with all speed fled at first to PERA, and from thence to CHIOS, where in few daies after after he died, of greefe of mind (as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happie if he had honourably before ended his dayes vpon the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE. Isodorus also the Cardinall and Legate from the Pope, disguised in simple apparrell, and being of the Turkes vnknowne, redeemed himselfe for a small ransome, as if he had been a man of no account, and so escaped: whom if Mahomet had knowne, he had vndoubtedly beene made shorter by the head.

The glorie of this famous citie of CONSTANTINOPLE continued many hundred yeares, commaunding a great part of the world, vntill that by ciuile discord and priuat gaine, it was by little and little so weakened, that the emperors of later times, for the maintenance of their estate, were glad to relie sometime vpon one, and sometime vpon another, yet still holding the title and state of an empire, by the space of 1121 yeares, when as (God his judgement set apart, wonderfull and shamefull it is to consider, how) it was by this Turkish king Mahomet so quickely taken, and the Christian empire of the East there vtterly ouerthrowne: which happened in the nine and twentieth day of May, in the yeare of our Lord 1453. Constantinus Paleologus, the sonne of Helena, and last Christian emperor, being then slaine, when he had raigned about eight years. Since which time it hath continued the imperiall seat of the Turkish emperours, and so remaineth at this day.

The potestats and cittizens of PERA, otherwise called GALATA, a cittie standing opposit against CONSTANTINOPLE, on the other side of the hauen, and then vnder the gouernment of the Genowayes, doubting to run the same course of miserie with their neighbors, sent their Orators vnto Mahomet (the same day that CONSTANTINOPLE was taken) offering to him the keyes of their gates, and so to become his subjects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and sent Zoganus with his regiment to take possession of the citie. Who comming thither, according to Mahomet his commandement, there established the Turkish gouernment, confiscated the goods of all such as were fled, and vsed the rest of the citizens which stayed, with such insolencie and oppression, as that their miserie was not much lesse than theirs of CONSTANTINOPLE. And because it was doubted, that the Genowayes might by sea giue aid vnto the cittizens, if they should at any time seeke to reuolt, he caused all the wals and fortresses of the citie which were toward the land, to bee cast downe and laied euen with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greeke empire run, and Mahomet in one day become lord of the two famous citties of CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA: the one taken by force, the other by composition. At which time the miserie of PERA was great, but that of CONSTANTINOPLE justly to bee accounted amongst the greatest calamities that euer happened to any Christian citie in the world.

Pera yeelded to the Turke.

Mahomet had of long time borne a secret grudge against Caly-Bassa, sometime his tutor, for that by his meanes Amurath his father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian warres, had againe resumed vnto himselfe the gouernment of the Turkish kingdome, which hee had before resigned vnto him, then but young. But for as much as hee was the cheefe Bassa, and had for many yeares ruled all things at his pleasure, to the generall good liking of the people, during the raigne of old Amurath, and was thereby growne to bee of such wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater vnder any of the Othoman kings: Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne, before hee was well established in his kingdome, durst not to take reuenge of that injurie (as hee deemed it) but yet still kept it in remembrance, warily dissembling his deepe conceiued hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Neuertheless sometime (for all his warinesse) words fell from him, whereby the warie courtiers (which as curiously weigh their princes words, as the cunning goldsmith dooth his finest gold) easily perceiued the secret grudge that stucke in his stomacke against the Bassa: and thereby deuined his fall to be at hand. So it happened one day that as Mahomet was walking in the court, he saw a fox of the Bassaes tied in a chaine, which after hee had a while earnestly looked vpon, hee suddainely brake into this speech: Alas poore beast, hast thou no money to giue thy master to set thee at libertie? out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the kings disposition towards the Bassa. This ominous surmising of the courtiers (which oftentimes proueth too true) was not vnknown vnto the Bassa himselfe, but troubled him much: wherefore to get himselfe out of the way for a season, more than for any deuotion, he tooke vpon him to goe in pilgrimage to visite the temple of the great prophet (as they tearme him) at MECHA, which amongst the Turkes is holden for a right religious and meritorious worke: hoping, that the young kings displeasure might in time be mittigated, and his mallice assuaged. But Mahomet perceiuing the distrust of the Bassa, and whereof it proceeded, ſeemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good words comforted him vp, willing him to be of good cheere, and not to miſdoubt any thing; neither to regard the vaine ſpeech of fooliſh people, aſſuring him of his vndoubted fauour: and the more to put him out of all ſuſpition, continually ſent him rich gifts, and heaped vpon him new honors, as if of all others he had eſteemed him moſt. Vntill that now at the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, it was diſcouered by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, and his letters produced. For which cauſe, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the tyrant bare againſt him, as alſo for his great wealth, he was by Mahomets commandement apprehended and carried in bonds to HADRIANOPLE: where after he had with exquiſite torments been enforced to confeſſe where all his treaſures lay, he was moſt cruelly in his extreame old age executed. After whoſe death, his friends and ſeruants (which were many, for he was a man greatly beloued in court) in token of their griefe put on mourning apparell: ſo that in the court appeared a great ſhew of common ſorrow; wherewith Mahomet being offended, cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch as did weare ſuch mourning apparell, ſhould the next day appeare before him: at which time there was not one to be ſeene about the court in that heauie attire, for feare of the tyrants diſpleaſure.

Mahomet placeth his imperiall ſeat at Conſtantinople, and is worthely accounted firſt Emperor of the Turks.

After that Mahomet was thus become lord of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, as is aforeſaid; and had fully reſolued there to place his imperiall ſeat: he firſt repaired the wals and other buildings ſpoiled in the late ſiege, and by proclamations ſent forth into all parts of his dominions, gaue great priuiledges and immunities to all ſuch as ſhould come to dwel at CONSTANTINOPLE, with free libertie to exerciſe what religion or trade they pleaſed. Whereby in ſhort time that great and deſolat citie was againe well peopled, with ſuch as out of diuers countries reſorted thither: but eſpecially with the Iewiſh nation, which driuen out of other places, came thither in great numbers, and were of the Turkes gladly receiued. So when he had there eſtabliſhed all things according to his hearts deſire, he tooke vpon him the name and title of an Emperour: and is from that time not vnworthely reputed for the firſt emperour of the Turks.

Now amongſt many fair virgins taken priſoners by the Turks at the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE, was one Irene a Greek borne, of ſuch incomparable beautie and rare perfection, both of body & mind, as if nature had in her to the admiration of the world, laboured to haue ſhowne her greateſt skill; ſo prodigally ſhe had beſtowed vpon her, all the graces that might beautifie or commend that hir ſo curious a worke. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, preſented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe, as a jewell ſo fit for no mans wearing as his owne: by the beautie and ſecret vertues whereof, he found himſelfe euen vpon the firſt view not a little moued. Neuertheleſſe, hauing as then his head full of troubles, and aboue all things carefull for the aſſuring of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, by him but euen then woon; he for the preſent committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and ſent her away, ſo to be in ſafetie kept vntill his better leiſure. But thoſe his troubles ouerblowne, and his new conqueſts well aſſured, he then began forthwith to thinke of the faire Irene: and for his pleaſure ſending for her, tooke in her perfections ſuch delight and contentment, as that in ſhort time he had changed ſtate with her, ſhe being become the miſtreſſe and commander of him ſo great a conqueror; and he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greateſt honour and ſeruice he could. All the day he ſpent with her in diſcourſe, and the night in daliance: all time ſpent in her companie, ſeemed vnto him ſhort; and without her nothing pleaſed: his fierce nature was now by her well tamed, and his wonted care of armes quite neglected: Mars ſlept in Venus lap, and now the ſoldiors might go play. Yea the verie gouernment of his eſtate and empire ſeemed to be of him, in compariſon of her, little or not at all regarded; the care thereof being by him careleſly committed to others, that ſo he might himſelfe wholy attend vpon her, in whom more than in himſelfe, the people ſaid he delighted. Such is the power of diſordered affections, where reaſon ruleth not the reine. But whileſt he thus forgetfull of himſelfe, ſpendeth in pleaſure not ſome few daies or moneths, but euen a whole yeare or two, to the lightning of his credit, and the great diſcontentment of his ſubjects in generall: the Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the court (men deſirous of imploiment, and grieued to ſee him ſo giuen ouer vnto his affections, & to make no end thereof) began at firſt in ſecret to murmur thereat, and to ſpeake hardly of him; and at length (after their inſolent manner) ſpared not openly to ſay, That it were well done to depriue him of his gouernment and ſtate, as vnworthy thereof, and to ſet vp one of his ſonnes in his ſteed. Which

ſpeeches were now growne ſo rife, and the diſcontentment of the men of warre ſo great, that it was not without cauſe by ſome of the great Baſſaes feared, whereunto this their ſo great inſolencie would grow. But who ſhould tell the tyrant thereof; whoſe frowne was in it ſelfe death? or who durſt take in hand to cure that his ſicke mind? which diſtraught with the ſweet, but poyſoned potions of loue, was not like to liſten to any good counſell, were it neuer ſo wiſely giuen: but as a man metamorphoſed, to turne his furie vpon him which ſhould preſume ſo wholeſomely (but contrarie to his good liking) to aduiſe him. Vnhappie man, whoſe great eſtate and fierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in ſo great a perill to haue beene thereof moſt carefull; but were now for feare all become ſilent and dumbe. Now amongſt other great men in the Court, was one Muſtapha Baſſa, a man for his good ſeruice (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet greatly fauoured, and by him alſo highly promoted; and he againe by him as his Soueraigne no leſſe honored than feared: who no leſſe than the reſt, greeued to ſee ſo great a change in the great Sultan, of whom they had conceiued no ſmall hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and mooued alſo with the danger threatened vnto him by the diſcontented Ianizaries and men of warre: eſpying him at conuenient leiſure to be ſpoken vnto, and preſuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to breake with him, and to giue him warning thereof.

How dangerous a thing it is for a ſubiect or vaſſale, without leaue, preſumptuouſly to enter into the ſecrets of his dread Lord and Soueraigne, the wofull examples of others (moſt mightie Mahomet) haue ſo ſufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutifull loyaltie I ow vnto your greatneſſe, far dearer vnto me than mine owne life, I would not at this time aduenture my ſelfe vnto the hazard of your doubtfull acceptance of my faithfull ſpeech and meaning; but with others keepe ſilence, and in ſecret mourne together with my heauie thoughts: which if I ſhould in ſo great a danger both of your life and empire now doe, without warning you thereof, I were not to be accounted vnworthie onely thoſe your great fauours and honours, moſt bountifully on me beſtowed; but as a moſt vile traitor both vnto your ſtate and perſon, to be of all men deteſted and abhorred. The life you haue of late led, euer ſince the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, as a man careleſſe of his ſtate, and wholly wedded vnto his owne pleaſure, hath giuen occaſion not vnto the vulgar people onely (alwayes readie to ſay the worſt) and ſoldiors of the Court, the guarders of your perſon, but euen vnto the greateſt commaunders of your armies and empire, to murmure and grudge, I dare not ſay, to conſpire againſt you. Yet pardon me dread Soueraigne, if I ſhould ſo ſay, for that there is no man which with great diſcontentment maruelleth not much to ſee ſo great an alteration in your heroicall diſpoſition and nature: whereby you are become far vnlike that noble Mahomet, which hauing ouerthrowne the Greeke empire, and taken the great citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, promiſed both vnto himſelfe and others, the conqueſt of ITALIE, and the ſacking of ROME, the ſtately ſeat of the antient Romane conquerours. You haue giuen your ſelfe ouer (as they ſay) for a ſpoile and prey vnto a poore ſimple woman, your ſlaue and vaſſale, who with her beautie and allurements hath ſo bewitched your vnderſtanding and reaſon, as that you can attend nothing but her ſeruice, and the ſatisfying of your moſt paſſionate and inordinate deſires; which how much the more you cheriſh them, ſo much the more they torment and vexe you. Enter but a little into your ſelfe (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with the like time heretofore by you ſpent in treading honors ſteps, and you ſhall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the firſt raiſer of your houſe and familie, ſo giuen himſelfe ouer vnto pleaſure, you had not now inherited the countries of BITHYNIA and GALATIA, with others moe alongſt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his ſonne Orchanes (the liuely image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed ouer LICAONIA, PHRIGIA, and CARIA, or extended the bounds of his empire ſo farre as vnto the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS. What ſhould I ſpeake of Amurath his ſonne and ſucceſſour in the empire, who in perſon himſelfe, firſt of the Othoman kings, paſſed ouer into EVROPE, placed his imperiall ſeat at HADRIANOPLE, conquered THRACIA, BVLGARIA, and RASCIA. Yea Baiazet your great grandfather is in his misfortune to bee more than you commended, as vanquiſhed in field by the mightie Tamerlane with foure hundred thouſand horſemen and ſix hundred thouſand foot, and not by a ſilie woman: comforting his miſhap with the honour and greatneſſe of him by whom he was ſo ouercome. Neither may I with ſilence paſſe ouer your woorthie grandfather the noble Mahomet, who not contented to haue reſtored the ſhaken empire, conquered alſo a great part of MACEDONIA, euen to the Ionian ſea, and carying the terror of his armes ouer into

ASIA did great matters againſt the Caramanians and others. As for your father Amurath (of worthie memorie) I cannot but to my great greefe and ſorrow ſpeake of him, who by the ſpace of thirtie yeares made both the ſea and earth to quake vnder his feet, and with ſtrong hand more than once vanquiſhed the Hungarians, & brought vnder his ſubiection the countries of PHOCIS, BEOTIA, ÆTOLIA, with a great part of MOREA; and to ſpeake of him truly, brake euen the very heart & ſtrength of the Grecians, and other his fierce enemies. Let all theſe moſt famous conqueſts of your noble progenitors, whoſe worthie praiſes (as eternall trophees of their honour) are diſperſed into euery corner of the world, awake you out of this heauie Lythargie wherein you haue too long ſlept, yea, let the remembrance of the conqueſt of this imperiall citie by you to your immortall glorie woon, ſtir you vp to greater things: and let it neuer bee ſaid of you, That you were able with your ſword to ouercome your greateſt enemies, and not with reaſon to ſubdue your inordinate affections: Thinke that your greateſt conqueſt, and ſuffer not your ſelfe, ſo great a conquerour, to be led in triumph by your ſlaue. What auaileth it you to haue woon CONSTANTINOPLE, and to haue loſt your ſelfe? Shake off theſe golden fetters wherein the wilie Greeke hath ſo faſt bound you: which at the firſt though it ſeeme vnto you hard and painefull, yet ſhall time diſgeſt it, and make you to thinke it both good and neceſſarie for your eſtate. Weane your ſelfe from your deſires, and giue reſt vnto your troubled thoughts: which if you cannot doe at once, ſtriue by little and little to doe it: pleaſure groweth greater by the ſeldome vſe thereof, and ſatietie bringeth loathſomeneſſe. Moderat your ſelfe therefore, and againe take vp armes. Your ſoldiors if they be not employed abroad, will to your farther trouble ſet themſelues to worke at home: Idleneſſe maketh them inſolent, and want of martiall diſcipline corrupteth their manners. Hereof proceedeth their intemperat and diſloyall ſpeeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the honour and enlarging of the Othoman empire, as did all your moſt noble progenitors, they will ſet vp another that ſhall, euen one of your owne children. And what the common ſouldior fooliſhly ſayth, their great commaunders malitiouſly purpoſe: which what a confuſion it would bring vnto the whole ſtate of your empire, together with the danger of your royall perſon, I abhorre to thinke. Wherefore it is time, it is now high time for you to ſhew your ſelfe, and with the maieſtie of your preſence to repreſſe their tumultuous inſolencie, before it breake farther out. Rebellions are by far, more eaſily preuented, than in their heat appeaſed. The diſcontented multitude is a wild beaſt with many heads; which once enraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed: yet doe you but ſhew your ſelfe maſter of your owne affections, and you ſhall eaſily maſter them alſo. But what is fit for you to doe, beſeemeth me not for to ſay: yes pardon me, I beſeech you, that I haue thus much (contrarie perhaps to your good liking) alreadie ſaid; I prouoked (by what diuine inſpiration I know not) euen halfe againſt my will, to diſcouer vnto you the ſecret of my heart, and to lay open vnto you thoſe things, which others knowing as well as I, doe yet for feare keepe the ſame from you. And if I haue gone too farre, or in any thing that I haue ſaid, forgot my ſelfe, impute the ſame (my dread Soueraigne) vnto the Zeale of my loue and loyaltie towards you, or vnto my fidelitie ſo often by you tried, or to our antient education (the ground of your affection towards me) or to what els ſhall pleaſe you, rather than to my preſumption; from which, how farre I haue alwayes been, I appeale euen to your maieſties owne knowledge.

Hauing thus ſaid, he fell downe at his feet, as there to receiue the heauie doome of his ſo free ſpeech, if it ſhould bee otherwiſe than well taken of the angrie Sultan: who all this while with great attention and many a ſterne looke had hearkened vnto all that the Baſſa had ſaid: for well he knew it to be all true; and that in ſo ſaying, he had but diſcharged the part of a truſtie & faithfull ſeruant, carefull of his maſters honour. But yet the beautie of the Greeke was ſtill ſo fixed in his heart, and the pleaſure he tooke in her, ſo great, as that to thinke of the leauing of her, bred in him many a troubled thought. Hee was at warre with himſelfe, as in his often changed countenance well appeared: reaſon calling vpon him, for his honour; and his amorous affections, ſtill ſuggeſting vnto him new delights. Thus toſſed too and fro (as a ſhip with contrarie winds) and withall conſidering the danger threatened to his eſtate if he ſhould longer follow thoſe his pleaſures, ſo much diſpleaſing vnto his men of warre, hee reſolued vpon a ſtrange point, whereby at once to cut off all thoſe his troubled paſsions; and withall, to ſtrike a terrour euen into the ſtouteſt of them that had before condemned him, as vnable to gouerne his owne ſo paſsionate affections. Whereupon with countenance well declaring his inward diſcontentment, hee ſaid vnto the Baſſa, yet proſtrate at his feet:

Although thou haſt vnreuerently ſpoken, as a ſlaue preſuming to enter into the greateſt ſecrets of thy thy ſouereigne (not without offence to be of thee once thought vpon) and therefore deſerueſt well to die; yet for that thou waſt of a child brought vp togither with me, and haſt euer been vnto me faithfull, I for this time pardon thee: and before to morrow the ſunne go downe, will make it knowne both to thee, and others of the ſame opinion with thee, whether I be able to bridle mine affections or not. Take order in the meane time that all the Baſſaes, and the chiefe commanders of my men of warre be aſſembled togither to morrow, there to know my farther pleaſure; whereof faile you not.

So the Baſſa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in vnto the Greeke, and ſolacing himſelfe all that day and the night following with her, made more of her than euer before: and the more to pleaſe her, dined with her; commanding, that after dinner ſhe ſhould be attired with more ſumptuous apparell than euer ſhe had before worne: and for the further gracing of her, to be deckt with many moſt precious jewels of ineſtimable valour. Whereunto the poore ſoule gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her funerall apparell. Now in the meane while, Muſtapha (altogither ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as he was commanded, cauſed all the nobilitie, and commanders of the men of warre, to be aſſembled into the great hall: euerie man much marueiling, what ſhould be the emperors meaning therein, who had not of long ſo publikely ſhewed himſelfe. But being thus togither aſſembled, and euerie man according as their minds gaue them, talking diuerſly of the matter: behold, the Sultan entred into the pallace leading the faire Greeke by the hand; who beſide her incomparable beautie and other the greateſt graces of nature, adorned alſo with all that curioſitie could deuiſe, ſeemed not now to the beholders a mortal wight, but ſome of the ſtately goddeſſes, whom the Poets in their extacies deſcribe. Thus comming togither into the midſt of the hall, and due reuerence vnto them done by al them there preſent; he ſtood ſtill with the faire lady in his left hand, and ſo furiouſly looking round about him, ſaid vnto them: I vnderſtand of your great diſcontentment, and that you all murmur and grudge, for that I, ouercome with mine affection towards this ſo faire a paragon, cannot withdraw my ſelfe from her preſence: But I would faine know which of you there is ſo temperat, that if he had in his poſſeſſion a thing ſo rare and precious, ſo louely and ſo faire, would not be thrice aduiſed before he would forgo the ſame? Say what you thinke: in the word of a Prince I giue you free libertie ſo to doe. But they all rapt with an incredible admiration to ſee ſo faire a thing, the like whereof they had neuer before beheld, ſaid all with one conſent, That he had with greater reaſon ſo paſſed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therewith. Whereunto the barbarous prince anſwered: Well, but now I will make you to vnderſtand how far you haue been deceiued in me, and that there is no earthly thing that can ſo much blind my ſences, or bereaue me of reaſon as not to ſee and vnderſtand what beſeemeth my high place and calling: yea I would you ſhould all know, that the honor and conqueſts of the Othoman kings my noble progenitors, is ſo fixed in my breſt, with ſuch a deſire in my ſelfe to exceed the ſame, as that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And hauing ſo ſaid, preſently with one of his hands catching the faire Greeke by the haire of the head, and drawing his falchion with the other, at one blow ſtrucke off her head, to the great terror of them all. And hauing ſo done, ſaid vnto them: Now by this iudge whether your emperour is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to diſcharge the reſt of his choller, cauſed great preparation to be made for the conqueſt of PELOPONESVS, and the beſieging of BELGRADE.

At the ſame time that the barbarous Turkes tooke the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE; Thomas and Demetrius Paleologi, brethren to the late vnfortunat emperour Conſtantinus, gouerned a great part of PELOPONESVS, one of the moſt famous prouinces of GRÆCIA: which in forme of a leafe of a Plane tree, is almoſt in manner of an Iland, enuironed with the ſeas Ionium and Ægeum, which running farre into the land on either ſide thereof, ſeparateth the ſame from the reſt of GRÆCIA, by two great bayes, leauing but a ſtraight necke of land, called of the Greeks ISTMOS, in breadth about fiue miles, which was ſometime by the Græcians, and afterward by the Venetians, fortified by a ſtrong wall, and fiue great caſtles: neare vnto which place ſtood the great and famous citie of CORINTH. This prouince is in length 175 miles, and almoſt as much in breadths; wherin are contained the countries of ACHAIA, MESSENIA, LACEDEMONIA, ARGOLICA, and ARCHADIA; with many famous cities and goodly hauens, wherein it far exceedeth all the other prouinces of GRÆCIA. Theſe two princes Thomas and Demetrius, diſmaied with their brothers diſaſter fortune, began now ſo farre to diſpaire of their own eſtate, that vpon the firſt brute thereof, they were about preſently to haue fled by ſea into ITALY. And as it commonly falleth out, That one euill happeneth not alone; ſo at the ſame time it fortuned, that the Albanians rise in armes against the said two princes their soueraigns: and vnder the leading of their rebellious captaine Emanuel Catecuzenus, grieuously troubled both the poore princes. These Albanians were a rough and hardie kind of people, which liuing after the manner of the rude Scythian heardsmen, by feeding of cattell, had of long time planted themselues in PELOPONESVS; differing from the naturall Greekes, both in the manner of their liuing and language: which diuersitie was no small cause that they oftentimes spurned, as now, against the gouernment of the Græcian princes. In this extremitie, the two distressed princes (not well knowing which 1454 way to turne themselues) sought for peace at Mahomets hands, offering to become his tributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full conquest of that countrey; and sent Turachan gouernour of THESSALIA, one of his greatest men of warre, with an army into PELOPONESVS, to aid those princes against the Albanians: by whose industrie the masterfull rebels were in short time discomfited, and the countrey of PELOPONESVS quieted; yet so, that it was now become tributarie to the Turkish king.

These two princes Demetrius and Thomas, the last of all the Christian princes that raigned in PELOPONESVS, hauing thus lost their libertie, liued for a few yeares as the Turkes vassales; paying such yearely tribute as they had before promised. During which time, many displeasures arose betwixt the two brothers, being both jealous of their estate, and desirous by all plausible meanes to win the hearts of their subjects one from another: whereby it came so to passe, that whiles they both desired to become popular, they weakned their owne credit, and had not their subjects at such commaund as best stood with the safetie of their estate. Neuertheless as soon as they vnderstood that the Christian princes of the West were making great preparation against the Turke; and that Calixtus the third of that name (then the bishop of ROME) had already put a fleet of gallies to sea, which did great spoile vpon the bordets of the Turkes dominions; they vainly persuading themselues that the Turkes would in short time be againe driuen out of GRECIA, refused to pay any more tribute vnto the Turkish king, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occasion, Mahomet with a puissant army came downe and first besieged CORINTH, and afterwards entring into PELOPONESVS tooke diuers strong townes, and destroied the countrey before him: and forced the two princes for safegard of their liues to flie, the one to MANTINIA, and the other into the strong cittie of EPIDAVRVS, now called RAGVSIVM. The poore princes destitute of such aid as they expected, and altogither vnable to withstand the power of the mightie tyrant, began againe to sue for peace: which he, hauing now spoiled their countrey, granted vpon condition, That all such places as he had already taken, should be still his owne; and also that the citie of PATRAS with the countrey adjoyning, should be deliuered vnto him; and that for the rest, the said princes should pay vnto him a yearly tribute: which hard conditions the poore princes, now in danger to loose all, were glad to accept of: whereupon a peace was for that time againe concluded.

Thomas and Demetrius rebell against Mahomet, and are by him spoiled of part of their dominion.

In his returne he tooke the citie of ATHENS in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciauoli by composition (by meanes of Omares the sonne of Turachan, one of his great captains) promising to giue him the countrey of BEOTIA with the citie of THEBES in lieu thereof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius, sometime prince of ATHENS, and had of long time been brought vp in the Turks court, as one of Mahomet his minions; and was of him (as was supposed) entirely beloued. But when he had receiued the dukedome of THEBES, in exchange for his princely state of ATHENS, he was shortly after, as if it had been in great friendship sent by Mahomet to Zoganus, his lieutenant in PELOPONESVS: by whom he was at first courteously entertained, but afterwards being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) suddenly staied, and when he least feared, cruelly murdred.

About three yeares after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet and the two brethren, Mahomet vnderstanding that the Christian kings and princes had combined themselues against him, with a purpose to driue him againe out of GRÆCIA: thought it now high time, and much for the assurance of his estate, to roote vp the small reliques of the Grecian empire, which yet remained in PELOPONESVS in the two princes of the imperiall bloud, Thomas and Demetrius: whereunto he saw a faire occasion presented. For asmuch as those two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themselues, neither paied him such tribute as they had before promised: hereupon he with a great and strong army came to CORINTH, where Arsanes a noble man of great authoritie and power in that countrey, whose sister Demetrius had married, came vnto him from

from the prince his brother in law, attended vpon with many gallant gentlemen, his followers, of purpose to aid him against the other prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harme to haue been by the Turke intended against himselfe or his brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned of as of a friend. But when Mahomet was entered into PELOPONESVS, and come to TEGEA, he caused the same Asanes, with all his cheefe followers, to be laied hold vpon, and cast into bonds: knowing (as it should seeme) no man for friend, which might any way hinder his ambitious designes.

Demetrius hearing what was happened vnto Asanes, fled to SPARTA, now called MIZITHRA: whether Mahomet in few dayes after came and laied siege to the citie. But the poor prince considering, that he must needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the cittie, and humbly submitted himselfe with all that he had into his power. Which so well pleased the Turkish tyrant, that hee courteously receiued him, comforted him, and promised him in stead of SPARTA to giue him other lands and possessions of like value elsewhere: Neuertheless, hee committed him to safe custodie, and carried him about with him as his prisoner, vntill hee had finished those warres. After he had taken SPARTA, he besieged CASTRIA, where he lost diuers of his Ianizaries: for which cause, when he had taken the citie, he put all the souldiours therein to the sword, and cut the captaines ouerthwart in two peeces. From thence he marched to LEONTARIVM, called in antient time MEGALOPOLIS, which he tooke; with another cittie called CARDICEA, whither they of LEONTARIVM had before conueyed their wiues and children, as to a place of more safetie. There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of those cities, men, women, and children, in number about six thousand, of whom he left not one aliue: and yet not so satisfied, commaunded the very beasts and cattell of those places to bee killed. Many cities of PELOPONESVS terrified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours, forthwith yeelded themselues: and amongst others SALVARIVM, a great and strong citie of ARCHADIA; where hee caused all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the number of ten thousand, to be cast into bonds, looking for nothing but present death: all which he commaunded afterwards to be sent captiues to CONSTANTINOPLE, and with them peopled the suburbes of that citie. After that, he by the counsell of Demetrius, sent one of his captaines called Iosua, with certaine companies of Greeke souldiors, vnto the strong citie of EPIDAVRVS, to commaund them in the name of the prince, to deliuer vnto him the citie, with the prince his wife and daughter, which lay there. But the Gouernour trusting vnto the strength of the citie, refused to deliuer the same: yet suffred the princesse with her daughter to depart out of the citie, being willing to goe to her husband; whom the captaine hauing receiued, returned, and presented them to Mahomet. By whose commaundement they were presently sent into BEOTIA, there to attend his returne towards CONSTANTINOPLE, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the young ladie, who had so warmed Mahomets affection, that he tooke her afterwards to his wife. At the same time hee also subdued the most part of ACHAIA and ELIS, by Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant: whether hee came not long after himselfe, and laied siege to the citie of SALMENICA, which for lacke of water was at length yeelded vnto him: but the castle was by the space of a whole yeare after valiantly defended against the Turks left to besiege it, by Thomas the prince: of whom Mahomet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the great countrey of PELOPONESVS hee had found many slaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant prince seeing the miserable ruine of his countrey, and the state thereof vtterly forlorne, after he had most notably endured a yeares siege in the castle of SALMENICA, got to sea, and so arriued in ITALIE: where trauelling to ROME, hee was honourably receiued by Pius Secundus, then bishop there: who during his life, allowed him a large pension for the maintenance of his state. Thus Mahomet hauing thrust both the Grecian princes out of their dominions, and subdued all PELOPONESVS (excepting such strong townes and castles, as bordering vpon the sea coast were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant to gouerne that new conquered prouince, and with great triumph returned himselfe towards CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him Demetrius the prince, with his wife and daughter, and many other noble prisoners. But after he was come to HADRIANOPLE, and placed in his royall seat, he remooued the Eunuch from the faire young ladie, and tooke charge of her himselfe. As for Demetrius her father, hee gaue to him the cittie ÆNVM, with the custome arising of the salt there made, as a pension for him to liue vpon. Thus this most famous and populous countrey of PELOPONESVS fell into the Turkish thraldome, about the yeare of our Lord 1460, seuen years after

after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE. Which I haue here togither set downe, as it is reported by them who liued in that time, and in the same countries: omitting of purpose other great occurrents of the same time (which shall also in conuenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great Empire, with the common miserie of the delicate Græcians, might appeare vnder one view; which otherwise being deliuered by peecemeale, as it did concurre with other great accidents according to the course of time, would but breed confusion, and require the Readers greater attention.

The Christian princes, especially such as bordered vpon the dominions of the Turkish tyrant, were no lesse terrified than troubled with the subuersion of the Constantinopolitane empire: for they saw by the continuall preparation of the Turk, that his ambitious desires were rather encreased, than in any part satisfied with his so great and late victories. Wherefore they with all carefulnesse fortified their frontier towns, and prouided all things necessarie for defence of themselues, and for the repulsing of so mightie an enemy. Amongst the rest, George the old Despot, or prince of SERVIA (whose dominions of all others lay most in danger of that tempest) speedily mustred his men of warre, fortified his strong cities, placed his garrisons, and left nothing vndone, that he thought needfull for the defence of his countrey: for he had many times before to his great losse, endured the furie of the Turkish kings, although he were joyned vnto them in the bonds of neerest allyance. And hauing thus politikely set all things in order at home, in person himselfe tooke his journey into HVNGARIE, from thence to procure aid against such time as he should haue need. But the Hungarians, and especially Huniades (who at that time bare greatest sway in that kingdome) hauing before had sufficient triall of the vncertainty and light faith of that aged prince, who had so often fashioned himselfe according to the occurrents of the time, that he was accounted neither right Turke, nor good Christian; refused to promise him any aid, but left him to his owne fortunes: wherewith he returned discontented, and full of indignation. But shortly after he was come home, he died of an hurt receiued in a skirmish with Michaell Zilugo, gouernor of BELGRADE: whose brother Ladislaus he had but a little before trecherously murdred, as he was trauailing by wagon to BELGRADE with his said brother Michael, who at the same time hardly escaped. This was the end of George Despot of SERVIA, when he had liued nintie yeares: in which time of his long life, he had plentifully tasted of both fortunes. A man assuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous vnquiet nature: by profession a Christian, yet a great friend vnto the Turkes, whom he many times stood in great steed: a deepe dissembler, and double in all his dealings; whereby he purchased vnto himselfe that credit, that he was not of any his neighbour princes whilest he liued, either beloued or trusted; and after his death, of his subiects so detested, that the people of that countrey euen at this day in their countrey songs, still tearme him, The faithlesse and graceless Despot. Lazarus his youngest son, after his death succeeded in his place; hauing depriued both his elder brethren (Stephen and George) of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkish king had long time before put out their eies, of purpose to make them vnfit for the gouernment of so great a countrey: yet these blind princes found meanes to flie away from him to Mahomet, carrying with them a great masse of money; and so incited him against Lazarus their younger brother, that to keepe friendship with the tyrant, he was glad to promise vnto him a great yearely tribute, and so to become his tributarie. But within few moneths after, Lazarus died, the last Christian prince that raigned in SERVIA: after whose death, great troubles arose in SERVIA for the soueraignte: The blind brethren still crauing aid of Mahomet, with whom they then liued; and the desolate widow of Lazarus, putting her selfe with her three sons, Iohn, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians: by which means she with much trouble held her state for a season. Vntill such time as that the Seruians, seeing small assurance in that manner of gouernment, and wearie of the harmes they daily receiued of the Turkes; yeelded themselues with their countrey, vnto the obedience of the Turkish emperour Mahomet, who for euer vnited the same vnto his empire as a prouince thereof, and so it remaineth at this day.

The death of George, Despot of Servia.

Servia yeelded to the Turke.

Now was Mahomet by the continuall course of his victories, growne to that height of mind, that he thought no prince able to abide his forces; neither any enterprise so great, which he was not of power to bring to passe: wherefore he ceased not on euerie side continually to vex and trouble the princes, whose countries bordered vpon his. But aboue others, his heart was greatest against the Hungarians: for that by them the Turkish kings his auncestors, had been more troubled, and their state more endangered, than by any or all other the Christian princes. Wherefore fore he reſolued now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his raign greatly deſired. And becauſe the citie of BELGRADE ſtanding vpon the great riuer of Danubius, was accounted the key of that countrey, he determined there to begin his warres, and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of HVNGARIE. Hereupon he leuied a great armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand of his beſt ſouldiours; in whom he repoſed ſuch an aſſured truſt and confidence, that he accounted the citie already as good as taken, and a faire way made into HVNGARIE: ſo ready are we to promiſe vnto our ſelues, the things we earneſtly deſire. For the better accompliſhment of theſe his deſigns, he had prouided in readineſſe a fleet of 200 ſhips and gallies, which he ſent vp the riuer of Danubius from VIDINA to BELGRADE, to the intent that no reliefe or aid ſhould be brought vnto the citie out of HVNGARIE, by the great riuers of Danubius and Sauus, whereupon the citie of BELGRADE ſtandeth. With this fleet he kept both thoſe riuers ſo ſtraitly, that nothing could poſsibly be conuaied into the citie by water: and not ſo contented, ſent part of his ſaid fleet farther vp the riuer of Danubius, and ſo landing his ſouldiours in many places, ſpoiled the countrey all alongſt the riuers ſide. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, and encamped before the citie: whereunto at his firſt comming he gaue a moſt fierce aſſault, thinking to haue taken them vnprouided: but finding greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined, and that the Hungarians were ready to skirmiſh with them without the wals, he begun to proceed more warily, and entrenched his army: and to prouide for the ſafetie therof, by caſting vp of deep trenches & ſtrong rampiers, againſt the ſudden ſallies of his enemies: and after, planting his batterie, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals with his great artillerie. By the furie whereof, he ouerthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great induſtrie and labour ſpeedily repaired, by caſting vp of new fortifications and rampiers, in ſuch ſort, that it was rather ſtronger than before.

Belgrade beſieged.

In the meane time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a moſt worthy captaine) being then Generall for the Hungarians, ſent a fleet of ſhips and gallies, wel appointed with all warlike prouiſion, downe the riuer of Danubius from BVDA: which encountring with the Turkes fleet, tooke twentie ſaile of them, and ſo diſcomfited the reſt, that they were glad to run themſelues on ground neere vnto the kings campe. All which were by Mahomets commandement preſently ſet on fire, becauſe they ſhould not come into the power of the Hungarians. By this meanes the Chriſtians became maſters of both the riuers of Danubius and Sauus; and ſo at their pleaſure, by water conuaied into the citie all things needfull for the defence thereof. Huniades alſo himſelfe, with fiue thouſand valiant ſouldiours, and Io. Capiſtranus a Minorite frier (by whoſe perſuaſion fortie thouſand voluntarie Chriſtians out of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, and HVNGARIE were come to that warre) entred into the citie that way with their ſouldiours and followers.

The Turks fleet ouerthrown by the Chriſtians.

Mahomet reſolutely ſet down for the winning of the citie, had with continuall batterie made the ſame at length ſaultable; and ſo determined the next day to giue a generall aſſault, appointing which part of the wall euerie Colonell with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. But as they were with great diligence and greater ſtirre, preparing all things needfull for the next daies ſeruice: it fortuned, that Carazies Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant generall in EVROPE, and his beſt man of warre, was by chance ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the towne. With whoſe death, Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the euill which afterwards enſued vnto him and his whole army. For all that, proſecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the aſſault to be giuen: and with the dreadful ſound of trumpets, drums, cornets, and other inſtruments of warre, brought on his Ianizaries to the breach; who as couragious ſouldiours fiercely aſſailed the ſame, and without any great reſiſtance, entred both there and in diuers other places of the citie; reckoning the ſame, to be now their owne. For Huniades hauing before ſtored euerie corner of the citie with his moſt valiant and expert ſouldiours, had taken order that the defendants, vpon the firſt charge of the Ianizaries, ſhould forſake their ſtations, and as men diſcouraged, retire towards the citie: of purpoſe to draw the fierce enemies faſter on, to their farther deſtruction; and vpon a ſigne giuen to ſet vpon them on freſh, and to repaire vnto their former places of defence. Which was accordingly done: ſo that as ſoone as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turkes moſt forward ſouldiors, were in great numbers entered, vpon the retiring of the defendants, and the ſigne before appointed in the citie giuen, the defendants, as men ſuddenly changed, turning againe, fiercely charged the Turkes which were entred, tred contrarie to their expectation: and the valiant Huniades, at the same time issuing out on G euerie side with his most resolute souldiors, so oppressed the Turkes, that few of them that were entred escaped with life, but were there in the cittie either slaine or taken prisoners; and the rest with exceeding slaughter beaten from the wals. Presently after, Huniades in this confusion of the Turks, strengthned with the souldiors which came with Capistranus the frier, made a sallie out of the towne, and set vpon the Turks appointed for the defence of the great ordinance; which was with such resolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great slaughter to forsake their charge, and to leaue the ordinance to their enemies.

The Turkish tyrant sore troubled and throughly chafed with the losse of his great ordinance, couragiously charged the Hungarians afresh, to haue recouered the same againe: but was so valiantly repulsed by Huniades, and so beaten with the murthering shot out of the citie, that he was H glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades also retiring, turned the ordinance he had lately woon, vpon the Turks campe, and with the same did them no small harme.

In this hurle, a great part of the Christian army (which then lay on the other side of Danubius) was speedily transported ouer the riuer; and making no stay in the citie, joyned themselues with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the citie. Who notably strengthned with this new supply, assailed the Turkes trenches, as if he would euen presently haue entered their campe: at which his presumption, the proud tyrant (neuer before so braued) disdaining, went out of his trenches, and valiantly encountring him, beat him backe againe to the great ordinance; from whence he was againe by the Christians driuen to his trenches. Which manner of doubtfull and dreadfull fight, was on both sides notably maintained, vntill the day was almost spent: victorie with indifferent wings, houering now ouer the one side, now ouer the other. I

Mahomet wounded, and carried away for dead.

In these hote skirmishes and conflicts, Chasanes captaine of the Ianizaries, with many other valiant men were slaine. And Mahomet himselfe performing the part as well of a couragious souldiour as of a worthy chieftaine, was sore wounded vnder his left pappe; so that he was taken vp for dead and so carried into his pauilion, to the great discomfiture of his whole army. But comming againe vnto himselfe, and considering that he had in that siege lost his whole fleet, his great ordinance, with most part of his best souldiors, and yet in no possibilitie of the towne: secretly in the night arose with his army, and with great silence shamefully departed; still looking K behind him when the Hungarians should haue pursued him into SERVIA, or haue troubled him vpon his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE. At this siege (beside many of his best captaines and chiefe commanders) were slaine fortie thousand of his best souldiours. The losse that he there sustained was so great, and so stucke in his mind, that euer after during his life, when he had occasion to speake of that siege, he would shake his head and sigh deeply, and many times wish, That he had neuer seene that citie, whereat both he and his father had receiued so great dishonour. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horsmen on that side of Danubius to haue presently pursued the fearfull enemy, that the whole army of the Turkes might haue there been ouerthrown. This notable victorie was obtained against the Turke the sixt of August in the yeare of our Lord 1456. L

The death of the most famous captaine Huniades.

Shortly after, this most valiant and renowmed captaine Huniades, worthy of immortall praise, died of hurt taken in these warres; or as some others write, of the plague, which was then rife in HVNGARIE: who when he felt himselfe in danger of death, desired to receiue the sacrament before his departure, and would in any case (sicke as he was) be carried to the Church to receiue the same; saying, That it was not fit, that the Lord should come to the house of his seruant; but the seruant rather to go to the house of his Lord and master. He was the first Christian captaine that shewed the Turkes were to be ouercome; and obtained more great victories against them than any one of the Christian princes before him. He was vnto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the spoile of them beautified his countrey: and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at ALBA IVLIA, in S. Stephens church: his death being M greatly lamented of all good men of that age.

Mahomet the Turkish emperour, no lesse desirous to extend his empire with the glorie of his name, by sea than by land; shortly after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE put a great fleet to sea, wherewith he surprised diuers Ilands in the ÆGEVM, and hardly besieged the cittie of the

RHODES.

RHODES. At which time, Calixtus the third, then bishop of ROME, aided by the Genowaies (for the grudge they bare against the Turkes for the taking of PERA) put to sea a fleet of sixteene tall ships and gallies well appointed, vnder the conduct of Lodouicus, patriarch of AQVILIA; who with that fleet scoured the seas, and recouered againe from the Turkes the Island of LEMNOS, with diuers other small Islands thereabout: and encountering with the Turkes fleet neere vnto the Island of the RHODES, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paule, discomfited them, sinke and tooke diuers of their gallies, and forced them to forsake the RHODES. After which victorie at sea, hee for the space of three yeares, with his gallies, at his pleasure spoiled the frontiers of the Turks dominions all alongst the sea coast of the lesser ASIA, and wonderfully terrified the effeminate people of those countries: and so at length returned home, carrying away with him many prisoners and much rich spoile.

After that Mahomet was thus shamefully driuen from the siege of BELGRADE, and his fleet at sea discomfited (as is before declared) hee began with great diligence to make new preparation against the next Spring to subdue the Isles of the ÆGEVM, especially those which lay neare vnto PELOPONESVS. But whilest he was busie in these cogitations, in the meane time embassadours from Vsun-Cassanes the great Persian king, arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, with diuerse rich presents sent to him from the said king. Where among other things, they presented vnto him a paire of playing tables, wherein the men and dice were of great and rich precious stones of inestimable worth, and the workmanship nothing inferiour to the matter: which the embassadours for ostentation said, That Vsun-Cassanes found in the treasures of the Persian king, whom he had but a little before slaine and bereft of his kingdome, and had there beene left long before by the mightie conquerour Tamerlane. Together with these presents, they deliuered their embassage, the effect whereof was, That those two mightie princes might joyne and liue together in amitie: and that whereas Dauid the emperor of TRAPEZONDE, had promised to pay vnto Mahomet a yearely tribute, enforced thereunto by George his lieutenant in ASIA; he should not now looke for any such thing: for as much as that empire after the death of the emperour then liuing, should of right belong vnto Vsun-Cassanes, in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Calo-Ioannes, the elder brother of Dauid the emperour, then liuing: And further requiring him, from that time not to trouble or molest the said emperour his friend and neere alliance, so should hee find him his faithfull and kind confederat: otherwise it was (as they said) in his choice to draw vpon himselfe the heauie displeasure of a most mightie enemie. Mahomet before enuying at the rising of the Persian king, and now disdaining such peremptorie requests, little differing from proud commaunds; in great choller dismissed the embassadours with this short answere: That he would ere long be in ASIA himselfe in person, to teach Vsan-Cassanes what to request of a greater than himselfe. This vnkindnesse was the beginning and ground of the mortall wars which afterwards ensued between these two, then the greatest princes of the East, as shall be hereafter more at large declared. The embassadours being departed, and Mahomets fleet of an hundred and fiftie saile readie to put to sea, hee altered his former determination for the Islands of the ÆGEVM (which after the losse of CONSTANTINOPLE had for the most part put themselues vnder the protection of the Venetians) and commanded his admirall with that fleet to take his course through the straits of Bosphorus into the great Euxine sea (now called the blacke sea) and so sailing alongst the coast to come to anker before SINOPE, the cheefe citie of PAPHLAGONIA, and there to expect his comming thither with his armie by land. This great citie of SINOPE standeth pleasantly vpon a point of the maine which runneth a great way into the Euxine, sometime the metropoliticall citie of that prouince: but as then, with CASTAMONA and all the countrey thereabout, was vnder the gouernement of Ismael, a Mahometane prince: vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for no other cause than that he was in league with Vsun-Cassan, the Persian king. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a strong armie, and passing therwith ouer into ASIA, was come before he was looked for, to SINOPE. Ismael seeing himselfe so suddainely beset both by sea and land in his strongest citie, although he wanted nothing needfull for his defence, hauing in the citie foure hundred peeces of great artillerie, and ten thousand souldiours: yet doubting to be able with that strength to endure the siege, offered to yeeld vp the citie to Mahomet, with all the rest of his dominion, vpon condition, That he should freely giue him in lieu thereof the citie of PHILIPPOPOLIS in THRACIA, with the countrey therevnto adjoyning. Of which his offer Mahomet accepted: and so taking possession of SINOPE, with the strong citie of CASTA-

MONA, and all the reſt of the princes territorie, ſent him away with all his things to PHILIPPOPOLIS, as he had promiſed. This Iſmael was the laſt of the honourable houſe of the Iſfendiars, who had long time raigned at HERACLEA and CASTAMONA in PONTVS. From SINOPE he marched on forward with his armie to TRAPEZOND. This famous citie ſtandeth alſo vpon the ſide of the Euxine or Blacke ſea in the country of PONTVS, where the emperors of CONSTANTINOPLE had alwayes their deputies, whileſt that empire flouriſhed and commaunded the Eaſt part of the world, as farre as PARTHIA: but after it began againe to decline (as all worldly things haue but their time) one Iſaack (whoſe father, emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, the Conſtantinopolitanes had for his euill gouernment ſlaine) flying to TRAPEZOND, tooke vpon him the gouernment of that citie, with the countries of PONTVS and CAPADOCIA, and many other great prouinces, and was at firſt called the king of TRAPEZOND: but after hee was well eſtabliſhed in that gouernment, both he and his ſucceſſours tooke vpon them the name and title of emperours; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Conſtantinopolitane emperours, and therefore are of moſt accounted for emperours. Hee that then raigned, was called Dauid Comnenus: which moſt honourable familie of the Comneni had long time before raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE; and out of the ſame were many other great princes deſcended, which ruled in diuers places of MACEDONIA, EPIRVS, and GRÆCIA. Mahomet comming to TRAPEZOND, laied hard ſiege vnto the ſame by the ſpace of thirtie dayes both by ſea and land, & burnt the ſuburbs thereof, as he had before at SINOPE. The fearefull emperour diſmayed with the preſence of ſo mightie an enemie, and the ſight of ſo puiſſant an armie, offered to yeeld vnto him the citie with his whole empire, vpon condition, That hee ſhould take his daughter to wife, and deliuer vnto him ſome other prouince, which might yeeld him ſuch yearely profit as might ſuffice for the honourable maintenance of his ſtate. Mahomet perceiuing the weakeneſſe of his enemie by his large offers, refuſed to accept therof, and attempted by force to haue taken the citie: which not ſorting to his deſire, the matter was againe brought to parle: where after long debating too and fro, it was at laſt agreed vpon, That the emperour vpon the faith of the Turkiſh king for his ſafe returne, ſhould in perſon meet him without the cittie, if happily ſo ſome good attonement might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the emperour following the Turkes faith before ſolemnly giuen for his ſafe returne, as was before agreed, went out of the citie to meet him, in hope to haue made ſome good agreement with him: but as ſoone as hee was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable & helliſh doctrine of his falſe prophet (That faith is not to be kept with Chriſtians) preſently cauſed the emperour to be caſt into bonds, and ſo to be detained as priſoner. Which when it was bruted in the citie, the citizens vtterly diſcouraged, without farther reſiſtance yeelded themſelues with the citie into his power.

Trapezond beſieged by Mahomet.

Trapezond yeelded vnto the Turke.

Mahomet now lord of TRAPEZOND, entring the citie, tooke priſoners the emperors daughter, with all the reſt of his children and kindred, and all ſuch of the nobilitie as hee found in the citie: whom he cauſed forthwith, together with the emperor, to be ſent by ſea as it were in triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE. Of the reſt of the cittizens he choſe out ſo many as hee pleaſed for his owne ſeruice, and appointed eight hundred of the Chriſtian children, in whom appeared moſt towardlineſſe, to be brought vp for Ianizaries, many alſo of the other citizens were ſent into captiuitie to CONSTANTINOPLE: the beautifull women and virgines hee deuided amongſt his friends and men of warre, certaine choſen paragons of whom, hee ſent as preſents to his ſonnes. After he had thus taken his pleaſure in the citie, and left none there but the baſeſt of the people, he put a ſtrong garriſon of his Ianizaries into the caſtle, and a great garriſon of common ſouldiors into the citie, appointing his admirall to gouerne the ſame. The reſt of the emperours ſtrong townes, diſcouraged with the taking of TRAPEZOND, and the miſeries thereof, in ſhort time ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turkiſh thraldome, wherein they haue euer ſince moſt miſerably liued. So Mahomet in the ſpace of few moneths hauing reduced that empire into the forme of a prouince, returned in great triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE; when hee had in this expedition ſubdued PAPHLAGONIA, PONTVS, and a great part of CAPADOCIA, with ſome other prouinces neere vnto the Euxine ſea. When he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, he ſent the emperour with his children priſoners to HADRIANOPLE. But afterwards vnderſtanding that the Perſian queene, the wife of Vſun-Caſſan, ſought meanes to get ſome one of her vnckles children, whom by the power of her husband ſhe might if it were poſsible aduance vnto her fathers empire, he ſent for Dauid the wofull emperour to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there cruelly cauſed him, him, withall his ſonnes and kinſmen, to be put to death; and to the vttermoſt of his power rooted out all that moſt honourable familie of the Comneni, excepting George the emperors youngeſt ſonne, who at his firſt comming to HADRIANOPLE turned Turke: whoſe ſiſter (the emperours daughter) Mahomet afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Chriſtian empire was by the Turkiſh tyrant Mahomet thus miſerably ſubuerted & brought to nought in the yeare of our Lord 1461.

The ruine of the empire of Trepezond.

The yeare following, which was the yeare 1462, Mahomet hauing intelligence, that Wladus Dracula prince of VALACHIA, his tributarie, was reſolued to caſt from him his obedience, and to joyne himſelfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it beſt to proue if he could by policie circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpoſe hee ſent Catabolinus his principall ſecretarie vnto him to bring him to the court, promiſing him greater fauours and promotions from the emperour, than he had as yet at any time enjoyed. And by the ſame truſtie meſſenger, he commaunded Chamuzes Baſſa, gouernour of BIDINA and the countrey lying ouer againſt VALACHIA, on the other ſide of Danubius, to doe his vttermoſt deuoire for the entrapping of Wladus: promiſing him great rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Wherupon Chamuzes deuiſed with the ſecretarie, that when he had done his meſſage to the prince and with all his cunning perſuaded him to take that journey vpon him, hee ſhould ſecretly beforehand giue notice vnto him of the certaine day of his returne backe againe from the prince: at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courteſie of himſelfe bring the ſecretarie well on his way, being a man of ſo great account in the Court, or at leaſtwiſe not refuſe ſo to doe, being thereto requeſted by the ſecretarie: at which time the Baſſa ſecretly paſsing ouer Danubius with certaine troupes of horſemen, and lying cloſe in ambuſh vpon the way, ſhould ſuddenly ſet vpon the prince, and ſo either take him, or els kill him. The plot thus laied, and euerie circumſtance agreed vpon, the ſecretarie held on his way; and comming to the prince, forced his wit to perſuade him to go to the court: ſometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelitie and valour; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater honours and princely preferments he was to receiue at the emperours hands. But when hee had ſaid what he could, he obtained no more of the warie prince, but good words againe, and that he would in courteſie conduct him on his way vnto the ſide of Danubius. Wherof the ſecretarie by ſpeedie meſſengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence: who ſecretly paſsing ouer Danubius with certaine troupes of horſemen, and riding a good way into the country, lay in ambuſh vpon the way whereby the prince with the ſecretarie muſt needs paſſe. According as was before appointed, the ſecretarie accompanied with the prince, put himſelfe vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambuſh with his horſemen: who ſuddenly ariſing, and on euerie ſide aſſailing the prince, ſlew diuers of his men before they were well aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baſſa had ſuppoſed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a ſtrong guard of valiant and ſtout men) ſo receiued Chamuzes and his Turkes, that hee ſlew many of them, and at length after a hard conflict tooke him with the reſt priſoners: whoſe hands and feet he cauſed to be cut off, and their bodies afterwards to be thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes ſet faſt in the ground, to the terror of all that ſaw them; and did the Baſſa ſo much honour, as to hang him and the ſecretarie vpon a gibbet a great deale higher than the other Turkes. And not ſatisfied with this reuenge, preſently gathered his forces, and paſsing ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, burnt all the country before him alongſt the riuers ſide, killing man, woman, and child, without mercie: after which great ſpoile & ſlaughter made, he returned againe into VALACHIA. The report of theſe news being brought to Mahomet, ſet him in ſuch a choller and rage, that he commaunded the great Baſſa Mahometes, which firſt told him thereof, to be cruelly whipt: Which ſeruile puniſhment in that tyrannicall gouernment hath vſually beene inflicted euen vpon the greateſt Baſſaes of the court, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the tyrants, eſpecially if they bee not naturall Turkes borne; accounting the reſt in their anger but as their baſe and contemptible ſlaues, as well appeareth by the wofull end of many, euen of the greateſt of them. But when he vnderſtood by moſt ſure aduertiſements, that all was as the Baſſa had before reported, or rather worſe, it is not to be in words expreſſed into what a rage he fell: the ſpoile of his countrey greeued him much, but the ſhamefull death of the ſecretarie his embaſſadour, and of Chamuzes the Baſſa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation and deſire of reuenge. Wherefore with all ſpeed poſsible he aſſembled his ſouldiours and men of warre, out of all parts of his dominions to PHILIPPOPOLIS: and had in short time raiſed ſuch an army, as the like he had not at any time imploied ſince the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE. At the ſame time alſo, he ſent his Admirall with 25 gallies, and 150 ſaile of other ſmall veſſels by the Euxine, to enter the riuer Danubius, and there landing his men, to joyne his forces with the prince of PODOLIA: who for a grudge he bare againſt Wladus, had promiſed to aid the Turke againſt him. When all things were now in readineſſe, he marched with his army from PHILIPPOPOLIS, and paſsing ouer Danubius, entered into VALACHIA; before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the helpe of the Podolian, had burnt the citie of PRAILABA, the greateſt towne of trade in all VALACHIA; and was beſieging CEBIVM, called in antient time LYCOSTOMOS: where after they had lien a while and receiued ſome loſſe, they left the ſiege and departed, the Podolian backe againe into his countrey, and the Admirall to his fleet.

Mahomet himſelfe in perſon inuadeth Valachia

Mahomet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made hauocke of all that came in his way. As for priſoners, he tooke but few; for the Valachies before his comming, had retired their wiues and children, and all that were vnfit for warres, either into their ſtrong citties, or into the refuge of great and thicke woods (whereof there is in that countrey plentie) or elſe into the high and rough mountaines, where they were in more ſafetie than in any their ſtrongeſt holds: and all ſuch as were able to beare armes, followed the prince, who euer kept the woods and mountaines, ſtill following the Turkes army ſo neere as he poſsibly could, with ſafetie; and many times cut off ſuch as ſtragled any thing farre abroad from the armie, into the countrey: yet neuer durſt ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull, in compariſon of the Turkes multitude. Mahomet, to ſmall purpoſe roaming vp and down the countrey at his pleaſure, ſtaied neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of ſuch a weake enemy as durſt neuer ſhew himſelfe, pitched his tents ſtill in the open plaines, and ſo lay with his army in great ſecuritie, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his eſpials vnderſtanding of this the manner of Mahomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with all his power furiouſly aſſailed that quarter of the Turkes campe where the Aſian ſouldiours lay, and ſlew many of them in their tents; the reſt terrified with the ſuddenneſſe of the alarum, fled out of their tents for refuge vnto the Europeian ſouldiours: the prince following them at the heeles, and entring into that quarter of the campe alſo, did there great harme; and ſtrucke ſuch a generall terrour and feare into all the Turks army, that they were euen vpon the point to haue wholy forſaken their tents and betaken themſelues to flight. Yea Mahomet himſelfe, diſmaied with the terrour of the night and tumult of his campe, and fearing leaſt the Hungarians had joyned their forces with the prince; not knowing which way to turne himſelfe, had vndoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Baſſa a man of great experience in martiall affaires, perſuaded him otherwiſe: and by generall proclamation made through the campe, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death, forſake the place wherein he was encamped, ſtaied the flight; and with much adoe enforced them to make head againſt the prince. Wladus perceiuing the Turkes now to begin to ſtand vpon their guard, and to make reſiſtance: after great ſlaughter made, returning, tooke the ſpoile of the tents forſaken by the Aſian ſouldiours, and vpon the approach of the day, againe retired with victorie into the woods. As ſoone as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certaine companies of ſelect ſouldiours, to purſue the Valachies: who ouertaking part of the princes armie, tooke a thouſand of them priſoners, and put the reſt to flight: all which priſoners were by the tyrants commaund, preſently put to the ſword. From that time Mahomet euerie night entrenched his army, and cauſed better watch and warde to bee kept in euerie quarter of his campe, than before.

A moſt horrible ſpectacle.

As he marched along the countrey, he came to the place where the Baſſa and the ſecretarie were hanging vpon two high gibbets, and the diſmembred Turks empailed vpon ſtakes about them: with which ſight he was grieuouſly offended. And paſsing on farther, came to a plaine containing in breadth almoſt a mile, and in length two miles, ſet full of gallowes, gibbets, wheels ſtakes, and other inſtruments of terrour, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carkaſes of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twentie thouſand. There was to be ſeene the father, with his wife, children and whole family, hanging togither vpon one gallowes; and the bodies of ſucking babes, ſticking vpon ſharpe ſtakes; others with all their limbes broken vpon wheeles, with many other ſtrange and horrible kinds of death.

death: ſo that a man would haue thought, that all the torments the Poets faigne to bee in hell had been there put in execution. All theſe were ſuch as the notable, but cruell prince, jealous of his eſtate, had either for juſt deſert, or ſome probable ſuſpition, put to death; and with their goods rewarded his ſouldiours: whoſe cruell manner was, togither with the offender to execute the whole family, yea ſometimes the whole kindred. Mahomet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell diſpoſition, wondred to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſpectacle of extreame crueltie: yet ſaid no more but that Wladus knew how to haue his ſubjects at commaund. After that, Mahomet ſent Ioſephus, one of his great captaines, to skirmiſh with the Valachies; who was by them put to the worſe: but by the comming in of Omares the ſonne of Turechan, they were againe in a great skirmiſh ouerthrowne, and two thouſand of their heads brought by the Turkes vpon their launces into the kings campe: for which good ſeruice Omares was by the king preferred to be gouernour of THESSALIA.

Two thouſand of the Valachies ſlaine.

When Mahomet had thus traced VALACHIA, and hauing done what harme he could, ſaw it to be to no purpoſe, with ſuch a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemy, which ſtill kept the thicke woods or rough mountaines: he returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, leauing behind him Haly-beg with part of his army, to proſecute that warre; and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was alſo called Wladus, as a ſtale to draw the Valachies into rebellion againſt the prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought vp in Mahomets court, and for his comely feature of him moſt paſsionatly affected: which inordinat perturbation, ſo preuailed in the intemperat nature of the laſciuious prince, that he ſought firſt by faire words and great gifts to corrupt the youth; and not ſo preuailing, attempted at laſt to haue forced him: wherewith the noble youth being enraged, drew his rapier, and ſtriking at him to haue ſlaine him, grieuouſly wounded him in the thigh: and thereupon fled. Neuertheleſſe being drawne backe againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the king, and ſo became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honoured, and now ſet vp for a ſtale (as is before ſaid) for the Valachies his countreymen to gaſe vpon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the king, diuers Valachies came to Haly-Beg the Turkiſh Generall, to raunſome ſuch friends of theirs as had been taken priſoners in thoſe warres, and were yet by him detained: to whom the younger Dracula by way of diſcourſe declaring the great power of the Turkiſh emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endleſſe miſeries of his natiue countrey; cunningly imputed the ſame vnto the diſordered gouernment of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes: aſſuring them of moſt happy and ſpeedy redreſſe, if the Valachies, forſaking his fierce brother, would cleaue vnto him as their ſoueraigne, in ſpeciall fauour with the great emperour. Which ſpeech, he deliuered vnto them with ſuch liuely reaſons, and in ſuch effectuall tearmes, that they their preſent, perſuaded by him; and others by them; in ſhort time all, as if it had been by a ſecret conſent, forſooke Wladus the elder brother, and choſe Dracula the younger brother to be their prince and ſoueraigne. Who joyning vnto him the Turkes forces, by the conſent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernment of that warlike countrey and people; yet holding the ſame as the Turkiſh tyrants vaſſaile, the readieſt way to infidelitie. Wladus ſeeing himſelfe thus forſaken of all his ſubjects, and his younger brother poſſeſſed of his dominion, fled into TRANSYLVANIA, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian king apprehended and laied faſt in ſtrait priſon at BELGRADE, for that he had without juſt cauſe (as it was laid to his charge) moſt cruelly executed diuers Hungarians in VALACHIA: yet ſuch was his fortune, after ten yeares hard impriſonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battaile againſt his auntient enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of VALACHIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, ſent the ſame fleete which hee had vſed in his late warres, into the ÆGEVM, to take in ſuch iſlands as being before vnder the Conſtantinopolitane empire, had vpon the loſſe of the citie put themſelues vnder the protection of the Venetians; but eſpecially the iſle of MITYLENE, called in auntient time LESBOS: pretending that Nicholaus Cateluſius prince therof, did harbour the pyrats of ITALY, and other places; and alſo bought of them ſuch priſoners, and other bootie, as they continually tooke from the Turkes at ſea, or alongſt the ſea coaſt, out of many places of his dominions: pretending alſo the chaſtiſing of the ſaid prince, for that he had by treacherie ſlaine his eldeſt brother, and ſo vnjuſtly taken vpon him the gouernment. His fleet thus ſet forward, he himſelfe with a

ſmall army paſſed ouer into ASIA, and came by land to POSSIDIVM a citie of IONIA ouer against MITYLENE. From whence he embarked himſelfe ouer the narrow ſtraite into the iſland: where after he had once landed his army, he in ſhort time ouerran the whole iſland, and miſerably ſpoiled the ſame, leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuitie; who ſhortly after were ſold at CONSTANTINOPLE like flocks of ſheepe, and from thence diſperſed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrey, and left nothing therein vnſpoiled; he beſieged the Prince in the citie of MITYLENE, whereof the iſland now taketh name: and with his great ordinance continually battered the ſame by the ſpace of 27 daies. In which time many ſharpe aſſaults were alſo giuen by the Turkes, whereby the defendants were greatly diminiſhed and waſted. The prince perceiuing himſelfe not able long to hold out, offered to yeeld vp the citie, with all the ſtrong holds in the iſle, vpon condition, that Mahomet ſhould therefore giue vnto him ſome other prouince, of like valew to the iſland: which his offer Mahomet accepted, and by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe for performance of that he had promiſed. Whereupon the prince came out of the citie, and humbled himſelfe before him, excuſing himſelfe for the receiuing of the men of warre (wherewith he was charged) as done for no other purpoſe, but that they ſhould forbeare to ſpoile his owne countrey, much ſubject to their furie: vtterly denying that he had at any time bought, or ſhared, any part of ſuch prizes as had by thoſe pirats by ſea or land been taken from the Turkes. With which his excuſe, Mahomet ſeemed to be reaſonably well contented, and with good words cheered him vp: neuertheleſſe, as ſoone as the citie, with all the other ſtrong holds in the iſle, were by the princes meanes deliuered into his hands, hee no longer made reckoning of his Turkiſh faith, but cruelly cauſed many of the chiefe citizens of MITYLENE to be put to death; and three hundreth pirats, whom he found in the citie, to be cut in two peeces in the middle, ſo to die with more paine. And when he had placed conuenient garriſons in euerie ſtrong hold in the iſle, he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him the prince, and all the better ſort of the inhabitants of MITYLENE, that were left aliue, togither with all the wealth of that moſt rich and pleaſant iſland; leauing it almoſt deſolat, none remaining therein more than his owne garriſons, with a few of the pooreſt and baſeſt people. Mahomet after he was arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, caſt the prince Nicholaus, with Lucius his coſin (whoſe helpe he had before vſed in killing of his elder brother) into cloſe priſon: where they ſeeing themſelues euerie houre in danger of their liues, to winne fauour in the tyrants ſight, wickedly offered to renounce the Chriſtian religion, and to turne Turke. Which Mahomet vnderſtanding, cauſed them both to be richly apparelled, and with great triumph to be circumciſed, and preſently ſet at libertie: yet ſtill bearing in minde his olde grudge, he ſhortly after, when they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, clapt them both faſt againe in priſon, and there cauſed them to be moſt cruelly put to death. A juſt reward for the bloodie murtherers, and apoſtacie, who to gaine a little longer life, were content to forſake God.

Mitylene beſieged.

Mitylene yeelded to the Turke.

1464 Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen king of BOSNA (in antient time called MÆSIA SVPERIOR) who ſupported by the Turkiſh emperour, had wrongfully obtained that kingdom againſt his owne brethren, refuſed now to pay ſuch yearely tribute as hee had before promiſed: for which cauſe Mahomet with a ſtrong armie entered into BOSNA, and laied ſiege vnto the citie of DOROBIZA: which when he had with much adoe taken, he deuided the people therof into three parts; one part whereof he gaue as ſlaues vnto his men of warre; another part he ſent vnto CONSTANTINOPLE; and the third he left to inhabit the citie. From DOROBIZA he marched to IAZIGA, now called IAICA, the cheefe citie of that kingdome, which after four months ſiege was deliuered vnto him by compoſition: In this citie hee tooke the kings brother and ſiſter priſoners, with moſt of the nobilitie of that kingdome, whom he ſent as it were in triumph vnto CONSTANTINOPLE. The other leſſer cities of BOSNA following the example of the greater, yeelded themſelues alſo. But Mahomet vnderſtanding that the king of BOSNA had retired himſelfe into the fartheſt part of his kingdome, ſent Mahometes his cheefe Baſſa with his Europeian ſouldiors to purſue him: wherein the Baſſa vſed ſuch diligence, that he had on euery ſide ſo incloſed him before he was aware, that hee could by no meanes eſcape, which was before thought a thing impoſsible. So the king for ſafegard of his life was faine to take the citie of CLYSSA for his refuge: where he was ſo hardly laied to by the Baſſa, that ſeeing no other remedie, hee offered to yeeld himſelfe vpon the Baſſaes faithfull promiſe by oath confirmed, that he ſhould be honourably bly vſed, and not to receiue in his perſon any harme from the Turkiſh emperour. Wherupon the Baſſaes oath to the ſame purpoſe was with great ſolemnitie taken; and for the more aſſurance conceiued in writing, firmed by the Baſſa, and ſo deliuered to the king: which done, the king came out of the citie and yeelded himſelfe. The Baſſa hauing thus taken the king priſoner, carried him about with him from place to place, and from citie to citie, vntill he had taken poſſeſsion of all the kingdome of BOSNA; and ſo returning vnto his maſter, preſented vnto him the captiue king: who was not a little offended with him, for that hee had vnto him ſo farre engaged his Turkiſh faith. But when the poore king thought to haue departed, not greatly fearing further harme, he was ſuddenly ſent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worſt, caried with him in his hand the writing wherein the Baſſaes oath for his ſafetie was compriſed: neuertheleſſe, the faithleſſe tyrant without any regard thereof, or of his faith therein giuen, cauſed him preſently to be moſt cruelly put to death, or as ſome write, to be ſlaine quicke. Thus was the Chriſtian kingdome of BOSNA ſubuerted by Mahomet in the yeare 1464: who after he had at his pleaſure diſpoſed thereof, and reduced it into the forme of a prouince to be (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Baſſaes; in great triumph returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him many a wofull Chriſtian captiue, and the whole wealth of that kingdome.

The great warres betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius, in 13 books, De vita & geſtis Scanderbegi, from whence this Hiſtorie is taken: and were done betwixt the yeares 1450 and 1467.

Mahomet, following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his raigne by one or other of his great Baſſaes or expert captaines ſtill maintained warres againſt Scanderbeg, the moſt valiant and fortunat king of EPIRVS: the greateſt part whereof, although it did in the courſe of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by peecemeale haue beene amongſt the ſame in their due time and place inſerted; yet I haue of purpoſe for diuerſe reaſons wholly reſerued them for this place: Firſt, for that I would not interrupt the courſe of the hiſtorie before rehearſed, with the particular accidents of this warre: And then, for that the greateſt heat of this hereditarie warre, deliuered as it were from hand to hand from the father to the ſon, happened not long after this time; when as Mahomet hauing conquered the kingdome of BOSNA, had ſurrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion: Wherein I had reſpect alſo vnto the Readers eaſe, who may with greater pleaſure and content, and leſſe paines alſo, view the ſame together, than if it had beene diſperſedly ſcattered and intermedled with the other greater occurrents of the ſame time. In which diſcourſe I will but breefely touch many things well worthie of a larger treatiſe. And if forgetting my ſelfe, I ſhall in ſome places happen to ſtay ſomthing longer than the Readers haſt would require; yet I hope, that the zeale and loue hee beareth vnto the worthie memorie of moſt famous Chriſtian princes, together with the ſhortneſſe of the hiſtorie, in compariſon of that which is thereof written in juſt volumes by others, ſhall eaſily excuſe a larger diſcourſe than this. But againe to our purpoſe.

Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne ſent embaſſadours to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, ſo that he would graunt to pay vnto him ſuch yearely tribute as his father Amurath had in his life time demaunded. Which embaſſage the craftie tyrant ſent rather to proue what confidence Scanderbeg had in himſelfe, than for any hope he had to haue his demaund graunted. This diſhonourable offered peace Scanderbeg ſcornefully rejected, and ſo returned the embaſſadours as they came: and preſently vpon their departure entered with his horſemen into that part of the Turks dominion which bordereth vpon EPIRVS: & when he had waſted the countrey, returned home laded with the ſpoile thereof. In reuenge of which deſpight, Mahomet ſhortly after ſent Ameſa one of his beſt men of warre, with twelue thouſand horſemen into EPIRVS, to requite Scanderbeg with the like ſpoile of his people and countrey. But Scanderbeg vnderſtanding by his eſpials of the Turks comming, lay cloſe in ambuſh with ſix thouſand ſouldiours vpon the gteat mountaine MODRISSA, ouer which the Turks muſt of neceſsitie take their way: and as they were about by night to haue paſſed ouer that rough and ſteepe mountaine, and were with much difficultie almoſt got vp to the top thereof, they were ſuddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who hauing the aduantage of the place, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, & draue them downe the mountaine amaine; at which time their horſes ſtood them in no ſtead at all, but were rather vnto them an hinderance in that vneuen and troubleſome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and diſorder againe fiercely aſſailed on the one ſide by Scanderbeg, and on the other by his nephew, called alſo Ameſa; who before the Turkes comming had placed themſelues with their horſemen in places of moſt aduantage: ſo that the Turkes hardly beſet and forced on euery ſide, were in ſhort time ouerthrowne and put to flight. In this conflict ſeuen thouſand of the Turkes were ſlaine, and Ameſa Generall of the Turks armie with diuers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg ſent priſoners to CROIA. For ioy of this victorie at Scanderbeg his returne, great triumph & feaſting was made at CROIA: During which time, Scanderbeg cauſed Ameſa the Turke, with the reſt of the Turkiſh captains, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that ioy, whereof they againſt their wils had giuen the occaſion; and afterwards vſed them with all kind of courteſie during the time of their abode. This Ameſa requeſted of Scanderbeg, That he might ſend a meſſenger to CONSTANTINOPLE, to certifie Mahomet how the caſe ſtood with him and the reſt, whom happily he might thinke to haue beene ſlaine in the battaile; and to procure from him their ranſome. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg eaſily graunted, and ſet downe their ranſome at thirteene thouſand duckats. The newes of this ouerthrow ſore greeued the Turkiſh tyrant, but afterwards when he ſaw the remainder of his armie without their generall and leaders, hauing for moſt part loſt their enſignes and armor, and alſo the meſſenger that was ſent from Ameſa, he fell into ſuch a rage, that hee denied to giue any thing at all for his ranſome: imputing all that loſſe to his trecherie, follie, or cowardiſe. Howbeit he was afterwards perſuaded by his Baſſaes and other great courtiers, Ameſa his friends, to thinke better of the Generall, of whoſe faithfulneſſe and valour he had of long time had great experience, and alſo to ſend his ranſome: by denying whereof, hee ſhould (as they ſaid) diſcourage his other generals and captaines, who by chaunce of warre might hap to fall into the like danger. By whoſe perſuaſion Mahomet ſent an embaſſadour to Scanderbeg, with the ranſome demaunded, and other great preſents alſo. Vpon receit whereof, Ameſa with the other captaines were ſet at libertie, and ſent with ſafe conuoy out of EPIRVS. All the money ſent for the Turkes ranſome, Scanderbeg deuided amongſt his captaines and ſouldiors.

This late receiued ouerthrow filled the proud tyrant with deſire of reuenge, ſo that hee determined foorthwith to ſend another armie into EPIRVS: the leading whereof, diuers of his great and moſt expert captains ambitiouſly ſought for. For Mahomet had promiſed great rewards and moſt honourable preferments to him whoſe hap it ſhould bee to vanquiſh Scanderbeg. Amongſt the reſt, one Debreas (a man for his forwardneſſe and courage, in great fauour with his ſoueraign) by great ſute obtained to haue that charge: promiſing with exceeding confidencie vnto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better ſucceſſe in his warres of EPIRVS, than others thither by him before ſent: for the accompliſhment whereof hee required to haue no greater power than was ſent the yeare before. But after that Ameſa was returned to the court, and had with long diſcourſe ſet forth the vertues and valour of Scanderbeg, with the inuincible courage of his ſouldiors, Debreas became more temperate in his ſpeech, and was contented to receiue a new ſupplie; ſo that he had vnder his charge foureteene thouſand ſouldiors: with which armie hee marched towards EPIRVS, and was come to a place called POLOGVS, where he lay with his armie encamped in a plaine in great ſecuritie, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies countrey, neither as he ſuppoſed, neere the enemie. Of all this preparation, and of the comming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence: and being reſolued not to expect the comming of the Turkes into EPIRVS, made choiſe of ſix thouſand of his beſt horſemen; with whom he marched with as much ſpeed as was poſsible into the enemies countrey, and came by night vnto the plaine where the Turkes lay, hoping to haue been vpon them before they were aware, and ſo to haue ouerthrowne them. Wherin he was much deceiued: for by the light of the moone (which then ſhined all night) he was by the Turkes in time deſcried, yet the ſuddenneſſe of his approach with the ſtrangeneſſe of the attempt, exceedingly diſmaied the whole army of the Turkes. But Debreas mindfull of the promiſe he had made vnto his lord and maſter, with cheerfull words encouraged his ſouldiours, and preſently ſent out certaine troups of light horſemen, to receiue the firſt charge of the enemy, vntill he might ſet his whole army in order of battaile. Betwixt theſe troupes, and others ſent out by Scanderbeg, began a ſharpe skirmiſh; both the armies ſtanding faſt, as beholders, carefully expecting the euent thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his ſouldiours ſhould in this firſt encounter be put to the worſe, it might tend to the great diſcouraging of the reſt of his army; ſeconded his men with other freſh troups vnder the leading of Moſes and Ameſa: by whoſe comming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten backe, and chaſed euen to their maine battaile. In the heat of which chaſe, Moſes forgetting himſelfe, had with great danger in following on too faſt, been encloſed by the Turkes, had not his furie beene in good time ſtaied by Ameſa: for which ouerſight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not with greater moderation vſe his good fortune; commending ſuch forwardneſſe in a priuat ſouldior, but not in ſo great a commaunder. When Moſes and Ameſa had thus put the Turkes to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole armie, and fiercely aſſailed the Turkes, yet troubled with the diſcomfiture of their fellows. Debreas on the other ſide, with cheerefull ſpeech, and his owne valour, ſo encouraged his ſouldiors, that Scanderbeg was there notably reſiſted, and his fortune as it were at a ſtand: vntill that Muſachius, with certaine troupes of reſolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbeg his armie, gaue ſuch a fierce charge vpon the ſide of the Turkes armie, that he brake their rankes, and ſore diſordered that part of the armie. Which when Debreas perceiued, he withdrew himſelfe out of the front of the battaile wherein hee had valiantly ſtood againſt Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Muſachius had diſordered the battaile, and with ſuch courage cheared vp his troubled ſouldiours, that his onely preſence and valour ſeemed to bee the very life and heart of his whole armie. Whileſt Debreas was thus buſied againſt Muſachius, Scanderbeg in the meane time with might and maine ſtill charged the front of the enemies armie: who now in the abſence of the Generall began to looſe their order and to giue ground, making no ſuch reſiſtance as before. At which time, Moſes forcibly breaking into the thickeſt of them, tooke one of their enſignes, which hee threw backe amongſt his followers: wherewith they encouraged, ſo preſſed vpon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therewith diſcouraged, and their battaile diſordered, were almoſt readie to turne their backs and to flie. Debreas ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, haſted with all ſpeed vnto the place where he ſaw moſt perill, and did what was poſsible to haue reſtored the battaile, and encouraged his ſouldiors: where preſsing in amongſt the formoſt, hee was by Scanderbeg himſelfe encountered hand to hand, and ſo by him ſlaine: with whoſe fall the whole armie diſcouraged, without further reſiſtance fled. Moſes purſuing them on the one ſide, & Muſachius on the other, with furious hand ſlew more in that chaſe than were ſlaine in the battaile. Of the Turkes were ſlaine in this battaile 4120, and ſome priſoners taken, but of the Chriſtians few or none: ſo that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a victorie giuen. All the ſpoile taken from the enemie, together with the priſoners, was by Scanderbeg equally deuided amongſt the ſouldiors. Vnto Moſes he gaue Debreas his horſe and armour: and vnto Muſachius a priſoner, which by his port and behauior ſeemed to be a man of ſome good account. This Turke agreed with Muſachius vpon a ranſome of two hundred duckats, and preſently vpon agreement made, drew forth the money out of a little bag which he had kept ſecretly about him, and offered it to Muſachius for his ranſome: Who receiuing the money, told the Turke, that he muſt prouide another ranſome, for as much as that money was his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his perſon. The Turke on the other ſide alledged for himſelfe, the agreement alreadie made, with the payment of the full ſumme agreed vpon. This controuerſie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleaſure heard them both what they could ſay: Muſachius laying in hard for another ranſome, and the Turke for his libertie vrging the agreement. Who when they had both ſaid what they could for themſelues, Scanderbeg ſmiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his and neither of theirs: for the priſoner with the money were both mine (ſaid he) at the firſt taking of him; ſince which time I haue giuen to you Muſachius the priſoner, which I knew, but not the money which I knew not of: neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (ſaid he to the Turke) who had by law of armes loſt your ſelfe, together with all that you had about you. After he had thus pleaſantly diſcourſed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded vnto Muſachius the money he agreed for, and to the Turke his deſired libertie: who glad thereof, and hauing alſo receiued his horſe and armour of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, ſpeaking all the honour he could of ſo noble a conquerour. After this victorie Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to CROIA.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg & Debreas.

Debreas ſlain by Scanderbeg, and his armie ouerthrowne.

A pleaſant contention betwixt Muſachius and a Turke for his ranſome.

When Mahomet vnderſtood that Debreas was ſlaine, and his armie ouerthrowne, hee became exceeding melancholie: but after he ſaw ſo many of his ſouldiors returned as had ben ſufficient to haue reſtored a loſt battaile, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed with their cowardiſe, as that he could not endure the ſight of them. The death of Debreas greeued none more than the king himſelfe: for the captaines generally either enuied at his hardineſſe, or elſe hated his inſolencie. Ameſa amongſt the reſt tooke no ſmall pleaſure, that his proud ſucceſſour had taken part of his euill fortune, and ſo in part eaſed his former infamie. The great Baſſaes and men of warre ſeeing their ſoueraigne ſo deſirous of reuenge, offered to ſpend their liues in that ſeruice: whoſe forwardneſſe wardneſſe he ſeemed not to refuſe: howbeit he had in his mind alreadie plotted another manner of reuenge. He was not ignorant, what great matters his father Amurath had brought to paſſe, by ſowing diſcord amongſt the princes of GRÆCIA: which fowle practiſe he purpoſed now to put in practiſe himſelfe. There was at that time many famous chieftains in EPIRVS, of Scanderbeg both beloued and truſted; amongſt whom, he was in hope to find ſome one who for deſire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to giue ſome deſperat attempt againſt the life or ſtate of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moſes Golemus of DIBRA (a man honourably deſcended) was moſt inward with Scanderbeg, and for his proweſſe and experience in martiall affaires, of all men accounted the beſt captaine in all EPIRVS, next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe: him, the craftie tyrant moſt deſired to alienat from Scanderbeg, as one fitteſt to ſerue his purpoſe, and eaſieſt without ſuſpition to be delt withall; becauſe he commonly lay with a ſtrong garriſon in DIBRA, vpon the verie frontiers of EPIRVS. Wherfore he directed his letters vnto the gouernor of SFETIGRADE, commanding him by all meanes he could poſsibly deuiſe to withdraw Moſes from Scanderbeg; and not to ſpare for any gold or golden promiſes whereby to allure him: promiſing alſo vnto the gouernour himſelfe great preferments, if hee could winne him. Vpon receit of which letters, the gouernor began forthwith carefully to deuiſe, how he might beſt attempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuiſes, he at laſt thought vpon a ſhrewd-headed fellow, one of the Chriſtians which dwelt in SFETIGRADE; whom for that he was a Chriſtian, he might without ſuſpect vſe as an inſtrument in ſo dangerous and important an action. This Chriſtian the gouernour called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promiſes woon him to vndertake the matter; he ſent him away, fully before armed with plenteous inſtructions, full of treaſon and deceit. When this ſubtill meſſenger was come vnto Moſes, and vnder pretence of great and ſecret matters of importance, had obtained to ſpeake with him in priuat: he after ſome diſcourſe had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length vnder the couert of faire glozing words, to vtter his poiſon: Shewing vnto him (as a meſſenger from the gouernor) the great and good opinion the Turkiſh emperour had of long time conceiued of his valour and proweſſe: for which cauſe his heroicall nature could not but honour him, although he were his enemy; and therewith alſo maruell, that he being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commaunded by Scanderbeg, whoſe ſtate was by him chiefly vpholden: whereas if he would doe wiſely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an emperour of greateſt magnificence and power, he ſhould quickly in his court find ſuch honourable entertainment, as were to be preferred before the ſtate of Scanderbeg: or if the ſoueraigntie of EPIRVS his natiue countrey did better pleaſe him, he might eaſily be thereunto aduanced, by joyning his owne endeuour vnto Mahomets great power. It pleaſed Moſes well to heare his owne praiſes (a thing incident vnto hautie minds) and he liked well that he was ſo fauoured of the Turkiſh emperour: but the hope of the kingdome of EPIRVS began to worke in him new conceits, and moued him more than all the reſt. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, ſaue themſelues: ſo glorious a thing it is, to ſtand in the higheſt place. For all that, Moſes neither in word or countenance made any ſemblant of liking, or diſliking the meſſage. Which the wily meſſenger taking for a ſecret conſent, and hartely glad that he had been ſo well heard: not deſiring as then any further anſwere, craued leaue to depart; promiſing in ſhort time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this meſſenger, many troubled thoughts began to ariſe in the mind of Moſes: his mirth was changed into melancholy, and the cheerfulneſſe of his countenance was abated, his hautie thoughts were his ſolitarie companions, and the imagined kingdome the idoll he in ſecret worſhipped; ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed vnto the wiſer ſort as a man altogither metamorphoſed. Some were ſo bold, as for to aske the cauſe of the meſſengers comming: vnto whom he anſwered, That he was one, from whom he receiued intelligence of matters concerning the good of the ſtate: which his anſwere was holden for true; for who durſt once miſtruſt Moſes? Whileſt he was thus toſſed vp and downe with his owne thoughts, as a ſhippe with the billowes of a wrought ſea, the ſame ſlie meſſenger, according to his promiſe came againe; and for his more credit, in ſecret brought with him ſuch preſents as well might ſeeme to haue beene ſent from the Great Turke; with his meſſage better framed than before. Of all which that was ſent, Moſes is reported to haue receiued nothing but the worſt, which was, the verie treaſon it ſelfe. And ſo returned the meſſenger, with anſwere, That he could not but in good part accept of the Turkiſh emperours great fauours; and for the reſt of his requeſts, queſts, whatſoeuer he ſhould chance to doe therin, he ſhould not from thenceforth find him any great enemy: commanding the meſſenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of ſuſpition.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into DIBRA, to ſee how all things ſtood there, and to conſult with Moſes for the beſieging of SFETIGRADE; which citie it grieued him to ſee in the poſſeſsion of the Turkes. Moſes to auert Scanderbeg from that enterpriſe, wherein hee muſt of force be driuen to ſhew himſelfe, told him, That he vnderſtood of late by a certaine meſſenger which came to him out of SFETIGRADE, that the citie was ſo well ſtored by the Turks, of all things neceſſarie for the defence thereof, that it were but loſt labour to attempt any thing againſt the ſame: wherefore hee aduiſed him rather to beſiege BELGRADE (not that BELGRADE which is ſituated vpon the riuer of Danubius, but another of the ſame name) in the confines of EPIRVS, then holden by the Turkes, but diſtant from SFETIGRADE about an hundreth and fortie miles; of the taking whereof, there ſeemed to be more hope. By this perſuaſion, Scanderbeg reſolued with himſelfe to make prouiſion for the beſieging of BELGRADE. And forasmuch as his ſouldiours of EPIRVS alwaies vſed to the field, were not ſo fit for the beſieging of townes, he thought it good to pray aid out of ITALY, from his old friend Alphonſus king of NAPLES, with whom he had been of long time acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he ſent two of his noblemen embaſſadours vnto him, with certaine rich preſents, and familiar letters of this purport.

Scanderbeg craueth aid of Alphonſus king of Naples.

Our ſouldiours of EPIRVS, know only how to fight with men, and them to vanquiſh: with wals they know not how to deale. You Italians (as I vnderſtand) haue skill in that kind of ſeruice, and take pleaſure therein: wherefore now at this preſent, I haue need of your helpe and cunning. There be certaine townes of our enemies in EPIRVS, yea almoſt in the heart of our kingdome; which eye-ſore I haue of long deſired (if it pleaſed God) to take out of my ſight: but being occupied with continuall wars, had no leiſure vntill now, happely to attempt any thing againſt them. This time I haue choſen as moſt fit, to ſatisfie my deſire, both for the ſeaſonableneſſe of the time of the yeare, and for that Mahomet ſpareth me leiſure; whoſe furie I haue twiſe calmed: You vnderſtand in few words, what I haue need of: all other things are almoſt in readineſſe, and we only looke for your helpe. Lend me ſuch ſouldiors as know how to fight a farre off, I meane harquebuſiers and canoniers, for of others we haue ſtore plenty. But happy is APVLIA, my Alphonſus, vnder thy gouernment, from whence men fit for all ſeruices may be drawne as out of a moſt plentifull treaſurie. Whenſoeuer we haue requeſted men fit for ſeruice, either in peace or warre, you haue beautified both our court and campe. By you the kingdome of EPIRVS hath been ſupported with ciuile pollicie, and warlike ſtrength: all ſort of people, of what condition ſoeuer: yea euerie corner of EPIRVS ſoundeth forth thy praiſe, both at home and abroad. But for mine owne part, I doe ſo louingly embrace your kindneſſe, and ſo firmly retaine the remembrance of your deſerts towards me, that ſometime I wiſh you that fortune (although in ſo doing I may ſeeme vnkinde) which (as the common ſaying is) proueth, but getteth not friends: to the intent, that you might by ſome more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you deuoted.

When Scanderbeg had ſent away his embaſſadours, he with all diligence began to prouide things neceſſarie for the ſiege of BELGRADE: wherein he had purpoſed alſo to haue vſed the ſeruice of Moſes. But he now in heart a traitor both to his prince and countrey, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuſes to ſtay at home in DIBRA: alleadging firſt, that it was to be thought, that ſo ſoone as the Turkiſh king ſhould heare of the ſiege of BELGRADE, he would inuade ſome part of EPIRVS, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the ſiege: and then, that no part of all EPIRVS lay neerer vnto the Turkes, or more in danger, than DIBRA; and that therefore he could not doe any better ſeruice, than to ſee vnto the ſafetie of that countrey, long before committed to his charge, and in which alſo moſt part of his liuing lay. Theſe his excuſes, proceeding indeed from deepe treaſon, were yet neuertheleſſe thought reaſonable, and he for his prouident care highly commended; and authoritie giuen him with new ſupplies to augment the garriſon vnder his commaund, as time and occaſion ſhould require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the entended ſiege, the embaſſadours before ſent to Alphonſus, were returned into EPIRVS, and with them ſuch aid as Scanderbeg had before requeſted, and a great deale more: For Alphonſus fearing the greatneſſe of

of the Turkish emperour, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg his actions, reckoning EPIRVS not aboue 60 miles distant from his dominions, to be the strongest wals of his kingdome in APVLIA (as not many years after, it by proofe appeared, when as the Turks hauing taken OTRANTO put all ITALY in no small feare.) With this aid he also wrote louing letters vnto Scanderbeg, thanking him for his presents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things, as of his owne. But when he came to make mention of the souldiours he had sent; Alphonsus, after the manner of his pleasant nature, merrily wrote vnto Scanderbeg, That he had sent him Italian souldiors which could according to his desire, fight well both with men and wals; but better with women: and that therefore the Epirots were best to take heed, that they whose helpe they required for fight a farre off, proued not also good warriours at hand at home in their houses. The great commendation Scanderbeg had giuen of the king, was by him referred vnto the excesse of his loue, and by the king requited with like.

Scanderbeg besiegeth and distresseth Belgrad.

Scanderbeg now furnished with all things needfull, set forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before BELGRADE, with an army of fourteene thousand good souldiours: and in short time had so distressed the citie, that the Turkes were glad to take truce with him for sixteene daies, which time expired, they promised to deliuer vp the towne, if they were not before relieued. Vpon conclusion of this truce, Scanderbeg encamped himselfe vpon an high hill neere vnto the citie, with three thousand horse, and a thousand foot; and appointed Musachius and Tanusius, with the rest of the army, to remoue farther off into a large plaine, where they might encampe themselues in a more wholsome and fresh ayre, in that hoat season of the yeare, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed also 25 scouts to keepe continuall watch vpon the top of the highest mountaine, to discouer a farre off the comming of the enemie, and to giue warning therof vnto the campe by making a fire vpon the mountaine: by the negligence of which watch, Scanderbeg receiued a great ouerthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The newes of the siege of BELGRADE was brought vnto Mahomet, at such time as he was readie to haue passed into ASIA against the emperour of TRAPEZOND: which great enterprise he was loath to giue ouer, for the relefe of BELGRADE; and yet to lose that citie vnto Scanderbeg, grieued him much: wherfore he resolued with himselfe so to do the one, as that he would not altogither neglect the other. And so holding on his entended journey into ASIA himselfe, with such fortune as is aforesaid, he sent Sebalius one of his great Bassaes, with fortie thousand horsemen to relieue BELGRADE, promising him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg either aliue or dead. This Bassa was of the Turks accounted for a warie captaine, but not so coutagious, alwaies more politike than forward: he hauing receiued his charge, set forward with all speed possible, no lesse carefull of that he was commanded, than was Mahomet himselfe, and by great journies came on so fast, that he still preuented the fame of his comming; and by his forerunners intercepted, or rather (as some write) corrupted the watch which Scanderbeg had before placed vpon the mountaines; so that no signe was giuen vnto the campe of the enemies, as was expected. By meanes whereof, Sebalius with all his power were vpon that part of Scanderbeg his army, which lay in the plaines, before they were well aware of his comming: so that most part of them had not so much leisure as to bridle their horses, or to put on their armor. In which so sudden a feare, Musachius armed himselfe, and put his souldiours in such order as the shortnesse of the time and the enemies approach would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flie: but seeing no lesse danger in flight than in fight, he resolutely receiued the enemies charge, as a man desirous before hand to reuenge his owne death. And at length (seeing his men slaine about him by heapes, and that courage must needs giue place vnto fortune) fiercely attempted to haue broken through the middest of his enemies, and so to haue fled vnto the mountaine where Scanderbeg lay: but he was so beset, that no way was possible to be made; wherefore resoluing there to die, he desperatly fought, to the great admiration of his enemies, vntill that he, with all there with him, were euery man slaine. Tanusius on the other side, after he had giuen diuers braue attempts to haue rescued his cosin Musachius, finding by proofe, that he could doe him no more good therein but to become the wofull companion of his death, exhorted all the rest yet left, for safegard of their liues to flie: in which doing, most of them were slaine, for the Bassaes great army so filled all places thereabout, and so eagerly pursued the victorie, that it was almost impossible any way to scape. Scanderbeg lying vpon the mounmountaine, and ſeeing the ouerthrow of moſt part of his armie, was about many times to haue deſcended from the hill, to haue holpen them in what hee might, or els to haue there died with them: but yet ſtayed, being thereto earneſtly requeſted by his other moſt expert captaines; and perſuaded, not deſperately to thruſt both himſelfe and them all into the manifeſt perill of aſſured death. Scanderbeg ſeeth his men ſlain, and is not able to releeue them.

Sebalias hauing ſlain Muſachius, and put Tanuſius to flight, followed the chaſe with the greateſt part of his armie, ſo that few were left in the great plaine, except ſuch as ſtayed to rifle the dead. Scanderbeg taking that oportunitie, came downe from the hill whereon he ſtood, with his foure thouſand ſouldiors, and in a moment ſlew all ſuch Turkes as he found in his way: and after following in the taile of the Turkes armie, cut off a great number of them, and brought a generall feare vpon the whole armie: inſomuch, that Sebalias perceiuing that he gained not ſo much in chaſing of Tanuſius, but that he loſt more in the rereward of his armie, by the purſuit of Scanderbeg, left the chaſe, and turned vpon his fierce enemie: Where after a ſharpe skirmiſh begun, the warie Baſſa fearing in the maintaining of that diſordered fight to haue the victorie wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, cauſed a retreat to bee ſounded, ſo to call together his diſperſed ſouldiors, and in better order to encounter his dangerous enemie. Scanderbeg in the meane time hauing aſſembled the remainder of his armie, valiantly again encountred the Turks, who thought in this battaile to haue made an end of the warres in EPIRVS: and with his owne hand ſlew [illegible]mat and Barach, two valiant ſouldiours of the Turkes; which like ſtout champions had before ſworne vnto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they ſhould chance to meet with him. In this laſt skirmiſh a great number of the Turks were ſlain: but night drawing on, Sebalias retired with his armie to a mountaine neere vnto the cittie, and Scanderbeg likewiſe to another almoſt two miles off: and in the dead time of the night riſing with his armie, returned in ſafetie into EPIRVS, leauing ſtrong garriſons vpon all the ſtrait paſſages as he went, for feare leaſt the Baſſa proud of this victorie, ſhould forthwith breake into EPIRVS. This was the onely and greateſt ouerthrow that Scanderbeg had hetherto receiued of the Turkes: wherein hee loſt two thouſand horſemen and three thouſand foot (moſt part whereof were of the Italians ſent from king Alphonſius) together with his tents and great artillerie, and about eightie of his men taken priſoners. And of the Turks were alſo ſlaine three thouſand. Scanderbeg flieth by night into Epirus.

The next day Sebalias perceiuing that Scanderbeg was retired, commaunded the bodies of the ſlaine Turks to be ſought out and buried: but of ſuch Chriſtians as they yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their hands and feet, and ſo left them amongſt the dead. The head of Muſachius and of many other the ſlaine Chriſtians, which by their armour or apparrell were thought to be of the better ſort, were by the commaundement of Sebalias cut off: which becauſe he could not for the diſtance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoyance carrie with him to CONSTANTINOPLE, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is; he cauſed them to bee ſlaine, and ſtuffed with chaffe, and ſo to bee carried as the vaine trophees of his victorie. Afterwards, when hee had repaired the battered wals of BELGRADE, and put a new ſupplie of ſeuen hundred freſh ſouldiours into the cittie, beſide the old garriſon therein before, and ſet all things in good order, he returned with great triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE. And the more to ſet out the glorie of his victorie, at ſuch time as he entered the citie, he firſt cauſed the captiue Chriſtians to be led in chaines before him; after whom were borne the enſignes taken from the Chriſtians, with the aforeſaid heads thruſt vpon launces, and after them all the ſpoile: laſt of all came Sebalias himſelfe, with his ſouldiors, as great conquerours, and was of the people receiued with ſuch applauſe and joy, as if hee had conquered ſome great kingdome. No man was now ſpoken of but Sebalias, his praiſes were in euery mans mouth, hee was the onely man (as they ſaid) that did ſhew that Scanderbeg was to be ouercome: no preferment was now thought too great for him, or reward ſufficient to counteruaile his deſert. The poore Chriſtian captiues were afterwards for moſt part ſold: of the reſt, ſome were aliue thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes, ſome hanged vpon yron hookes, ſome otherwiſe cruelly at the victors pleaſure tortured to death.

Moſes lately before corrupted by the practiſe of the gouernour of SPETIGRADE, hearing of the great loſſe Scanderbeg had receiued at BELGRADE, thought it now a moſt fit time for his reuolt. But for as much as the fact, in the nature of it ſelfe foule, ſeemed euen to himſelfe the doer thereof, a great deale fouler and more diſhonourable, for that he had therein no complices: hee thought it good, if it were poſsible, to allure ſome others into the fellowſhip of his treaſon, ſo to diminiſh diminish the infamie of himselfe, in communicating the same with many, and to appeare with greater credit before the Turkish tyrant, than if hee should as a contemptible fugitiue come all alone. Wherefore vpon the bad newes from BELGRDE, he seemed at the first very pensiue, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common miserie of the countrey of EPIRVS, with many words amplifying the same: and then on the contrarie part, setting forth to the vttermost the force and power of the Turkish emperour Mahomet, thereby to strike a greater terrour and distrust into the minds of them with whom hee was conuersant: but vnto such as were more secret and inward with him, hee discouered the great affection and fauour the great emperour Mahomet had of long borne him, with the large offer of his gifts and preferments, assuring them of the like also, if they would conforme themselues vnto his appetite; seeking hereby so much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his most execrable treason: yet when he had said what he could, he found none but a few of the baser sort of the common souldiours, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moses saw how much he had laboured, and how little preuailed, fearing to be discouered, hee fled by night to SPETIGRADE, accompanied with a few base fellowes, and easily obtained the gouernours passe, with safe conduct to CONSTANTINOPLE: where he arriued a little before the returne of Sebalias from BELGRADE, and was of Mahomet both joyfully receiued and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg vnderstood that Moses was thus reuolted, at the first report thereof hee was so troubled with the strangenesse of the fact, that he stood speechlesse as a man astonied: but after he had pawsed a while, and vpon further enquirie had found it to be true, he according to his heroicall disposition, said no more, but that he could easily haue Moses excused, for that hee was carried away with the violence of such fortune as might haue alienated the mind of a right constant man. And when diuers of his friends (according to the manner of the world) with hard speeches seemed to agrauate his offence: he could not abide to heare the same, but commanded them to hold their peace, and no more to vse such speeches: wishing that all treason and euill fortune were together with Moses gone out of EPIRVS. Vpon this newes, Scanderbeg accompanied with Amesa his nephew and a troupe of horsemen, presently went into the countrey of DIBRA, and there with all care caused most diligent enquirie to be made, if any could be found partakers of the conspiracie with Moses. But finding none, he much rejoyced in the fidelitie of his subjects: and hauing set all things in good order in that prouince, returned himselfe to CROIA.

Moses remaining in the Turks court, ceased not to solicite Mahomet to proceed in his warres against Scanderbeg, promising to doe therein great matters, euen to the spending of his life in that seruice. But the craftie tyrant thinking it not good to trust him too farre before hee had further triall of him, delayed him off vntill the next Spring, pretending that the yeare was too far spent to begin warres. In the meane time he caused all Moses talke, his behauior and actions, to be diligently obserued and noted; and oftentimes himselfe discoursed with him concerning the managing of that warre: all which he did especially to sound the depth of Moses his thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the most assured and vndoubted signes of a mind deuoted to his seruice, and altogether estranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteene thousand horsemen for the inuading of EPIRVS, such men as Moses himselfe should make choice of: for a greater number he required not for the vanquishing of Scanderbeg. These souldiors although they detested (so few in number) to enter that fatall countrey of EPIRVS, as men faire warned by other mens harmes, yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceiued of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his meanes to find friends in that countrey to joyne with them, were the willinger to goe. So Moses furnished with a notable armie, and all warlike prouision he could desire for the destruction of his countrey; and blinded with the imagination of a kingdome, set forward, & marching through THRACIA and MACEDONIA, forgetting the loyaltie due vnto his soueraigne, and the loue hee ought to haue borne vnto his natiue countrey, came and entered into DIBRA.

Mahomet sendeth Moses with fifteene thousand select men to inuade Epirus.

Scanderbeg by his espials vnderstanding of the comming of Moses, as also what strength hee was of, stood not now vpon any policie against him who had of long been priuie to all his stratagemes, but was readie euen at his first entrance with true valour to encounter him. As both the armies stood raunged in order of battaile, a messenger came from the Turks campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his armie durst to proue his fortune hand to hand against one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battell. By which messenger answere was returned,

That

That the challenge ſhould be accepted. The name of the Turk which made this braue challenge was Ahemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name amongſt the Turkes. Vpon this proud challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a gentleman of no leſſe reputation amongſt the Chriſtians, haſtely ſtept forth before Scanderbeg (as if he had beene afraid to haue beene preuented by ſome other) and requeſted, that he might be the man to abate the Turkes pride. Scanderbeg embracing him, commended his noble mind, and wiſhing him good fortune, gaue him leaue to catrie with him into the field the firſt honour of the Chriſtian armie. As he was arming himſelfe, his companions & fellowes in armes ſtanding about him, wiſhed vnto him not more courage or ſtrength than he had, but onely the fortune of Maneſſi. Vpon his armour hee put on many rich jewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the rewards of the enemie, if hee could vanquiſh him. The Turkiſh champion was no ſooner come into the plaine betwixt both armies, & made ſhew of himſelfe in great brauerie as if his match had yet beene ſcarcely found, but he ſaw Zacharias come forth brauely mounted, and readie to charge him: to whom Ahemaze calling aloud, ſaid there would bee time ynough for him to haſten to his death, and therefore requeſted to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded ſuch like conditions of the combat, as had beene long before derided by Maneſſi: whereof Zacharias in no better ſort accepted. In few words it was agreed vpon betwixt them, That each of them ſhould abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or aid of others; and that the victor ſhould haue full power ouer the bodie and ſpoile of the vanquiſhed. Thus agreed, they withdrew themſelues one a good diſtance from another, and with their launces charged, ran together with ſuch force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their launces one vpon the other, and were both horſe and man ouerthrowne. Both vnhorſed, they nimbly recouered themſelues, and with their ſcimitars fiercely aſſailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it ſhould ſeeme had determined to beautifie that combat with varietie, ſtanding a great while indifferent to both. After many ſturdie ſtrokes giuen, without any hurt done, by reaſon they were ſo ſtrongly armed, it fortuned that both their ſwords were beaten out of their hands: then grapling together with their bare hands, as if they had beene two vnarmed wreſtlers, after long ſtrugling till they were both almoſt out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying vpon him, with his dagger, aboue the gorget thruſt him into the throat, and ſlew him: and ſo riſing vp, with the ſword that firſt came to his hands, cut off the Turks head: at the ſight whereof the Chriſtian armie gaue a great ſhout for joy, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks. To be ſhort, Zacharias deſpoyling the Turk of his armour, and what elſe he thought good, returned loded with the ſpoile of his enemie, and preſented vnto Scanderbeg the proud Turkes head: for which hee was of him afterwards moſt honourably rewarded.

A combat betwixt a Turke and a Chriſtian.

Into this place yet reeking with the bloud of the late ſlaine Turke, came Moſes, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not haue aduentured his perſon: but when he ſaw him readie to come forth, hee ſhamefully forſooke the place, and returned with ſhame ynough into his armie.

Preſently after, both the armies vpon ſignall giuen ſet forward, and ſo began to joine battaile: where at the firſt onſet Scanderbeg ſo valiantly charged the vauward of the Turkes armie, that they were glad to giue ground: which Moſes perceiuing, releeued them with new ſupplies: and riding now here, now there, with his preſence and courage reſtored the battaile, in many places almoſt loſt. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, ſtill preuailed vpon their enemies, and after great ſlaughter made, came to the ſtrength of their battaile; where Moſes had placed moſt of his beſt ſouldiours, as his moſt aſſured and laſt refuge: In this place the Turks fought with exceeding courage, and Moſes warily obſeruing in what part of the battaile Scanderbeg himſelfe was, directed his greateſt forces againſt him, of purpoſe, if poſsibly he might, to haue ſlaine him: whereof he miſſed but a little; for a courageous ſouldiour of the Turkes by chance encountering with Scanderbeg, with his horſemans ſtaffe bare him quite backward vpon his horſe, in ſuch forcible manner, that the Turks for joy gaue a great ſhout, thinking verely he had beene ſlaine: but Scanderbeg recouering himſelfe againe, and chafed with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, furiouſly aſſailed the ſame Turke with his ſword, and after a great fight ſlew him. A great part of the Turkes armie being alreadie ouerthrowne by them that had the leading of the wings of Scanderbeg his armie, diuers of the common ſouldiours thruſt the heads of the ſlaine Turkes vpon the points of their ſpeares, in token of victorie, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Turks: and now joyning themselues with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the maine battaile of the Turkes than before. Neuertheleſſe, Moſes encouraging his ſouldiours, did what was poſsible for a man to doe, and euen with his owne valour a great while ſtaied the courſe of the victorie: vntill he ſeeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his beſt ſoldiours, and that there was no remedie but that he muſt either flie, or there die; turned his backe and fled. In which flight, many of the hindermoſt of the Turks were ſlaine: as for Moſes himſelfe, he eſcaped by waies to him well knowne, onely with foure thouſand men, the poore remainder of ſo great an armie: the reſt, to the number of about eleuen thouſand, all choiſe men, were ſlaine: whereas of the Chriſtians were not paſt an hundreth loſt, and about eightie wounded. Of all the Turkes that were taken, onely one was ſaued; who being a man of good account, had yeelded himſelfe to Zacharias, and was afterward raunſomed: the reſt were all by the common ſouldiours, without pittie, tortured to death, in reuenge of the crueltie by them ſhewed at BELGRADE: Scanderbeg himſelfe either not knowing thereof, or winking thereat.

Moſes with the reſt of his diſcomfited armie, lay ſtill a while vpon the borders of EPIRVS, and would faine haue perſuaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to haue followed him againe into EPIRVS, to haue ſurpriſed the garriſon left in DIBRA, in number not aboue two thouſand; promiſing to bring them vpon the ſame garriſon, before they ſhould be aware of their comming. But the Turks hauing him now in contempt, were about by generall conſent to forſake him, and to returne home. And ſo Moſes ſeeing no remedie, returned with them to CONSTANTINOPLE, with countenance as heauie as if he had beene a condemned man now carried to the place of execution: and the Turkes which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting that he ſhould haue ended the wars in EPIRVS; began now to diſgrace him as faſt, and to ſpeake all the euill of him they could deuiſe. Yea the prowd tyrant himſelfe (although he could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was ſo highly offended with him, for the loſſe of his armie, that he had vndoubtedly put him to moſt cruell death, had not the great Baſſaes, and others neere about him, perſuaded him otherwiſe: ſaying, That in ſo doing, he ſhould alienat the mindes of all others from reuolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his ſeruice. So was he by their mediation, pardoned his life; but withall, ſo diſgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his neceſſarie maintenance: all which deſpiteful contumelies he outwardly ſeemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly ſo tormented with melancholy and griefe, that he could neither eat nor drinke: The remembrance of the foule treaſon committed againſt his prince and countrey, was day and night before his eies; and the diſgraces of the Turkes court inwardly tormented him with intollerable griefe: The ſight of the tyrant (who meaſured all things by the euent) filled his heart with ſecret indignation; and to returne againe vnto his naturall prince, of whom he had ſo euill deſerued, he was aſhamed: Sometime the clemencie and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, ſlow to reuenge, and eaſie to be entreated to forgiue, hartened him on to thinke of returne; and by and by, the conſideration of his fowle treaſon ouerwhelmed him with deſpaire. Thus with contrarie thoughts plunged too and fro, tormented with the inſpeakable griefes of a troubled conſcience, not knowing what to doe, purpoſing now one thing, and by and by another: at laſt he reſolued to forſake the inſolent tyrant, and to ſubmit himſelfe to the mercie of Scanderbeg; wiſhing rather to die in his countrey for his due deſert, than to liue with infamie, derided in the Turkes court. Reſting himſelfe vpon this reſolution, one euening hee got ſecretly out of the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, and trauelling all that night and the day following before he reſted, by long and wearie journies, came at laſt vnto his natiue countrey of DIBRA. The garriſon ſouldiours beholding their old gouernour all alone, full of heauineſſe, as a man eaten vp with cares; mooued with compaſsion, and forgetting the euils hee had beene the occaſion of, receiued him with many teares and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not farre off. Moſes comming vnto him with his girdle about his necke, in token that he had deſerued death (as the manner of that countrey was) found him walking before his tent, and there with heauie cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, ſubmitted himſelfe vnto his mercie, and with great humilitie and ſignes of repentance, craued his moſt gracious pardon. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg preſently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kiſſed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him: and within a few daies after, cauſed all ſuch things of his as were before confiſcat, to be againe reſtored vnto him; with all ſuch offices and promotions as he had before enjoyed: and by open proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man should either publikely or priuatly speake of that Moses had trespassed. Mahomet vnderstanding that Moses was returned againe into EPIRVS, and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much grieued thereat, and fumed exceedingly: First, for that he had at all trusted him; and then, that he had so let him slip out of his hands: being verily persuaded, that all that Moses had done, was but a fineneſſe of Scanderbeg to deceiue him.

Shortly after that Moses was returned into EPIRVS, Mahomet by like practise alluted vnto him Amesa, Scanderbeg his nephew; promising to make him king of EPIRVS in his vnckles steed. For by that meanes, the craftie tyrant thought it a more easie way to draw the mindes of the people of EPIRVS from Scanderbeg vnto him descended of the princes bloud, than to Moses, or to any other stranger he should set vp. Amesa vpon this hope of a kingdome, fled to CONSTANTINOPLE: and becauſe he would cleere the mind of the tyrant of all suspition and distrust, he carried with him his wife and children, as the most sure pledges of his fidelitie. This Amesa was of stature low, and the feature of his body not so perfect as might sufficiently expresse the hidden vertues of his mind: He was of courage hautie aboue measure, subtill, and of a pregnant wit; wonderfull painfull, and thereto courteous and bountifull (the chiefe meanes whereby aspiring minds steale away the hearts of men) whatsoeuer he got of himselfe, or had by the gift of his vnckle, he deuided it amongst his souldiours or friends: he was verie affable, and could notably both couer and dissemble his affections: for which things, he was aboue all others both beloued and honoured of all the people of EPIRVS, next vnto Scanderbeg himselfe. At his first comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promises, and vaine praises of himselfe as had Moses; but only excusing his owne reuolt, laboured to perswade him, That he had for just causes left his vnckle, with a desire now faithfully to serue him. And to that purpose spake vnto him as followeth:

Amesa his first speech vnto Mahomet.

If it should please thee (most noble Mahomet*) to call to remembrance the old iniuries, and auntient displeasures by vs committed against thine imperiall Maiestie: we might seeme now rather to haue come hither to receiue the just guerdon of our euill deserts, than vpon any hope of honor or preferment. For what could haue been done more in disgrace of the* Othoman empire, than that you haue seene long since done by vs, in the most dangerous time of the Hungarian war; rather of a malicious & set purpose, than for that we were just enemies? When as in the same perfidious course, I my selfe being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuse is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentance) your fathers army was betrayed at MORAVA, and the kingdome of EPIRVS by great treacherie wrested out of your fathers hands; the only cause of so many calamities, and of so much bloudshed. But vaine is this feare, and our suspition needlesse, with so wise and mercifull a prince; especially for that my yeares then greene, and youth prone vnto the harme of it selfe, and a mind not resting vpon his owne resolations, deceiued me. I beleeued mine vnckle (for the ignorant beleeue many things) and allured with the desire of soueraigntie (the proper disease of that age) and too much credulous, I forsooke you and followed his promises: but discretion growing with yeares, I haue by little and little perceiued both the slie perfidious dealing of mine vnckle, as also that my reuolt from you was more hurtfull vnto my selfe than to any other. Scanderbeg recouered, and also enlarged the kingdome of EPIRVS; but not without my great labour and helpe. I expected long time, that he should haue giuen me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at least some part thereof, as a small reward of my so great trauell and danger. Not long after he married a wife, and hath begot a young heire, a new successour in his kingdome: vnto me for shame of the world, because I should not altogither lead a priuat life, he hath assigned a base corner of EPIRVS; where he enioyning the rest, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this case I had much adoe to bridle my affections, and could neuer disgeast that iniurie: yet the iniquitie of the time, with the insolent disposition of the man, compelled me to smother vp my thoughts, and to make faire weather; least finding some suspition, he should craftely haue entrapped me, as he did of late George Streſie his sisters sonne; whom wrongfully charged with fained surmises, he hath almost depriued of all his possessions. I would willingly haue fled vnto the feet of your highnesse, I would gladly haue forsaken my ingratefull vnckle with the staines of his infamous kingdome; but that the remembrance of the old rebellion, and many iniuries sithence done, did make me afraid: vntill that now (God I thinke so appointing it) I came most gladly, following your most royall faith and promise. You had scarcely beckned vnto me, you had scarcely inuited me, hauing of long intentiuely waited ene-

rie occaſion; but ſtraight way I came with ſuch ſpeed, as if I would haue flowne: I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg or his euill happe, or your more proſperous ſucceſſe, as of late did Moles; leaſt I might thereby juſtly ſeeme either for feare or regard of ſome imminent danger, rather to haue prouided for mine owne ſafetie than to haue embraced your magnificence. Neither haue I left any thing for you in me to ſuſpect, nor any cauſe wherefore I ſhould deſire to returne againe into Epirvs: here are preſent moſt ſure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyaltie. Behold (worthy Mahomet) you haue whatſoeuer is deere vnto me, yea whatſoeuer nature could giue, pleaſing vnto men in the courſe of mans life. Theſe I haue brought vnto thee, which ſhould with violence haue been taken from an enemy: ſuch pawnes as might aſſure thee of the faith of a moſt doubtfull man. More than this, haue I brought nothing: for in ſo great ſpeed and ſecret departure, I could not haue regard of my ſubſtance. And if I might haue had time to haue truſſed vp my traſh at leyſure; yet I know not how, I ſhould haue thought it a kind of baſeneſſe, to haue brought with me any part of the poore reliques of mine old fortune: eſpecially vnto thee, of all other the richeſt. Onely my fidelitie I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I haue not: and if thou deſire of me any other bond for more aſſurance, I refuſe not whatſoeuer your highneſſe ſhall appoint: for I came not hither to ſet downe couenants and agreements of my ſelfe, but to receiue them from you. I dare not promiſe to vanquiſh mine vncle, and to ſubdue Epirvs with an army of fifteene thouſand men: the miſfortune of Haly-Baſſa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare victorie of Sebalias, with great bloodſhed gained, may ſerue for examples. In me you ſhall neither want diligence nor faithfull ſeruice: as for other things concerning the euent of this warre, and for the reuenge of the iniuries by you receiued; you being a prince of power inuincible, and of a moſt deepe iudgement, are not to be aduiſed by me your vnskilfull vaſſaile.

Ameſa honourably entertained by Mahomet.

This ſpeech of Ameſa, ſeemed vnto Mahomet free from all diſsimulation, foraſmuch as he knew moſt part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his preſence, confirmed the reſt. Wherfore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertainment, referring other matters vnto a farther time.

Vpon the approch of the Spring, Mahomet deſiring nothing more than to be reuenged vpon Scanderbeg, entred into conſultation with his great Baſſaes, concerning the inuaſion of Epirvs: vnto which counſell Ameſa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuiſe for the deſtruction of his countrey, of all others beſt liked. After the matter had been long too and fro debated, it was concluded, that Iſaack the great Baſſa of Constantinople, ſhould with an armie of fiftie thouſand be ſent againſt Scanderbeg, and Ameſa with him, hauing the charge of fiue thouſand horſemen: and the Baſſa to proclaime Ameſa king of Epirvs; thereby to perſuade the Epirots, that Mahomet inuaded Epirvs rather for the diſpleaſure he bare againſt Scanderbeg, and for the aduancement of Ameſa, than for any ambitious deſire he had to take vnto himſelfe that kingdome.

Great was the preparation for this warre, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying fame had in ſhort time filled euerie corner of Epirvs with the report of theſe newes; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay, ſent for his great captains and men of warre into Dibra, where that tempeſt was firſt to be expected: and when they were all aſſembled, he declared vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger, and what he thought thereof himſelfe as followeth.

A notable ſpeech of Scanderbeg vnto his captains, how the Turks were to be withſtood as they comming into Epirus.

Amongſt all other things which God hath left to vex and greeue the minds of men in ſo great varietie of worldly affaires, we ſee (right worthie ſouldiors) theſe two the greateſt, Hope, and Feare. The firſt a more comfortable thing, and proper to courageous minds (I may not ſay) of light beleefe: the other a thing of more diſcretion and ſafetie, which although it vſe to deferre the deſires of men, yet hath it power at length excellently to cure and ſeaſon the ſame. Hereupon is it eaſily to be gathered, that the great cheefetaines of former times haue gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in ſhew more hardie, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Carthaginentian captaine vſed to call Q. Fabius (whom the Romanes euer thought too ſlow and too fearefull) his great enemie: but Terentius Varro he called a greater enemie vnto his owne countrey and the people of Rome, than to himſelfe. But wherfore do I wrongfully call that Feare, which might more truly be called Diſcretion, or wholeſome Policie? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can denie, That thereof hath riſen the antient diſcipline of warre, and the old and ſeuere

gouernment of martiall affaires. This aduiſed careſulneſſe cheriſheth and nouriſheth Hope it ſelfe, it doth nothing raſhly, it hath eyes before, behind, and on both ſides, it waigheth in indifferent ballance things paſt, preſent, and to come. You may now perceiue to what end my ſpeech tendeth. I would firſt conferre with you, and know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this warre; that either I might yeeld vnto your opinion, or els you (as you haue alwaies hitherto done) to mine. You heare, you now heare with your eares what preparation, what warlike prouiſion is daily made againſt vs. Lo the great Baſſa of CONSTANTINOPLE, all the flower of EVROPE, and whole ſtrength of the Otho-man kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither euer did) to prooue my fortune a-gainſt him, not without your honour: but I thinke it better to vſe police and warie heed againſt ſo great an enemie, than our wonted force and courage. That notable ouerthrow of Hali Baſſa, ſo many great victories by vs atchieued, our minds by ſo many good haps confirmed, perſuade me to thinke that wee haue both courage and ſtrength to encounter him in plaine battaile: but the vncertaine euents of war, and fortune neuer ſufficiently knowne, maketh wiſe men to forget what is paſt, and to feare that is to come. It was neuer proper to any man, it was neuer giuen by inheritance, alwaies to ouercome; new occurrents require new correſpondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yeſterday, preſume to aſſure your ſelfe to deuide the ſpoile of your enemies to day. Victorie is like a trauellour, and goeth hi-ther and thither, not reſting long in a place: and although it be for moſt part both gotten and kept by courage and diſcretion; yet oftentimes, when you haue moſt carefully and politiquely diſpoſed of all things, the fortune and chance of warre haue therein a great ſway. I was wont to require (I remember it well) onely valour and courage in my ſoldiors, contemning all externall accidents and fortunes haps; if you did promiſe vnto me courageous minds, I aſſured you of all good hap and proſperous ſucceſſe: but that loſſe we receiued at BELGRADE (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth, and alwayes ab-horreth to thinke vpon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme farre other-wiſe of worldly matters, and the vncertainetie of fortune. What if that day had been longer? or Scbalias of more courage? might not the ſtate of EPIRVS haue that day been vtterly ouerthrowne? We were then rather by God preſerued, than by any thing that was in our ſelues: what remained more, but that we ſhould like cowards haue yeeld our ſelues to haue been bound of the conquerours? The night defended vs, yea euen God himſelfe defended vs; who tooke from them both policie and force, and gaue vs time to breath and eſcape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the comming of the vi-ctor: Howbeit, he tooke nothing from vs, he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much carefull to keepe the honour he had alreadie gained, and peraduenture in feare of them of whom he was not without cauſe moſt feared. I ſpeake not this of purpoſe to terrifie any of you, but rather to admoniſh you, and to conſult with you, how ſuch great preparations may be fruſtrated and ouerthrowne, and ſome notable victorie by vs atchieued, without the price of our blood, or the loſſe of ſuch things as we haue. The number of our enemies is great, and ſo great, as vntill this day we neuer ſaw in EPIRVS greater, except at ſuch times as they came to beſiege our cities, and to deuour vs all. Now if we ſhall meet them in the plaine fields in a ſet battaile, the euent thereof will be doubtfull, many of vs muſt needs fall, ma-ny of vs muſt die (I would I might be a falſe prophet) before ſo great an armie will either flie or be ouercome, your victorie ſhall be mingled with teares, and the heauineſſe of the conquerour not much vnlike the ſorrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we loſt at BELGRADE? Is that loſſe ſo to be recouered? What flower of Chiualrie, hardly to be in many yeares reſtored? How many worthie men were there ſlaine? EPIRVS muſt needs in ſhort time be vnpeopled, if we ſhall ſo deſperatly only ſeeke for ſuch glorious victories. Wherefore if we will doe well, we muſt ſo fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow alſo. Neither are our enemies and we in like caſe: The loſſe of fortie or fiftie thouſand is leſſe vnto the Turkiſh tyrant, than the loſſe of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but a few, and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our owne ſakes, yet let vs doe it for our wiues and childrens, whoſe welfare and libertie dependeth of our liues: I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almoſt euery one of your names, which maketh me alſo more careſull of your health. And yet I would not refuſe to trie the whole fortune of this battaile in plaine field, if we might thereby end all the wars againſt the Turks for euer; if I were in hope ſo to find an end of our labours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours, for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our poſteritie: but a new enemie alwayes ariſeth, and we muſt ſtill looke for new wars. When this Iſaack is gone, another Iſaack will ere long come in his place: we ſhall be alwaies exerciſed with new wars, and encloſed with new dangers: It is the deſtinie of EPIRVS (as far as I can ſee) and wee our ſelues are borne thereto. Wherefore we muſt gather our wits together, we muſt well husband our forces, and ſo diuide our patrimonie, as that we may alwayes haue ſomthing to content our creditors, when they ſhall chance to come vpon vs. Yet ſhall God (no doubt) giue an end alſo vnto theſe troubles: for extremities cannot be of long continuance, and you your ſelues ſhall at length take reſt: yea, the ſtrong and puiſſant enemie, wearied with ſo many vaine attempts, will at laſt haue ynough thereof, and leaue off his perpetuall hatred againſt vs: then ſhall it be to you no ſmall pleaſure to remember ſo many labours and dangers paſt. Thus haue I declared vnto you the commodities and incommodities enſuing the victorie in plaine battell. But what if we be vanquiſhed? Where haue we any hope of reliefe left? from whence may we expect helpe? Will the bloodie enemie, inflate with victorie, expect whileſt we again recouer our ſtrength and encounter him againe with new forces? No, he will purſue vs and chaſe vs, ſo long as any of vs are left: and hauing ouercome vs, will poure out the reſt of his furie vpon our townes and country, then ſubiect to his iniurie. But ſome of you peraduenture will ſay, that they are by policie to be ouertaken, and not to be met in open field: of which opinion I alſo am my ſelfe, yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the ſame. Then I thinke it beſt to deceiue them, when they thinke they cannot be deceiued: when as they being as it were in poſſeſſion of a ſuppoſed victorie, like men ouerioyed, ſhall caſt no perill. Now they come euen from the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, full of diſtruſt, prying into euery corner, as men before warned by others harmes, and ſo many dreadfull examples of their fellows: Beſides that, they haue with them my graceleſſe nephew and domeſticall foe Ameſa, who will teach them to foreſee and ſhun ſuch ſnares as in times paſt he with vs was wont to lay for them. Wherfore we muſt now tower vp vnto the height of ſome notable and ſtrange policie, whereby both our country may be from danger preſerued, and alſo ſome great victorie, without our owne bloodſhed (which ſeldome chanceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our antient glorie and renowne, we haue to this day by many moſt notable victories gained: But time and ſpace, and the ſight of the enemie, ſhall furniſh vs with this deuiſe. Now (that my diſcourſe may come to the purpoſed end) firſt of all, all things ſubiect either to the furie or victorie of the enemie, are to be remoued out of the way; all people, of what age, ſex, or condition ſoeuer, are to be brought out of the countrey into places of ſafetie; and then, our townes are to be furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons and all other neceſſarie prouiſion, againſt all the chaunces of fortune. Beſides, who knoweth the ſecret deſignes of the tyrant? or whether he himſelfe (of long time deſirous of reuenge, and thirſting after our blood) will follow the Baſſa at the heeles, or no? Perhaps I may beleeue and feare more than is needfull: but it is good to feare all that may be feared, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things ſhall thus be ſet in order, if there ſhall be nothing left in the fields or in the villages, that may enrich, feed, or feare our enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our enemies, vndoubtedly we ſhall be victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in theſe wars, I will aſſuredly deliuer your enemies into your hands to be ſlain at your pleaſure; and (by the leaue of God) will make the name and valour of the Epirots more terrible vnto the Turke, than euer it hath been in the time of our anceſtors. I flatter not my ſelfe, I deceiue you not: if any thing may be promiſed in worldly actions, this I aſſure you of, and this will I take vpon mee. But theſe things are better done than ſaid. In the meane while, to ſpend no more time in longer talke and diſcourſe (than which, no greater loſſe can be to ſoldiors) let euery one of vs take a part in this charge, for the good diſpoſing of all things, and how to withſtand the enemie. I will not commaund any thing to others, which I will not my ſelfe doe: I will refuſe nothing, or reckon any thing baſe, which may tend to the common honour or profit of vs all.

This ſpeech of Scanderbeg was well liked and joyfully receiued of all the hearers, ſo that many beſought him to manifeſt vnto them how he purpoſed to proceed in thoſe wars: whereunto hee with cheerefull countenance anſwered, That it was ynough for him, if they did but beleeue him, promiſing himſelfe in perſon to bee in the moſt dangerous actions as farre as any of them, wherwith they reſted contented. And preſently diſpatching his lieutenants into diuers parts of his kingdome, as he thought moſt conuenient, prouided, That all things were in ſhort time conueyed out of the countrey into the ſtrong townes and other places of refuge. No corne, no cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the countrey; but all left deſolate, in like manner as was before at the comming of the great king Amurath to the ſiege of CROIA.

The Epirots remoue all their things out of the country into the ſtrong townes, before the coming of the Turke.

By this time Iſaack the great Baſſa was come into EPIRVS, accompanied with Ameſa: and as hee marched, ſtill ſent before him his ſcouts and eſpials, carefully to view euery corner of the countrey, for feare to bee entrapped as others before him had beene; directed in his journey for moſt part by Ameſa. Scanderbeg had in readineſſe ſuch an armie as he had purpoſed to vſe againſt his his mightie enemie, but lay with ſix thouſand horſemen onely in ſhew, as if hee had determined with them to haue giuen them battaile, but meaning indeed nothing leſſe. For as ſoone as the Baſſa was come in ſight, he with thoſe horſemen, according as hee had before appointed, as if hee had beene diſcouraged with the very ſight of the Turkes, turned his backe and fled. And becauſe he would not giue them any occaſion to ſuſpect it to be done for ſome policie or fineneſſe, and ſo to make them more carefull, he fled not into the mountaines or woods, as his wonted manner was, but directly toward LYSSA, a towne of the Venetians ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt, as if hee had quite deſpaired of the keeping of EPIRVS, and fled thither for refuge. The Baſſa ſeeing him flie, was glad thereof, and ſent certaine troupes of horſemen to purſue him, & diligently to marke which way he tooke: but encamped himſelfe with his armie in the plaines of DIBRA, neer vnto ORONYCHIVM, where Scanderbeg lay before: & there reſted his armie, wearie of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horſemen, ſent after Scanderbeg. But vpon their returne, when it was for a certaintie reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled out of EPIRVS, and not an enemie to be ſeene, the Turkes began to rejoyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any loſſe driuen the enemie out of the countrey; yet much greeued, that they could no where find any thing to ſatisfie their greedie deſires: for why, all things were ſo cleane gone, as if the countrey had beene ſwept againſt their comming, which might haue beene a ſufficient cauſe for them to haue diſtruſted ſome great matter; but they flattering themſelues, ſuppoſed all this to be done for feare of them, vpon extreame deſperation: ſuch is the fraile condition of men, to looſe ſtrength of bodie, common ſence, yea, their reaſon and vnderſtanding, when ſome great miſcheefe is appointed for their ouerthrow or deſtruction. The Baſſa ſeeing the enemie fled, and now no cauſe of feare, conſulted with his cheefe captaines, what were now beſt to bee done? Ameſa ſtill perſuading him not to remoue, but there to ſtay a time, and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whoſe opinion preuailed, ſaid it was better to goe farther into the countrey, and to take the ſpoile thereof, before the countrey people ſhould conuay away all their ſubſtance into places of ſafetie, as they had done there in DIBRA, and leaue them nothing but the bare ground and emptie cottages. By this perſuaſion, the Baſſa earely next morning in good order ſet forward: commaunding by generall proclamation, That no man vpon paine of death ſhould breake his array or ſtraggle from the armie. Yet before he ſet forward, he called Ameſa vnto him; whom after he had highly commended, and with great vehemencie inuayed againſt Scanderbeg, he with the great applauſe of the whole armie in the name of Mahomet created him king of EPIRVS. That day he marched not farre, by reaſon of the great heat: for it was then about the middeſt of Iuly. Yet when he had well wearied himſelfe with that daies trauell, finding neither enemie nor any things els worthie to be accounted in any part of a victorie; he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and ſending forth his ſcouts euery way, but eſpecially towards LYSSA. The next day, which was the third day after the Baſſaes comming into EPIRVS, hee ſet forward againe, and came at length into ÆMATHIA, and there encamped that night.

Ameſa is by the Baſſa created king of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turks ſuppoſed) was gone a great way out of their ſight towards LYSSA, and come euen to the borders of his kingdome, he there ſtaied all the reſt of that day. And a little before the going downe of the ſunne, he with a few ſelect horſemen departed from the army, and with painfull trauell got vp to the top of the high mountaines, from whence a man might by day well diſcouer all the plaines of ÆMATHIA. There he appointed one Peleus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horſemen to marke diligently which way the enemy held, and by certaine ſecret and appointed waſtings and ſignes, to giue knowledge thereof to the army. After ſuch order taken, he returned himſelfe, and came againe to the campe after midnight. And preſently riſing with his army, and fetching a compaſſe about, came vndiſcouered, and ſecretly encamped himſelfe as neere as he could vnto the mountaines where his ſcouts lay, with eagles eies waiting for the leaſt mouing of the enemy. The Baſſa deſirous to get as farre as hee could into the countrey, before the heat of the day, began early in the morning to ſet forward, and came to the plaines of PHARSALIA, through the world ſpoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, between the two moſt famous chieftaines Cæſar and Pompeius: and now once more to bee made famous, by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Here the enemie finding ſome ſtragling cattell, and other ſmall things which the country people had in their haſtie flight left behind them, fell to ſeeking after bootie, and as men without

feare, spent that day in roaming vp and downe the countrey, in hope to find something: and at night encamped without any great watch, but towards LYSSVM, from whence they (in great securitie) looked for the comming of Scanderbeg; and as it were in disgrace of him, carried Amesa in triumph vp and downe the campe, as if he had been alreadie possessed of the kingdome of EPIRVS. Scanderbeg lying on the other side of the mountaines, perceiued by his espials which way the enemy lay: and with great silence vnder the couert of the mountaines and woods, secretly bent his course the same way, vntill hee came to a mountaine called TVMENIST, at the foot whereof he encamped that night. The next morning the Bassa holding on his way, came and encamped not farre from the same mountaine, and there staied himselfe with halfe his army, and sent Amesa with the other halfe to burne and spoyle the countrey: who about noone returned to the campe with such prey as he had got, with his souldiours well wearied with trauell and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a carefull housholder, who being about to entertaine and feast some honourable personages, trusteth not to his wife and seruants, but looketh vnto the bestowing of his prouision himselfe, carefully ordering and disposing and setting foorth all things, especially if his prouision (for want of abilitie) be short, to welcome so great guests; and setting all things foorth to the greatest shew, seeketh at least to fill the eies of his guests, although he doubt to satisfie their appetites: so he carefully viewing all the mountaines and thick woods therabouts without resting, set Moses in one place, Tanusius in another, and all the rest in places most conuenient. He appointeth euerie man what to doe, and instructeth them, and considereth of euerie particuler circumstance himselfe: and so diuideth his forces, as might best serue his purpose, and make the most terrible shew vnto the enemy: for which purpose he in euerie companie placed mo trumpets, drums, and other instruments of war, than he had before at any time vsed. When he had so to his most aduantage bestowed so many of his captaines and souldiours as he thought good, and as the nature of the places would giue leaue, he with foure thousand horsemen and the like number of foot, speedily marching vp the rough mountaine of TVMENIST, from thence plainly beheld in what order the Turkes campe lay in the plaines below. The Turks, especially they which were lately returned with Amesa from the spoile of the countrey, lay scattered abroad in the fields, with their horses vnbridled and vnsadled, resting their wearie bodies: some got vnder the shadows of trees were victualing themselues; some hauing filled their bellies, lay fast on sleep vpon the greene grasse; the rest were passing the time, some with one kind of sport, some with an other, as souldiours doe in field when they haue little or nothing to doe: for it was then the hotest time both of the yeare and of the day, being about the midst of Iuly, and the noontime of the day. The like negligence was also in that part of the campe where the Bassa himselfe lay: euerie man taking his ease and pleasure, with small regard of horse or armour; for being out of feare of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to haue been a great way off at LYSSVM, they lay as men without care wrapped vp in securitie, the common destruction of great armies and common wealths. Amesa with the great captaines, were at the same time altogither in the Bassaes pauilion, consulting what course they were best to take, to doe something to the contentment of Mahomet, and their owne commendation: Some said it were best, with fire and sword to destroy all they could in EPIRVS; and so hauing laied the countrey wast, to returne: Others thought it better to march directly to CROIA, to proue if the citizens could be perswaded to yeeld themselues, and receiue Amesa for their king; otherwise to threaten them with a continuall siege, and vtter destruction of the countrey, if vpon the vaine expectation of helpe from Scanderbeg they should refuse to submit themselues. As for Scanderbeg himselfe, who then lay houering ouer their heads, he was in all that consultation least feared: who from the top of the mountaine, beholding the securitie and disorder of the Turks camp, and delighted with the sight thereof; encouraged his souldiors, and martialed them in such order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the enemy. But first of all he determined to oppresse the Turkes scouts, which lay at the foot of the mountaine: for which purpose he himselfe with a few horsmen first secretly discended the mountain, the rest of his army following shortly after, and so suddenly came vpon the scouts that he slew them all, excepting one, who escaping by the swiftnesse of his horse, came running into the campe as one halfe feared out of his wit, crying out that Scanderbeg was comming. The Turks suspecting nothing lesse than the comming of him that way, at the present instant hardly beleeued that he was so nie: whē as he following him at the heels as fast as he could, with his horsmen and his footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had been a sudden tempest, broken in amongst amongst the vnarmed Turkes, and there making great slaughter of them, filled all the campe with sudden tumult and feare. Ameſa who at the first noise had speedily got him to his charge, with his souldiours some halfe armed, some on foot, hauing no leisure to bridle their horses, was the first that made head against Scanderbeg. The Bassa also did what he might in that sudden feare and shortnesse of time, to arme his men, and to put them in order: but whilest these things were in doing, the souldiours which lay in ambush in the woods, came downe the mountaine with such horrible shouts and noise of instruments of warre, as if heauen and earth should haue presently gone togither; the hils and vallies with their hollow ecchoes, encreasing the terror of the alarum. Insomuch, that the Turkes dismaied, and fearing that all the force of EPIRVS with the countries adjoyning had come vpon them, began to flie on euerie side, before that Moses and the rest that lay in ambush were come into the plaines. Ameſa acquainted with his vnckles stratagems, as much as he could encouraged the Turkes; crying alowd and telling them, That such vaine tumults and terrours were not to be feared, being but the bare shifts and deuises of their enemies to couer their owne weaknesse: and by his owne valour staied many which before were about to haue fled. In this while, the Bassa hauing put his men in best order he could, was comming to the aid of Ameſa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg: but in his setting forward, he was so valiantly encountred on the one side by Moſes with his horsemen, and on the other by Tanuſius and Emauuel with their footmen, that he was enforced, not without great losse, againe to retire vnto his trenches.

Scanderbeg sadly assaileth the Turkes.

All the hope of the battell depended vpon Ameſa, who still with great courage withstood his vnckle; exhorting his souldiours valiantly as men to endure that first assault, which should afterwards bring them most assured victorie: hartening them on with hope of speedie help from their fellowes, if they would but a while endure the furie of their enemies, whose hearts (as hee said) would presently be discouraged, if they preuailed not in that their first and desperat attempt, hauing nothing else to trust vnto. By which persuasion the Turkes were againe encouraged, accounting it a great dishonour to flie, and leaue their chiefetaine in the field. But when they saw Scanderbeg still to preuaile vpon them, and that no helpe came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbeg his horsemen slaine as they were arming themselues; many were by the way cut off as they were comming, and the rest put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Ameſa, turned their backs and fled also. Scanderbeg his horsemen pursuing the chase, made great slaughter of the Turkes, and in the same chase tooke Ameſa prisoner. Scanderbeg, hauing ouerthrown that part of the Turkes battell, was comming with a thousand footmen and some horsemen, to haue ayded Moſes against the Bassa: but before his comming, Moſes to blot out his former infamie, had with inuincible courage put the great Bassa with all his army to flight: and Scanderbeg following the chase, gaue him not leaue to looke behind him, vntill he was got out of EPIRVS. Many were in this chase taken prisoners, and amongst the rest one Meſites a Sanzacke, a man of great account amongst the Turkes. In this battell beside the prisoners, were taken twentie of the Turkes faireſt ensignes. As for horses, armour, and other spoiles taken in the field, and in the campe, all which fell vnto the souldiors share, it is almost incredible to be told. The number of the slaine Turkes is of diuers diuersly reported, they which write of the most, reckon vp thirtie thousand; and they which speake of the least, account twentie-thousand. Of the Christians were lost but sixtie. Now if any account it strange, that so great a victorie should be gained with so little losse; not to speake of that is written in holy writ, let him but read the auncient histories of the Romans, or the chronicles of our owne country, and he shall in them find victories no lesse strange. There was to be seene the sudden and strange alteration of these worldly things, no more indeed (whatsoeuer we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we haue not. Scanderbeg possesseth the rich pauilion, erst belonging to the great Bassa; and other of his captaines enioy tents, with much other rich furniture neuer prepared for their vse. Ameſa which the same day as a victorious conquerour ouerran a great part of ÆMATHIA with his horsemen, and was in triumph carried vp with the generall acclamation of many thousands of valiant souldiors, and honoured as a king, and of them so called; is now led through the Christian army to his vnkle, with his hands bound behind him as a slaue, speechlesse and confounded, vnable to hold vp his head for shame: whose miserie moued most of the beholders to compassion, and forced teares out of the eies of many.

A notable victorie of the Christians.

The next day after this great victorie, Scanderbeg caused the bodies of the slaine Turkes to be

be buried, togither with their horſes; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their loathſome carkaſes ſhould not infect the countrey: and after that, returned in great triumph to CROIA. By the way as he went, the countrey people, which were before for feare of the Turks fled into the woods and mountaines in great multitudes, met him; as did others alſo out of the cities, whoſe mouthes were all full of his worthy praiſes. Before him went the captiue Turkes with their hands bound behind them, excepting ſuch as were enforced to carrie the Turkes enſignes: Next vnto them followed the great Baſſaes rich pauilion, in ſuch manner ſupported by the ſouldiours, as if it had been in the field: Then came Scanderbeg himſelfe with the Turkiſh Sanzacke, and Ameſa following him; for Ameſa had with great and humble ſute obtained of his vncle, that he might not as he well deſerued, be carried bound amongſt the other captiues: Laſt of all came Scanderbeg his victorious ſouldiours in goodly order, euerie man leading a ſpare horſe taken from the enemy, and loaded with ſpoyle. So when he was come to CROIA, and there of his ſubjects joyfully receiued, he brake vp his army, and gaue euerie man leaue at his pleaſure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Ameſa, were committed to ſafe keeping, vntill farther order was taken for them. Ameſa afterwards was for his treaſon worthely condemned to perpetuall priſon, and by an embaſſador from Scanderbeg ſent vnto king Alphonſus to NAPLES, there to be kept in durance; and with him was alſo ſent an honourable preſent of part of the ſpoile taken from the Turkes, in token of the victorie. What became afterward of this Ameſa, concerneth not much the courſe of our hiſtorie; yet to ſatisfie the deſirous, I think it not amiſſe with him to ſtray a little out of the way.

When Ameſa had remained a yeare in priſon at NAPLES, Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of the death of Alphonſus, by his embaſſadour requeſted of Ferdinand his ſonne, to haue Ameſa reſtored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into EPIRVS, and caſt in priſon at CROIA; but not in ſuch ſtraight manner as before: for Scanderbeg according to his accuſtomed clemencie, began now to forget the injurie to him before done; and at laſt ouercome with the continuall ſupplication and teares of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and reſtoring him to his former libertie, receiued him alſo into his former fauor. But Ameſa remembring what pledges of his loyaltie hee had left with Mahomet at CONSTANTINOPLE, and fearing what would become of his wife and children, if he ſhould haſtely vſe that his libertie, giuing his vncle moſt humble thankes, brake vnto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth:

The ſpeech of Ameſa to Scanderbeg.

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodneſſe onely, without any deſert of mine, haue regarded my life and welfare, it behoueth me alſo to be carefull for the life of others: leaſt whileſt I receiue your exceeding bountie with too much deſire of mine owne health and honour, I doe at this preſent, by this ſame benefit of yours, caſt away them, whom I haue long ſithence by mine owne trecherie vndone. Mine vnfortunate and guiltleſſe wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent children are with him alſo: theſe yet liue, and ſhall liue, ſo long as the tyrant ſhall thinke, that I liue in heart his; but when he ſhall once perceiue by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will foorthwith cut and rend in peeces the pledges of my faith, and their innocent blood ſhall pay the guilt of their fathers offence. Wherefore the Othoman tyrant is of me by ſome deuice to be deceiued, that I may in the meane time preſerue thoſe pledges, vntill I may by ſome fit occaſion afterwards redeeme the ſame. I will by your leaue this night take my flight out of CROIA, as if I had broken priſon, and eſcaped againſt your will, and ſo flie vnto Mahomet, making the greateſt ſhew I can of my wonted loue and loyaltie towards him: not omitting to heare, or ſpeake vnto that credulous king ſuch things concerning your eſtate, as I was wont in my better fortune: that hauing ſo cleared my ſelfe of all ſuſpition, which he perhaps hath conceiued by reaſon of my captiuitie and long ſtay with you, I may at length, with my wife and children, ſo eſcape from him: Wherein you may helpe me much, if you ſhall openly make ſhew as if you were greeued with my eſcape, and ſeeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the priſon for the ſame. In the meane time, whileſt I ſhall ſtay in the tyrants court expecting ſome fit time for my eſcape, I will ſtand you in ſtead of an intelligencer, ſo that your enemie ſhall not to my knowledge either attempt or goe about any thing againſt you, which ſhall be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refuſed not to graunt whatſoeuer he had requeſted, but ſaid vnto him:

Ameſa

Ameſa, ſithence we haue graunted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not prohibit you to vſe that our gift to your moſt good, and to the preſeruation of them who for euer may moſt juſtly call vpon you, as debtor vnto them, for their welfare and libertie. Go thy waies, proceed, take thy time and occaſion as ſeemeth vnto thee beſt; and at length reforme thy ſelfe, whileſt thou yet haſt ſufficient time and ſpace. We now beleeue you in all things, and well like of this your deuiſe: Ameſa you ſhall herein deceiue no man but your ſelfe, if you ſhall longer follow the faith & court of the barbarous king, whereas like danger is both of bodie and ſoule both to thee and thine. Whenſoeuer thou ſhalt returne vnto vs, thou canſt not doe vs a greater pleaſure: and in what regard thou haſt heretofore been with vs, in the ſame thou ſhalt be with vs againe.

The anſwere of Scanderbeg to Ameſa.

The ſame night Ameſa by ſecret order from Scanderbeg, eſcaped both out of priſon and out of CROIA: and in the morning it was all ouer the citie, that he was gone, and the keepers ſharply rebuked for their negligence. He comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, eaſily perſuaded Mahomet, that he was by chance eſcaped, with all things els that he told him: yet was he not for all that, ſo well graced of him as before; not for any diſtruſt he had in the man, but for the euill ſucceſſe hee had in the former warres. Now whether Ameſa neglected his promiſed returne, or could find no oportunitie to performe the ſame, is vncertaine: but certaine it is, that ſhortly after he died at CONSTANTINOPLE, poyſoned as was thought by the commaundement of Mahomet, who could no longer endure the ſight of him, whom he reckoned the author of the notable ouerthrow receiued in ÆMATHIA. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant man, well worthie of remembrance, had not his haughtie thoughts ſoared too high with the deſire of ſoueraignetie.

The death of Ameſa.

When Mahomet vnderſtood in what manner Iſaack Baſſa was ouerthrowne, and his armie diſcomfited, hee was therewith much greeued, and juſtly blamed the Baſſaes ſecuritie: yet ſuch was his credit with his ſoueraigne, that the matter was in better ſort paſſed ouer than was ſuppoſed it would haue beene. Neuertheleſſe, Mahomet in reuenge thereof would willingly haue imployed all his forces vpon Scanderbeg, if his more vrgent affaires would haue ſo permitted. For at the ſame time, beſides that great warres began to ariſe betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeares after) hee was certainely enformed, That the Chriſtian princes were making a ſtrong confederation againſt him. At which time Mahomet diſdaining openly to ſue for peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practiſed by ſuch as were ſent to redeeme the priſoners, and alſo by the Sanzacke himſelfe, to perſuade Scanderbeg to require peace of him; aſſuring him, that if he did but aske it, it would for a long time bee eaſily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg well acquainted with the Turkiſh policie, vtterly refuſed to do. Wherefore Mahomet for defence of his countries bordering vpon EPIRVS, ſent two of his moſt expert captaines, Sinam, and Hamur, with each of them foureteene thouſand ſouldiors into MACEDONIA, expreſſely charging them not to enter at any time or vpon any occaſion, into EPIRVS, or by any meanes to prouoke Scanderbeg: which his commaundement they ſo well obſerued, that the Epirots by the ſpace of almoſt two yeares enjoyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old injuries wearing out with time, at length by the mediation of the ſame captaines, a peace for a yeare was agreed vpon betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. In which time he paſſed ouer into APVLIA, and there notably aided king Ferdinand againſt the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our hiſtorie, I of purpoſe paſſe ouer.

A peace for a yeare concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet, as he deſired, he determined according to his wonted maner to trouble the quiet eſtate of Scanderbeg: and ſo ſending a new ſupplie of ſouldiors vnto Synam-beg, who then lay with a ſtrong garriſon vpon the frontiers of EPIRVS, commaunded him with all his power to make warres vpon Scanderbeg. Synam accordingly, with an armie of twentie thouſand men entred into EPIRVS, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his armie vtterly ouerthrown, ſo that but few eſcaped by flight with Synam himſelfe. Preſently after he ſent Aſam-beg, another of his captaines, into the ſame ſeruice, with an armie of thirtie thouſand, whom Scanderbeg alſo in plaine battaile vanquiſhed at OCRIDA: in which battaile Aſam himſelfe was ſore wounded, and finding no way to eſcape, was glad to yeeld himſelfe priſoner to Scanderbeg, by whom hee was courteouſly vſed, and afterwards ſet at libertie. Iuſſum-beg following Aſam with eighteene thouſand into EPIRVS, was ſet vpon by Scanderbeg alſo, and hauing loſt part of his armie, was glad glad by ſpeedie flight to ſaue himſelfe with the reſt. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old captain and a man of great experience (who had beene a great commaunder, and a companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Amurath) requeſted of Mahomet, That he might proue his fortune againſt his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, aſſuring him of better ſucceſſe than before. The long and approued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in ſuch hope of good ſpeed, that he gaue preſent order for the leuying of ſuch an armie as Caraza had requeſted, and for ten thouſand mo than he had at the firſt required. With this ſtrong armie, in number almoſt fortie thouſand, Caraza ſet forward, hauing before filled the minds of men with the expectation of ſome great matter to haue beene by him done. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding certainely, that Caraza was comming, ſtood more in doubt of the man than of his power: and therefore aſſembled greater forces than hee had vſually done before: and to welcome him, ſent two thouſand of his beſt and moſt expert ſouldiors ſecretly into the enemies country; who lying in ambuſh amongſt the woods & mountaines, whereby Caraza muſt needs paſſe, ſuddenly ſet vpon foure thouſand horſemen, the forerunners of Caraza his armie; who marching diſorderedly, and fearing no ſuch matter, were in a trice ouerthrowne, and moſt part of them ſlaine: thoſe few that eſcaped, fled backe againe to the armie, as if they had come in poaſt to bring tidings of ſome haſtie newes to the Generall. With which ſo vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was ſo diſcomfited, that if he might for ſhame, he could haue beene content to haue returned againe and gone no farther: yet for his honours ſake holding on his way, he came into EPIRVS; where whileſt hee was (after the manner of old men) long in reſoluing what courſe to take, he was vpon the ſudden aſſailed by Scanderbeg, before hee could well put his men in order of battaile. At which time there fell ſuch a vehement ſhower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three dayes together it rained continually (for it was about the later end of Autumne) all which time Scanderbeg ceaſed not in one place or other to trouble the Turks campe: ſo that the old Generall, partly diſtempered with the extremitie of the weather, which for the violence therof he tooke to be ominous; and more diſcouraged with the reſtleſſe attempts of Scanderbeg, riſe with his armie, and retiring back, by the ſame way he came returned to CONSTANTINOPLE. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that hauing promiſed ſo much, had performed ſo little: yet afterwards was again by him in ſome ſort commended, for that he had with leſſe loſſe looked vpon Scanderbeg, than other his Generals before ſent againſt him.

Mahomet perceiuing that Scanderbeg was not to be ſubdued but with ſuch forces as hee was not then at leiſure to imploy vpon him, thought it not amiſſe to proue if hee could by faire ſpeeches and glorious ſhewes of fained friendſhip get within him, and ſo bring him to confuſion. For which purpoſe he ſent vnto him an embaſſadour, with rich preſents, and letters of this purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of ALBANIA and EPIRVS, ſendeth greeting.

The letters of Scanderbeg to Mahomet.

I thinke friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendſhip more firm, than that which hath growne of long and mutuall conuerſing and liuing together: and eſpecially if the ſame haue taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done betwixt vs two; who haue of long time, euen from our childhood, liued together in great loue and friendſhip, when as you firſt lay as hoſtage in my fathers court. Wherfore beloued Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all thoſe things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted; and being mindfull alſo of all thoſe things which you haue oftentimes done for the aduancement of our empire and kingdome, and for the glorie of the Othoman familie; I cannot chuſe but imbrace thee with a ſingular Zeale and affection. For I take God to witnes, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleaſing vnto me in my life, than to haue thee with me, and for a while to enioy thy companie. Neither needeſt thou to fear any thing to come vnto me, for that my ſouldiors without my knowledge or commaundement haue of late broken in and ſpoiled thy kingdom: which thing as reaſon required, was vnto me exceedingly diſpleaſing: neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquiſhed and ouercome, and ſo receiued the iuſt reward of their euill deſerts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equitie of thy cauſe, and as thy heart could haue deſired. But to let theſe things paſſe, the remembrance of our old loue and friendſhip perſuadeth me to come to agreement, & to joine together with thee in a perpetuall league

of amitie: to the intent that our auntient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reaſon of long abſence is almoſt worne out, may againe take life, encreaſe, and be confirmed. Of which peace, let theſe bee the capitulations, if they ſhall ſeeme vnto you reaſonable: for I know it belongeth vnto him that requireth not the peace, to appoint the conditions of the ſame. Firſt, we require of you freely and peaceably to ſuffer our armies to paſſe through your kingdome, for the beſieging of the cities and inuading of the countries ſubiect to the Venetians our enemies: Then, to deliuer vnto vs your ſonne Iohn in hoſtage, whom we will always vſe as one of our own naturall children: And afterwards, that our marchants and men of trade may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your kingdome with their marchandize, and there freely and ſafely vſe their negotiation: Laſt of all, that your ſelfe in perſon may at your pleaſure ſafely and without all feare repaire vnto vs, and in like manner returne againe. In which things if you will yeeld vnto vs, I promiſe in the faith of a king, to graunt vnto you and your kingdome ſincere peace, with perpetuall tranquilitie; and that there ſhall not be any more deerer vnto me than your ſelfe; and will neuer to the vttermoſt of our power permit your kingdome to be infeſted or moleſted by any of our ſubiects, or others. Whatſoeuer you ſhall farther receiue from vs by the mouth of our embaſſadour Muſtapha, you may thereto giue full credence. Fare you well from our imperiall pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE the 10 of May 1561.

Scanderbeg hauing receiued theſe letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned him anſwere by the ſame meſſenger as followeth:

The ſouldiour of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, prince of the Albaneſes and Epirots, vnto Mahomet prince of the Turkes, greeting.

The anſwere of Scanderbeg to the former letters of Mahomet.

Your letters (moſt magnificent) are deliuered vnto vs: wherein you write of your exceeding loue and ſingular affection towards vs, confirmed as you ſay by old acquaintance: which being growne vp betwixt vs, and by tract of time firmely rooted and as it were into nature conuerted, ſhall alwaies retaine his force and ſtrength. But for as much as it ſeemeth vnto you good to awake the ſame, hauing of long time and many yeares lien as it were aſleepe; and to make a motion that we ſhould enter into a certaine new league and confederation, whereof amongſt other conditions of the league by you propounded, this is one, That your forces may freely paſſe through my kingdome, to inuade the Venetians: Vnto this your requeſt, worthie Mahomet, it ſtandeth neither with equitie nor with mine honour to conſent, for ſo much as the Venetians are my eſpeciall good friends and confederats. As for that you deſire to haue my ſonne Iohn with you in hoſtage for the better aſſurance of the peace betwixt vs, I ſhould peraduenture doe it (moſt noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would giue me leaue: but ſithence I haue no moe but him, and he as yet a tender child, it is not for the good either of him or vs, to haue him now taken from vs, when as he ought of vs to be moſt tenderly cheriſhed, and carefully inſtructed. As for that you requeſted concerning your marchants, that they may freely and ſafely trafficke into my kingdome at their pleaſure, I can be content to yeeld thereunto, and wiſh heartily, that there might be a free entercourſe for our marchants indifferently with their commodities into both our kingdomes. Farther, whereas you earneſtly perſuade me boldly and without feare to come vnto you, that by ſuch enterview and perſonall preſence, our great deſire, growne of long abſence, might be the better ſatisfied: in this thing moſt excellent prince, I cannot but praiſe your moſt honourable diſpoſition, and commend your good nature; and would therefore boldly follow your perſuaſion, if my other vrgent affaires, with the gouernment of my kingdome, would ſo permit. But what ſhould I doe? my ſonne Iohn is (as I ſaid before) but little, and as yet vnfit to gouerne: and my people (as you know) loue alwayes to haue ſomething to doe; being by nature a fierce and reſtleſſe nation, whom I my ſelfe haue much adoe to rule and gouerne: For all that, I will come vnto you according to your deſire, expecting onely a more commodious time. So fare you well, and loue me ſtill. From our campe the 30 of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had receiued theſe letters, and well peruſed the ſame, he writ to him againe in manner following:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of all the parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg for the concluding of a perpetuall peace betwixt them.

Your letters we haue receiued by our embaſſador Muſtapha, wherin you giue vs to vnderſtand, that you

you like of none of the conditions of peace by vs propounded, but onely that concerning our marchants G and men of trade, that they might freely and at their pleasure vse their traffique and trades with their marchandise too and fro: and vpon this condition onely you graunt vs peace. Thus your offer we accept of, and all the rest of your excuses we willingly admit: wherefore I promise vnto thee (my louing Scanderbeg) and will performe all that thou doest require, and vpon that resolution rest: and will so long as I liue obserue and keepe a sincere and inuiolable peace with thee for euer, except thou first giue cause of violating the same. And for that purpose haue we with our vsuall and imperiall seale signed these our letters, which we by our embassadour Mustapha haue sent vnto thee, as thereby confirming vnto thee this perpetuall peace. Wherefore you also (if you be so content) may subscribe, and with your seale confirme this of ours, that I in like manner may also haue your like consent and agreement. And would farther, that you would commaund knowledge thereof to be made by open proclamation through H all your kingdome, as I will in like manner cause to be done through mine. And for the more manifestation of this my loue towards you, I would also that you should vnderstand, That of mine owne meere motion and bountie, I doe freely giue vnto you all those things, which you by force of armes haue taken from my father in Albania and Epirvs, so that you may possesse and enioy the same, as if they had alwaies been yours and your ancestors: Wherefore I giue, graunt, and confirme vnto thee and thy heires, all the right, title, or interest, which I heretofore had therein: and from henceforth will alwayes account and repute thee as prince of Albania and Epirvs, and so call thee. And as I haue pro- mised thee in the faith of a king, will neuer hereafter with warres molest thee or thine, except thou thy selfe giue cause thereof. Wherefore after you haue with your seale confirmed these things, you may commend them to our faithfull embassadour Mustapha, to bee by him brought vnto vs: vnto whom I I would you should in all things giue full credit. So fare you well, and render vs loue for loue. From our imperiall palace at Constantinople, the 22 of Iune, 1461.

A peace cōclu-ded betwixt Ma-homet and Scan-derbeg.

Vpon receit of these letters a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the same by publicke proclamations solemnely published through both their kingdomes, to the great rejoycing of many. Which peace was for a season faithfully kept on both sides, vntill that the Turkes lying in garrison vpon the frontiers of Epirvs, began after their woonted manner againe to fetch preyes and booties out of the countrey. Of which injuries Scanderbeg by letters complained to Mahomet: who answered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and seemed in shew to be much offended with the insolencie of the doers thereof: and foorthwith caused many things to be againe restored. By which meanes the peace before concluded, was still as before continued.

A little before the conclusion of the aforesaid peace, great warres began to arise betwixt the Turks and the Venetians: who all this while being in league with the Turk, peaceably followed their traffique and trades of marchandise, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbours harmes and miseries, vntill that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their owne houses, and as it were to awaken them out of a dead sleepe. For Mahomet after he had subuerted the empire of Constantinople, and driuen Thomas and Demetrius the emperours brethren out of Peloponesvs (now called Morea) rested not so contented, but by his lieutenants and other great captaines began to disturbe the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their possession Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with diuers other strong townes in Peloponesvs, standing vpon the sea coast. And now it chanced, that about this time, Iosue, Mahomets lieutenant in Peloponesvs, had by the treason of a Greeke priest, vpon the suddaine surprised the citie of Argos: And Omares another of his great captaines, hauing first spoyled the countrey about Navpactvm (now Lepanto) entered farther into the territorie of the Venetians about Methone and Corone, making hauocke of whatsoeuer came in his way. With which injuries, plainely tending to open warre, the Venetian Senatours being much troubled, sat oftentimes in counsell, deliberating with much care what course to take in a matter of so great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were best to send embassadours to Mahomet, so to make proofe if the matter might by faire means be redressed: others on the contrarie part deeming it to be to no purpose so to doe; for as much as such great and manifest outrages, nothing differing from plaine hostilitie, could not possibly be done without the tyrants knowledge and expresse commaund. After the Senatours had oftentimes met together, and with many great reasons debated the matter too and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing

(as in consultations of great matters with a multitude, it most commonly falleth out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time, to bring the multitude to some certaine resolution, than it is afterwards to performe the same in action.) In this so great a diuersitie of opinions concerning so weightie a cause, at length one Victor Capella, a noble gentleman and graue Senator stept vp in the middest of the Senate, and there franckely deliuered this notable speech vnto the rest concerning the matter propounded, as followeth:

The notable speech of Victor Capella, to perswade the Venetians to take vp armes against Mahomet.
